Secondly, there was a doctrinal reason for writing. A question would arise in regard to the miraculous birth of Jesus. The whole account must be written out. The midwife gives her testimony. The people around at the time were brought forward with evidence to show that Jesus was not born like other folks. Was his mother a virgin? That was a difficult point, you see. Consequently testimony was invented, with the most honest purpose in the world, giving the whole history of Mary; her childhood, the nurture and care that was taken of the mother of the Christ, how and where she was raised, and all about her marriage to Joseph, so that there could be no doubt whatever on the point—the question as to her virginity.

These accounts must have been written at a time when all these beliefs were entertained. Then, again, some heresy would start up that would need authentications. The necessary documents would be invented, merely for the purpose of giving credibility to a certain class of heresies. Another book would be written to meet these heresies and prove their falsity.

Considering in this way the different motives at work in the early centuries of the Church, you will see how inevitable it was that a crop of writings should spring up more or less legendary.

The names of the more important and conspicuous gospels I will give you; and first I shall mention the Protevangelion of James. It means the first gospel, the gospel about the first things, the childhood of Jesus, etc. James was the reputed brother-in-law of Jesus; he was born in wedlock after Jesus. This contains twenty-five short chapters. It embraces the period from the birth of Mary to the massacre of the innocents by Herod, giving simply the infancy of Christ.

The next one I shall mention is called the Gospel of the Nativity. It consists of ten chapters, and embraces the period from the birth of Mary to the birth of Jesus. It guarantees Mary's virginity up to the time of the birth of Jesus.

The next gives the history from the birth of Mary to the arrival in Egypt—that is, when Jesus was a child. It embraces twenty-four chapters.

The fourth is the history of Joseph, the father. Thirty-two chapters contain what purports to be his complete biography—his pedigree, trade, and all his doings to the time of his death.

The fifth, the Gospel of the Infancy, consisting of fifty-five chapters, embraces the period from the birth of Jesus until his visit to the temple at the age of twelve.

The sixth, the Gospel of Thomas, the Israelite, consisting of nineteen chapters, and carrying Jesus from the fifth to the twelfth year.

I have spoken of the origin of these books. They floated about in Christendom aimlessly for several hundred years. Why they were rejected it is impossible to say with certainty. Most of them were furiously orthodox, and the biographical details, though extravagant in themselves, are no more so than many things remaining in the New Testament. They were probably rejected simply because they were unpopular and fell out of use. They were dropped very much as boys and girls drop Mother Goose when they become of age. There was no ecclesiastical or theological reason for dropping them. As time passed on, they were mainly serviceable to the artists. Those of you who have gone into foreign galleries, or seen copies of ancient pictures in the print-shops, will recognize how large a place these apocryphal books occupied in affording subjects for art. You have seen the pictures of the interior of Joseph's carpenter shop, with little Jesus playing there. You have seen the picture of Joseph with the budding staff which pointed him out as the one whom the Lord had selected as husband for the Virgin Mary.

The miracle plays that you have heard of were all made up from the apocryphal books. They furnished the material in the middle ages for the amusement of the common people.

It was my good fortune in 1871 to attend the passion play at O——, and as I looked on I recognized all through the Apocryphal New Testament. I saw how the whole arrangement was simply a stringing together of the legends and stories taken from those fragments of literature. The whole village was devoted every winter to arranging matters for the play, and the priests took as much interest as any one. The costumes, etc., were imported from Munich.

I will read you extracts from two or three of the best of these apocryphal gospels, to better show their precise character. I have here an edition translated from the best text, and probably the most authentic.

Here the speaker read from the Gospels of James the account of how Mary, at twelve years of age, was given over to the care of the old man, Joseph, who, according to the account, was already the father of grown up children, and a widower. This is related in chapter viii. Next, a passage was read from the first chapter of the Gospel of Thomas, showing what kind of stories were invented of the childhood of Jesus. This chapter tells about little Jesus, when only five years old, playing by a running stream on the Sabbath day, how he formed twelve sparrows from soft clay, and when reprimanded by Joseph for profaning the Sabbath, he "called to the sparrows, and said to them, 'Go, fly away; and while ye live remember me.' So the sparrows fled away, making a noise."

Then other simple stories were read, showing how Jesus puzzled his teacher Zaccheus by his knowledge of the prophets before he had been taught his alphabet; how he restored to life a child that had been poisoned by a serpent; how he caused another less fortunate youth to fall dead because he jostled him, and caused those to become blind who accused him of the act.

The speaker then went on to say that most of the stress of these old writings was to establish the authenticity of the resurrection, and to explain his employment between his crucifixion and his rising. This is a space of time which the New Testament passes over entirely. According to the orthodox theory, he must have been about his father's business. The tradition early gained currency that Jesus spent that time in the under world, going there to preach to the spirits gone before, to deliver the Gospel to the old sages lingering there and awaiting his coming.

This was called Sheol, the under world, wrongly translated hell. It was a shadowy place where the dead flitted about like shades, joyless and sorrowless, waiting for the time when the message of the resurrection should come to them, when those who were willing to receive Christ should rise out of Sheol into blessedness. This story is told in all its details in the Gospel of Nicodemus, he being one of the influential people among the Jews who befriended Jesus. This passage is perhaps the finest as a work of art of any in the whole apocryphal literature.

A portion of the first chapter of Nicodemus was read, describing the appearance of Jesus before Pilate, and the tearing down of the standards in the hands of ensigns; and this was followed by reading the fifteenth and sixteenth chapters of Nicodemus, describing the descent of Jesus into Sheol, the breaking of the gates of brass and the bars of iron, and the final victory over Satan—a passage which the speaker declared to be worthy of Dante.

Mr. Teed and Hydrogen.

MR. TEED, Dear Sir: You assert that it is inconsistent to use the term hydrogen, signifying water-producer, if that is not its real meaning; that I ought to give it its proper name. I have no desire to quibble about mere names. The term hydrogen does not deceive or mystify the scientist; he knows that it indicates the main constituent of water, and is therefore content in the general use of the word.

In alluding to the experiment with the gun-barrel, you ask me to prove that "the oxygen and hydrogen is the substance composing the force." I deem it a sufficient answer to reply that the experiments I suggested are accepted as positive proofs of the composition of water by all modern chemists, especially the experiment of the decomposition of water by electricity, which is not open to the objections you have raised against the former experiment—objections, however, destitute of any real force and undeserving serious consideration. As evidence of my assertions, I call your attention to a work on chemistry edited by John Attfield, Ph. D., F. C. S., Professor of Practical Chemistry to the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, and member of colleges in Europe and America too numerous to mention at this time, published by Henry C. Lea, Philadelphia, 1871. This work is a text-book in the New York College of Pharmacy. I extract from page 18 as follows: "Hydrogen is obtainable from its commonest compound, water, by the agency of hot zinc or iron, or by the action of either of these metals on cold diluted sulphuric acid." Page 20: "The composition of water can be proved analytically as well as synthetically, a current of electricity decomposing it into its constituent gases, twice as much hydrogen as oxygen by volume being produced."

The complimentary phrases applied to me of "a fossil of the old school," and a "fool," and as one advocating an "effete theory," don't disturb me. I am in good company, while you are alone in the advocacy of your pet theories.

In conclusion, I request, if you deem this deserving of an answer, that you will confine your remarks, as far as possible, to a statement of facts and authorities. It would be desirable, I think, to mention the names of the evolutionists who have "set aside the effete chemistry of the past three hundred years"—which, of course, includes modern chemistry as well. W. B. SICKLES.

HATRED never ceases by hatred, but by love; this is the everlasting law.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus

AND HIS MANIFOLD AND WONDROUS ADVENTURES IN THE LAND OF COSMOS.

FROM AN ANTIQUE MS. (EVIDENTLY INSPIRED), DISCOVERED BY I. N. FIDEL, IN CONJUNCTION WITH A. HOOK, ESQ.

Introductory Remarks by the Discoverers.

We read the wondrous discoveries of a Tischendorf. Fired by a noble ambition, we determined to exceed or die! We have exceeded and shall die, but we shall also live! Long after the tall grass shall wave over our honored graves shall we live in the memory of our fellows!

We said to ourselves, Surely this Tischendorf cannot have discovered all the manuscripts; there must be others left; there must at the least be one more; one for us to discover; one perhaps of greater moment to the world even than the one he discovered. Profoundly saturated with this impression, we instantly set about filing our unpaid bills? We were not possessed of a sufficient number. We procured others. We collected many huge bundles, and carefully, yet hastily, we filed them. Thus qualified, we rushed off to the convent—the convent immortalized by the labors of a Tischendorf, and of ourselves! Alas! our absence was mourned by all our friends. Those of them who had furnished us with the unpaid bills were inconsolable. Borne down with griefs, they mourned as those without hope, and refused to be comforted. How they prayed for our safety and our return! But enough of sorrow; let us proceed. We drew near the convent. We saw it. We gazed in mute delirium upon its illustrious and venerable walls. Ha! a man approached us! He drew nearer. We bid our beating hearts be still. He carried something in his hand! Ye gods! what was it? Was it a manuscript? No, it was an iron vessel, such a one as is used for the carrying of ashes. For a moment we were irresolute; but our courage quickly returned. We looked at each other. We glared aloud! By intuition, by inspiration led, we rushed upon the man, and overturned him! The vessel was full to the brim with ashes; yea, pressed down and running over! Like famishing ghouls we dug into them with our fingers; dug until the ends thereof were red with crimson gore! But our reward was full, and great, and glorious, and fat! Oh, Jupiter Pluvius, how fat it was! At the bottom of the vessel was a manuscript!!! We laughed, we shouted, we yelled with unspeakable joy. We threw our hats into the clouds, and they NEVER came back. We danced upon an empty stomach! The owner of the stomach—he whom we had overturned—made violent objections! The wretch, the craven, the ineffable dolt! Bitter and breathless punches we heaped upon him, and at length we silenced him and danced in peace! Presently we examined our treasure. Death, desolation, and despair! it was incomplete! We were speechless, and we howled with many and very grievous howlings. We shrieked until the echoes of Lebanon awoke! It availed us nothing, no, not anything. The manuscript was still incomplete. Ha! we said, We will awake the man, mayhap he can tell of the remainder. The dolt refused to open his eyes! Yea, though we kicked him untiringly, and with unflagging zeal battered him with the iron vessel, did he yet remain silent! We said, We will awake him or perish; we will move the vast heavens, the green earth, and the portly Lord Mayor or do it. We nerved ourselves for the effort and yelled ferociously. At the terrific, appalling sound every button departed, and the welkin and the vesper bell rang again. Buttonless we could shout better, and we shouted. At the hideous clamor the birds of the air fell down dead with fright; the convent reeled to and fro and fell through into the cellar, and the heavens were rent asunder! We looked up, and lo! there was something coming down! The heavens were indeed rent asunder and manuscripts were falling through the opening! Swiftly they descended and fell around us, a mountain, a very Alp of manuscripts! Joyfully we we began the ascent—the ascent of the mountain of manuscripts. Covered with glory, and dust, and creeping things whose legs were innumerable, we at last gained the summit. We sang three Te Deums, and began a fourth. Suddenly we saw a manuscript that was incomplete. We threw ourselves upon it, we clutched it and each other, and rolled to the foot of the mountain. With a trepidation vast, immense, we brushed away the cobwebs and gazed in rapture upon our treasure. It was the missing portion of the manuscript we had found in the iron vessel!! Fearful lest we should be robbed of the glory due to us, we instantly fled. Breathless we arrived in England—London—Fleet Street! With an unutterable joy and a pride unspeakable, we place the invaluable, the precious, the priceless manuscripts before an admiring, a discerning, a MUCH-BELIEVING public. Farewell. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

GOOD people shine from afar, like the snowy mountains; bad people are not seen, like arrows shot by night.

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier,

CURATE OF THE ROMISH CHURCH IN FRANCE, WHOSE VIEWS UPON THEOLOGY WERE NOT PUBLISHED TO THE WORLD UNTIL AFTER HIS DEATH.

Proof the Second continued.

But nothing is more easy than to refute such reasonings or to demonstrate the fallacies of such testimonies. For, in the first place, the arguments that our Christians draw from their pretended grounds of credibility may serve equally to the establishing of either a truth or a lie; seeing, in fact, as we do, that there is no creed, however false, that does not pretend to rest itself upon like grounds of credibility; not one that does not pretend that its doctrine is sound and true, and which, at least in its own way, does not condemn all vice and commend the practice of all virtue. There is not one that has not had its learned and zealous defenders who have suffered persecution for the defense and maintenance of its dogmas; and finally, not one that does not pretend to have had prodigies and miracles wrought in its favor. The Mohammedans, the Indians, the pagans, allege such in favor of their respective religions, as well as the Christians. If our Christians pride themselves so much on their prophecies and miracles, the heathen do not pride themselves one whit less on theirs. Thus it happens that any advantage which might be derived from these pretended grounds of credibility are likewise to be found in about equal proportion in all other creeds whatsoever.

This being the case, as the study of all history and the practices of all creeds and religions show it to be, it follows, evidently, that those pretended grounds of credibility to which our Christians attach so much importance are put forth equally by all other creeds whatsoever, and consequently cannot be regarded as sure and certain proofs and testimonies of the truth of either their creed or of that of any other. The inference is self-evident.

Secondly: To give an idea of the connection between the miracles of paganism and those of Christianity, might it not be said, for instance, that there are more reasonable grounds for believing Philostratus in what he relates of the life of Apollonius than there are for believing all the Evangelists together in what they relate of the miracles of Jesus Christ? because we know, at least, that Philostratus was a scholar, learned and eloquent, that he was the private secretary of the Empress Julia, the wife of the Emperor Severus, and that it was at the request of that empress that he wrote the life and wonderful actions of Apollonius—a certain proof that Apollonius had made himself famous by great and extraordinary actions, since an empress so esteemed him as to order an account of his life to be written expressly for her own use; nothing of which can certainly be said of Jesus Christ, nor of those who wrote concerning him, these latter having been but rude, ignorant men, uncultured and untaught, with not even sufficient intelligence among them to record with order and coherence the facts they tell us of, or to prevent them from contradicting each other both frequently and grossly.

And, with regard to him whose life and actions they profess to describe, had he really wrought those miracles and good works that have been attributed to him, he must infallibly have risen to high repute in men's eyes; he must have been admired, have had statues erected in his honor, as for a god; instead of which he was regarded as an obscure individual, a fanatic and an impostor. Josephus, the Jewish historian, after having spoken of the greatest miracles said to have been accomplished in favor of his nation and his religion, forthwith diminishes our faith with regard to these, and even renders them suspicious, by saying that each and all are at liberty to believe as much or as little as they like of his statements—a sure sign that he had but slight belief in them himself. This is why the most judicious regard all such tales and legends as so many fabulous narratives.

All that can be said upon this subject distinctly proves that these pretended miracles can be equally imagined in favor of what is false and vicious as in favor of what is just and true. And this can be proved by the testimony of what the Christians themselves call the Word of God and by the testimony of him they worship; for their books, which they say contain the word of God, and Christ himself, whom they worship as God-made man, set down and affirm that not only are there false prophets—that is to say, impostors who proclaim themselves sent of God, and who speak in his name—but further set down and affirm that these impostors do work, and will continue to work, such prodigious miracles that even the just will come near being deceived and led astray. (See the Gospel according to St. Matthew, chap. xxiv, verses 5, 11, and others.)

Moreover, these pretended miracle-workers require us to believe in their works and to utterly disbelieve n those of the opposite party, thus mutually destroyng one the other.

It happened one day that one of these false prophets, named Sedecias, seeing himself contradicted by another of his tribe, called Micheas, smote the latter on the cheek, saying to him, humorously, "I should like to know by what means the spirit of God has left me to go over to thee."

But how could these pretended miracles be witnesses of the truth, since it is quite clear that they never happened? For it should be ascertained: 1st. Whether those who are said to be the authors of those narratives are really such; 2d. Whether they were men of probity, worthy of belief, wise and enlightened, and whether they were not prejudiced in favor of those of whom they speak in such laudatory terms; 3d. Whether they had well examined and considered beforehand all the circumstances of the facts they record—whether they had a thorough knowledge of such facts, and recorded them faithfully; 4th. Whether the books or ancient annals that record all these great miracles have not been tampered with, falsified, and corrupted, in the course of time, as has been the case with so many others.

If we consult Tacitus, and a number of other celebrated historians, on the subject of Moses and his people, the Jews, we will find that they were regarded as a nation of thieves and robbers. Astrology and magic being at that period the only sciences in vogue, and as Moses was, it is said, well versed in the wisdom of the Egyptians, it was not difficult for him to inspire in the breasts of the children of Jacob, rustic and ignorant as they were, a sentiment of veneration for and attachment to his person, nor to lead them to embrace, in the misery in which they found themselves, the yoke he desired to impose upon them. All this is quite different from what both the Jews and the Christians would have us believe. By what certain rule are we enabled to determine why we should give credence to the latter rather than the former? Assuredly, there is no likely reason for so doing.

There is likewise as little certainty, even as little likelihood, touching the miracles to be found in the New Testament, as in those of the Old, to be able to fulfill the above conditions. It would be useless to advance that the annals which record the facts contained in the Gospels have ever been regarded as holy and sacred—that they have been faithfully handed down without any alteration of the truths contained in them—since it is perhaps for these very reasons that they should be looked upon with suspicion, and would be all the more altered and corrupted by men who hope to profit by them; the usual habit of the authors who transcribe this species of annals or history being to add, retrench, or change whatever they please, to suit their own design or interest. And this not even the Christians themselves can deny; since—without mentioning numerous other grave and learned personages who have acknowledged the additions, the retrenchments, and the falsifications which have been practiced at various times and seasons on what they are pleased to call sacred history—their own Saint Jerome, a famous doctor among them, explicitly says in divers portions of his prologues that they have been corrupted and falsified—they being already in his day in the hands of all sorts of persons who added to or retrenched from them anything they pleased—and this to such an extent, he says, that there were as many different versions extant as there were different copies. (See his prologues to Paulier, his preface on Joshua, that on the Gospels to Pope Damasus, his epistle to Galeate, his preface on Job, that on the Psalms dedicated to Paul and Eustachius, etc.)

With regard to the books of the Old Testament in particular, Esdras, priest of the law, bears witness himself of having corrected and restored, as a whole, the pretended sacred books of his law, many of which had been lost, and more of which had been corrupted. He divided them into twenty-two books, according to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and composed several others, the doctrines contained in which could be communicated to none but the wise men. If these books were some of them lost and more of them corrupted, as both Esdras and the learned Jerome have so explicitly declared in so many places, there can then be no certainty with regard to their contents; and as for what Esdras says of having corrected them and restored them as a whole by the inspiration of God himself, there can be no certainty of that, either, seeing that any impostor could affirm as much.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

PROF. TYNDALL, in the last of his six lectures recently delivered in the Royal Institution, London, gave his juvenile audience a very clear idea of the difference between visible and invisible heat. Light is the result of waves of luminiferous ether, which strike against the retina. Heat is also the result of ether waves, but we do not require, of course, any special organ to feel them. Heat waves, which give also the sensation of light, produce what is called visible heat. Heat waves which do not effect a sensation of light produce what is known as invisible heat. The illustrations were admirable, as usual.

HE who is thoughtful, blameless, dwells alone, does his duties, if free from desire has attained the highest end—him indeed I call a Brahmana.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of Reading Matter than any other Journal of its class.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 23, 1878.

"Political Organization."

In our last issue appeared an article under this heading, to which we did not have time to append a few words in response. It seems to us that brother Wolff struck the key-note for true reformative political action. Our political parties are as corrupt as they can be. Dishonesty and incompetency are the qualities that rule our country, and we are "going to the dogs," or to political and financial degradation, as rapidly as a people can. It is time for honest, earnest men to act in concert and make herculean efforts to save our country from shipwreck and ruin. O that an HONEST MAN'S PARTY could be inaugurated; that every Liberal in the land would join it; and that the number of honest men might increase ten-fold—yea, fifty-fold! The great curse of our nation is moral and political dishonesty. It is ingrained in the very natures of the people. Almost everybody, especially the ruling spirits of the country, is seeking to gain advantages over somebody else, and to take from society more than they give it. Our Christian civilization has proved a failure; our country is paralyzed, and the cities are reeking in dishonesty, corruption, and villainy. Priests and their followers, rulers and the masses, are alike in the great pit of national and moral fraud. If this is the best Christianity can do, it is time it was discarded and something better taken in its place. If it succeeds no better in saving our souls—and it will not—than it has in securing our national prosperity and happiness, it is to be feared that we are all doomed to the "demnition bow-wows" sure enough! But let men learn to be honest in a private capacity and in a public capacity. Honesty, a rare virtue in these days, is a thousand times better as the governing motive power of a people than all the cunning, sharpness, and political dishonesty that ever was practiced. We must begin at the foundation, and be honest in a private capacity first, and then in whatever public capacity we may be called upon to fill. Let us not try nor hope to gain justification nor happiness by the good deeds of another, but of our own. If it is commendable for another to be honest and true and noble, it is equally as grand and good for every man to do what is true and honest. Selfishness is an essential quality in the human breast, and leads to exertions necessary for our present and future well-being; but the people have fostered it too much. They have too much made it the leading incentive to all our actions and conduct. We care too much for self, and not enough for others; we are too willing to benefit ourselves at the expense of others. If we would all learn to be half as anxious for the good of others, and for the general good, as we are for our own, the world would be immensely the better for it. In promoting the happiness of others we increase our own. It is the best men who study the general good and the good of their fellows as much as their own. O that we had far more honest men, good men, true men! It matters little what their theological views may be if they are only actuated by the higher principles of manhood and good-will to the human race. O that we were able to fill the ranks of our leaders, rulers, and law-makers with this class of men!

O for an honest political party, governed by honest purposes! Can such a one be organized, in which demagogues and political tricksters will not be able to gain control? Is not the object worthy of an earnest effort to accomplish it? Let those who think so be willing to co-operate and move forward in unison. With friend Wolff, we think the Liberal League has most commendable objects, but it does not meet the most vital questions of the day. As important as its provisions are, others are more urgently demanded.

Shall the Liberals of the United States unite in political action? is a question that must soon be decided. We would answer this question in the affirmative. We can number, in the aggregate, hundreds of thousands of voters, and though we may not alone be able to fill places of trust and public service, united we may wield a powerful influence in that direction. Can we not run on the broad ground of honesty and equality, and induce many thousands to join us? Friends, what shall be the response?

We regret that an error in the address of friend J. B. Wolff escaped attention in our last. It is 920 F street, Washington, and not L street, as given.

The Great Religions of the World.—Continued.

It is but proper that a little consideration should be devoted to the religion of the Roman people. Though they borrowed their gods mostly from the Grecians, their religion was essentially different, inasmuch, as their characteristics were unlike the Grecians. The latter were poetical, witty, and fond of pleasure and mirth; the former were a matter-of-fact people, who looked more to utility than to imagery and fancy. The same difference was observable in the characteristics attributed to their gods. The gods of Olympus engaged in festive sports, and sought amusement and pleasure, whereas the gods of Rome were practical, not theoretic; prosaic, not poetic; earnest and serious, not gay and sportive. Herein was exemplified the general rule that the gods of a people partake of the nature and characteristics of the people who devise them and worship them. If the makers of the gods are jovial and happy, so will be their gods; if, on the other hand, they are grave and taciturn, so will be their gods; if they are warlike, cruel, and revengeful, their gods will possess the same qualities. The gods of Rome, says Hegel, are not human beings, like those of Greece, but sullen, malicious gods made by the understanding, even when borrowed from Greek story. They were worshiped, also, in the interest of the practical understanding as givers of earthly fortune. The worship of the Romans was a utilitarian worship, and not one of love or emotion. The religion of Rome was a religion of the State, and with the Romans Church and State were thoroughly united. The religion of the Roman people has been aptly termed a religion of the State. The church of Rome contained little of dogmas or doctrines. Its truths were aimed to be taught by spectacles and ceremonies, and this principle was frequently carried to the point of severity.

Jupiter was the chief god of the Romans, and was considered the "Father of Heaven," and "Father of Light." Many temples were erected to him under different appellations, as Optimus Maximus, Imperator, Victor, Invictus, Stator, Prædator, Triumphator, and Urbis Custos. He was regarded as the supreme god over all.

Juno and Minerva were goddesses of the imperial order and ranked with Jupiter on the Capitoline Hill. Juno was the queen of heaven, and the goddess of womanhood, while Minerva was the goddess of wisdom, intellectuality, and learning. Thus, the trinity, among the Romans, consisted of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, and in them are to be discovered some of the characteristics ascribed to the Christian trinity.

Among the most noticeable gods of Rome may be named the Sabine god, Janus, the god who presided over beginnings and endings, openings and shuttings. It was for him was named the month of January, which begins our year.

Among the subordinate deities were Vertumnus, Faunus, Vesta, Apollo, etc.; and as gods representing the powers of nature, they had Sol, the sun; Luna, the moon; Mater Matuta, mother of day; Tempestates, of storms and tempest; Vulcanus, an old Italian deity; Fontus, the god of fountains; Neptunus, of the ocean, etc. They also had Tellus, Saturnus, Ops, Mars, Silvanus, Terminus, Ceres, Liber, Flora, Pomona, Pales: etc.

The religious worship of the Romans was ceremonial and elaborate, consisting of sacrifices, prayers, and festivals, of which they had a large number. Their year was full of festivals, which were dedicated to their several deities, and in the observance of which, they were scrupulous. They also had days of purification, atonement, etc. They regarded themselves as a very religious people. They had an abundance of priests, sometimes denominated Flamens, and were devoted to their special deities. One order of the priesthood was called Salii, and from early times were called priests of Mars. The Luperci were another order. There is no doubt but that the masses were sufficiently taxed to support their ecclesiastical gentry.

The Vestal Virgins were an order of young ladies whose office it was to tend the fire of Vesta, and prevent the evil omen of its extinction. They were selected when very young; and were required to serve thirty years; they had a large revenue, and enjoyed the highest honors, and to strike them was a capital offense. If a criminal about to be executed met one of them, his life was spared. Dignitaries of the State were required to pay them honor. They assisted at theatres, feasts, and public entertainments. Their presence was supposed to ensure peace and prosperity. They prepared the sacred cakes, took part in the sacrifices, and took charge of the holy serpent, feeding him, etc., etc.

The Augurs were a class of prophets who were appealed to about events to take place. They made their calculations by omens and signs. The Romans when at prayer covered their heads so that no sound of evil augury might be heard. They had many forms of prayers and they were required to be repeated three times to be efficacious.

The Romans as religionists possessed a great amount of liberality. While they were closely wedded to their own gods, they were entirely tolerant toward the gods of those who went to reside among them. Whether Jew or Gentile, they were perfectly willing they should enjoy their religious preferences and worship their god or gods as they chose. They did not persecute other religionists because they did not bow down and worship the same gods they did. In this respect, they were a good example for the devotees of some other religious systems.

The decay of the Roman religion was commensurate with the decay of their nationality. In fact, as a rule, the religion of no people has outlived the national life of that people. All in all, there have been much worse systems of religion in the world than the old Roman, even as there have been worse systems of civilization.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Open Letter to D. M. Bennett, No. 2.

DEAR SIR: When I wrote you my private letters and the communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 8, 1877, I expressed my opinion and appreciation of what I thought you were doing for the cause of Liberalism, and I was willing to help you with hand and heart. But you have compelled me to change my opinion by your wrangling criticisms and your peculiar way of slandering other editors who do not say amen to everything you say, and by misconstruing good endeavors. If you had followed the kind advice of B. F. Underwood—in your paper of Jan. 19, 1878—and others, you would have abstained from publishing another vituperative editorial, wherein you display a great deal of vanity in the lowest form of slander, "contemptious pity" for the "average of editors," and manifest more speculation and jealousy than Liberalism. As you have referred to personal matters between you and your "average editors," please answer the following questions:

1. Did you act in accordance with the advice of Mr. Asa K. Butts regarding the introduction and circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER?

2. Did you use the mail list of The Index when your sheet was started? and who got it for you?

3. Did you give us a true statement of the conversation with Messrs. McKesson & Robbins in your communication "Off the Track," published in The Index of Jan. 31, 1878? and did Mr. Robbins say if another party (named at the time) would coöperate, they would also?

4. When Mr. Abbot says that "Anthony Comstock, having been proved unfit to exercise the great powers of his present appointment by manifest abuse of them to purposes of bigoted persecutions for opinion's sake, ought to be summarily dismissed, and that the possibility of similar abuses of authority in the future ought to be effectually guarded against by strict and precise legislative provisions," and other good kind advice, what motive have you to charge The Index with "an effort is apparently made to defend Anthony Comstock?"

5. Have you in all your various denunciations against Comstock, with which you have bored the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and almost made a martyr of Comstock, said so much against him and his transaction as Abbot does in that short sentence?

6. If Mr. Abbot or any editor or citizen had used such means to circulate a petition as you are charged with by Messrs. McKesson & Robbins in the New York Tribune of January 3, 1878, would you not consider it your imperative duty as a moral Liberal editor, to make inquiry and to use your best efforts to guard the reputation of true Liberalism either against the charge or the offense?

7. Did Col. Robert G. Ingersoll have to pull the wires in the office of the "Postmaster-General and other dignitaries," and was a hint from Washington to the District-Attorney necessary?

8. Can and ought a protege to influence United States' dignitaries to change an existing law and the decision of a district attorney who ought to be competent to judge whether a person should be tried or not?

6. Will you not try to abstain from your harshness and irreverence, and from misrepresentations of those who feel kind towards you, and are true to the good cause, and not over-rate your doings, influenced perhaps by vanity and silly flattery? I ask you not "from reverence for ancient legends, myths, and dogmas," or a belief in a Christ, or "gods and demi-gods," but for your, and for genuine Liberalism's, and for humanity's sake. Sincerely,

CARL H. HORSCH, M.D.

Dover, N. H., February 10, 1878.

AN OPEN REPLY.—Although our correspondent manifests a not very friendly feeling towards us, and though some of his questions are almost impertinent, not to say insolent, we will endeavor to answer them in as amiable a spirit as possible. We doubt not we have faults that are more or less apparent to our readers, among which perhaps vanity is conspicuous, but we try to be governed by upright motives, and our aims are to work in promoting the general good. We have felt that some of our brother editors have acted very meanly towards us, and that without cause. We have felt that they have endeavored to blast our reputation and to bring us into disgrace in the eyes of the Liberals of the country. We have been stung to the quick by this ungenerous treatment, and it is quite possible that while smarting under the consciousness of such treatment we have been a trifle bitter and severe, but we hope we have not been unjust. Far be it from us to censure our friend for the partiality he evinces for his favorite. He has a perfect right to exercise his preference, and we would be the last person in the world to deprive him of it. Now for replies to his interrogatories, and as they are extremely direct and personal, we will answer them in the same personal manner:

1. I did not act in accordance with advice from Mr. Asa K. Butts regarding the introduction and circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I started it and circulated it before I ever knew him or had received a letter from him. He has never attempted to advise me or control me.

2. I might have used a part of the mail list of The Index, though I cannot say positively that I did. I obtained lists of names from several friends which I made a slight use of to the extent of sending out a limited number of sample copies, and for no other purpose. I had the list of The Iconoclast, The Radical, and several smaller lists. Among six thousand names furnished by a friend, I presume was a portion of The Index list, but the party had a right to the possession of the names, and I obtained them in an honorable, legitimate way. I certainly did not steal them. I did not obtain them as The Index list, nor did I ever attempt to induce a patron of The Index to leave the support of that paper.

3. I gave a true statement of the conversation I had with

Mr. Robbins so far as my memory served me. He did say to me that he would coöperate with me by allowing the firm name to remain on the circular if a certain other party would do so. After I so explicitly stated this case, two or three times before this, it seems hardly necessary for friend Horsch to put this question. If he did not believe me then, probably he will not now. He will, of course, do as he pleases in the matter.

4. This is a long question—if it is a question—and not extremely clear. My motives were laudable, so far as I am able to judge, In a five-column article Mr. Abbot not only applauded and sustained Comstock but he endeavored to destroy the force of the petition to Congress I had circulated to be signed for the repeal or modification of the unconstitutional Comstock laws. Subsequently he introduced into his editorial columns an advertisement unfavorable to myself, for the purpose of showing to his readers that I had been guilty of forgery and falsehood, giving this as another reason why the petition should not be signed. This I regard as unfraternal, unkind, and unmanly.

5. I will leave Dr. Horsch and others to answer this question. I certainly have said some things about Comstock that Mr. Abbot has not said, but I will not pretend that I have said it as well or as tersely as he would have done. I only did my best. It is true he has talked on both sides of the Comstock question, while I have occupied but one side.

6. If Mr. Abbott had gotten up a petition calling for action of Congress, and had done precisely as I did, I should not have lifted my voice or pen to oppose his efforts. I think I should have treated him much more kindly than he has me.

7. This question is stated unfairly. Col. Ingersoll did not "pull wires" nor do anything in the slightest degree improper. He simply sent copies of the two tracts upon which I was arrested and indicted to the Post-office Department and asked the question whether it was the purpose of the Department to prosecute persons for sending such matter through the mails. He took occasion also to say that he should defend my case not only before the District Court here, but before the country; but there was no pulling of wires in the matter. Col. Ingersoll may be regarded as a straightforward man, and in my opinion took the correct view of the situation. Abbot, Peterson, and Payne saw fit to take up on the other side—the side of "purity," perhaps—but I will leave it with my readers to decide which was nearest right. I obtained this information in reference to Col. Ingersoll direct, and Dr. Horsch can rely upon it that it is correct.

8. "United States dignitaries" can be and are influenced by various circumstances and individuals, sometimes for good, sometimes for ill. It is certainly to be desired that they may be influenced by no worse nor more mercenary person than Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll.

9. I shall endeavor at all times to perform my duty and do the work I have in hand according to the best judgment I possess. I shall always claim the right to express myself frankly and plainly, even though to some persons who are but partially out of the bonds of superstition I may be considered a trifle "irreverent." I shall try to do nothing really wrong, but I shall not feel it obligatory upon me to gauge my conduct or my language by any standard or regulation prescribed by F. E. Abbot or any other person, even the propounder of these conundrums. Had my questioner asked if I would be a good boy and not be so naughty as to deviate in thought or language from the course so ably and so kindly marked out by The Index," it would have been as pertinent as the question he did put, and as respectful to myself. I may overrate what I do, and may be "inflamed by vanity and silly flattery" but I shall continue to use my feeble abilities to show up the errors of the past, point out the duties of the present and future, and do all in my power to advocate the constitutional rights and liberties of American citizens. I cannot expect my style will please all, nor that every one will approve of just what I say and do on every occasion, but I hope to meet the appreciation and commendation of a majority of American Liberals, and those who condemn my efforts and objects have the privilege of taking as little stock in them as they please.

Hoping my friend will feel satisfied with my replies to his queries, I am respectfully and fraternally,

D. M. Bennett.

Mrs. Clara Neyman gave a most interesting discourse last Sunday afternoon in Science Hall before the Church of Humanity. Her subject was "What Shall be the Religion of the Future?" She took a comprehensive survey of the religions that have existed in the world, with their mysticisms, supernaturalism, and absurdities, and afterwards marked out in beautiful language what should be the true religion of the future, which should be the Religion of Humanity, the religion that will aim to make our fellow-beings better and happier, a religion that will transfer our duties and reverence from an imaginary being above the clouds to our brothers and sisters all around us. By following out the inculcations of this religion, a paradise might be made of this vale of tears. Mrs. Neyman is prepared to lecture before Liberal societies in various parts of the country and at reasonable prices. Address, 97 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

James W. Stillman addressed the Spiritualists at Harvard Hall, in this city, on Sunday evening last, on the subject of "Reform in Education." He discussed the subject from the materialistic standpoint, advocating an entire reconstruction of the present educational system, urging the claims of pure science, and the total abolition of all purely theological instruction. The lecture was listened to with marked attention, and was well received by the audience.

Let it be remembered that every new subscriber whose name is sent in for The Truth Seeker is a helper in the good cause of human progress. Every one who can add a name to the list of truth seekers is doing a good deed. Price, $3.00 a year, $1.50 for six months, $1 for four months, or 25 cents per month. Almost any person can try it for a few months. Remember, to new subscribers, for $3.50 we send the paper one year and a copy of the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," or "Thirty Discussions and Bible Stories," or "The Truth Seeker Collection." For $5.00 we will send the paper one year and "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," or "Analysis of Religious Belief," by Lord Amberley, or Thomas Paine's great works in one volume, or four volumes of "The Truth Seeker Tracts," bound in cloth, and all sent postage free. Let us have a few hundred more names upon these terms.

Maria Monk and Her Awful Disclosures, a new and revised edition, being No. 9 of the Holy Cross Series, we have now in the press. It will be ready to send out in a few days. This work gives an interesting insight into convents and convent life, exposing the evils committed in the name of sanctity and holiness. 200 pages; paper 50 cents; cloth 75, including postage. For sale at this office.

"The Mother of Harlots," or Popery dissected, being No. 2 of the Holy Cross Series, is in preparation and will be out in two or three weeks. Over 200 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents, postage included. Orders are in order.

Just ready.—"Priestly Celibacy," and "Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures," being numbers 10 and 11 of the Holy Cross Series. Prices, 15 and 10 cents respectively.

W. F. Jamieson has been debating with Elder W. J. Orem (Adventist), in Pleasanton, Kansas. Elder Orem told Mr. Stephen Decker, "You promised me that I would meet a gentleman in Mr. Jamieson, and I have." Liberals can afford to be gentlemen in debate as elsewhere.

Bro. Moses Hull lectured last Sunday evening at Harry Hill's. Subject, "God's Revelation—What It Is and What It Is Not." It was listened to with much attention and interest. On to-morrow evening he delivers a discourse at the same place on the popular subject of Hell. The interim he has spent in this city and has been helping us in The Truth Seeker Office. He is willing to do almost anything that will advance the good cause.

Tucker's Radical Quarterly Review.—It is with deep regret we learn that this talented and finely executed Radical periodical is compelled to suspend its issue. It would have been a grand thing could it have been sustained, but it is a hard time for publishers. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

Mr. T. C. Edwards, who for a few months has been engaged in the office of The Truth Seeker, has returned to his home in Vineland. May health and prosperity attend him, lo these many years.

Numbers 1 and 5 of the present volume are exhausted and cannot be supplied. Other numbers are to be had.

Communications.

The Truth Seeker and Infidelity.

Having at an early age, been schooled into the Presbyterian creed and given the prime of my life to the study of dissemination of the Calvanistic theology, I feel prepared, in my humble way, to judge and to speak of the most liberal opinions of Freethinkers. As General Jackson's organ said, "The world is governed too much," may we not yet more certainly say, It believes too much. Patient investigators of science, of which Tyndall is almost chief, seem to me more modest, not to say honest, than professing Christians. These believe, and often affirm they know certain dogmas proscribing such as do not, while scientists are careful to stop as their evidence stops, admitting that they know only what they have patiently learned, and tolerate all ignorance, errors, creeds, and even bigotry.

The Truth Seeker, is certainly doing a good work in this line. For four weeks I have mourned its loss, as a change of post-offices has, as I have just learned, put it into the hands of a namesake, which hereafter is to be corrected. My loss, however, I am glad to say, has been his gain, and if he and others and all of us would but appreciate the priceless value of free, honest thought and discussion, circulating to our utmost the papers maintaining them, our race would beyond all question start hopefully up the ascending grade. But the hue and cry is raised of Infidelity. The editors and papers are Infidel, and this, in the minds of unthinking, priest-ridden masses, damns them. How sad that so many of our kind go by sound instead of sense. A New England town once asked Franklin (certainly not a Christian) to give them a bell for their church, but tendering instead a library, he remarked that he thought sense was better than sound. Shall we not all concur? Where is the man or woman of any brain or candor who believes all things, those in the Bible not excepted? Can any sane person take it all literally as it reads? Even its chronology and conflicting dates are now admitted errors by most theologians, certainly by all even superficially read in geological facts. True, as Shakers interpret round the material resurrection, so do distinguished theologians interpret round the Mosaic chronology of creation. But the sound legal and logical maxim asserts that unambiguous language admits of no misinterpretation.

But could we allow them to thus construe themselves out of Infidelity, there is no escape from the orthodox testimony against the orthodox. Ishmael like, the hand of nearly every church is against nearly every other. I have heard the leaders of the United Presbyterian church, holding rigidly to an inspired psalmody, denounce Watts and all of like sentiments as Infidels for advocating and offering will-worship. Wesley denounces Calvin and his predestinating followers as blasphemers in virtually making God the author of sin, while they unchurch and indeed unbible all Arminians as denying all the strong passages of Scripture explicitly stating the sovereignty of God. Albert Barnes, on Galations, alleges that Luther was an outrageous slanderer and blasphemer in saying that Christ (by imputation) was the greatest of sinners. After trying to prove to an able clergyman's congregration that the Bible did not justify the drinking of alcoholic wines, I repaired to his pleasant abode and partook of his nice dinner. Then, in the parlor, he asked me what I thought of the Samson, fox-fire-and-corn story. Expressing doubt, I asked him in return the same question, to which he frankly replied, "I don't believe a word of it, since the man most likely never saw half so many wild foxes, nor ever caught a half dozen, nor could he keep a single fire-brand upon a single tail, or two together" (Judges, xv, 1–5); nor could the good parson more readily have assented to the story of the unprecedented slaughter, with the unprecedented weapon, which follows in the same chapter, or the no less incredilbe one of his getting, by the Lord's help, water from the jaw bone used in the slaughter. Why not all of us be truth lovers and truth seekers, learning and obeying the good laws of nature around us? These will be found, as far as experience extends, inflexible, and are so ordained for our safty and repose. Let any power or any faith disturb these vital and all-important laws, and we could no longer live awake or sleep in peace. Then, to such as reproach us with the Infidel epithet, we reply, "Physician, heal thyself."

South Union, Ky., W. Perkins.

How Honest Laborers are to be Imprisoned.

The State of New York has a bill introduced into its Legislature to build workhouses for the imprisonment of tramps. The bill provides for the creation of a new office; that of superintendent of workhouses. The salary is to be $4,000 a year, with clerk-hire and traveling expenses not exceeding $2,000. The number of workhouses, or prisons in reality, to be hired or built are unlimited. The expenses of these workhouses are to be paid by the State.

On the first conviction, a vagrant cannot be committed for over six months. On a third or any subsequent conviction, no time is to be specified for which the vagrant shall be detained. Under this provision, a man or woman may, for mere vagrancy, without trial by jury, and under commitment by a single magistrate, be imprisoned at hard labor for life—a sentence that would not be imposed upon any person for idleness if tried by a jury.

Capitalists and thieves not satisfied with robbing the people of what little they have had, and what they should have had—the public lands that have been given to railroads, accompanied by subsidies that come from the masses, which have been used to oppress the very ones that produced it for them—now propose building prisons to confine the people, who they have compelled to go tramping about the country searching for work and begging for bread. They think it an excellent idea to build workhouses and then force the many laborers that are out of employment, under the pretense of vagrancy, to work in them, the products to be divided amongst the few that will compose our oligarchy. If the thousands of honest laborers that are tramping about for the want of employment are put in workhouses and made to manufacture, it will lessen the manufactories, and consequently throw a great many more out of employment, who will be obliged to go tramping and ultimately join their fellow-laborers in the workhouse.

Thus, the manufactories will diminish, and the workhouses increase; then these tyrannizing rascals who have fought so hard to subjugate labor will have their work consummated.

There are probably ten persons now tramping about where there was one a short time ago. It is claimed these persons will not work if work be provided; that they are living this wretched sort of a life from mere choice, not compulsion. This infamous falsehood imposed upon them I contradict. Six years ago we had no tramps worth mentioning, but bad work for all that would work, and they all employed themselves. If idleness is their choice now, why wasn't it then?

Instead of introducing bills into legislature to imprison laborers and spending thousands of dollars in erecting workhouses, paying officers and clerks exorbitant salaries to superintend these usurping institutions, they should pass bills to give each individual a portion of land. The money States would expend in building workhouses and paying officers, let it be loaned to the people to go upon and furnish the lands with stock and utensils. By so doing they will make the unemployed honest and respectable citizens—not vagrants and criminals. If we had had the thieves that committed the great embezzlements within the last quarter of a century, such as Government officials, railroad contractors, Tweed rings, and saving's bank operators, within the walls of our State prisons before they had committed any robberies, we would not have any tramps now.

Ray Chapman.

Communications.

A Church Scavenger.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER: Neither you nor G. F. T. should be too hard on Comstock. While making himself exceedingly offensive to those who love the truth, is he not doing a certain amount of dirty work that it is extremely necessary to have done in order to purify society and protect the people against the moral and spiritual poisons that are festering in our churches? Are not the scavengers, the soap-fat men, the ashes-and-swill-gatherers, the street-sweepers, the sewer scrapers, and the purifiers of our slop-sinks and water-closets really the most important members of society? Do they not keep the poisonous miasmas from the air, diseased germs from our blood, and the pestilence from our homes? Does not the church need its scavenger, as well? If Comstock chooses to engage in that work, though making himself a necessary evil, will not good grow out of the service? How would the corruption festering in Plymouth church ever have been brought to light and Christian churches cleansed of their moral and spiritual rottenness if Anthony Comstock had not arrested Victoria C. Woodhull on a charge of publishing obscene literature, when she simply told the truth in regard to the actions of the Plymouth church pastor? How could the rottenness of our courts, the injustice of our laws, have been so clearly demonstrated if Comstock had not arrested George Francis Train for obscenity when he simply published extracts from the Bible in the Train Ligue with his Beecher comments thereupon? When arraigned in court on the charge of sending obscene literature through the mails, Mr. Train pleaded guilty, and said he had been publishing extracts from the Bible. Had the law been enforced, the Judge should have executed the penalty of fine and imprisonment for violation of the law, and have done with the case. But not so; the Judge, contrary to the law and the rules of the court, compelled him to plead not guilty, and put him in the Tombs to await his trial because he would not accept bail. What was the necessity of a trial when the prisoner had confessed his guilt? Why should a man go throgh the farce of being sent to jail to await a trial to prove him guilty of something he had already confessed he had done? Mr. Train had the manhood to refuse bail and to stick to the Tombs until the parties who put him in should take him out. And there, after six months' incarceration, instead of trying him for the crime for which he was arrested, they thought a man who would stick to his word and who would stand firm for the truth must be insane, and so they tried him for insanity instead of obscenity. It seems that both the Church and the courts in this country have become so corrupt that they don't know the difference between insanity and obscenity, so the Church arrests a man for obscenity and the courts try him for insanity. With such a man as Beecher in the pulpit, and such a man as Benedict on the bench, and a man like Anthony J. Comstock to do their dirty work, we are not surprised that their heads are muddled upon this subject.

The arrest of Mrs. Woodhull by this Plymouth church tool was a direct assault upon the liberty of the people and upon free speech and a free press—the bulwarks of our republic. By the arrest of Mr. Train, they not only violated the rules of the court, but the judges of the court broke the law, and absolutely made it condemn the Bible as an obscene publication. But Truth will vindicate herself, even if she waits until the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER are opened for her to do so. When trampled upon, she always brings her strongest champions to defend her, and, standing in the front ranks, these champions draw their two-edged swords, and slaughter their enemies right and left.

Not satisfied with his efforts to bolster up a rotten Church by the suppression of free speech, and in the arrest of Mrs. Woodhull, and of demonstrating the corruption and imbecility of our courts and the laws, in the arrest of Mr. Train, Comstock, by the aid of forged letters and trumped-up charges, arrested John A. Lant on the charge of obscenity. The object of Lant's arrest was to suppress the circulation of the Toledo Sun, one issue of which contained the celebrated Beecher prayer, which, although blasphemous, had not a word of obscenity in it. It was not written by Mr. Lant, but by Mr. Train. Now, Mr. Editor, unlike you and Mr. Train, I am a firm believer in the truths of the Bible, even from Genesis to the second coming of Christ as described in the book of Revelations—swallowing the story even of the immaculate conception and the necessity of faith in Christ as the gate to immortality—yet I am so tenacious of the rights of free speech and so firm in my convictions of the power of truth to vindicate itself when free to do so, that I would uphold Lant in his right to publish the Beecher prayer, if he desired to do so. If there is anything in the Bible that is obscene, let us know what it is. If there is anything in the revealed Word of God that won't bear investigation, that is false and is ashamed to come to the eyes of an enlightened public sentiment, let us know what it is. If Beecher is guilty of the crime charged against him by Tilton, this prayer written by Mr. Train is not an inappropriate one for him to make.

If a man is guilty of blasphemy, he should be arrested and punished under the laws prohibiting blasphemy, and not for obscenity. But Comstock could not make the charge of blasphemy hold, and he knew that with such courts and juries as he could control he could convict on his favorite charges, and so Lant was arrested for obscenity. One of the charges was for publishing in the Toledo Sun a copy of a little book, "A Father's Advice to Every Boy" which has not an obscene word in it, and which was written for the express purpose of teaching young boys the dangers of secret vices and pointing out to them the paths of virtue and truth. If the Society for the Suppression of Vice would employ a respectable man to distribute this book, and appropriate the money they pay to Comstock to pay for them, they would make better use of the money and do more towards the suppression of vice by far than they do to bolster up a moral scavenger. Through the magnanimity of a Plymouth church judge, Lant got eighteen months in the Albany Penitentiary. Foote, Heywood, and last of all the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER have committed offenses worthy of the attention of the immaculate Comstock. Mind you, the pretended charge, the heinous offense committed every time, is obscenity; the real offense is attacking some guilty church-member, or some favorite church dogma. Has the Church become so corrupt that it is necessary to employ a scavenger to protect its members from having their corrupt practices exposed, and to cover up the rottenness festering within? Have the doctrines and teachings of the Church become so weak and untenable that they are afraid to have its weak points laid before the people? If these doctrines are true, the more they are attacked and exposed to the light the brighter they become; the rougher they are handled, the higher the polish they take on. This attempt on the part of such men as Comstock to prevent exposures is simply an evidence of weakness on the part of his employers. He is trying to cover up, to hide, to prevent the exposures of the corruption that is breeding within. He is hiding with fig leaves the nakedness of falsehood. It was to prevent the exposure of Beecher that Mrs. Woodhull was arrested. It is to hide the rottenness of Church and society that he is persecuting others since. The obscenity that he is trying to suppress is in the Church and not in the publications he attacks. We must simply regard this man Comstock as a church scavenger who, by exposing the conditions of things within the circle of those who employ him, is rendering society a great service. The greatest harm he does society is by resorting to hypocrisies and deceit in doing what he does. He causes many innocent folks to suffer, of course, but it is a kind of suffering that will be the salvation of the people.

Yours for truth, E. P. M.

Who Was Jesus Christ

BY WILLIAM EMMETTE COLEMAN.

1. Jesus was a descendant of David's son Solomon, and of a long line of Jewish Kings (Matt. i, 6, 11); yet he was a descendant of David's son Nathan, and of a still longer line of obscure nobodies (Luke iii, 23, 31).

2. He was the son of David on account of his being the son of Joseph, who was a descendant of David (Matt. i, 6, 16); yet Joseph, the son of David, was not the father of Jesus (Matt. i, 18, 19, 25; Luke i, 34, 35).

3. Jesus had no father (Matt. i, 23; Luke i, 34); his mother's husband, however, had two fathers (Matt. i, 16; Luke iii, 23).

4. The parents of Jesus went from their home in Galilee to Bethlehem to be enrolled for taxation (Luke ii, 1, 5); although, being citizens of Galilee, an independent province into which the Roman taxation could not and did not extend, they were not liable to taxation.

5. Jesus was born while Herod, King of Judea, was living, and in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar was but thirty years old (Matt. ii, 1; Luke iii, 1, 23); yet from the death of Herod to the fifteenth year of Tiberius was not thirty but thirty-four years.

6. Jesus was the son of the Holy Ghost, and was God himself (Matt. i, 20, 21; John x, 30; 1 John v, 7); nevertheless, he increased in favor with God as he grew older (Luke ii, 52).

7. Jesus, when twelve years old, declared that he must be about his Father's business at that time, he being then endowed with superhuman wisdom, astonishing all hearers (Luke ii, 42, 49); howbeit, he made no use of his transcendent wisdom, nor paid any attention to his Father's pressing business, till eighteen years thereafter (Luke iii, 23).

8. He was known by his mother and Joseph to be the son of God, the future King of the Jews, and the redeemer of the world (Matt. i, 18, 20, 21; Luke i, 30, 33, 35, 38); yet they made him a carpenter, and gave him no education (Mark vi, 3; John vii, 15).

9. John the Baptist predicted that Jesus would baptize, not with water, but with the Holy Ghost (Matt. iii, 11; Mark i, 8; Luke iii, 16; John i, 33); yet Jesus did baptize with water (John iii, 22, 23); and never baptized with the Holy Ghost, as the Holy Ghost was never given to any on earth till after Jesus' death, and then not by him, but by the Father (John xiv, 16, 17, 26; xvi, 7; Acts i, 4, 5, 8; ii, 4).

10. John the Baptist declared Jesus to be far superior to himself—John (Matt. iii, 11); but Jesus as emphatically asserted that John was superior to him—Jesus (Matt. xi, 11). A mutual admiration society!!

11. Jesus was driven into the wilderness by the spirit expressly to be tempted of the devil (Matt. iv, 1); notwithstanding, when the devil came to him to tempt him, he forbade him to tempt him, quoting scriptures to the devil to persuade him to desist from doing that which the Holy Ghost desired him to do (Matt. iv, 7).

12. Jesus called a man named Mathew to be his disciple some time after the delivering of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v, 7; ix, 9); which man's name was not Matthew, but Levi (Mark ii, 14); which man, Matthew or Levi, was, however, called by Jesus before the delivering of the mountain sermon (Luke v, 27; vi, 20, 49).

13. Jesus stilled the sea the same day he cured Peter's wife's mother (Matt. viii, 14, 15, 16, 18, 23, 26); but many days elapsed between the curing of Peter's mother-in-law and the calming of the sea (Mark i, 30, 31, 35; ii, 1, 2, 3; iii, 7, 13; iv, 1, 35–39); which cure of the wife's mother was made before Peter was chosen a disciple (Luke iv, 38, 39; v, 10, 11); albeit, the mother of Peter's wife was not cured till after Peter had been called to be a disciple (Matt. viii, 14, 15; iv, 18–20, 23).

14. Jesus, on a certain occasion, was alone; still he was at that time not alone, but his disciples were with him (Luke ix, 18).

15. Jesus bestowed the keys of the kingdom of heaven upon Peter, declaring him to be the foundation of his church, against which the gates of hell should not prevail (Matt. xvi, 18, 19); however, almost immediately after Jesus stigmatized Peter as Satan, the keeper of the keys of hell (Matt. xvi, 23); and a short time thereafter threatened to deprive Peter of his apostleship, unless he submitted to a trivial ceremony (John xiii, 8).

16. Jesus taught his disciples to pray that they might not be led into temptation (Luke xi, 1, 2, 4); yet he, knowing Judas to be a thief by nature, selected him, the thief, in preference to eleven honest men, to handle the funds of the twelve, thereby voluntarily placing temptation daily and hourly in the way of Judas (John ii, 24, 25; vi, 71, 72; xii, 4–6).

17. Jesus cursed a fig tree for not bearing fruit out of season the day following his purging the temple (Matt. xxi, 12, 18, 19); but the tree was cursed by him the same day the temple was purged (Matt. xi, 11–15); which fig tree was seen by the disciples to wither away as soon as cursed (Matt. xxi, 19); though the disciples did not see the tree was withered till the day after Jesus had cursed it (Mark xi, 19, 20, 21).

18. Jesus was clairvoyant enough to see Nathanael from a distance under a fig tree (John i, 48–50); but he was not sufficiently clairvoyant to perceive from a distance that a fig tree had no fruit on it (Mark xi, 13).

19. Judas was declared by Jesus to be a devil (John vi, 71); but after this, Satan entered into Judas, that is, a devil entered a devil! (John xiii, 27).

20. Jesus was sent into the world by God to be put to death and rise again the third day (Acts ii, 23, 24; Luke xxiv. 25–27, 44, 46); nevertheless, Jesus earnestly and persistently supplicated the Father that he might not be put to death, thus entreating an unchangeable God to change his will and alter his well-settled plans, which prayer, if granted, would have prevented the scriptures from being fulfilled, have made Jesus a false prophet, and have entirely frustrated the inauguration of Christianity in the world (Matt. xxvi, 39, 42, 44; xvi, 21; Mark x, 33, 34).

21. Jesus was arrested by the chief priests and elders in person (Luke xxii, 52–54); though the chief priests and elders did not go in person to arrest Jesus, but remained with Caiaphas the high priest while they sent an armed multitude to arrest him (Matt. xxvi, 47–57).

22. Jesus was clad in mockery in a gorgeous robe by Herod (Luke xxiii, 11): but it was not Herod that placed the robe upon him, but the servants of Pilate (John xix, 2); the robe was placed upon him—with the crown of thorns—before the termination of the trial by Pilate (John xxi, 1, 2, 12, 16); it was, however, after the trial had closed and sentence passed, that the robe and crown were placed on the Nazarene (Matt. xxvii, 26, 27, 28, 29): said robe was a purple robe (Mark xv, 17); John xix, 2); which purple robe however was a scarlet robe (Matt. xxvii, 28, 29).

23. The chief priests were afraid to arrest Jesus for fear of the people who were friendly to Jesus (Luke xxii, 2); howbeit, Pilate was afraid to release Jesus for fear of the people, all of whom were enemies of Jesus, and clamorous for his crucifixion (Matt. xxvii, 22, 23, 25; Luke xxiii, 18–24: John xix, 12).

24. Jesus was crucified on Friday, and on the Passover Day (Mark xiv, 16, 17. xv, 1, 6, 25, 42); yet the Passover never came on Friday, and never can, according to established principles of the Jewish Calendar.

25. Jesus's last words were, "My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Mark xv, 34, 37); nevertheless, his dying words were, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Luke xxiii, 46); his expiring words were, however, "It is finished" (John xix, 30).

26. During the time of Jesus's crucifixion and death the whole earth was in darkness for three hours, the veil of the temple was rent, the earth quaked and rocks were rent, and the graves were opened and many dead arose, all of which must have been proof positive of the truth of the mission of Jesus to Pilate and the Jewish people (Matt. xxvii, 45, 51, 52); notwithstanding all which, the day after all those marvels, the chief priests went to Pilate and called Jesus a deceiver, in which statement Pilate, by his action, showed a concurrence (Matt. xxvii, 61–65).

27. The body of Jesus was embalmed before it was buried (John xix, 39, 40, 42); but the body was never embalmed, he having arisen from the grave before the preparations for embalming it were completed (Luke xxiii, 55, 56; xxiv, 1–3; Mark xvi, 1–4).

28. No one visited the tomb of Jesus the morning of the resurrection except Mary Magdalene and other women (Mark xvi, 1–8; Matt. xxviii, 1–10); yet one disciple, Peter, visited the sepulchre that morning (Luke xxiv, 12); which one disciple was two disciples, Peter and John (John xx, 2, 3).

29. Jesus first appeared to Mary Magdalene when she was alone (Mark xvi, 9, 10; John xx, 14, 15, 18); still when Jesus first appeared to Mary Magdalene, she was in company with other women (Matt. xxviii, 1, 9); yet Jesus never appeared at all to Mary or the other women, only angels being seen by the women (Luke xxiv, 1, 2, 9, 10, 22–24).

30. Mary Magdalene knew Jesus when she first saw him after the resurrection (Matt. xxviii, 1–9); but she failed to recognize Jesus when first perceived by him (John xx, 14, 15); she was not allowed to touch Jesus when they first met (John xx, 17); but she took hold of Jesus' feet at their first meeting (Matt. xxviii, 9).

31. Jesus' first appearance to any one after his resurrection was to one woman, Mary Magdalene (John xx, 14; Mark xvi, 9); but his first appearance was to two women—Mary Magdalene and the other Mary (Matt. xxviii); but his first appearance, though, was to two men, Cleopas and another (Luke xxiv, 13, 15); however, his first appearance was to one man, Peter (1 Corinth. xv, 5).

32. Jesus was first seen by the disciples when eleven were present (Matt. xxviii, 10, 16, 17); but only ten were present when he was first seen by them (John xx, 19, 24); howbeit, Jesus was first seen, not by ten or by eleven, but by twelve disciples, though there were only eleven, as Judas was dead and his successor not chosen (1 Corinth, xv, 5; Matt. xxvii, 3-5; Acts i, 13, 16, 23-26); nevertheless, when Jesus was first seen by his disciples, there were more than eleven or twelve present—eleven plus two, plus various others (Luke xxiv, 13, 33, 36).

33. Jesus ascended to heaven in a body composed of flesh and blood (Luke xxiv, 39, 51), although flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God (1 Corinth. xv., 50).

"Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." "Lord, I believe: help thou my unbelief!"

Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, Jan. 14, 1878.

Reply to S. Marshall.

FRIEND MARSHALL: It is not "Our Editor" who objects to giving us both sides of the subject of Spiritualism. He forbears because he thinks the majority of his readers prefer to investigate other subjects. As for myself, I have always felt an interest in reading about spirits, just as when a child I delighted in feasting upon short stories, fairy tales, and accounts of witches and hobgoblins. And I must own that I have had at times a very faint hope that there might be something in this Spiritism that would solve the question of a future existence for the race. But as one phase of the phenomena after another has been pronounced to be humbug, trickery, and clap-trap, and been abandoned for newer and different "manifestations," I begin to despair of there being enough wheat sifted from the chaff to pay for the investigation. I should, nevertheless, be glad to have a column or two a week (no more) of THE TRUTH SEEKER devoted to the honest elucidation of the subject, if there be any elucidation in it; but would rather let the whole matter rest in abeyance, than have its columns open for all who would be ready to fill to overflowing the whole paper with their experience and that of their friends and neighbors. As an instance of what might be written, I will say nearly one-half the houses of this town have been said to be haunted, and some are still so, though I have been unable to get a single item of satisfactory proof that any are really haunted, or ever have been. There are so many journals devoted exclusively to the principles of Spiritists that all who wish can read the subject up to their satisfaction, without our robbing ourselves of better and more substantial matter in the few papers we have that are open to the discussion of real fact, science, and truth. No doubt Webster is good authority as to the generally accepted significance of the word "spirit," but when he affirms it to be "an immaterial, intelligent substance or being," or "Holy Spirit, the third person in the Trinity," he talks of what neither he nor any other person knows anything about. We cannot conceive of the immaterial in any form or shape, therefore I hold that my definition of the word which he quotes is a more reasonable one than his is. Of course Webster cannot give a real meaning to a word, for it is custom that does that. Now, he says "God" is "The Supreme Being, the eternal and infinite Spirit, Creator and Sovereign of the universe," while I say, God is nothing, but that all that is, is eternal, self-existent, and uncreated. So thee sees thee does injustice to Webster when thee calls him inconsistent, because thee substitutes the meaning of one form of expression for another. He divides his definitions according to their accepted usage, and to make him say, "The troops attacked the enemy with great wind," is unjust and unfair.

Now, as to slate-writing, it is my impression that it is all a species of jugglery and hallucination, or else is connected with mesmerism, clairvoyance, magnetism, and psychology. It is clear these things are done, but how they are done is the question. I think it will be found that all is natural, earthly, and the work of forces connected with the living and not the dead. I have never seen any evidence that Plato, Socrates, Swedenborg, Voltaire, Paine, or any of our dead philosophers yet live; nor that Tom, Dick, and Harry, Mary, Susie, or Sally, have ever "come back." If one comes, why not all? If man, why not Old Dog Tray, and all other animals? If animals, why not plants? for all are connected so closely that a dividing line has never been found. Are any of the Spiritual phenomena more wonderful than the marvelous feats of thaumaturgists and Indian jugglers? There may be powers and capacities in the human mind of which we are as yet totally ignorant, but because a thing is incomprehensible to us, shall we call it spiritual?

Would it not be wiser to wait for time to develop and explain the mystery? I have seen those who think they have seen and conversed with spirits—honest, truthful, good people, too—but I believe them to be self-deceived. I doubt if I should believe in the continued existence of man after death if I saw all my dead friends, and relatives one after another, appear before me. It is so easy to be deceived. Our very senses are unreliable in many cases. We have a puzzle called the "running ring"; and of all who have ever seen it there was not one who did not at first think a ring ran from top to bottom of the chain, and it took a deal of explanation to convince them it did not, so real did it look.

Thee says spirit is matter; Webster says it is immaterial; I say it is nothing. Which of us is right?

I shall be glad to hear from thee further, but by private correspondence, as I have had no actual experience in spirit phenomena, so am incompetent to enlighten a public concerning it, as I can only write negatively through common sense arguments. Fraternally,

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Snowville, Pulaski Co., Va.

Evolution and Darwinism.

LECTURE BY MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD, OF BOSTON, AT MARTIN OPERA HOUSE, ALBANY.

After an introduction by Mr. J. Albert Wilson, the lecturer said that the subject of Evolution was somewhat difficult to present in a popular form, yet a subject of such wide and increasing interest among thinkers of every school and phase of thought, involving such important modification of scientific and theological views long held, that no person who deserves to be regarded as intelligent and well informed on topics of the day could much longer remain ignorant of this theory or of the facts and inductions on which it rests. The time when it could be disposed of by the ridiculous question, "How do you like to think your grandfather was a monkey?" has passed, and it is beginning to be seen that those who indulge in this cheap twaddle are persons between whom and the monkey there is not always the greatest distance in ability to understand and appreciate a theory or an argument. Honored by the names of the greatest scientific and philosophic minds of Europe and America, like Darwin, Lyell, Owen, Huxley, Tyndall, and Carpenter, in England; Haeckel and Vogt, in Germany; Gray, Cope, Leidy, and Youmans, in America, it can afford to pass by unnoticed the sneers of the ignorant and the abuse of the bigoted. Evolution, or the theory that the present condition of this world is the result not of a creative fiat but of successive changes occurring in accordance with natural law, and reaching back through immense ages, is not a new theory, although in ancient times it was not presented with the definiteness with which it is now taught, nor with the array of facts and arguments now offered in support of it. Darwinism is later. It attempts to show some of the important principles by which the evolution of species has been produced. Darwinism implies evolution; but the truth of evolution does not depend upon Darwinism. Herbert Spencer has comprehensively formulated the changes of evolution as from the simple to the complex, the general to the special, homogeneous to heterogeneous. The nebular hypothesis is an illustration of this law in its application to the formation of the world. A mass of nebulæ becomes differentiated into sun, planets, and satellites, giving on our globe the variety of land and water, of hill and dale, difference of climate, productions, etc. As Strauss has observed, quite likely the universe is like a great tropical tree on which at the same time is fruit in various stages of production. Planets, suns, and systems come and go, but of matter and the manifestations of force we see no beginning and no prospect of an end. Of a being who made substance out of nothing, or who imparted motion to the world, there is no proof known to science. According to the theory of evolution, consistently carried out, life has appeared in accordance with natural law, and passed from the simple to the complex, from the speck of protoplasm to man. Why declare living protoplasm could not have been evolved from non-living matter? Oxygen and hydrogen—one of which sustains combustion and the other is the most inflammable element in nature—when united produce water, which will extinguish combustion. Are not the qualities of water due to these elements, although separately they bear no resemblance to it? Why not consider the qualities of living protoplasm the result of the union of the oxygen, carbon, nitrogen, and sulphur, of which it is composed? We know as little how or why oxygen and hydrogen will produce water, or chlorine, a suffocating gas, and sodium, a silvery metal, will produce salt as how the elements of protoplasm will give rise to the quality we call life. We need not suppose a first organism. Every living thing, according to evolution, is a modification of some previous form, and thus the living runs into the non-living, the organic into the inorganic. The facts of homology show a primordial kinship between organic forms widely different. All the animals of the earth can be reduced to a few—at most to seven different types. There has been an unfolding, a divergence, a change from general to specialized forms, and the same fundamental structure in the lower and the higher forms is a strong indication of generic relationship. The wing of the bird, the flipper of the seal, the fore leg of the horse and the hand of man are fundamentally the same, or on the same plan. The facts of embryology point the same way. Says Agassiz: "The more ancient animals resemble the embryonic forms of existing species." Haeckel observes that the successive changes of the embryonic development of the highest animal corresponds with the systematic classification of animals by the zoologist. The changes of the embryo are an abridged epitome of the change by which the lower animals have in millions of years been developed into the higher ones. Why do the bird and mammal begin their development as an individual as though they were going to become fishes if they are in no way related to the fish? Why do they have the gill arches, as though they were to breathe in the water, before the development of the lungs? Why do the higher animals in embryo have parts that belong to the lower ones, and which are of no service? In the light of evolution these facts are significant. Observe the facts of rudimentary structure. The little minute, dangling horns in the hornless breed of cattle are an indication that they come from a breed of cattle that had horns. And historically we know this to be a fact. The old objections are losing their force. Links between the bird and reptile have been discovered. The horse has been clearly traced through gradational forms. Mr. Darwin has given some of the principles by which these changes have occurred. More organisms perish than survive. All animals are subject to variation. Individual peculiarities are transmissible. Individuals whose peculiarities bring them into adaptation to their environment survive. The environment is ever changing, and the groups of animals and plants that cannot change must perish; those that can adjust themselves to their environment exist, and thus we have in form and structure, in color and in mental characteristic, "the survival of the fittest."

According to evolution, man's condition originally was one of barbarism. Morality, marriage, government, religion, all his relations have been gradually developed and increased in complexity from the earliest time to the present. Natural selection having ages ago taken hold of the mind, the improvement has been mental rather than in physical strength. And along this line will evolution proceed in the future, if the theory is, as we believe, well founded.

In the whole course of the lecture there was not a word to offend the taste of the most fastidious, and no attack upon or ridicule of religious beliefs. It was, as promised, strictly scientific. Having once been introduced to our citizens, Mr. Underwood will surely be greeted by a much larger house should he come again.—Albany Argus.

Tedious Wisdom.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Looking over your paper for Feb. 2d, I see that we are still called upon to digest and assimilate "great chunks of wisdom" hewn out of cosmos by the renowned prestidigitateur, Rev. Cyrus Romulus Regulus Teed, and in the T. S. of Feb. 9th, he takes "some one" to task for not being able to do so.

In a former number he told us that "matter is the product of a great variety of mutations of mind, itself converted into matter." This he says he "knows intuitively," and now he tells us that water is composed of light and heat on one octave, and that hydrogen is light and heat on another octave, and that one is male and the other is female. "There is no substance in the universe that cannot be converted into some other and all other substances." I suppose he also knows this intuitively. How wonderful all this is! It is true some "fossils of the old school," such as the following, have imposed upon us by telling us that "Mind is the product of matter in an organized form. Indestructible, imperishable, and immortal as it is, so also is its immanent force." (Dr. Louis Büchner.)

"Heat and light are not substances, but simply modes of motion." (Prof. John Tyndall.)

"A particle of iron remains the same whether it crosses the sky in the meteor stone, rushes along in the wheels of the engine, or circulates in the blood through the temples of the poet. These qualities are eternal, inalienable, and untransferable." (DuBois Reymond.)

"Nitrogen, carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, sulphur, and phosphorus possess their inherent qualities from eternity." (Moleschotte.)

In estimating the value of these opinions, however, we must recollect that these gentlemen had not the advantage of "a divinely illumined reason," but derived their information from purely mundane sources. They could not be expected to "know" about "the complementary or coördinating law of involution." Such men as Tyndall, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, and Haeckel had better take down their signs and retire from business. How can they expect to compete with a gentleman that gets his ideas "in pairs—male and female"—direct from "the Garden of Eden"?

Friend Bennett, it seems difficult for you to see what our modern Revelator "is driving at." Why, my dear sir, how can you be so "stupid"?

Has not Mr. Teed himself expressly told us that "The physical universe has one spacic center, which is the focalization of millions of qualitative conditions at the same focal point in space, these qualities being the convergences of force from as many circumferences." Again, "The mental and spiritual or functional universe in its structure is the correspondent of the physical, and has its focal point or center, which is the central functional potency of all existence and being—the origin and source from which perpetually proceeds the life of all function and all form."

There it is! What Doric simplicity! What charming freedom from even the appearance of ambiguity! How it does one's soul good to see the style of Junius revived. Bro. Bennett, how can you fail to see the point? But I remember that Mr. Teed says you are a little "obtuse," so I will come to your assistance. You see, the above language, translated into "United States," means that the universe swings on two hinges. The one is Jesus Christ, Lord God, Creator of Heaven and Earth, and the other is Rev. Cyrus Romulus Remus R. Teed, Esq. Modesty alone prevented this statement from being made by the gentleman at the commencement of the controversy. Seriously, now, has not this thing gone about far enough? I confess that it is getting to be just the least bit "Teed-ious." Besides, we are not prepared for the flood of light with which this new "incarnation of the everlasting Father" proposes to deluge this mundane sphere.

Recollect, I pray you, how it affected Saul of Tarsus' eyesight, and give us

Respite, respite and nepenthe
From an everlasting bore—
Only this and nothing more.

Yours truly, HARRY HOOVER.

Clearfield, Pa., Feb. 13, 1878.

LET no one make small account of the good, saying, it will not benefit me. By the falling of drops the water-pot is filled, and the wise man becomes full of good, gathering it up little by little.

Letters from Friends.

NEW YORK, Feb. 20, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: I have taken Payne's Age of Reason since it first started, and I have been much surprised and pained at the course it has pursued. Believing as I do that "the cause of Liberalism is the cause of truth," and believing, furthermore, that every departure by a Liberal from the strictest truth is an injury to our sacred cause, I most sincerely regret the sinuous deviations which Mr. Payne has made from the path in which all Liberals should walk. In looking over his papers I have been struck with the persistent manner in which he has misrepresented you. He seems to have divided his departures from the truth into two classes—square lies and insinuating lies. I have marked, from time to time, those statements which I personally know to be untrue, and, if you want them, here they are. He has not confined himself exclusively to you in his falsehoods, as you will see, but he cannot state anything about Infidelity, or even items of common news, in a straightforward manner. Notice his prevarications:

1. "It is asserted in this city that Mr. Anthony Comstock is an Infidel, and that his recent arrest of Infidel publishers was a sharp device to help the Infidel cause."—Age of Reason, No. 3.
2. "Mr. James W. Stillman is an Infidel as well as a lawyer. For the former he has been subjected to sufficient persecution at the hands of Christians in this city to cause him to quit the bar and enter the lecture field."—A. of R., No. 3.
3. "Where will you find a paper better supported than the Boston Investigator? In a few years it has changed its proprietor from a poor man to a place among the wealthiest men of Boston."—A. of R., No. 3.
4. "Look at D. M. Bennett. Less than five years ago, while tending a little garden patch in a remote section of Illinois, he began the publication of a little monthly Infidel sheet. A few months later he moved his paper to this city, landing, as he says, with scarcely a dollar in money, and with no knowledge whatever of the publishing business. That was about four years ago. To-day he is estimated to be worth two hundred thousand dollars."—Same Article.
5. "Every dollar has been made out of Infidelity in these four years."—Same Article.
6. "We might cite one or two other instances, but enough has been said to show that Infidel printing pays."—Same Article.
7. "The Infidel population is considerably greater than the Christian."—Same Article.
8. "Mr. Anthony Comstock, the U. S. mail detective of this city has succeeded in his efforts to induce the United States Government not to prosecute the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER for sending objectionable matter through the mails."—A. of R., No. 4.
9. "To this end Mr. C. has labored faithfully with the Government authorities for several months."—Same Article."
10. Speaking of your enlargement, he calls yours an "immense publishing establishment."—A. of R., No. 4.
11. In another article in the same number he says, "Without D. M. B., the business might not be worth above from twenty-five to fifty thousand dollars, but as Mr. B. is now situated, we, with many others, think that there is not a business in this city so profitable which could be purchased for two hundred thousand dollars."
12. In the same article he says you have made "numerous appeals for assistance," and makes other miserable insinuations unworthy of one who professes to be an Infidel. You made but one appeal.
13. "It is probable that there was never a class of people more completely humbugged than have been the Liberals of this country about one Anthony Comstock and his arrest of Infidel publishers."—A. of R., No. 6.
14. "The Liberal papers of every class have given up their columns for the past few months almost wholly to making this man Comstock notorious."
15. "They have aided, by all the means in their power, to fool their readers and to bring lasting odium on the Liberal cause."
16. "And what is it all about? Simply this and nothing more: A few years since the United States mails became flooded with obscene circulars, pamphlets, and books, sent forth by a horde of unprincipled quacks and frauds in this city, Boston, and other large towns. This mass of obscenity, by the aid of the United States mails, was easily and cheaply scattered broadcast over the land, until scarcely a family was exempt from the indecent assaults."
17. "Lewd books and obscene pictures were as common among the youths of the country as were Webster's spelling-books and Brown's grammars."
18. "So great and alarming became the nuisance that Congress was petitioned."
19. "Mr. Comstock, being a Liberal, or rather a Spiritualist,"
20. "Has shown a leniency toward Liberals."
21. "Whereas, in similar cases, where Christians or church-members were the culprits, he has prosecuted unmercifully."
22. "Not until after complaints by citizens and by the post-office officials had been repeatedly made to him for two years,"
23. "And not until he himself was threatened with prosecution for refusing to do his duty and comply with the terms of his oath of office, did he recently notice a well-known Infidel publisher, who was accused of sending obscene matter through the mails;"
24. "And even then no arrest was made."
25. "The publisher was simply asked to go before the United States Commissioner, at his convenience, and give bail, &c., and there the matter would stop."
26. "And there the whole matter did stop, so far as Mr. Comstock was concerned."
27. "But to serve personal ends this little, unnoticeable transaction has been magnified and falsified, greatly to the detriment of the Liberal movement all over the world."
28. "If the Liberal press of this country wish to stand before the public as falsifiers and maligners; if they wish to attach a lasting odium to the term "Liberal," and make it a stench to the nostrils of all fair-minded men and women, they will not apologize for the slanders and lies they have published about this Comstock-Infidel-obscenity matter."
29. "The Spiritualistic papers especially owe Mr. Comstock a personal apology."
30. "They would owe him as much even were he not a Spiritualist."
31. "It would at least be well for these papers to consider that no one's liberties have been put in jeopardy; no one's rights have been abridged."
32. "An United States officer was ordered to enforce the law. In place of this, he politely warned the violater, and that was all."
33. "There was no one molested."
34. "Privately and personally the relations between the United States officer and the accused were friendly."
35. "Why is it that the intelligent editors of the Liberal press allow themselves to be made the dupes of scheming, unprincipled outlaws and quacks?"
36. "And thus by publishing column upon column of lies,"
37. "Have arrayed the whole Liberal movement on the side of obscenity, vulgarity, and filth.
38. "For this flagrant insult and lasting wrong, more than all else, they owe to Liberals of whatever name an unequivocal apology and retraction."

The last twenty-six falsehoods are all in one article (A. of R., No. 6).

39. "We are told that Liberal editors have been prosecuted by the United States Government. Where? Not in New York."
40. "No attention whatever has ever been given by the Government to any Liberal or Infidel editor in this city, as such."
41. "The Government found that one Foot was flooding the mails with indecent literature, greatly to the detriment of the good morals and well-being of her subjects, and the Government made him stop."
42. "Foot was a Christian."
43. "That an Infidel might make a few thousand dollars, all the obscenity that has ever existed in this country is now shouldered by Infidels."

These last six are from A. of R. No. 7.

44. "If to oppose obscenity, forgery, embezzlement, desertion and cruel treatment of one's family; if to oppose double-dealing, fraud, slander, and other kindred acts which reason teaches us is not in harmony with the well-being of society—if to oppose these things is to oppose the Liberal cause, as Brother Bennett intimates in his TRUTH SEEKER, then we plead guilty. If to espouse the Liberal cause is to espouse all forms of vice and to oppose all civil law which punishes crime, then we do not belong to Brother Bennett's school of Liberals."

This, Mr. Bennett, I regard as a mass of contemptible insinuations. I have read THE TRUTH SEEKER for the more than four years it has been published, and I never, never knew it to intimate anything of the kind; and if Mr. Payne has, I shall be glad if he will point to the place. He can't do it.

45. "We have never been guilty of," and
46. "Are totally incapable of, penning a libel on any human being."
47. "The charge of forgery has been publicly made against him [Mr. Bennett],"
48. "As well as that of libel—for which we are told he now stands indicted."

The last five are from the A. of R., No. 8.

49. "ANTHONY COMSTOCK ON BELIEFS.—In the Vanderbilt will case in this city Mr. Anthony Comstock—about whom the Liberals of this country have imbibed many false notions of late—said: 'We object to this evidence because it invades the domain of human beliefs concerning which an issue cannot properly be made in a court of justice. Nearly one-half of the Christian world believes in the infallibility of the Pope. We may feel as confident that that is a delusion as that clairvoyance is, yet we have no right to pronounce insane those who believe in it. So the doctrine of the immaculate conception, also undoubtedly a delusion, is still believed in by a part of the Christian world.'"—A. of R. No. 9.
50. "In urging this movement [the establishment of Infidel papers] we wish not to be understood as urging the establishment of quack prints issued from our large cities with the sole purpose of enriching their proprietors. The Liberals of this country are not in want of any more pious-begging sheets, filled with forgeries and lies, and sent over the country for the express and only purpose of swindling unsuspecting countrymen under the disguise of Liberalism."—A. of R., No. 9.
51. "The New York Sun says: 'Payne's Age of Reason is the best and by far the cheapest Freethought journal in the world.'"—A. of R. Advertising Circular.

Will Mr. Payne please give the date of the Sun in which this appears? Let him recollect that bogus testimonials smack strongly of patent-medicine dodges and are little better than forgery.

52. "New York is a place where no one need work for a living unless he chooses to, and finds that physical exercise is necessary to his health and comfort. The sweat of the brow is not essential to procuring bread in this favored place."—A. of R., No. 8.
53. "One has only to ask and he will receive."—Same Article.

The piece on Anthony and his belief is, I suppose, as near the truth as Mr. Payne is capable of approaching; but, to any one who has read the paper, the trick is as thin as he intimates your editorials are. Comstock never said one word of the above. It was spoken, I think, by a judge to whose prejudices an anti-Spiritualist lawyer was appealing, and who was introducing evidence calculated to throw discredit on the belief of our Spiritualistic friends. The speech was published in The Banner of Light at the time. Another thing, if I recollect rightly, Comstock had nothing to do with the Vanderbilt will case. The man who said that is evidently not a Spiritualist, as he calls clairvoyance as much a delusion as papal infallibility or the immaculate conception, and Mr. Paine has stated (lie No. 19) that Anthony is a Spiritualist. If he is he would not have said what Mr. Payne has credited him with. But with so many lies out Mr. P. cannot be expected to remember all, and so it is no wonder he sometimes gets them mixed. A man must have an awful memory to be a consistent getter up of false statements. The whole thing was evidently concocted in what passes for the brain of Seth Wilbur Payne.

His allusion to "quack prints issued from large cities with the sole purpose of enriching their proprietors" is evidently intended, judging from his other utterances, for you. It shows to what meanness an alleged Infidel can descend when hard pushed for matter from which to manufacture lies. If the Infidels of this country have had any "pious-begging sheet filled with forgeries and lies, and sent over the country for the express and only purpose of swindling unsuspecting countrymen under the disguise of Liberalism," it is Seth Wilbur Payne's abortion on newspapers falsely called the Age of Reason. I have pointed out fifty-three lies in regard to you and Liberals—and there are more which on their face bear a close remblance to these—which I know from my own personal knowledge are such. And I presume all his other statements are twin brothers to them.

He says, in a spasm of virtuous indignation, that he is "totally incapable of penning a libel on any human being." It may be so, but the "twelve good men and true" must have been fearfully mistaken when they convicted him of libeling an honest, upright judge—who was several times elected to the important position of Mayor of Utica, N. Y.—and for which Payne suffered imprisonment in the penitentiary. Mr. Payne has a record, and it would not redound to his credit, perhaps, to have it overhauled. He is the best judge of that.

If Mr. Payne regards it as forgery to issue a circular with the name of a firm attached with the tacit consent of one member, what does he call issuing a circular lauding himself as a writer in a half dozen or more newspaper notices from large journals, which those journals never saw, and which they never would have allowed to circulate had they known of their existence? I saw some of those circulars a few months ago. They purported to be an advertisement of a book of biography of leading journalists, and to the self-puffing notices were attached the names of some of the prominent papers of this city. Every one of those notices was written by Seth Wilbur Payne. His quotation from the New York Sun is of a piece with his circulars. The Sun, as the Sun, editorially, never printed what he says it did. It may have done so as a paid advertisement, but not otherwise. If Mr. Payne is the saint he would have us think he is, it may be well, perhaps, for honest people's good names that there are a few sinners in the world.

The Age of Reason's remarks about Mr. James Stillman of this city are laughable. Mr. S. is a lawyer known to me personally. He never had a lucrative practice, and has all the time complained of hard times. When he read the above in the little sheet, he said, "What damned nonsense!" That was Mr. Stillman's comment on the article.

As to your alleged great wealth, I know it to exist only in the imagination of Mr. Payne. I have been a sympathetic witness of your almost superhuman struggles to establish THE TRUTH SEEKER on a firm foundation, and I have seen, with a joy second only to your own, its approach to a sure success. But as for two hundred thousand dollars, it is absurd to think of it, much less talk of it. You may not know, but I do, that Dunn, Barlow & Co. and the McKillop Sprague Co. only rate you as "good for small lines," with a "capital of from three to five thousand dollars." Which is the more likely to be correct, firms whose business it is to classify business men, and on whom hundreds of thousands of merchants rely for their information in regard to city dealers, or an ex-convict from a penitentiary? I leave it for your readers to decide.

Mr. Payne intimates that you were not arrested. The story is like that of the names appended to his circular. I saw Anthony Comstock and a U. S. marshal take you from your office; I saw you in charge of that same marshal in the U. S. Court building in this city, and had it not been for my personal efforts in procuring bail, you would assuredly have gone to Ludlow-Street jail. I was an interested spectator of the proceedings before Commissioner Shields on several occasions, and when Mr. Payne says you were not arrested, I pronounce it a falsehood worthy only of himself and Anthony Comstock. There were other witnesses to your arrest as well as myself, and if Mr. Payne had taken the pains to get at the truth that he has to misrepresent you he would have thought twice before making the assertion that he did.

And so with every one of the fifty-three falsehoods I have pointed out. They are so plain that no word of denial or refutation ought to be needed; but as they may be believed where Mr. Payne is not known, it is well they should be shown up. The Liberals of this country ought to give Mr. Payne such a lesson as will teach adventurers for all time that Infidels are not to be caught with clumsily conceived lies. He should be read from the ranks of Freethought as the Judas Iscariot who betrayed our cause for a paltry thirty pieces of silver. He is either insane or an imbecile, and, throwing this mantle of charity over his unworthy shoulders, let us bury him and his Age of Reason forever from the sight and hearing of truthful men.

A LOVER OF TRUTH.

BARD, PA., Jan. 24, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I see by your paper that you got out of the clutches of Comstock, and I rejoice with all my heart.

I knew nothing of you or your excellent paper until I saw your advertisement in the Advocate. Then I sent for a specimen copy, and got it on Dec. 1st, which showed me at a glance that you were a good man, and a good friend and brother, and there was at once a "mystic tie" between us. I cannot tell you how much I was gratified and delighted by the noble principles manifested by you and your friends and correspondents. Neither can I tell you how much I was grieved and displeased by the distress put on you by that "snake in the grass," Comstock. My old war spirit was aroused, and my blood was made as hot as ever it was for nine and forty years. I and other ones suffered that we might have a free country. There is no soul of man knows, or can know, the full measure of suffering a soldier has to endure, till he learns it by experience. Yes, we all suffered that liberty might live; that we might have free speech, and free press; free conscience, and the liberty to call our souls our own; and then to see our blood-bought heritage invaded—and by authority of the Government that we risked our lives to save, and by such people, and for such a purpose as to crush out honest men, guilty of no crime—filled my soul with grief and indignation! I determined to stand by you to the utmost of my ability. So I sent you a token of my brotherly love and esteem, the assurance of very profound sympathy, and that, however poor, I would raise you a dollar or two. When I got a dollar, I sent it and got two books for forty-five cents, and for the other fifty-five cents I prayed you to send me your paper for three months, and by the end of that time I felt sure of getting money, when I would extend my subscription and redeem my pledge. I now send another dollar, and I wish you would put my name once more upon the roll, making twice, and keep it there while we both shall live. I want one paper every week to put away with such good, Liberal books as I can get, to go with my blessing and solemn charge to my children when I go hence; and the other paper every week, I want to read and hand around and send to such as love, or may love, our Liberal principles. I got along pretty well with the last two petitions you sent me; got twenty-five names, making with those and the others thirty-five names. The first I sent to you, and the last I sent yesterday to Campbell of the House, and J. Don Cameron of the Senate. I will hand your paper around, and I will pay you just as I say, and if "Scar-faced Tony" or any other one lays the heavy hand of oppression on you again, I will pay you more I will get you a subscriber or two. Everybody here knows me. I preached for them twenty years, till my stomach got turned wrong side out by the scoundrelism of the Church, since which, Jimmy Rollins has not taken any more Christianity "in his'n." Fraternally yours, JAMES ROLLINS.

LINCOLN, NEB.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a five-dollar money order; two to pay my subscription for the year, and three as a donation to you—one each from myself, Edwd. Cockran, and F. H. Tracy—to assist you in your fight with Anthony Comstock, or, rather, with the canting, hypocritical organization (Y. M. C. A.) of which he is the dirty and despicable instrument. The "widow's mite" was according to her means. Our donation is like it, but there goes with it an amount of good will more than I can tell you. If my purse was as long as my will is strong on this subject, you would get from me, instead of one dollar, one hundred times one dollar. This is a fight for the liberty of mankind—the rights of man. They strike at you because you are in the front rank, one among the foremost who are heroically doing battle for our sacred rights. This is not alone your fight, and you must not be left alone to bear the brunt of it. Every liberal-minded man or woman, every lover of humanity: has an interest in this struggle. This is the old fight of tyranny and oppression against liberty of thought and conscience. Every man who holds such liberty dear for himself and his posterity should now come forward to the extent of his means and ability and make this quarrel his own. But right here let me ask where or what is the law under which you are arrested? I wish you would publish it. Is it possible that our national legislature has become the willing and pliant tools of superstition and priestcraft? Can a man be arrested, tried, convicted and punished, for uttering an honest opinion? Is the Church the ruling power in our land of boasted liberty and freedom? Can it prosecute and persecute whom it will without let or hindrance? I am not familiar with the law, but I venture to affirm my belief that the man at whose instance you were arrested, the man who swore to the pretended or assumed facts necessary to make the arrest, knows himself to be a perjurer. He knows that only a strained construction of the law makes it possible to arrest you upon a charge of obscenity. He knows you are not guilty of the charges alleged; but you are dealing some heavy, and telling blows at the Church, and must be reached and silenced, even if it takes perjury to do it. I can only indulge the hope that this persecution will result in benefit instead of injury to you by making your truthful and outspoken paper, and all of your publications, more widely known and sought after. This must be the result if Liberals do their duty. Our enemies have attacked us through your arrest, and we must fight.

Yours very truly, A. E. Rogers.

Detroit, Mich., Feb., 5, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Friend: I herewith enclose you a draft for six dollars for two copies of The Truth Seeker for this year—one for myself and the other please send to the address of H. H. Harriss, of Detroit, with back numbers. Absence on a business tour through the Western country necessarily placed me beyond immediate sympathetic access to you during the severe tribulation through which you have been caused to pass by the notoriously wicked, villainous, Jesuitical agent of the Young Men's Cursed Association; and it is almost inopportune for me to speak of it at this late date, especially after so many noble, friendly Liberalists of the country rushed to your rescue, not only with their sympathy, but what, under the circumstances, was still better, with their money. Since my return I have read up the matter with feelings of sorrow, pain, and indignation—sorrow to think that the hydra-headed monster, superstition, has still vitality enough left in its serpentine coils in this supposed-to-be free country to rear its venomous head and strike its poisonous fangs into one who was giving his life and talents to the cause of science, truth, and suffering humanity; with pain at the idea that our national legislature was made up of a material that could be cajoled and wheedled into hasty, inconsiderate, and unwise legislation, by which its power has been lent to an association, destined ere long, if not checked, to rival the infamous and bloody Inquisition, and, which insidiously aims a deadly blow at the very life and genius of the Government; namely, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and equal toleration of all religious beliefs or disbeliefs, unsupported by the bayonets of an ignorant, bigoted, mercenary soldiery; with indignation at the thought that the courts of justice—in a land that has been enriched by the very blood of its heroes and of nature's own noblemen, who bled that equal justice might be dispensed to all—can be prostituted to the degrading, blackmailing, damning purposes of supporting and enriching a vile, unprincipled, pretended conservator of public morals.

I received the blank petitions you sent me praying Congress to repeal those odious Comstock laws, but, sir, I did not solicit subscribers thereto, for the reason that I could not take the time nor exercise the patience necessary to explain to an unenlightened—on this subject—public the danger of this rumbling volcano over which tuey are sleeping. And, in fact, I do not believe in memorializing Congress in relation to this matter. No sir! let a corrupt and Christianized Congress pass their odious laws, to bolster up ignorance and superstition, in this boasted land of liberty. Let the Young Men's Christian Association, the Jesuits of Protestantism, throw around their system of pagan religion, which has been in the throes of dissolution ever since the adoption of our Constitution, all the legislative supports and Government ligatures that she can bring to bear. Such action is the legitimate fruit of the Evangelical Alliance, which, in one of its recent sessions, held in this city, declared it "the duty of our Government to determine which is the true religion and then to enforce its practice and observance." It is a most unmistaken evidence of their weakness. It is "the handwriting on the wall"—the shadow of the trembling Christian Belshazzers in their riotous feasts of licentiousness and superstition—the fleet-footed and hasty forerunner of their final overthrow and speedy destruction. It is just such over-reaching, clutching, grasping efforts of fear and despair that the keen eyed and far-scented historian always looks for as the shadow that coming events cast before, and as preceeding the downfall of every system, that, having no truth for its foundation, must depend upon special legislation or a standing army for its support. It recalls the old story of the Hebrew slaves in their fabulous sojourn in the land of the Pharaohs, who, as a punishment for their clamor for liberty, were subjected to still harder burdens of servitude by their cruel task-masters, immediately preceeding their exodus from the land of the tyrant. And it brings up, with distinct, vivid, and fresh recollections, the desperation of a South, which among many other overreaching and unconstitutional measures resulted in the passage of the infamous Fugitive Slave law to which they resorted in the vain effort to stay the tide of anti-slavery and human freedom; and, which, instead of checking, only swelled the flood that all the sooner swept their Bible institution into the sea of oblivion. And so with Christianity, in the womb of which the Y. M. C. A. was incubated, and in the interests of which arose the passage of the infamous Comstock laws and others, that will be passed in the near coming future, all of which are only so many premonitory symptoms of ruin. The "cloud about the size of a man's hand," seen in the religious sky, that will soon increase in size and swell in proportions until the all-powerful, portentous storm-cloud of science, rendered all the more terrible by the rumbling sound of its muttering thunders, will sweep every vestige of superstition from this land of our fathers, dedicated to humanity and equal rights. Christianity is a doomed system and if its reputed founder, Jesus, told the truth when he said, "for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword," then Christianity will go out in the midst of smoke, fire, and the sword, for, never has its encroaching and unhallowed feet pressed one foot of the virgin soil but what it either first baptized it in blood, or immediately thereafter. And why should it not perish? It is an alien—the legitimate offspring of Oriental superstition, nursed by its foster-mother, pagan Rome, and has no business here. It is not indiginous to, and cannot thrive in the virgin soil and under the free skies of the land of our Infidel fathers. It cannot breathe nature's pure air, that fanned the brows of a Franklin, a Washington, a Jefferson, and a Thomas Paine. It must either receive special legislation to circumscribe and curtail its encroachments of science, which they call obscenity and blasphemy, that is fast rooting out their poisonous exotic of a foreign clime, or it must perish. Then let the infamous Comstock, this ignoble son of an ignoble sire, this Jesuitical agent of the Jesuitical Y. M. C. A., procure still more odious Congressional enactments to prop up their hell less institution of religion. It will only be the means of hastening its final overthrow. You have escaped triumphantly: although, like their good old Daniel, you have been thrown into the lion's den; but you have escaped. The God of an enlightened public sentiment was too strong, and it closed the Christian lions' mouths, and you have come forth unharmed, all the more strong and powerful for good than ever. While the miserable, sneaking Comstock has to stand back like a hungry wolf and lick his bloody jaws.

And now, friend Bennett, should you ever again fall into the hands of this Delila-shorn Samson, this Goliath of Christianized Gotham, or should his keen-scented Christian nostrils snuff obscenity from the air emanating from or lingering about The Truth Seeker editorial sanctum, or should his hypocritical cry of blasphemy, like the yelps of the toothless hound, or the harmless venom of the fangless snake, ever again be heard on your track, all you need do, to check his blind, hydrophobic speed—to quiet his zeal for purity, assuage his grief for blasphemy, restrain his fears of public contamination, soothe his morbid tendency to impure thoughts, administer sedatives to his inherited, unsubdued, abnormal prurience, and check the rising passions that a knowledge of how marsupials propagate may create—will be to take your measure of the villain, fix your price on him and draw your check for the amount on some bank where you have no money deposited, get him thereupon to enter a nolle prosequi, and thus beat the cuss at his own game. Most respectfully yours, U. K. Booth.

Hartford, Ct., Feb. 14, 1878.

Friend Bennett—Dear Sir: I see by your report that you are $15.50 short in your expenses in the good fight you have made for the cause of liberty, equality, and justice. I see by the Age of Reason (Payne's) that he and some others are very much agitated over the matter, and are very anxious to know what you are going to do with the money. This, in my own private opinion, is none of their business. You have done a glorious work for the cause. This is not your fight alone, but for every truth-loving Liberalist and Spiritualist in the country; and you have not been half rewarded for it. I would not have done the labor and suffered the care and anxiety you have for double the amount you received, and any man who finds fault is a mean, cringing sneak, and not worthy the name of a Liberalist or Infidel; and I warn the editor of the Age of Reason that unless he changes his course toward you, failure, in the end, will surely be his doom. I will not tolerate such articles as I saw in the Age of Reason in behalf of Comstock, in which he represented that mean, vile, low-lived man as almost a saint. Such stuff was altogether too much for me, and Payne will find it will load him much heavier than he can bear before he is done with it.

D. Bodifield, M. D.

Ottawa, Kan., Feb. 15, 1878.

Dear Mr. Bennett: We have organized here as the Ottawa Liberal Club, James E. Lindzy, President, and W. W. Fraser, Secretary.

We would have sent a fair list of subscribers to Payne's Age of Reason had he not attacked you as he did. We care nothing for Peterson and his Common Sense. We want Liberal papers and Liberal men as editors.

Yours truly, W. W. Frazer.

Arenzville, Ill., Feb. 14, 1878.

D. M. Bennett: Payne sent me a copy of his Age of Reason, and also some circulars. It was my intention to take the paper, and I had got two others to take it. All I can say is that I would not now have it as a gift, after he has made the efforts that he has to vilify you. If it is true that you have made $200,000, whose business is it but your own? Toney's fight is not yours, but mine, and every other Liberal's in the United States. Give us all of Ingersoll's lectures, as they are good. As a general thing, his lectures are sought for among the Christians. He has a world-wide fame with the people. Respectfully, W. B. R.

Cambridge, Ill., Feb. 13, 1878.

D. M Bennett, Dear Sir: The following in regard to St. Anthony I copy from a letter from a gentleman who seems to understand the matter: "It is sickening enough even when he walks up to it honestly and eats nothing but to see a turkey-buzzard glutting himself upon carrion, putrid flesh, but when he goes to his work like a mean sneak thief, and, forgetting that he is only a scavenger, begins to peck at the eyes of animals that are not dead or even diseased, we think it is about time that he was shot and thrown upon the dunghill himself." J. A. Hart.

Mr. Bennett: Mr. Payne, in the Age of Reason of the 9th inst., in giving the names of those from whom he had received letters during the week, mentions mine. He says, "These letters are all of a friendly nature." Now, I do not know what Mr. Payne defines as "friendly," but I want it distinctly understood that that letter was not "friendly" in any such way as would imply an endorsement by me of his most uncalled-for and unjust attacks upon yourself. I believe that the gentleman has not the shade of a shadow of an excuse for his insinuations and charges against you. I am certainly "friendly" to all Liberal papers so long as they devote themselves to that cause, but so soon as their editors prostitute their columns to malicious attacks upon their brother editors, I cease to be friendly. The letter in question was written to Mr. Payne to point out to him some of the instances in which he had failed to do justice to yourself. May every success attend you, brother Bennett, in your laudable efforts to emancipate the minds of your fellow-men from the bondage of superstition and ignorance. Mr. Abbot I regard as one of the noblest of Liberals. Let there be no quarrel between you. He is mistaken in this matter; that is all.

Fraternally yours, E. C. Walker.

Kalamazoo, Mich., Jan. 28, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Sir: I am a trial subscriber to Payne's Age of Reason, as well as a constant reader of The Truth Seeker. I have received my last trial paper, dated Jan. 26th, and on the fourth page, under the head of editorial, I was somewhat astonished to hear my friend Seth on the Comstock matter. What ails the man? Is it a common case of jealousy? A brother worker in the same building, engaged in the same great and noble cause—we did not look for such a budget of bitterness from such a source.

Now, friend Bennett, is it a fact that you were not arrested by Comstock at all? Have you and Comstock been on friendly terms during the last three months? Sorry to hear that Comstock is a Spiritualist; is it a fact? Would brother Payne feel just as bad if your paper had remained at its original size? Would he have been consoled if no one had come to your rescue? Alas for poor human nature! Remember, Wilbur, that whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

Old orthodoxy stamps everything it comes in contact with, even children. At a recent temperance meeting here, quite a noted Liberal took strong grounds in favor of organization, whereupon a young orthodox hopeful was heard to remark that it would be "a hell of a temperance society without any God to go by."

Yours truly, L. S. Benedict.

Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 10, 1878.

Dear Friend Bennett: I am very much disappointed in the course being pursued against you by the Age of Reason. I am a subscriber, as you know, to that paper, and have the names of four others who would have been subscribers to it had they not seen the scurrilous hints and language used toward you by the editor of said paper. We have known you too long, old friend, not to trust our cause in your hands. I have been greatly pleased by the manner in which you have engineered the affair of Comstock, and had I paid $20,000 I should most willingly be satisfied with your control of it, knowing full well it would be put to proper use, and not devoted to an illegal purpose.

Yours truly, W. F. Porter.

Useful Recipes.

Cure for Sprains.—Alcohol, one pint; oil of spike, one ounce; origanum, one ounce; camphor, one ounce; spirits ammonia, one ounce.

Hair Dye.—Lac sulphur, one ounce; sugar lead, one-half ounce; rose-water, one pint. Apply the wash about four times a week, but do not shake before use.

Lip Salve.—Oil of sweet almonds, eight ounces; white wax, three ounces; spermaceti, three ounces; rhodium, fifty drops, and white sugar candy form an excellent lip salve.

Chinese Depilatory.—Quick-lime, one ounce; pearl-ash, two ounces; sulphuret potassium, two ounces; charcoal-powder, one dram. Triturate together and sift and place the fine powder in a well-stopped bottle.

Hair Restorative.—Castor-oil, eight ounces; tincture cantharides, two ounces; blood-root, one ounce; lemon-oil, one-fourth ounce; rosemary, one-fourth ounce; bergamot, one-fourth ounce; lavender, one-fourth ounce; alcohol, one-half gallon. Color with alkanet.

Drop-cakes.—Beat up the whites and yolks of six eggs separate, with a spoonful of rose water; to which add six ounces powdered sugar; beat the whole well, and add one ounce of bruised caraway seeds, and six ounces flour. Drop them on wafer-paper, and bake in a moderate oven.

Flo-flo Cakes.—One pound sugar, one pound butter, eight eggs, one pound and a quarter flour, two ounces currants, and a half nutmeg; mix the butter with the sugar and spice; then add half the eggs, and beat for a few minutes; add the rest of the eggs, and beat for five minutes longer; stir in the flour and currants, then bake in shapes.

Oyster Stuffing.—Oysters are not chopped when mixed with dressing for turkeys. Prepare some bread-crumbs, and mix plenty of butter with them; add the oysters (one quart) and moisten the dressing with the oyster liquor. If only an "oyster flavor" is desired, the dressing is made mostly of bread, and half a dozen oysters are chopped or minced to add to the flavor.

Scotch Fancy Cakes.—Rub half a pound butter into a pound and a half of flour; break four eggs into three-quarters of a pound sugar, and whisk them five minutes; make a print with the butter and flour; pour in the eggs and sugar, and add half a gill of cream; mix all into a dough; cut into pieces about two inches across and an eighth of an inch thick; cover the tins with buttered paper; lay the cakes on and bake.

To make a nice oyster stew, strain the oysters through a colander; put the liquor in a saucepan, let it come to a boil, and skim; put in the oysters, a large piece of butter, pepper, and salt; when boiled up, add two quarts of oysters, one cupful of milk; serve immediately. Another way is to wash the oysters in a colander; put in a saucepan half a cupful of boiling water, one large tablespoonful of butter, pepper, and salt; when boiled, add the oysters, let them boil; add milk or not, according to taste.

To make a beefsteak pudding, take two pounds of rump steak and cut in small pieces, and cut into shreds two or three onions; paste the pudding with good crust; then put in the meat, with salt and pepper and a dozen oysters; add thickening composed of mushroom catsup, flour and water and mustard; simmer for an hour and a half, and serve in the dish. It may be turned out if the gravy in the pudding can be retained. Mutton, veal, ham, fowl, and game may be served in a similar way.

Chicken fricassee may be made as follows: Cut the chicken in small pieces, just cover with water, season highly, add a few small pieces of pork; if a fat chicken, not a very large piece of butter; add a few potatoes cut in half; before taking from the fire, remove the lid and dredge in a little flour. Another way is to cut the chicken in small pieces, cover with half milk and water; boil until tender, add a small piece of onion; take the chicken out, stir in a tablespoonful butter and flour creamed together, add one egg well beaten; then put in the chicken for a few moments; if too thick, add a cupful of cream or milk.

Boiled Turkey.—An old turkey will answer for this, though a young hen is better. After drawing, wash the inside exceedingly clean, wipe it dry on a towel, and fill the breast with bread-crumb, chestnut, or oyster stuffing. In trussing it, draw the legs into the body, break the breast-bone, and give the bird as round and plump an appearance as possible. Put it into plenty of warm water, or into as much boiling water as will rise an inch above it, and when it has boiled ten minutes, cool it down by the addition of cold water, and then take out a portion of it, leaving only as much as will keep the bird entirely covered until it is ready for table. Clear off the scum carefully as it rises to the surface, and boil the bird very gently from an hour and a half to two hours and a quarter, according to size. When oyster stuffing is used, a large tureen of rich oyster sauce should be served with it; but celery sauce, or good white sauce or chopped parsley in drawn butter, will answer otherwise.

When White with Snow.

When white with snow are all the hills,
And dusky lie the vales below,
And hushed and hidden glide the rills,
And hungry flies the cawing crow;
When other songsters none are near,
The mocking-wren sings loud and clear,
Sweetheart!
Sweetheart—sweet—sweet! O, words most dear,
Most pleasing to a maiden's ear!

When grannams cower about the fire,
And red-cheeked girls a-sleighing go,
When kine stand shivering in the byre,
And schoolboys, sledding, shout ho, ho!
When roads are hard, and clouds are drear,
The mocking-wren sings loud and clear,
Sweetheart!
Sweetheart—sweet—sweet! O, words most dear,
Most pleasing to a maiden's ear!

When to the wild rose tightly clings
The frosted hip with fiery glow,
And shrill the skater's iron rings,
And breath, like smoke, curls upward slow;
When winds blow cold, and leaves drift sere,
The mocking-wren sings loud and clear,
Sweetheart!
Sweetheart—sweet—sweet! O, words most dear,
Most pleasing to a maiden's ear!

W. L. Shoemaker.

The Old Story.

Tell me the old, old story
Of unseen things above,
Of golden castles in the air,
Which none may test or prove.
Tell me the story boldly,
As to a little child;
For I am weak and foolish,
And wish to be beguiled.

Tell me the old, old story,
That I may be taken in
With idle tales of glory
And nostrum cures for sin.
Tell me the story often,
Lest I grow sane too soon,
Deceived in childhood's morning,
But not in manhood's noon.

Tell me the story always,
If you would really be
A stumbling-block to progress—
To all that's good and free;
And when sweet truth and reason
Are dawning on my soul,
Tell me that story promptly,
Lest sense should make me whole.

—National Reformer.

Home Song.

Stay, stay at home, my heart, and rest;
Home-keeping hearts are happiest;
For those that wander they know not where
Are full of trouble and full of care;
To stay at home is best.

Weary, and homesick, and distressed,
They wander east and they wander west,
And are baffled and beaten and blown about
By the winds of the wilderness of doubt;
To stay at home is best.

Then stay at home, my heart, and rest;
The bird is safest in its nest;
O'er all that flutter their wings to fly
A hawk is hovering in the sky;
To stay at home is best.

H. W. Longfellow.

Organization.

New York State Liberal County Committees.

Editor Truth Seeker: The thirty-one counties of western New York included in the Freethinker's Association, have each a Freethought and Liberal league county committee, consisting of three members; but in the thirty eastern counties of the State there are no such committees, therefore allow me to request each of the following-named persons to associate with himself two other persons to constitute a county Liberal league committee for his county. And I further request each person hereinafter named to send me the name and address of the persons so appointed:

Albany Co., Thomas Dugan, Albany; Clinton Co., J. Churchill, Champlain; Columbia Co., Charles Groves, Canaan Four Corners; Delaware Co., Harva Bergant, Deposit; Dutchess Co., John P. Atwood, M. D., Poughkeepsie; Essex Co., Freeman L. Lyon, M. D., Bloomingdale; Franklin Co., J. G. Reynolds, Bombey; Fulton, McIntyre Fraser, Johnstown; King's Co., Dr. A. H. Brockway, 13 Green St., Brooklyn; New York Co., Wm. H. Boughton, 59 Liberty St., New York City; Orange Co., R. A. Conkling, Port Jarvis; Otsego Co., E. Wilcox, Morris; Queen's Co., Samuel Keese, Great Neck; Rensselaer Co., Joseph Knight, Troy; Rockland Co., Gen. Robert Avery, Nyack; Saratoga Co., J. J. Dunlap, M. D., Saratoga; Ulster Co., Aug. Huhne, M. D., Roundout; Washington Co., A. J. Culver, Whitehall; Westchester Co., Nathan H. Ellis, Yonkers.

I will be thankful to any one who will furnish me the names of an earnest, active Liberal from each, or either, of the following counties, Greene, Hamilton, Montgomery, Putnam, Richmond, Schenectady, Schoharie, Suffolk, Sullivan, Warren, and Yates.

The special business of these committees will be to encourage the organization of Liberal leagues in their respective counties and in other ways advance the Liberal cause.

H. L. Greene.

New York State representative on the Ex. Com. of the N. L. L.

The Cause in Iowa.

The coming State convention is the topic of principal interest to live Iowa Liberals. We have sent copies of the call to many of our local papers, and to friends of the cause in different parts of the State, and I think that a fair proportion of these papers will insert the call. The friends to whom I have written all seem to be willing to work for the success of the meeting. Says Mr. J. N. Frank, of Lysant: "Your letter with call received. I am very glad to do anything for a cause that I believe to be for the good of all." Mr. M. C. Thomas, of Redfield, writes: "We are talking of starting a Liberal league in this place." Mr. J. F. Frick, of Toledo, writes that the Toledo Times will publish the call. From other points in the State come cheering reports. The Burlington, Cedar Rapids, and Northern R. R. will sell return tickets at one-half the usual rates to all who produce certificates that they have attended the convention and paid full fare to West Liberty. The Central R. R. of Iowa will make the same reduction to all who paid, when going to the convention, full fare to Grinnell. This reduction will apply only to those who purchase their return tickets over the Iowa Central, at Grinnell, and over the B. C. R. and N. at West Liberty.

This reduction will be of benefit to those who reside either in the northern or southern part of the State, at points reached by these roads. At West Liberty and Grinnell you change cars for Des Moines, going over the C. R. I. and P. R. R.

In my next I hope to be able to announce the arrangements which shall have been made for the accommodation of visitors. I understand that Mr. Strong, the resident member of our committee, is perfecting all necessary arrangements.

As to the work to be done at Des Moines, we must organize a State league or association, and we need to pay particular attention to the formation of the executive committee. An earnest, active Liberal in each county of the State is wanted; one who will immediately organize the county sub committee and go to work. To this end, I desire to hear from every Liberal in Iowa. The question to you is: "Will you serve upon the executive committee?" If you cannot, please send me the name of some one in your county who can. If you desire an answer, please enclose stamp, as the committee has no fund upon which to draw for expenses. Organize local leagues in every town in the State where possible. Make your leagues auxiliary to the national league. Liberal leagues have been organized at Toledo, Tamah, and at Adel, Dallas county. Come, let us multiply such associations by the hundred.

Some object that organization now is premature; that it will but stimulate the foes of civil and mental freedom to greater activity, and rivet our chains the tighter. We must not flatter ourselves with the fond hope that the agents of reaction are not at work. They work while we sleep. This is evidenced a hundred different ways. Just look at the pending Constitutional amendment; at the closing of the Exposition on Sunday; and at the present crusade against Liberal editors and publishers. The enemies of liberty and equal rights now work in the dark; we will organize and force them to come out into the light that the people may see what their nefarious designs really are. The very argument that organization is premature because it will anger our tyrants and induce them to bind us the more securely is the most conclusive that could be produced in favor of organization and work. If we cannot organize to secure the removal of certain abuses without bringing down upon us still more heavily these and added wrongs, then, in the name of justice, let us be up and doing, that we may wipe such a foul blot from the escutcheon of our common country and leave our children free. In the evolution of rights we must not forget that we are factors in the great problem. Come to, Des Moines, all who can, and help us to bear aloft the standard of truth, upon which is inscribed: "The greatest of rights is equal rights." Every freeman to the front. Pause ye never nor parley; yourself bear the battle's brunt, and soon your reward shall be. If each one of us, individually, does his or her duty, all will be well.

E. C. Walker,
Of the State Com., W. I. L. L.

C. B. Clip, Shawano, Wis., writes: Enclosed please find money order for $3.00, and forward by mail, as per advertisement in The Truth Seeker, one copy of "Analysis of Religious Belief," Viscount Amberley. I acknowledge receipt of The Truth Seeker for the past two months or such a matter. The Liberal sentiment is gaining ground slowly in this section, I think. I had the "audacity" to attack foreign missions in our local paper some time ago, which stirred up considerable Christian indignation and led to quite a lengthy controversy. It was the first attack of the kind ever made here. I am reading the "Sages," which I borrowed from J. Melendy, whose name appears in your columns occasionally. I am much pleased with the work. I have examined "The Truth Seeker Collection," and consider it a decided success. I will tell you a little of my "'sperience," as the "meetin'" phrase goes. I was brought up to believe, and did believe the Bible. "Jonah swallowed the whale" and all, in my early days, and used to listen with hair on end to the glowing and sublime portrayals of the unbelievers hereafter. At the age of twelve I began to read and study the Bible, and I have read and studied until at the age of twenty-two I have denounced all faith in its divine origin and its pretended divine author, Jehovah of Judea. I have not the least possible faith now in the existence of Son, or Ghost, or angel, devil, or imp, or goblin. As for the visionary heaven and hell of the Christians, I have neither hopes of the one nor fears of the other. I am glad to hear that the Freethinkers of central New York have organized—my native county, St. Lawrence, is in that jurisdiction, I see. I hope the brethren all over the country will follow their example—organization is strength and efficiency. I will give you a little instance of church tyranny which has just happened here. A highly-esteemed young lady of this place, a faithful member of the Catholic church, has friends residing some twenty miles out in the country. Now it so happens, either by chance or providence, or the contrivance of the devil, that her next door neighbor is a promising young Infidel, and they, strange as it may seem, are good friends. A short time since it happened that this young Infidel was going on business, with a conveyance, to the country place where the Catholic lady's friends reside, and asked her if she would not like to go out and see them. She accepted the invitation, and I am authorized to say, had a very pleasant time. They attended a social dance at a farmhouse that evening, and returned the following morning. A more harmless affair is hardly conceivable, but it started a breeze; some devout Catholic went straightway to the priest and told him all about Miss ——"runnin' 'round with an' bein on such friendly terms with that rampant Infidel." The "Holy Father" was awfully "put out" about it, and the lady was threatened with a genuine church mauling, but I believe she has not got it yet, and the storm seems to be abating, but it was a narrow escape. She is a lady of spirit, however, and says the church must not meddle with her private affairs or dictate who shall be her friends and who not.

E. Fannie Allyn writes from Cleveland, O.: I enclose a copy of the Evening News of this city. It speaks for itself. I hope Col. Ingersoll will have time to answer the challenge, though it is like loading a cannon to shoot a fly. The grand soul of Ingersoll did a grand work as is shown by the replies, and I am reminded that "it is the wounded bird that flutters." It was not the price of admission to see a free man, one who dared be true to himself. Last night I attended Mrs. Van Cott's psychological exhibition. It would have been amusing if it had not been sorrowful to see her coax and force tender children forward. Twenty-five minutes completed the job and the old and young were pardoned. So Mrs. Van Cott said, and asked them to hold up their hands, but they were a discouraged looking set even after they found Jesus. I sat in the gallery and the Lord did not come up there. I noticed that he was not worth a cent to send them forward to the altar, unless the fat, magnetic fingers of Mrs. Van Cott assisted him. To me much of her talk—for she used no logic and never asked them to reason—was blasphemy. Go on, brother, in the good work. I get The Truth Seeker every week—don't want to miss a copy. Don't look for Jesus to be found in your city, for Mrs. Van Cott says he is with her just now. Here is one of her sentences. Can you find another such in the calendar of intelligence and love? "Heaven will be just as bright to me if you don't enter there." Concentrated selfishness and brutality!

GHOSTS! GHOSTS!! GHOSTS!!

Send five cents for Col. Ingersoll's lecture on "Ghosts," as delivered at Albany, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1878. Just out, flashing with wit and genius. It is crammed with logic, arguments, sarcasms and facts. It is beautiful, it is grand, and more, it is true. Only five cents. With a photograph of its eloquent author for fifteen cents. With cabinet size of the same, thirty cents.

"Ghosts and other Lectures." A new work by Col. Ingersoll, soon to be issued. Send me stamp, and as soon as the book is out, will send you descriptive circular and price thereof. Send three-cent stamp for Catalogue of Books, Tracts, Photographs, etc.; also, club rates for Liberal and scientific newspapers and periodicals. Address, E. C. Walker,
6t6 Lock Box B. Florence, Iowa.

ART OF PROPAGATION.

Is a highly-illustrated practical work on the rapid increase and multiplication of stock. Published by Jenkins' Grape and Seedling Nursery, Winona, Columbiana County, Ohio. Price, prepaid, by mail, 50 cents. Catalogue free. Agents wanted. Address as above. 1t8

JUST OUT!

AURICULAR CONFESSION
AND
Popish Nunneries.

BY Wm. HOGAN.

Twenty-five years Confessing Priest. A very interesting work. 220 pages. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.
D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

TWO BOOKS ON FINANCE.

SPECIFIC PAYMENTS BETTER THAN SPECIE PAYMENTS.

BY EDWARD D. LINTON.

CONVERSATIONS ON THE CURRENCY.

BY EDW'D D. LINTON AND GEO. D. DRURY.

The question to be met and settled now is, Shall money continue to rule and curse mankind, or shall it be made to serve and bless?
Price 25c. For sale at this office.

The Priest in Absolution,

The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.
D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.
☞The other twenty-five numbers of the "Holy Cross Series" are being brought out as rapidly as possible.

Positive Thinker,

SCIENCE HALL,

NEW YORK,

Advocates Positive Philosophy and the Religion of Humanity.

One Year, $1 50; Six Months, 75 cents; Three Months, 40 cents; five to one post-office, $5.00; ten and one to getter-up of Club, $10.00. Issued weekly after the first three numbers. Subscribers will be entitled to the full number. Send five cents for copy and circular. 4t8

Hell! Hell! Hell!

Send five cents for Col. Ingersoll's Lecture at Chickering Hall, New York, on Feb. 3d, upon that warm subject. "HELL," "GHOSTS," and "LIBERTY," in one pamphlet, for 15 cents.
Address E. C. WALKER,
3t8 Lock Box B., Florence, Iowa.

THE MYSTERY UNVEILED.

The miraculous conception and birth of Jesus Christ exposed and explained. A book for thinking men. Price, post-paid, 35 cents
Address BENTON BEMENT.
4t8 St. Johns, Mich.

NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.
THE
Great Magnetic Remedy.

DO YOU SMOKE?
DO YOU CHEW?
DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective. Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed, we warrant the Remedy to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.

Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.
Address,
J. A. HEINSOHN & CO., Manufacturers.
9t8 Cleveland, Ohio.

The Popes and Their Doings.

NO. 3 OF THE "HOLY CROSS SERIES."

Being brief stories of fully one hundred and fifty of the conspicuous and sinful Popes—the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God—who filled the chair of the Holy See in Rome during several centuries. The cheapest and most popular history of the Popes ever written. A friend styles it "rich, rare and racy." 273 pp., 12mo. Sent by mail at the very low price of 50 cents in paper; 75 cents in cloth.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE. Truly one of the most valuable works that have appeare within the last ten years. By PROF. DRAPER. Price, $1.75.

PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION; or an answer to the question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Divinely-Inspired and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Works of Thomas Paine.

COMMON SENSE. His first and most important political work. Clear type. Paper, 15 cts.

THE CRISIS. Containing Nos. I. to XVI., inclusive. Written in the "times that tried men's souls" during the American Revolution. 12mo. Full, clear type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth 80 cts.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN. Written in defense of his fellow man. A work almost without a peer in the world. On full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON. On large, clear type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON AND AN EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. Complete in one volume, on full, bold type. Containing "Common Sense," "The Crisis" (sixteen numbers), and "The Rights of Man," with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. Complete, 12mo. Composed of the "Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "An Essay on Dreams," "Of the Religion of Deism," etc., etc., with a life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

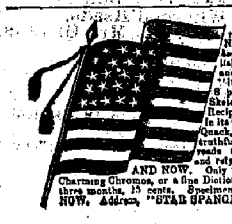
THOMAS PAINE'S GREAT WORKS. Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Containing a Life of Paine, his POLITICAL WRITINGS—"Common Sense," "The Crisis," "Rights of Man"—his THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS—"Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "An Essay on Dreams," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "Of the Religion of Deism"—all in one large volume, crown-octavo, of THE TRUTH SEEKER LIBRARY, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3.00; colored leather, red burnished edges, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. By Calvin Blanchard. 12mo. Large, clear type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Published by

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

LIST OF PHOTOGRAPHS

For Sale at The Truth Seeker Office.



Thomas Paine.	F. E. Abbot,
Paine's Bust.	Frothingham.
Paine's Monument.	Wendell Phillips.
Voltaire.	Emerson,
Rousseau,	Garrison,
Humboldt.	Henry Bergh.
Goethe.	Peter Cooper,
Schiller,	D. R. Burt,
Aug. Comte.	S. P. Andrews.
Heine.	Walt Whitman,
Alex. Pope.	Froude,
John Milton,	Max Muller,
Goldsmith,	Warren Chase.
Shelley,	Jas. Parton.
Byron.	Wm. Denton.
Burns,	Dr. Slade,
Washington.	A. J. Davis.
Franklin.	Foster,
Jefferson.	J. M. Peebles,
John Adams.	Frances Wright.
J. Q. Adams.	E. V. Wilson,
Madison,	G. L. Henderson,
Jackson.	Prof. Fiske,
Lincoln,	Fred Douglas.
Lincoln's Monument.	N. P. Banks,
Gerrit Smith,	P. V. Nasby.
Henry C. Wright.	Beecher,
J. S. Mill,	Tilton,
Sumner.	Moulton,
Edgar A. Poe.	G. W. Curtis.
Greeley.	Th. Nast,
Castellar,	J. G. Bennett,
Tennyson.	Chas. A. Dana.
Darwin	Phoebe Carey
Tyndall,	Alice Carey.
H. Spencer,	Elizabeth C. Stanton.
Huxley.	Susan B. Anthony.
Proctor,	Lucy Stone,
Draper,	Julia Ward Howe,
Bradlaugh.	Chas. Cheney,
Holyoake,	Paulina Davis,
Ingersoll.	Mary F. Davis,
Underwood.	Emma H. Britten.
Mendum,	Lizzie Fowler,
Seaver,	Mrs. Slenker,
L. Colby.	Susan H. Wixon.
Dr. Hare.	D. M. Bennett.
Judge J. W. Edwards.	W. S. Bell.
Lizzie Doten.	J. C. Bundy.
Mrs. J. Conant.	S. S. Jones.
Dr. Mary E. Walker (full figure).	Asa K. Butts, W. F. Jamieson.

Geo. Francis Train.

and hundreds of others, including generals, statesmen, poets, actors, actresses, etc. at 15 cents each singly, or eight for one dollar.

Neat Albums, by mail, to hold 30 photos., 80 cts., to hold 50, $1.

D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth St. New York.

"PATRIOTIC PAPER." Complete, original, and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," the "FAMILY FAVORITE" and Home Paper for THE MILLION. Established, 1863. There's nothing like it. Old and young, rich and poor, saint and sinner,—Beware for ALL." It's a large 40-column 8 page paper, crowded with charming Tales, Sketches, Stories, Poems, Wit, Humor, Puzzles, Recipes, Humorous Poems, etc., etc., in its "ROGUE'S CORNER," every Swindler, Quack, Humbug, and Fraud is fully, freely, and truthfully exposed. No one can be swindled who reads the "BANNER." 100,000 people read and rely upon this National Paper. TRY IT ONCE AND NOW. Only 75 cents a year, or with Premium of SIX Charming Chromos, or a fine Dictionary, cloth, 321 pages, only $1. Trial Trip, three months, 15 cents. Specimens FREE. Don't put it off but send NOW. Address, "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

THE OUTCAST.

By WINWOOD READE, author of "Martyrdom of Man."

This is his last work. Mr. Reade was unquestionably one of the ablest writers of the present century. His "Martyrdom of Man" attracted extraordinary attention in Europe and in this country, for its ability, brilliancy and boldness. This last work is regarded with equal favor. The English edition was published at two dollars. We give it entire for THIRTY CENTS IN PAPER.

ASTROLOGY.

PROF. LISTER, Astrologer, 505 W. 23d st., New York. 44 years' practice, 27 in Boston. Can be consulted by letter. Send for Circular. Address all letters 505 West 23d st., New York City.

SPERMATORRHŒA

should be in the hands of those suffering from this LIFE-WASTING DISEASE. It is an external application, and has thoroughly and permanently cured over one thousand cases, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had falling-sickness-fits; others on the verge of consumption, while others again had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information, address, with stamp, Vineland, N. J., where DR. FELLOWS is permanently located, and obtain his private circular, with cures sworn to, which is unimpeachable testimony to the doctor's skill and reliability as a physician in treating this prevalent and most dangerous of all diseases. SPERMATORRHŒA. 1tf

☞ TERMS WITHIN THE REACH OF ALL. ☜

BOOK BUYERS,

And all who wish to subscribe to periodicals should send 15 cents for No. 16 of The Evolution. Address

THE EVOLUTION, 34 Dey Street, N. Y.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n. Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

Address D. M. BENNETT, Publisher
141 Eighth St., New York.

JUST ISSUED.

BEYOND THE VEIL.

A very neat and entertaining volume, giving beautiful descriptions of life, occupations, etc., in the Spirit World. Dictated by the spirit of Percy B. Randolph, through the mediumship of Mrs. Francis H. McDougal and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson of California. With a steel-plate engraving of Dr. Randolph.

Price $1.50, post-paid by mail.

D. M. BENNETT
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

BOOKS FOR THINKERS,

PUBLISHED BY

CHARLES P. SOMERBY, No. 139 Eighth Street, New York,

(A few doors East of Broadway.)

FULL DESCRIPTION OF OTHER LIBERAL WORKS FROM TIME TO TIME.

READ OUR ADVERTISEMENTS EVERY WEEK, AS FREQUENT CHANGES WILL BE MADE.

ISSUES OF THE AGE;

OR,

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.

By HENRY C. PEDDER.

12mo, Extra Cloth, Beveled.....Price, $1.50.

"The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations."—New York Tribune.

"In the restless spirit of inquiry abroad, and the feverish excitement of doubt, he sees the returning glory of that intellectual empire which declined with Grecian culture. He has brought the fruits of a large culture and extensive reading, and a mind unusually calm and thoughtful, to bear upon the questions which are agitating the hour."—N. Y. World.

"An admirably written, scholarly volume."—New York Daily Graphic.

"An unprejudiced and thoughtful consideration of some of the most momentous questions that are now agitating the world, and will, no doubt, attract, as it deserves, the widest attention."—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Good Discounts on Orders of $5 and Upward, according to quantity.

Send 10 cents for Prometheus containing 28 pp. choice reading matter and a Full List of Liberal Publications; or for List only, Free.

CHARLES P. SOMERBY,
PUBLISHER, BOOKSELLER, IMPORTER, AND PRINTER,
139 EIGHTH ST., Bet. Broadway and Fourth Ave., NEW YORK.

Just Issued!

ANALYSIS OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF

BY VISCOUNT AMBERLEY.

Son of Lord John Russell, late Premier of England. A work of profound research, and just the thing for enquiring, thinking people. The lengthy and able article on is worth four times the price of the work.

"JESUS CHRIST"

Republished, complete in one volume, from the London edition (2 vols., 8vo.), and at one-fifth the price. Cloth, $3 00; Leather, $4 00; Morocco, gilt edges, $4 50. Sent by mail at these prices.

D. M. BENNETT, Publisher,
141 Eighth st., New York.

LECTURES,

BY MRS. CLARA NEYMAN.

This talented lecturess will give the following lectures, at a reasonable compensation, before Liberal audiences, as may be desired:

1. German Skepticism.
2. What is True Religion?
3. Woman's Reform Work in Europe.

Address MRS. CLARA NEYMAN,
97 Maiden Lane, New York.

THE MAGNETIC TREATMENT.

Send 25 cents to DR. ANDREW STONE, Troy, N. Y., and obtain a large, highly-illustrated book on the system of Vitalizing Treatment. Also The New Gospel of Health for $1.25, a masterly work on progressive medicine and healing by magnetism, 519 pages, illustrated with 120 cuts for personal manipulations, explanatory of the sublime science of healing without medicine. 1y5

SEEDS.

Best and Cheapest in America, or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from Grower, postage or express paid, and get fresh, true, and reliable seeds. I can and shall beat any firm in America in quality and low prices. Beautiful illustrated Seed Catalogues and Garden Guide free.

Address R. H. SHUMWAY,
10t5 Seed Grower, Rockford, Ill.

BROUGHTONS INVIGORATING SYRUP. 25 CTS.

A certain cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Stomach, Liver or Kidney Diseases, Weakness, &c. 25 cents per bottle. Incurable cases solicited and cured or money refunded. The same ingredients put up in powders to be sent by mail. Sample bottle, circular, and 2615

Advice Free, 495 Broome St., N. Y.

READER, that little cottage contains one of the choicest libraries in the country. I buy my books of J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole, Bronson, Mich. Rare O. P. works a specialty. Lists for stamp. 3m1

ATTENTION, LADIES!

THE BEST THING OUT.

An Excellent, non-Rusting, Durable Galvanized Iron Plater, with directions for using the same, will be sent, post-paid, on receipt of $1.25, with order and address. E. D. BLAKEMAN, Circleville, O.

DO YOU WANT [illegible] Photographs, Albums, Gold Pens, Pencils, Paper, Stationery, Knick-knacks, Notions, Novelties of every description? Beware of worthless dealers—avoid risk—send only to the old, original and only "HEADQUARTERS." Established, 1860. We originated what is now an enormous trade. We import books weekly. Supply all Scientific, Legal, Medical, science, foreign and other books not often to be obtained—in fact, supply ANYTHING AND EVERYTHING in the Book or any other line. Our large store has four floors crowded with books on every known subject, and all offered very low. CATALOGUES FREE. Information given. Send stamp, and send now. Address, HUNTER & CO., PUBLISHERS, HINSDALE, N. H

THE TRUTH SEEKER COLLECTION

OF

FORMS, HYMNS, AND RECITATIONS.

Forms for organizing Societies, Forms for Constitutions and By-laws, for Funeral Services, Marriage Services, Naming of Infants, Obituary Notices, Epitaphs, Wills, etc. Also, nearly 500 Liberal and Spiritualistic Hymns, original and selected; for Public Meetings, Funerals, Social Gatherings, etc., etc. The whole supplemented by a fine selection of Recitations, comprising many of the finest poetical gems in the language. Nearly 600 pages, at the extremely low price of 75 cents in cloth. The price is made low, so that every family can have a copy. Let none fail to have it.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

Professor Martinez, the great Scottish Seer and Wizard, will for $2.00 Cents, with your age, height, color of eyes and lock of hair, send to you a correct picture of your future husband or wife, initials of their names, the time and place where you will first meet, and the date of marriage. Address, Prof. MARTINEZ, 42 Province St., Boston, Mass. This is no humbug!

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. H. HALLELT & CO., Portland, Maine. 1y7

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine. 1y7

GOLD any worker can make $12 a day at home. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine. 1y7

RICH, RARE, RACY reading. The Lantern. With catalogue of novelties, rubber goods. 10c. A. T. THAYER, 10 South Fifth ave., N. Y. 4t7

TRUE $20,000 SOLD. The GENUINE Swiss Marseille COMPASS, INDICATOR AND TIME-KEEPER. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveller, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY-BODY desiring a reliable Time-Keeper and also a superior Compass. Usual watch size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat CHRONOMETER case. Perfection guaranteed. WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1.00; 3 for $2.00. Circulars sent free. It WILL pay you to call and see it before purchasing elsewhere. Or, if you cannot be offered a "premium" or "gift" for the BEST—for the Greatest. Send all orders to the sole Agents, J. J. KING & Co., Brattleboro', Vt.

Gems of Thought.

SLANDER is the revenge of a coward, and dissimulation his defence.—Johnson.

SLANDER, whose edge is sharper than the sword, whose tongue outvenoms all the worms of Nile.—Shakspere.

THE worthiest people are the most injured by slander, as we usually find that to be the best fruit which the birds have been pecking at.—Swift.

LIFE would be a perpetual flea-hunt if a man were obliged to run down all the inuendoes, inveracities, insinuations, and suspicions which are uttered against him.—Beecher

SHUN the inquisitive, for thou wilt be sure to find him leaky; open ears do not keep conscientiously what has been intrusted to them, and a word once spoken flies never to be recalled.—Horace.

THE march of intellect is proceeding at quick time; and if its progress be not accompanied by a corresponding improvement in morals and religions, the faster it proceeds, with the more violence will you be hurried down the road to ruin.—Southey.

THE man who is inquisitive into the secrets of your affairs, with which he has no concern, should be an object of your caution. Men no more desire another's secrets to conceal them than they would another's purse, for the pleasure only of carrying it.—Fielding.

WHO taught the parrot his "Welcome"? Who taught the raven in a drought to throw pebbles into a hollow tree where she espied water, that the water might rise so as she might come to it? Who taught the bee to sail through such a vast sea of air, and to find the way from a flower in a field to her hive? Who taught the ant to bite every grain of corn that she burieth in her hill, lest it should take root and grow?—Bacon.

IS IT said that if the religion of the past has been largely composed of superstition, that of the present is free from this repulsive element? Ah, what assurance have we that a century hence we will not regard the creeds and formulas of the churches as we regard the childishness of the Puritans or the corruption of Romanism? Are we not certain that beliefs now cherished as cardinal will then be considered of little worth, or intrinsically harmful.—Hudson Tuttle.

LET us consider how great a commodity of doctrine exists in books; how easily, how secretly, how safely they expose the nakedness of human ignorance without putting it to shame. These are the masters who instruct us without rods and ferules, without hard words and anger, without clothes or money. If you approach them, they are not asleep; if investigating you interrogate them, they conceal nothing; if you mistake them, they never grumble; if you are ignorant, they can not laugh at you.—Bury.

WE should make not only our homes beautiful, but all that is around and about us, as far as lies in our power. Every aspiration we cherish for the good and the lovely creates a taste in our minds for higher and purer enjoyments, and once in the road which leads to the esthetic we will find it impossible ever to retrace our steps, and will make of ourselves a temple wherein will reside and grow all that is good and lovable in humanity. To improve and elevate ourselves is to elevate the race, than which no aspiration can be higher or nobler.—Elmina D. Slenker.

PURE, serene, and unswerving, Science walks through this world of ours, illuminating dark places with her grand and lucid light, revealing hidden things and both beautiful and ugly facts. She lifts her gaze up into the illimitable skies, and describes to the dwellers of earth the marvelous worlds which pave the pathways of immensity. She scans the surface of our globe, and reads the poem of the lost creations written in the records of the rocks. Her clear, unbounded vision sweeps the reaches of the stars and waves and pierces the horizon of mazy distances. Her search is only for the real—her worship only for the true. Her sublime mission is to declare what is, not what ought to be; to drag forth and expose the deformity of error, wherever hid, and to cast her clear and cheerful beams on the glory of nature.—Sara B. Chase, A. M., M. D.

ATHEISM is the gospel of happiness. It is the herald of good news—that this wondrously beautiful world is not under the wrath of any monster of the skies. Christianity stamps upon the human heart the counterfeiting die of a devil, and seeks to save sinners from a horrid hell by a bribe of a blissful heaven. Atheism grasps all the good it can hold, seeks truth for its own sweet sake, strives to scatter the sunshine about the hearthstones of happy homes, and teaches men to lead noble lives, that they may leave the world better than they found it. Christianity seeks to save souls from pits of its own digging, to sever the shadowy shackles itself has forged from the fog of mystical faiths. Atheism comes to wrench from the world the frightful veil with which creeds and churches have wrapped the fair face of nature, to give us a glimpse of the peace of an earthly paradise, and to teach us to stand fast in that liberty wherewith our natures make us free; to usher in the glorious gospel of gladness until the doleful discord of religions have sighed out their last sad notes on the dying breeze of evening, and the blessed breath of the beautiful morning shall bring the cheerful chorus of hope and joy and justice from the gladsome lips of emancipated men.—S. H. Preston.

Odds and Ends.

SOME women use paint as fiddlers do rosin, to aid in drawing a beau.

THE matron who led her nephew by the ear to school was a true-ant commissioner.

"IN come tacks," as the man remarked when he sat down on a handful of the little cusses.

A BAREFOOT little boy stepped on a bee, and soon after said to his mother, "Ma, I didn't know bees had splinters in their tails."

DR. NOTT, after years of observation, was accustomed to say, "A man always gives every reason for what he does but the true one."

JOHN. "I wish I was a girl!"
Mother. "Why? my son."
John. "Because then I could wear my hat in the house."

"WHO is that, my son?" asked a father of his precocious little one. "I'm sure I don't know," was the reply; "It must be God, for mother says he's 'round everywhere."

A VERY neat definition of the word "suspicion" was that given by a jealous husband: "A suspicion is a feeling that impels you to try to find out something which you don't wish to know."

IN the class-room of a New England college, an eminent professor was asked, "Sir, who do you consider the finest metaphysician in our country?" "Modesty forbids me to answer," was the reply.

"IS'NT your hat sleepy?" inquired a little urchin of a gentleman with a shocking bad one on. "No; why?" inquired the gentleman. "Why, because I think it is a long time since it has had a nap," was the answer.

"I DIDN'T like our minister's sermon last Sunday," said a deacon, who had slept all sermon time, to a brother deacon. "Didn't like it, brother A.? Why, I saw you nodding assent to every proposition of the speaker."

IN struggling to make a dull-brained boy understand what conscience is, a teacher finally asked, "What makes you feel uncomfortable after you have done wrong?" "My papa's big leather strap," feelingly replied the boy.

"PRISONER," said one of the magistrates at a petty session held a few days since not far from Banbury, "prisoner, you are charged with aiding and abetting at a prize fight." "Please, sir, I take my Gospel oath I didn't bet a farthing upon it," was the reply.

AN old woman who went into the poultry business some time since, under the expectation that she could make a fortune by selling eggs, has quitted it in disgust, because, as she says, "the hens 'll never lay when eggs are dear, but always begin as soon as they get cheap."

THERE are queer nooks and corners left in old England. A visitor to a country parson tells how, when he accompanied him lately to take the duty in a remote parish, the sexton said, "Perhaps your reverence won't mind preaching from the chancel, for we've got a duck a settin' in the pulpit."

A GENTLEMAN who happens to own a paddock, and who had tried every effort and threat in vain to keep tramps from making a short cut through it, was eventually persuaded to stick up the following notice: "Beware! Beware! Polypodiums (ferns) planted here!" The effect was marvelous and the annoyance ceased.

IN A Methodist prayer-meeting, the other evening, a newly-converted brother, lamenting the heresy of Rev. Mr. Meriam and other Congregational theologians, made the following confession: "Once, I was a reviler of foreordination and election, and believed in the future happiness of all mankind. But now, thank the Lord, I hope for better things."

SMITH, the poet laureate, has beaten every one who wrote of the seasons before. He has got four seasons into four lines, for which he charges four dollars. This is the poem:

"First comes the sneeze,
Then comes the peas,
Then comes the fleas,
Then it begins to freeze."

LITTLE Billy Crook told little Phil Smith that his father wore a wig, and was always awfully pleased when anybody went up behind him and yanked it off. Mr. Crook was saying, "God bless all in this household," when little Phil tried it, and he was so awfully pleased that Phil thought the prayer had been answered all at once, and one leg looked shorter than the other as he limped home.

"P'AY tards wid' Annie, Mama," said little three-year-old. "Oh! no, my dear, it's Sunday." For the sixth time within the space of an hour the name of the day had been told Annie as a reason for decorous behavior. Little three-year-old looked thoughtful a moment, then kneeling by the lounge with hands clasped, and eyes raised, she suggested the following compromise: "P'ease Dod, let Annie p'ay tards Sunday, and s'ell be dood all de rest ob the week."

A TUTOR to one of the colleges, who limped in his walk, was some years ago, accosted by a well-known politician, who asked him if he was not the chaplain of the college at such a time, naming the year. The doctor replied that he was. The interrogator observed, "I knew you by your limp." "Well," said the doctor, "It seems my limping made a deeper impression than my preaching." "Ah, doctor," was the reply, with ready wit, "It is the highest compliment we can pay a minister to say that he is known by his walk rather than by his conversation."

Truth Seeker Tracts.

No.	(REVISED LIST.)	Cts.
1.	Discussion on Prayer. D. M. Bennett and two Clergymen,	3
2.	Oration on the Gods. Ingersoll.	10
3.	Thomas Paine. "	5
4.	Arraignment of the Church. Ingersoll.	5
5.	Heretics and Heresies. "	5
6.	Humboldt. "	5
7.	The Story of Creation. Bennett.	5
8.	The Old Snake Story. "	2
9.	The Story of the Flood. "	5
10.	The Plagues of Egypt. "	2
11.	Korah, Datham, and Abiram. " nnett.	2
12.	Balaam and his Ass. "	2
13.	Arraignment of Priestcraft. "	3
14.	Old Abe and Little Ike. Syphers.	3
15.	Come to Dinner. "	2
16.	Fog Horn Documents. "	2
17.	The Devil Still Ahead. "	2
18.	Slipped Up Again. "
19.	Joshua Stopping the Sun and Moon. D. M. Bennett,	5
20.	Samson and his Exploits. Bennett.	2
21.	The Great Wrestling Match. "	2
22.	Discussion with Elder Shelton. "	10
23.	Reply to Elder Shelton's Fourth Letter. D. M. Bennett.	3
24.	Christians at Work. Wm. McDonnell.	5
25.	Discussion with Geo. Snode. Bennett.	5
26.	Underwood's Prayer.	1
27.	Honest Questions and Honest Answers. D. M. Bennett.	5
28.	Alessandro di Cagliostro. C. Sotheran,	10
29.	Paine Hall Dedication Address. B. F. Underwood.	2
30.	Woman's Rights & Man's Wrongs. Syphers.	2
31.	Gods and God-houses. "	2
32.	The God's of Superstition and the God of the Universe. D. M. Bennett,	3
33.	What has Christianity Done? Preston.	3
34.	Tribute to Thomas Paine. "	2
35.	Moving the Ark. D. M. Bennett.	1
36.	Bennett's Prayer to the Devil.	2
37.	Short Sermon. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	1
38.	Christianity not a Moral System. X. Y. Z.	3
39.	The True Saint. S. P. Putnam.	3
40.	Bible of Nature vs. The Bible of Man. J. Syphers.	3
41.	Our Ecclesiastical Gentry. Bennett.	1
42.	Elijah the Tishbite. "	3
43.	Christianity a Borrowed System. "	3
44.	Design Argument Refuted. Underwood.	2
45.	Elisha the Prophet. Bennett.	3
46.	Did Jesus Really Exist? "	3
47.	Cruelty and Credulity of the Human Race. Dr. Daniel Arter.	5
48.	Freethought in the West. G. L. Henderson.	5
49.	Sensible Conclusions. E. E. Guild.	3
50.	Jonah and the Big Fish. D. M. Bennett.	1
51.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets. No. 1.	5
52.	Marples-Underwood Debate. Underwood.	3
53.	Questions for Bible Worshipers. B. F. Underwood.	2
54.	An Open Letter to Jesus Christ. Bennett.	5
55.	The Bible God Disproved by Nature. W. E. Coleman.	3
56.	Bible Contradictions.	1
57.	Jesus Not a Perfect Character. Underwood.	2
58.	Prophecies.	2
59.	Bible Prophecies Concerning Babylon. B. F. Underwood.	2
60.	Ezekiel's Prophecies Concerning Tyre. B. F. Underwood.	2
61.	History of the Devil. Isaac Paden.	5
62.	The Jews and their God. "	10
63.	The Devils Due-Bills. John Syphers.	3
64.	The Ills we Endure—their Cause and Cure. D. M. Bennett.	2
65.	Short Sermon No. 2. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	2
66.	God Idea in History. H. B. Brown,	5
67.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets No. 2.	5
68.	Ruth's Idea of Heaven and Mine. Susan H. Wixon.	2
69.	Missionaries. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	2
70.	Vicarious Atonement. J. S. Lyon.	3
71.	Paine's Anniversary. C. A. Codman.	3
72.	Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. D. M. Bennett.	2
73.	Foundations, John Syphers.	3
74.	Daniel in the Lion's Den. Bennett.	2
75.	An Hour with the Devil. "	10
76.	Reply to Erastus F. Brown. D. M. Bennett.	3
77.	The Fear of Death. D. M. Bennett.	5
78.	Christmas and Christianity. D.M.Bennett.	5
79.	The Relationship of Jesus, Jehovah, and the Virgin Mary. W. E. Coleman.	2
80.	Address on Paine's 139th Birthday. Bennett.	5
81.	Hereafter, or the Half-way House. John Syphers.	1
82.	Christian Courtesy. Bennett.	2
83.	Revivalism Examined. Dr. A. G. Humphrey.	5
84.	Moody's Sermon on Hell. Rev. J. P. Hopps, London.	2
85.	Matter, Motion, Life and Mind. Bennett.	10
86.	An Enquiry about God's Sons. "	2
87.	Freethought Judged by its Fruits. B. F. Underwood.	1
88.	David, God's Peculiar Favorite. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	3
89.	Logic of Prayer. Charles Stephenson.	3
90.	Bible-Mania. Otter Cordates.	2
91.	Our Ideas of God. B. F. Underwood.	1
92.	The Bible: is it Divinely Inspired? Dr. D. Arter.	5
93.	Obtaining Pardon for Sins. Hudson Tuttle.	1
94.	The New Raven. Will Cooper.	5
95.	Jesus Christ. D. M. Bennett.	10
96.	Ichabod Crane Papers.	10
97.	Special Providences. W. S. Bell.	2
98.	Snakes. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.	2
99.	Do the Works of Nature prove a Creator? Sciota.	5
100.	The Old and the New. R. G. Ingersoll.	5
101.	100th Anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday. Bennett et als.	5
102.	The Old Religion and the New. W. S. Bell.	1
103.	Does the Bible Teach us all we Know. Bennet.	2
104.	Evolution of Isrsel's God. A. L. Rawson.	10
105.	Decadence of Christianity. Cápphro.	2
106.	Franklin, Washington and Jefferson Unbelievers. Bennett.	2
107.	The Safe Side. H. B. Brown.	5
108.	The Holy Bible a Historical Humbug. S. H. Preston.	1
109.	Ghosts. Ingersoll. 4 pp.	5
110.	Materialistic Prayer. Bennett, 4 pp.	1
111.	Reply to Scientific American. Bennett,	1
112.	Sensible Sermon. Savage, 8 pp.	2
113.	Come to Jesus. Bennett. 8 pp.	2

SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

1.	Hereditary Transmission. Prof. Louis Elsberg, M.D.	5
2.	Evolution; from the Homogeneous to the Heterogeneous. B. F. Underwood.	3
3.	Darwinism. B. F. Underwood.	3
4.	Literature of the Insane. F. R. Marvin.	5
5.	Responsibility of Sex. Mrs. Chase, M.D.	3
6.	Graduated Atmospheres. J. McCarroll.	2
7.	Death. Frederic R. Marvin, M.D.	5
8.	How do Marsupial Animals Propagate their kind? A. B. Bradford.	5
9.	The Unseen World. Prof. John Fiske.	10
10.	The Evolution Theory — Huxley's Three Lectures.	10
11.	Is America the New World? L. L. Dawson.	10

Discount on one dollar's worth 10 per ct. off; on two dollars' worth 20 off; on five dollars' worth 40 off; on ten dollars' worth 50 off.

As few or as many of any given kind may be ordered as desired.

RADICAL BOOKS.

SENT POST PAID AT THE PRICES ANNEXED.

By D. M. BENNETT.

Age of Reason. Paine. Paper covers.	25
" " " Cloth "	50
" " and Ex. of Proph. Paper 50; cl.	75
A Few Days in Athens. Frances Wright.	75
Apocryphal New Testament.	1 25
An Eye Opener. Paper, 50; cloth,	75
Antiquity of Christianity. Alberger.	25
Analysis of Religious Belief. Viscount Amberly, $3.00, 4.00, and	4 50
Apples of Gold. Susan H. Wixon.	1 50
Anti-Theological Lectures. Rev. R. Taylor.	2 00
Antiquity and Duration of the World.	25
Astronomy and Worship of the Ancients.	25
A. J. Davis' Entire Works,	27,00
Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub,	15
Bible in India. Jacolliot,	2 00
Buckle's History of Civilization. 2 Vols., 8vo.	4 00
Burgess-Underwood Debate. 50 and	80
Bible in the Balance. Fish.	1 00
Bacon's Novum Organum.	2 00
Bhagvad-Gita, or Dialogues of Christna and Arjuna.	1 76
Buechner's Man, Present and Future.	4 00
Christianity before Christ. Craven.	25
Chapters from the Bibles of the Ages.	1 50
Criticism on the Theological Idea of Deity.	1 00
Childhood of Religion. Clodd.	1 25
Childhood of the World. Clodd, 40 and	60
Christianity and Materialism. Underwood.	15
Cause of Religious Ideas. Tuttle,	1 00
Conway's Sacred Anthology.	4 00
Colenso on the Pentateuch, Abstract of.	25
Devil's Pulpit, Rev. Robt. Taylor,	2 00
Diegesis "	2 00
Denton's Irreconcilable Records,	50
" Our Planet, Past, Present, and Future,	1 50
" Radical Rhymes.	1 25
" Who are Christians. Deluge.
Denton's Common Sense Thoughts, Be Thyself, What is Right? Man's True Saviors, Sermon from Shakspere's Text, God Proposed, Spiritualism True, Orthodoxy False, 10 cents each.
Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science,	1 75
" Intellectual Development of Europe, 2 vols.,	3 00
Darwin's Origin of Species,	2 00
" Descent of Man, (Impr'd Ed.)	3 00
Descent and Darwinism, Schmidt,	1 50
Einstein's Origin of Religious Ideas.	1 00
Exeter Hall, Wm. McDonnell,	60 & 80
Errors of the Bible. Wright,	35 & 60
Essence of Religion. Fuerbach. 40 and	80
Eight Scientific Tracts.	20
Frothingham's Religion of Humanity,	1 50
" Child's Book of Religion,	1 00
" Stories of the Patriarchs.	1 00
" Safest Creed,	1 50
" Transcendentalism in New England,	2 50
Faraday's Various Forces of Nature.	2 00
Fiske's Myths and Myth-Makers,	2 00
God Idea in History, Tuttle,	1 25
Good Sense, D'Holbach,	1 00
Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages,	2 50
" Lost and Hostile Gospels.	3 25
Graves' Sixteen Crucified Saviors.	2 00
" Biography of Satan.	60
Grey's Enigmas of Life.	2 00
" Creeds of Christendom. 2 Vols.	7 50
Heroines of Freethought, Mrs. Underwood.	1 75
Heathens of the Heath, McDonnell,	1 00 & 150
Hume's Essays and Treatises,	1 50
Huxley's Lay Sermons,	1 75
" Man's Place in Nature,	1 25
" Critiques and Addresses,	1 50
History of all Religions Sects. Evans.	1 00
Haeckel's History of Creation. 2 Vols.	5 00
Hollick's Nerves and the Nervous,	1 00
Humboldt's Works,
Ingersoll's Gods and other Lectures. 30 and	50
" " etc., Large Edition.	1 25
Influence of Christianity on Civilization,	25
Infidels' Text Book. Cooper.	1 00
Jehovah Unveiled.	35
Jamieson's Clergy a Source of Danger.	1 00
Josephus' Complete Works.	2 50
Johnson's Oriental Religions. 8vo.	5 00
John's Way.	15
Kneeland's Review.	1 00
" Hymns.	35
Koran, with Notes and Life of Mahomet.	2 75
Lecky's Rationalism in Europe. 2 Vols.	4 00
" History of European Morals.	6 00
Life of Thomas Paine. Blanchard. p 50; cl	75
Lewes' Biographical History of Philosophy,	3 50
" Problems of Life and Mind.	3 00
Lizzie Doten's Poems of Progress, and Inner Life, each	150
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization,	2 00
" Pre-Historic Times Illustrated,	6 00
Lyell's Elements of Geology, 770 cuts.	3 40
" Principles " " 2 vols. and maps,	3 00
Monks and Popes. Alberger.	1 00
Morley's Life of Voltaire,	2 00
Martyrdom of Man. Winwood Reade.	3 00
Peeble's All Around the World,	2 50
" Seers of the Ages,	2 50
Plato's Divine and Moral Works,	2 20
Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion,	30 & 50
Physical Man, Tuttle,	1 50
Paine's Common Sense.	12
" Crisis. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Rights of Man. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Theological Works, with portrait	1 50
" " " paper,	1 00
" Political Works, cloth,	1 50
" Great Works Complete. Crown octavo, with life and portrait.	3
" Political Works, steel portrait,	1
" Life, by Calvin Blanchard with portrait Paper, 50; cloth	75
Parturition without Pain,	1 00
Plain Home Talk and Medical Common Sense, E. B. Foote, M.D.,	1 50
Proctor's Six Lectures on Astronomy,	20
Reason, the only Oracle of Man. Ethan Allen	60
Syntagma, Taylor,	1 00
System of Nature. D'Holbach,	2 00
Self-Contradictions of the Bible,	25
Studying the Bible, Mrs. Slenker,	75
Spencer's (Herbert) Entire Work,
Strauss' Old Faith and New,	2 00
" New Life of Jesus, 2 vols.,	12 00
Supernatural Religion, 2 Vols., 8vo.,	3 00
Sexual Physiology, Trall,	2 00
Talleyrand's Letter to Pope Pius vii,	25
Tyndall' (Prof. John) Entire Works,
The Christ of Paul,	2 00
The Case against the Church,	75
The Relations of the Sexes. Mrs. Duffey,	2 00
The Voices, Warren Sumner Barlow,	1 25
The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 50
The Champions of the Church, Bennett $3 00, $4 00, and	4.50
Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, etc., 75 &	1 00
Truth Seeker Tracts, Vols. I, II. III. and IV., by the lot, 50 &	75
The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations,	75
The Outcast, Winwood Reade,	30
Talks with My Patients, Mrs. Gleason, M.D.,	1 50
Underwood-Marples Debate,	35 & 60
Underwood's Twelve Tracts.	20
Vestiges of Creation,	75
Volney's Ruins,	1 00
Volney's New Researches in Ancient History,	1 50
Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.	3 00

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 9. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, March 2, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE parsons stand up for the devil as though he were a personal friend.

VICTOR EMANUEL had eighteen hundred horses in his stable when he mounted the pale one.

THE Chicago Baptist University has declared its inability to pay its debts. Sing, brothers.

"Jesus paid it all."

DEACON BLOCK has been expelled from the Presbyterian church in Atlanta, Ga., for permitting a dance in his parlor.

MOODY is said to find the people of Springfield too intellectual for easy conversion. They exasperate him with cool arguments, and do not become enthusiastic. Besides, he has a toothache.

MR. HAMMOND is successfully frightening children into religion in Ohio at $200 a week. When Edward gets through with a Sunday-school the little innocents look as though they had been sitting up with a ghost story for a week.

THE churches are full of anxious inquirers all eager to know how it is about those subscriptions made when Brother Kimball began his debt raising. Many of those are now coming due. If they are paid in cash, it is well. If not, what then?

A STICK of wood loaded with gunpowder, charged by a farmer whose pile was too often visited by thieves, exploded in the stove of the Congregational church at Bellevue, Ohio, but with no serious results. That farmer must have been an ungodly Infidel.

TWO married members of an Indiana church choir, who were in love with each other, and who used to write glowing letters full of Scripture, fell out at last, and the young married man shot the young married woman. All in good time he will probably know more about the eternal punishment problem than the ministers.

TOO MUCH RELIGIOUS EXCITEMENT.—E. W. Hawthorne, of Petersburg, Ind., a member of the senior class of Asbury University, Greencastle, Ind., is pronounced insane. He will be sent to the asylum at Indianapolis. He joined the Methodist church during a revival three weeks since. Religious excitement is the probable cause of his insanity.

IN Rutland, Vt., the Congregationalists refuse to partake of the holy sacrament from the same cup with their colored brothers and sisters. One cup was passed around to one hundred and one white men and women, one of whom sat in the same pew with the four colored persons, and then another cup—a pewter one—was served to the four men of African descent.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK'S accomplice, first lieutenant, and chief man Friday, is now being examined on a charge of perjury. Four or five witnesses swear that he perjured himself, and it looks as though a case could easily be made out against him. His chief, the immaculate Anthony, attends closely upon the examination, and works hard to screen his faithful servant from justice.

ADAM SCOTT, the Scotchman, had a boy, Bob who was a great trouble to him, and he thus referred to him in his prayers: "O Lord, ha'e mercy on Bob! Ye ken yersel' he is a wild callant, and thinks nae mair o' committing sin than a dag does o' lickin' a dish; but put thy hook in his nose and thy bridle in his gab, and git him back to thee wi' a jerk that he'll no forget the longest day he has to live."

SIX JESUIT Fathers who, to evade the mortmain law bought a house in the Rue de Chateaubriand, Paris, on the tontine system, but in reality for the corporate body, have been defeated in an action against a neighbor for building a wall to their prejudice. The court ruled that even as a tontine they had no focus standi, because not authorized, and that the manifest fraud rendered them incapable of suing.

THE wife of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll is thus described by The Times of Chicago: "Mrs. Ingersoll is tall, has a prominent nose, large dark eyes, heavy dark hair, arranged high in a twist, wears rich jewelry, copies nobody's dress or manner, does just as she pleases, and asks no odds. She is as much of a favorite, as original and wicked in her views, as her husband; is charming, and therefore dangerous, say the orthodox.

"WHAT becomes of good people when they die?" asked a Sunday-school orator who was addressing a crowded anniversary assembly. "They go to heaven," was the prompt reply of a number of the children. The correctness of this answer being beyond controversy, the orator naturally brought on his next, which was, "What becomes of the brutes when they die?" There was a momentary pause, which was broken by the exclamation of a loud-voiced youngster: "Make 'em into soap-grease!" The buzz of enthusiastic mirth which followed punctuated the speech with a full-stop.

THE following is the official report of the untaxed property in New York city:

Untaxed church property	$38,140,500
Untaxed hospitals	5,250,000
Untaxed dispensaries	180,000
Untaxed sectarian schools	5,287,000
Untaxed libraries	1,235,000
Untaxed asylums and reformatories	7,966,500
Untaxed Masonic Temple	1,000,000
Untaxed Academy of Design	460,000
Untaxed Y. M. C. A. Hall	600,000
Untaxed Cooper Institute	800,000
Untaxed cemeteries	1,500,000
Total	$63,409,000

With the growth of the city and charitable effort this class of property is now estimated at $80,000,000. In addition, $44,000 have been spent in providing free gas for the lamps before church doors.

THE Rev. Alfred M. Loutrel, appeared recently in the Jefferson Market Police Court, as complainant against a colored girl whom he accused of disorderly conduct. Before the examination was concluded, it transpired that the gray-haired clergyman had given the girl cause to act disorderly. The following is the girl's account of the affair, the truth of which, he, Loutrel, did not deny: "A short time after I went into Mr. Loutrel's employ, two years ago, he came into my room when I was asleep one night; he awoke me, and carried me in my night-dress to his own bed, and placed me in it. I was afraid of him. He told me that I was black, but beautiful; that the Bible said so; that he thought a great deal of me, and would always do so; that he wanted me to be as a wife to him and occupy a place by his side always. I remained with him that night, and we have slept together as man and wife ever since. I liked him, and could not bear to be thrown away by him without a home or money; it made me tired of living; he was so good and kind to me, and turned upon me so suddenly without any fault on my part." Comment is unnecessary.

AT this season commences the annual "Slaughter of the Innocents." It is the time for Sunday-school fairs, shows, concerts, and exhibitions. Great companies of little girls and boys are put on church platforms, and made to sing choruses and to speak pieces. Most of the boys are dressed from neck to heels in good serviceable clothing. Most of the girls wear their white dresses, low slippers, and no great amount of protection below the knees. These children, singing and speaking in crowded and unventilated churches, are bathed in profuse perspiration by the time the show is over, and when they go out into the frosty atmosphere of a December evening are liable to be attacked by pneumonia and other diseases. A sudden wrestle with croup or diphtheria is likely to follow about midnight, and the poor child who in a day or two is carried to her funeral is spoken of in the obituary sermon as a case of "the mysterious and inscrutable dealings of Divine Providence." Many mothers who would think it wrong to cast their children to the crocodiles of the Ganges or to administer strychnine to them, freely take them, half clad, to these Sunday-school displays, and then blame "Divine Providence"—whatever that may be—for the consequences of their own improvident folly.

AN UNDERRATED PERIL.—Clearly the orthodox Protestant churches have not yet got their eyes open to the danger that threatens them. If the body of belief which they hold in common were a loose heap of dogmas, thrown together like a pile of bricks, without relation or interdependence, we could understand the composure with which many orthodox preachers and papers watch the assault upon the dogma of hell. One brick taken from the pile wouldn't matter. But this is not the fact. The system of doctrine received by these churches is an edifice—an arch in which every stone has its place, and from which no stone can be removed without weakening, if not toppling down the whole structure. We do not say that the dogma of hell is the keystone of this arch; but if the attempt to dislodge it from its place is successful, we advise the clergy and the religious press to stand from under. As a matter of fact, the preachers who have outgrown their belief in hell either reject outright, or explain away, or are suspiciously silent about, other doctrines which have hitherto been esteemed vital. Take the case of the Rev. Mr. Merriam. He accepts the doctrines of the Trinity, the Atonement, the Inspiration of the Scriptures—in a certain sense. But it is not the sense in which these doctrines have been understood and received by the church of which he still calls himself a minister. What is true of him is notoriously true, in a greater or less degree, of all the others. It behooves the orthodox churches to redouble their vigilance. The adversary is a veteran strategist, and never makes a mistake in the choice of his point of attack.—Sun.

POLYANDRY IN THIBET.—A noticeable feature in the national life is the immense number of monasteries and nunneries which are to be found scattered over the country. In the neighborhood of Lhasa alone there are 11 monasteries, in which are cloistered upwards of 20,000 monks, and the nunneries are found in like proportion. This apparent devotion to spiritual concerns is at first sight calculated to arouse our admiration and sympathy, but a little consideration suggests the idea that the religious fervor of these Thibetan monks and nuns is a good deal heightened by a keen sense of sordid self-interest. If the blood of martyrs is the seed of churches, poverty, especially in the East, has a wonderful effect in multiplying the crop. To men who have no taste for the hard labor demanded by the soil from its tillers, and to women who have no means of gaining a livelihood for themselves, the secluded idleness and secured meals of a monastery or nunnery present attractions which it is next to impossible to resist. The women also have an excuse for entering religious orders which is denied to men, for there exists in Thibet one of those extraordinary marriage customs which are occasionally met with in out-of-the-way parts of the world, and which are to be explained only by reference to the surrounding circumstances of the people. A numerous progeny, in a poor and sterile country, is doubtless a distinct evil, and it is one which naturally suggests the imposition of a check even to those who have never heard of Malthus or his doctrine. This we may suppose to have been the position of the Thibetans when they cast about for some plan by which they might limit the increase of the population. The plan they adopted for this purpose is almost unique, and is called polyandry, which may be explained as being the exact reverse of polygamy; for, as in most Eastern countries, it is lawful for a man to have a plurality of wives, in Thibet it is the custom for a woman to have a plurality of husbands. The usual practice is for two, three, or four brothers in a household to marry one wife. They all reside in one house, and the children are considered to be the joint offspring of all. It is inconceivable to us that such a system should exist for an hour; but in Thibet, far from giving rise to the evils which might be expected to flow from it, it works easily and well, and the pictures which travelers give us of Thibetan households display a degree of domestic happiness and affection which certainly equals that enjoyed in much more favored lands. This is a description Mr. Bogle gives of a family at whose house he spent the night: "The house belongs to two brothers, who are married to a very handsome wife, and have three of the prettiest children I ever saw. They all came to drink tea and eat sugar-candy. After night came on, the whole family assembled in a room to dance to their own singing, and spent two hours in this manner with abundance of mirth and glee."—The Cornhill Magazine.

Events of the Week.

THE House Committee on Labor have reported adversely to Chinese immigration.

THE English War Office has ordered 150,000 improved rifles and 21,000 cavalry horses to be bought.

EMIGRANTS for Australia, to the number of one hundred and fifty, sailed from this city on the 24th inst.

GEN. ANDERSON, President of the Louisiana Returning Board, has been sentenced to two years' hard labor in the penitentiary.

THE Governor of Pennsylvania has signed warrants for the execution of five more Mollie Maguires, to take place on the 18th of April.

ONE man killed and three injured, with a general smash-up of the train, were the results of a railway accident near Milford Station, Va., on the 25th.

STEAMERS, ferry-boats, and schooners have been running into each other in the East and North rivers owing to the dense fogs. Several lives were lost.

THE new Pope is not so liberal as he was thought to be. It seems certain that Leo XIII does not hold the views he did when he was simply Cardinal Pecci.

THE Senate, Tuesday, chose Mr. Ferry, Republican, President pro tem. The Democrats nearly elected Mr. Thurman, Senator Davis, Independent, voting with them.

THE House of Representatives, by a vote of 169 to 87, have adopted Butler's bill to allow women to practice as attorneys before the Supreme Court of the United States.

GOLD is coming down and silver is going up in the face of the fact that the Silver bill has passed the Senate and is only awaiting the President's signature to become a law.

JESSE A. PALMER, of Little Compton, R. I., a prominent exhorter in the revival meetings of that place, committed a fiendish outrage upon a lady eighty years of age. The villain is in jail.

THE steamship City of Brussels and the steamship Hermann, which arrived at this port on the 24th, brought $700,000 in gold. This is the first fruit of the passage of the Silver bill.

HENRY WARD BEECHER has been appointed chaplain of a militia regiment in Brooklyn. He will dress in cocked hat, sword, and spurs, with, perhaps, a few other articles of wearing apparel.

THE U. S. storeship Supply sailed on the 25th loaded with exhibits for the Paris Exposition. Her cargo comprises a little of almost everything that this country produces. She will be followed by two other vessels.

THE biggest petition of the season was presented to Congress on the 26th of February, by Mr. Butler of Massachusetts. It was 700 yards long and contained 50,000 names. Of course, we mean the anti-Comstock-law petition from the Liberals of this country. What effect it will have remains to be seen.

THE famine in China still continues. A refuge house, in which were three thousand famine-stricken wretches, took fire, a short time ago, and was burnt to the ground. Only about one hundred escaped. The Bible and Tract societies can raise hundreds of thousands of dollars to send bibles and tracts to the heathen, but the food is generally sent by those who think that the body needs saving as well as the soul.

STRANGE and unaccountable phenomena continue to occur along the west coast of South America. Wharves, shipping, and forts in Callao have been damaged by earthquakes and the tremendous waves, and the towns and cities along the coast have suffered severely from a cause hitherto unknown in that part of the world—heavy rain-storms. Between the frequent earthquakes and tidal waves on the one hand, and the periodical revolutions of the governments, and the constant oppressive tyranny of the Church, on the other, the poor South Americans have an endless struggle for existence. God and man appear to conspire against them.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER II.—CONTINUED.

"I am inclined to think, girls, that uncle Robert is about right concerning Mr. Paine, for he is a cautious man, and takes great care to arrive at the exact truth of all important matters, and besides he would never have written this to me, his favorite niece, unless he was absolutely certain of its truth," continued Edith.

"I'd like to read some of Paine's works," said Sue; "but wouldn't father look daggers at me if he heard me say so?"

"And I mean to go to Mrs. Darwin's and see if I can't get that book your uncle said was written in defense of religion and against Atheism, 'The Age of Reason' I think he called it," said Myra, with whom to wish was to do, if possible.

"Yes, that is the name of the book," said Edith; "but I hardly think it would be proper for you to go and ask for it. How do you know they keep such books? It may hurt Mrs. Darwin's feelings if you inquire there for it. You know we did not see or hear a thing while there on our visit that proved them to be Infidels."

"But Mrs. Darwin was raised a Quaker; and father says Quakers are half-Infidels, and maybe Mr. Darwin is a whole Infidel," said Myra, laughing, "though I doubt it, as they are such nice people."

"Paine has always been called an Infidel, and see how nice Edith's uncle has described him to be," said Jennie.

"It's a queer world, isn't it?" said Sue. "But evening prayer-meeting will soon be out, and I must hurry home, for I don't want father to know I've been calling on Sunday, or he would give me a lecture, and perhaps make me read half a dozen chapters in the Bible as a punishment."

"And we too must go," said Myra and Jennie; and all went their various ways.

After they had left, Edith sat down, and for the dozenth time discussed with her mother the contents of her uncle's letter. She and Mrs. May were both members of the "Disciples," as they called themselves, and until of late they had never thought of questioning the truths of the doctrines they professed, but, like most people, took it for granted that while the different sects were, in the main, all on the right road to heaven, theirs was the only Biblical religion—the oldest, first, and best of them all, for did they not call themselves the "Christian Church," as much as to say there was no other church that was really Christian? And was not the whole Bible their creed? And only a few months ago did they not hear Brother P—— and Deacon S—— agreeing that there was not, and in the nature of things could not be, a real Infidel in the world; for how could any one doubt there must be a Creator to bring into existence all things and maintain order and regularity throughout nature?

"If I were you, Edith," said Mrs. May, "I would not trouble myself about Mr. Paine or his writings. It can do you no good, and may unsettle your faith and make you unhappy."

"It is too late now, mother, for me to consider these things, even were I willing thus to compromise with my conscience, for my doubts are aroused, and I cannot stop short of knowing the real truth if it can be got at."

"But, my child, you have been happy believing in your good Christ and the Bible, and why not continue on in the good old way? The poet shows good philosophy when he writes:

> 'So long as I can see a light, and revel in it's beam,
> I care not if an anchorite can prove it all a dream.
> So long as I can see a smile, and feel it warm me too,
> It answers just as well the while as if it all were true.'"

"But not for me, mother. It may be pleasant and easy and nice to go on dreaming as long as you are asleep and know not the ideal from the real; but I am awake now, and the great question for me is, What is true? and that question I'm going to solve if it shatters to ruin all the sweet dreams in which I have ever reveled, and leaves only hard, bare, cold realities, as you seem to fear it will. But don't let it trouble you, mother mine; I mean to be good, true, honest, and sincere, and then it will really matter very little what my faith is, as far as a virtuous and upright life is concerned," and, with mutual "good nights," they sought tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep.

CHAPTER III.

"GOOD EVENING," said a lively, cheery voice at the open door of Mrs. May's sitting-room, about two weeks after the reading of Uncle Robert's letter.

"Why, Myra," exclaimed Edith, "how you startled me. I was in a brown study over this sheet of [illegible] and never noticed you till you spoke so suddenly at my very elbow. But do come right in. I'm so glad to see you. It has been a long time for you to stay away, and I was thinking this afternoon that I'd have to come and hunt you up."

"I'm glad you think me worth that trouble," said Myra. "It is a real compliment, and I appreciate it all the more because I prize your good will above that of any one else in the whole town—always excepting dear old papa, you know."

"Thanks, Myra, for your good opinion. I am sure I value your society highly, and enjoy a chat with you more than with most other people, for I am certain that what you say is sincere and truthful, if it isn't all sugar and sweetness;" and Edith shook her head playfully at her impulsive, warm-hearted visitor. "And now," she continued, "do tell me what has kept you away so long?"

"Here is my apology," said Myra, handing her a small book, which upon opening she found to be the "Age of Reason." "And did you really go and get it?" asked Edith, in surprise.

"Certainly! And why not? I told you I should if they had it. I went the day after we were here at your house, and went alone, too, for one can talk more freely when alone, and besides there was no one there to tread on my toes," and Myra glanced at Edith mischievously.

Her friend smiled, and said she thought her failing was talking too freely at any time, whether alone or in company.

"I know that, Edith; but it's my nature, and folks must take me as I am if they want me at all. I found Mrs. Darwin alone, so I had an excellent chance to say what I wished. 'Two are company, and three are none,' you know, when one wants a private chat. I didn't waste much time in compliments, but just bolted out my request, asking if they had any of Thomas Paine's books, and told her I had been wanting to read some of them, but did not know where to get any unless it was there. 'We have his works complete,' said Mrs. Darwin, looking at me soberly and seriously, 'but we never lend them to young people unless their parents allow them to read such books. We do not like to cause trouble in families, or to interfere in any way concerning people's private opinions, but are glad to lend any book we have to responsible persons.' 'Well, I'm responsible,' said I. 'I've only father to care what I read, and he lets me do as I please, as I am old enough to know right from wrong.' Mrs. Darwin laughed a merry, gleeful little laugh as I said this, and remarked that I was very fortunate in being able to distinguish between the two in every case. 'And, indeed,' said she, 'you are the first person I ever saw who was the happy possessor of this desirable faculty,' and she looked at me in a curious, comical sort of a way, till all at once I began to perceive that she was paying me off for making a curiosity of her during my former visit, and then I ran up and kissed her, and told her she served me exactly right by paying me back in my own coin. She laughed merrily, and said it was too good an opportunity for a joke for her to allow it to pass unimproved. I said I was ready to take a joke or to give one, and was glad to see people unbend now and then. 'Yes,' said Mrs. Darwin, 'there is too much formality in the world, and too little fun, mirth, and innocent enjoyment. Smiles, cheerfulness, and sunniness of temper are the best health-builders in the world. They keep the heart fresh and young.' 'Ah! now I know why you don't seem old,' said I; 'you are too happy, pleasant, and cheerful to grow wrinkled and gray.' 'Perhaps you are right,' said she; 'I consider it a duty to my husband and children to look happy, and to be happy, and it is the duty of every one to carry sunshine with them wherever they go.' 'But,' said I, 'how can a body do that when they are as full of ups and downs as I am? Now, I am running over with joy one hour, and way down in the depths the next.' 'That is rather a drawback to continued sunshine,' said Mrs. Darwin, 'but one can do much by trying. Happiness grows by cultivation, and I think a strong determination to look upon the bright side of things will assist you materially in your efforts for sunny hours.' Then she went and got me the book, and I asked her if I might pass it to you after reading it. She was very willing, so I brought it along!"

"I am truly glad to have the privilege of perusing it," said Edith, "and am obliged to you for your kindness in getting me the permission."

"Oh, that was pure selfishness on my part, for I wanted the benefit of your superior judgment," said Myra, laughing.

"And how did you like it?" asked Edith.

"Oh, splendidly! father and I both read it, and carefully compared it with the Bible all the way through, and the good, old book came out the looser by each comparison. I tell you, Edith, Mr. Paine was smart, whether he was all the other good things or not. Mrs. Darwin also lent me Watson's 'Reply,' for she said it was always best to read both sides if one wished to be sure of the truth; and I am going to read that this week, while the other is fresh in my mind. I asked her if Mr. Darwin wasn't an Infidel? 'People call him so,' said she. 'And you and the children, are you all Infidels?' 'We all believe alike, and are all unbelievers in the mythologies of this or any past age,' said she, laughing. 'But don't you hate to be called Infidels?' said I. 'Oh, no! we are really proud of the name, for though given by our enemies as a term of reproach, to us it means free thought, liberty of speech, reform, truth, fact, science, and development, against creed, bigotry, superstition, myths, and uncertainties. To know a person as an Infidel is to know him as a thinker and reasoner, for it takes thought to enable, one to grow out of beliefs taught for generations, and grounded in one's mind from earliest childhood, till they become a part of the very being itself.' And I assure you, Edith, that Mrs. Darwin looked every inch a woman as she said all this in an earnest, enthusiastic manner. I felt she was just as sincere as you or I could be in our belief, and as certain that she was right; and the thought will come now and then, in spite of me, that she may be nearer right than any of us. Indeed, I feel now 'half seas over' since I read the 'Age of Reason,'" said Myra, laughing. "I can't read the Good Book with a bit of holy interest now, for it seems just like old stories, fables, and legends."

[TO BE CONTINUED].

Scientific Department.

A Nibble at Mr. John Fiske's "Crumb for the Modern Symposium."—Concluded.

"The legitimate conclusion is neither that of dualism nor of idealism, but what I have named reasoned realism, which reconciles common sense with speculative logic by showing that, although the truth of things (their Wahrheit) is just what we perceive in them (our Wahrnehmung), yet their reality is this and much more than this. Things are what they are felt to be; and what they are thought to be, when thoughts are symbols of the perceptions. Idealism declares that they are nothing but this. It is against this nothing but that common sense protests; and the protest is justified by reasoned realism, which, taking a comprehensive survey of the facts, thus answers the idealist: 'Your synthesis is imperfect, since it does not include all the data—notably it excludes the fact of an objective or not-self element in every feeling. You may conceivably regard the whole universe as nothing but a series of changes in your consciousness; but you cannot hope to convince me that I myself am simply a change in yourself, or that my body is only a fleeting image in your mind. Hence, although I conclude that the not-self is to you as to me, undivorceable from self, inalienable from feeling, in so far as it is felt, yet there must nevertheless be for both of us an existence not wholly co-extensive with our own. My world may be my picture of it; your world may be your picture of it; but there is something common to both which is more than either—an existent which has different relations to each.'"

We think enough has been quoted from Mr. Lewes to prove the untenableness of the idealistic position held by Mr. Fiske—or enough, at all events, to show that Mr. Fiske has no warrant whatever for asserting so dogmatically the infallibility of idealistic views. It would be quite beyond the powers of the present writer to add anything of equal value to the convincing arguments given in the quotations from Mr. Lewes, and he is content to leave the matter to his readers' impartial consideration, feeling confident that, if they have been temporarily mystified and confused by Mr. Fiske in regard to the reality of an external world, Mr. Lewes will speedily reinstate common sense for them on its old firm ground.

We come now to the consideration of the second position of Mr. Fiske's that we named for discussion, viz.:

"That there is an unknown and unknowable something left in what is called matter after all its attributes are eliminated."

We find a full consideration of this Agnostic view of things in "Problems" (first series, vol. ii), under the chapter on "Things in their Attributes and in Themselves," from which I make the following extracts. Page 391, § 12, Mr. Lewes says: "Metaphysicians commonly regard the belief of ordinary men in the real existence of the objects seen and touched to be the natural illusion of sense. I regard their postulate of a deeper, unknowable real to be the natural illusion of speculation substantializing its abstractions." Again, on page 393, §§ 14 and 15: "The 'thing in itself' is a fiction founded on a convenient distinction. . . . Its existence is not to be granted. It is a fiction, and we know its genesis. Kant invented a pure intention to serve as the a priori condition of empirical intention, and pure understanding as the a priori condition of empirical conceptions; he was also led to invent a pure object (the Ding-an-sech) as the a priori condition of empirical phenomena; thereby giving precision to the abstraction which metaphysicians had substantialized and declared to be the permanent reality underlying fleeting appearance." Also, on pp. 394–5, §§ 15 and 16: "If the metaphysician would prove the reality of the noumenon apart from its phenomenal manifestations, he must withdraw it from the invisible, intangible region; that is to say, he must make it.

phenomenal. Metaphysicians consider it deplorably superficial to accept the appearances of things for realities; but science and common sense will declare it to be utterly irrational to assume the reality to be that which cannot appear. The thing is its attributes: that is what we have to deal with; what the thing is to us. When metaphysicians tell us that we can never know things in themselves, and therefore all knowledge of the Absolute is necessarily excluded, our reply must be, that, in any rational sense of the term, things are known; and if the Absolute is the sum of things, then the Absolute is known, both in the known concretes and in the abstraction framed from them."

My last excerpt on this subject is the following, from p. 396, § 17: "In a word, the 'thing in itself' is a metaphysical fetich. It replaces the old conception of essence, which had replaced the earlier conception of a spirit, or demon, living in the object, animating it, and working by it. The savage regards his fetich in the light of a vehicle for the spirit which acts through it; the metaphysician regards the phenomenal object in the light of a vehicle for the manifestations of a noumenon which shines through it. The unknowable Absolute is the monotheistic development of this fetichism—the generalization and unification of all the particular entities or noumena."

Whatever may be thought of these views of Mr. Lewes by those favored few who are deeply skilled in "subjective analysis," the ordinary man of average culture and intelligence will be apt to conclude that the defenders of an unknown and unknowable something in matter, apart from all its attributes or phenomenal manifestations, are put in rather bad plight.

The third position taken by Mr. Fiske which I feel called upon to combat is:

"That the [alleged] mystery of the connection between mind and matter is forever insoluble."

Mr. Fiske, in discussing this question, shows us, if I am not greatly mistaken, that he, no more than some of the other writers who have contributed to the "Moderm Symposium," is exempt from liability to furnish us with an occasional illustration of that logical sin called "looseness of thought," the occurrence of which in discussions of this kind is so greatly to be deprecated. On p. 33 he dictatorially asserts that "the relation of concomitance between them [mental and physical phenomena] remains an ultimate and insoluble mystery"; whereas on p. 37 he declares that "it is not only inconceivable how mind should have been produced from matter, but it is inconceivable that it should have been produced from matter, unless matter possessed already the attributes of mind in embryo, an alternative which it is difficult to invest with any real meaning. The problem is altogether too abstruse to be solved with our present resources"—implying, of course, that with an extension of our resources it might be solved. There is certainly a lack of logical consistency here, and the result is that we are left in some doubt as to Mr. Fiske's real attitude regarding this fundamental problem. But, for the purpose of discussion, I shall take it for granted that the position ascribed to him here is the correct one, and he certainly cannot complain that any injustice has been done him if it is not, in view of his own conflicting statements on the subject.

Here, again, we shall confront Mr. Fiske with Mr. Lewes, and leave the public to decide between them. The great attempt made by Mr. Lewes is to show that there are not two separate entities or existences called body and mind, but that body and mind are merely two aspects of one existence, and that the problem of the relation between them is solved when there is established an equivalence between the subjective and objective aspects of the psychical processes and material conditions involved, and when it is shown wherein the difference exists. In chap. iii. of the problem entitled "Animal Automatism" (Physical Basis of Mind, "Problems," second series), Mr. Lewes expounds this view at great length. His argument is so concise that it is impossible to condense it, and one or two extracts cannot, of course, do him full justice, but will serve merely to indicate his position. Whether he has succeeded in demonstrating his case or not is a question that may be left unanswered. All that we have to concern ourselves with here, as regards Mr. Fiske, is the fact that one of the ablest thinkers of the age, so far from conceding, like Mr. Fiske, that the problem is forever insoluble, actually makes a brave attempt to solve it. The following are a few of Mr. Lewes' leading thoughts on this subject. Page 388, § 40, we read: "We are told that it is 'impossible to imagine matter thinking,' which is very true: only by a gross confusion of terms can thought be called a property of cerebral tissue, or of matter at all. We may, indeed, penetrate beneath the terms which relate to aspects, and recognize, in the underlying reality, not two existences, but one. Our conceptions of this reality, however, are expressed in symbols representing different classes of feelings, objective and subjective; and to employ the terms of one class to designate the conceptions of the other is to frustrate the very purposes of language. Matter and mind, object and subject, are abstractions from sentient experience. We know them as abstractions, and know the concrete experiences from which they are abstracted." The only other passage that I have space to quote is the following: "Our intelligible universe is constructed out of the elements of feeling, according to certain classifications, the broadest of which is that into external and internal, object and subject. The abstractions matter and mind, once formed and fixed in representative symbols, are easily accredited as two different reals. But the separation is ideal, and is really a distinction of aspects. We know ourselves as body-mind; we do not know ourselves as body and mind, if by that be meant two coexistent, independent existents; and the illusion by which the two aspects appear as two reals may be made intelligible by the analysis of any ordinary proposition. For example, when we say, 'This fruit is sweet,' we express facts of feeling—actual or anticipated—in abstract terms. The concrete facts are these: a colored feeling, a solid feeling, a sweet feeling, etc., have been associated together, and the colored, solid, sweet group is symbolized in the abstract term 'fruit.' But the color, solidity, and sweetness are also abstract terms, representing feelings associated in other groups, so that we find 'fruit' which has no 'sweetness,' and 'sweetness' in other things besides 'fruit.' Having thus separated ideally the 'sweetness' from the 'fruit,' which in the concrete, sweet-fruit, is not permissible, we easily come to imagine a real distinction. This is the case with the concrete living organism when we cease to consider it in its concrete reality, and fix our attention on its abstract terms, body and mind. We then think of body apart from mind, and believe in them as two reals, though neither exists apart."

These excerpts give but a very inadequate idea of the subtle "subjective analysis"—if I may be allowed to use that phrase—displayed by Mr. Lewes in his lengthy exposition of his views on this subject; but probably enough has been quoted to win for him the sincere thanks and deep respect of all earnest students of nature for his noble effort to wrest another of the so-called insoluble mysteries of life from the metaphysical darkness and mystification in which they have been so long enshrouded. And let us hope that there will always be some bold and fearless inquirer like Mr. Lewes who shall not be afraid to tackle the most insoluble of the insoluble mysteries which faint-hearted and obfuscated metaphysicians have at all times prated about. And, granted such enterprising minds, we may be certain that the day will surely come when the intellect of man shall have mastered all the problems—that are real, tangible problems, and not metaphysical absurdities—that life presents.

I am now brought to the consideration of the last of the four positions taken by Mr. Fiske which I started to discuss, viz.:

"That the relation between motion and feeling can never be demonstrated."

And once more shall I call on Mr. Lewes to do battle for modern science and psychology, as they are interpreted and advocated by him, against the pseudo science and psychology which Mr. Fiske champions. In "Problems of Life and Mind" (first series, vol. ii), Mr. Lewes has a chapter on "Motion as a Mode of Feeling," which has been accessible to the public for nearly three years, and yet it would appear that Mr. Fiske has never even heard of it, otherwise surely some reference to the views of a thinker of Mr. Lewes' calibre was called for when discussing a question that had so lately been treated by him with masterly analysis, and a conclusion reached radically opposed to that maintained by Mr. Fiske. It cannot be that the Spencerian school, of which Mr. Fiske is so zealous and devoted a disciple, would be guilty of harboring any small feeling of envy or jealousy against new philosophic thought because it happened to include or go beyond theirs and strike a little nearer the ultimate truth of things. Yet I must say it looks wonderfully like that in Mr. Fiske's case. It is extremely improbable that Mr. Fiske has not read Mr. Lewes' work; how, then, is his utter silence in regard to his views to be accounted for? Either he must be jealous of Mr. Lewes' fame or he must consider him beneath his notice! It would seem too absurd to charge Mr. Fiske with entertaining such a feeling as jealousy towards a brother philosopher; but it is hardly less absurd to imagine that he looks upon Mr. Lewes as unworthy of being even refuted. I cannot see any way for Mr. Fiske out of the difficulty, but would be very glad to know that some rational explanation could be given of the matter.

In opening the subject of motion and feeling in the chapter last cited, Mr. Lewes uses the following admirable language: "The love of drawing sharp distinctions, the love of mystery, and the love of stultifying dogmatic confidence by an equally dogmatic skepticism, all unite in proclaiming the gulf between motion and feeling to be unbridged, unbridgeable. Here, at any rate, science, it is said, must acknowledge its impotence. However clearly it may trace the course of molecular movements from the excitation of a sensory nerve to its final discharge on a muscle, the transformation of a neural process into a sensation remains an impenetrable mystery. Motion we know, and feeling we know; but we know them as utterly different; and how the one becomes changed into the other, what causal nexus connects the two, is a question which can never be answered.

"Such is the argument urged in a hundred different quarters. The force of it when the facts are so presented is irresistible. But are the facts correctly stated? That the passage of a motion into a sensation is unthinkable, and that by no intelligible process can we follow the transformation, I admit; but I do not admit that there is any such transformation. When I am told that a nervous excitation is transformed into a sensation on reaching the brain, I ask: Who knows this? On what evidence is this fact asserted? On examination it will appear that there is no evidence at all of such a transformation; all the evidence points to the very different fact that the neural process and the feeling are one and the same process viewed under different aspects. Viewed from the physical or objective side, it is a neural process; viewed from the psychological or subjective side, it is a sentient process" (pp. 409–411).

On pp. 418–419 we find the following: "There is abundant evidence that some external movement precedes an internal change, and that this change in a sensory nerve precedes a neural process; but there is absolutely no evidence that this neural process precedes and produces its sensation. If it did, the law of the conservation of energy would be at fault, since a motion would terminate in what was neither motion nor a mode of motion. Mr. Mill, expressing the current opinion, says: 'Let it be shown that the most complex series of physical causes and effects succeed one another in the eye and brain to produce a sensation of color, . . . still, at the end of these motions, there is something which is not color; there is a feeling of color.' I reply, that the production is a fiction; from first to last there has been a series of physical sequences, which, viewed subjectively, has been a series of sensations. The external motion has been transformed into a neural excitation, as a violent motion of the air may be transformed into the explosion of a nitrogenous compound. But to ask how this neural excitation becomes transformed into a sensation is equivalent to asking how the material of a yard measure—which is a substance—can be transformed into a unit of length—which is an idea. . . .

"So with the supposed transformation of a neural process into a sensation. The process is the objective aspect of the sensation. Instead of our feeling the sensation of sound, of color, or of fragrance, we are mentally looking at the changes in the sensory organ. Translating the subjective feeling into objective terms, we see the conditions of that feeling to be a living nervous mechanism and its mode of reaction under a stimulation."

On pp. 434–435 we have a fine criticism of Mr. Herbert Spencer, which his disciple Mr. Fiske would find interesting, no doubt:

"Even Mr. Spencer, who has with great lucidity expounded the evidence that mind and nervous action are the objective and subjective faces of 'the same thing,' insists that 'we are utterly incapable of seeing, and even of imagining, how the two are related. Mind still continues to us a something without any kinship to other things.' There is an equivocalness in first declaring them to be two aspects of the same thing, and then pronouncing their relation to be inconceivable. Since the relation is conceived and expressed, it cannot be inconceivable; and since the two aspects are said to have one foundation, their kinship is assigned. What is meant is that we are unable to imagine why one aspect is the obverse of the other; which may be said of all relations. The asserted relation may be questioned; but, once accepted, the question why it is what it is seems idle."

Further on, on p. 437, we find this pregnant sentence: "The phenomenon known objectively as a nervous tremor, a neural process involving very complex elements of molecular energy, does not become a feeling in the sentient organism: it is that feeling in the organism, and is the occasion of quite a different feeling in the observer."

And, again, on p. 439, this: "A feeling is a change in the state of the sentient organism, which, although initiated by some external change (conceived as motion), is not to be regarded simply as the equivalent of the motion which initiates, but of the whole neural process set in action."

These excerpts are from an argument covering more than forty pages, in which Mr. Lewes expounds his conception of motion and feeling with great lucidity of thought and aptness of illustration; and all that I have been able to do here is merely to indicate the line of his thought in relation to the subject.

When beginning this article I had intended to make a few remarks in regard to Mr. Fiske's assertion that science has nothing to say for or against the belief in a future life, but the consideration of that topic must be left over for the present.

W.

Correspondence Extraordinary.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. V.

My Dear Readers: I fear it will be tedious to you for me to give the details of how Jah and I kept on making something from nothing until we had changed the nothing throughout boundless space into something—until we had transformed it into real tangible matter. It was by far one of the most remarkable cases of evolution that ever has been produced. As you doubtless comprehend that the changing of nothing into something, even on ever so small a scale, was a most difficult feat to perform, and that when the business had to be extended so as to fill with material substance the vast expanse we had prepared, the magnitude of the job can be partially understood. It of course took us a long time to extend our operations for millions of decillions of miles in every direction, and fill all that space with the new matter we had learned to prepare, but we had made up our minds that before we commenced the arduous labor of making suns and worlds, we would get the material on hand with which to compound them. So you must understand that we kept on blending and mixing the ethereal something we had learned to make with the interminable nothing that surrounded us on every side. We continued to mix and blend, agitate and stir the two together, thus changing the nothing into something upon the most improved plan. We toiled weeks and months, and years and centuries at the work, or rather the time that would amount to those weeks, months, and years, for you will remember that there was no sun in existence, and there was nothing with which to divide the time into days, weeks, etc. We did not, of course, keep an accurate measure of the time that sped by, but knew that many centuries and ages had elapsed before we had succeeded in filling the limitless vacuum we had produced, even with the thinnest kind of ether that can be imagined. We found it necessary to keep the forces we had invented in constant use, and they were most invaluable in working up the nothing into something. They were very weak at first, it must be confessed, as they depended upon matter for their power, when matter was in such an ethereal condition and had so little consistency. You may be able to understand that even gravitation, affinity, magnetism, and electricity were far from being as powerful as they have become since, and light and heat had scarcely yet come into existence. We felt our way along by degrees, and did not succeed at once in getting up everything that in time we produced.

After the long period it required to fill space with the very thin form of matter which I have attempted to describe, we next essayed to thicken it up and give it more consistency and body. To effect this we tried a good many experiments and processes, and set our forces at work in various ways, but the results were not very satisfactory. All the stirrings we gave it did not seem to increase the consistency of the vast ether. Then said I to Jah, "Look here! You remember when we succeeded in getting up this something from nothing, we accomplished it by bringing two samples of nothing from opposite directions and from immense distances apart. Let us try it again with this thin air; let us bring all that we can carry in our big sacks from the same points in space, as near as we can hit them, from whence we brought the nothing which was the beginning of all this thin stuff we have produced." Jah replied: "Ah, Luce, you are a brilliant fellow; you are as full of expedients as this vast expanse is of the ether we have evolved from the nothing you speak of. I have confidence in your suggestion, and I will enter into it most heartily. Let us take our sacks and be off at once, for you know the best we can do it will take us a long time to make the journey." So we immediately took our departure in opposite directions, he towards the north, and I towards the south, each making the best time possible, for we were both anxious to test the experiment as early as practicable. We found we could not travel quite as fast as when on the previous trip. The slight diffusion of substance in the space we passed through tended in a limited degree to retard our rapid transit. We did not idle by the way, and used every exertion to make the term of our absence as short as possible. When my sacks were filled, I immediately took my flight to the scene of our operations; but with the load upon my back, and having to part the ether to let my big sacks through, I found my homeward progress less rapid than when going out. The resistance was greater, and the traveling more laborious. From my superior muscular strength, I exceeded Jah somewhat, and got back several days before he arrived. As near as I can calculate the time now, I was absent about one hundred and eighty-seven days, and the distance traveled was thousands upon thousands of quintillions of miles. Upon my arrival I amused myself the best way I could until my Brother's return by maturing plans for future operations.

When Jah brought his sacks into camp he was thoroughly exhausted, and muttered, half to himself and half aloud, "O dear me! had I known there was so much hard work connected with getting up a universe, I would have deferred the enterprise a few million years longer." I consoled him by mild and friendly discourse, and said to him that a pair of brothers like us should not cower at any undertaking, nor get discouraged, however great the tasks before us appeared.

After he had rested a few days he was all right again, and then we proceeded to mix the contents of our sacks together; and the result was marvelous. The ether from the extreme north, blending with that from the extreme south, as though the first possessed positive, or masculine, qualities, and the second negative, or the feminine, co-operated beautifully together, and the direct result was that the consistency of what we had previously produced was wonderfully increased, and it thickened up so that we had to make considerable effort to pass through it, and it arrived at a state nearly as dense as your atmosphere.

Jah and I were overjoyed at the results thus obtained, and, with the greatest amount of courage you can conceive of, we kept up the blending and mixing processes by the forces before mentioned—and which, by the way, became proportionately stronger and quicker—until all the space had been gone over, as on the former occasion, and the ether thus changed to the consistence of air. It, of course, took us a long time to effect this, we being many months in almost constant employment before we had gone over our entire domain and had metamorphosed all our light ether into air of about one hundred times its weight. When we had gone over the entire field we were weary and exhausted, in a comparative sense, but we felt so happy with the results which had been achieved that we did not care for being a little tired, and a few days of rest refreshed us to such an extent that we felt inclined to renew our efforts in the great experiments of making still denser matter.

Jah came to me after we had had a good rest, and thus accosted me, in his blandest tones: "Luce, we have succeeded thus far, in the great labor we have undertaken, beyond my most sanguine expectations. Your ability and your fertile brain have contributed largely to accomplish these grand results; but, as you will admit, we have performed but a small part of the work that we have undertaken. Before we can form vast suns and worlds fitted for the abode of living beings, we shall have to give the aeriform matter we have now produced a far greater degree of density, and develop a variety of different and independent substances. Now, the question is, Luce, how can this thing best be accomplished? Your suggestions proved very efficacious before, and I appeal to you again for further propositions. What shall we do next?"

My Brother was so gracious on this occasion that he greatly won my regard, and I felt willing to do anything in my power to please him and to further the grand scheme we had taken in hand. I thus addressed him: "My dear Brother, I feel grateful to you for the credit you accord to me for the part I have taken in the labors we have so far performed, and with you I rejoice that our efforts have been crowned with success. If, as you say, my suggestions have proved of value, I am very glad of it, and I thank you for the high compliments you so kindly pay me. I realize the necessity of continued efforts on our part, and with you I feel imbued with the desire to continue the enterprise we have inaugurated until full success has crowned our efforts. I well know we have got to give the thin matter we have so far produced much greater consistency, and I have been revolving it in my mind how this can best be accomplished. You doubtless remember how, in getting up our second degree, or aeriform state, from the mere ethereal, we tried many processes to accomplish what we wished to, without achieving the object desired. We do not wish to waste our efforts in unavailing attempts. It seems to me that we had better resort to the measure we tried in the first and second instances, which produced ether in the one case and air in the other. Let us make another of our long journeys, you to the far north and I to the extreme south, and bring back vast quantities of the thin air we will find there. We have found that, by commingling the products of the extreme limits of our domain, we have produced very satisfactory results. It strikes me favorably that that course is the one for us to pursue. Let us continue to blend the north with the south so long as satisfactory results repay us for our labor."

"Agreed," said Jah, "I am ready for another of those long journeys. I believe I can strike within a million miles or two the very locality I have visited already. I shall be ready to start in half an hour." It did not require longer than thirty minutes for me to be in traveling trim, and after shaking hands and embracing each other affectionately, we went like a flash of electricity through the vast abyss that was limitless in every direction. We found it required an additional effort to make the transit owing to the increased density of the aeriform matter through which we passed; but beings of such power as we possessed were not to be retarded by substance no denser than your atmosphere, and in due time we had performed our journey and executed our purpose. It took us a few days longer this time to make the round trip than before, but we effected it in fine style and spirits. Of course I got back a few days first, and when Jah came in loaded down to the guards with the northern air, we were rejoiced to see each other, and such a hand-shaking and fond embracing as we participated in has seldom been witnessed. After spending a few hours in cheerful conversation and rest, we tried our third grand experiment of blending and commingling the products of the far north with the far south, and the results were all we could hope for. The density of our universal material was increased tenfold.

I tell you when we found this to be the case our joy knew no bounds, and we spent several days in hilarity and rejoicing, leaving in the meantime our forces at work continuing the mixing process, spreading the glad effects over all our grand domain. We attended closely to work and caused it to be faithfully performed. We found our forces grew still more powerful, and in a few months the work was accomplished. Heavy air, partially opaque in places, had succeeded the thin air which had before been produced and extended everywhere, and we happily realized we were getting a material on hand with which to manufacture suns and worlds and stars.

But I will not detain you longer this time. You pay good attention to what I say, and I will try and not weary you. Remember, I do not ask you to believe any more of what I tell you than you choose. You are as free to believe or disbelieve as I am to narrate it.

With the kindest wishes in your behalf, I remain your devoted friend,

Lucifer,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Discussion.

The B nnett-Teed Discussion.

I.—Jesus Christ is not only Divine, but is the Lord God, Creator of Heaven and Earth.

MR. BENNETT'S EIGHTH REPLY.

Mr. Cyrus Romulus R. Teed, Dear Sir: You seem to be displeased with me because I pronounce the species of chimera, visionary vaporings, and speculations peculiar to yourself, and you claim that it is utterly false. I do not pretend to say that there are no other visionary, chimerical people in the world who arrive at conclusions without the aid of demonstrated facts, but I must, nevertheless, claim that your style of thought and argument is peculiar to yourself. That others may have peculiarities of a similar kind I will not deny.

I have very little to say about the overwhelming knowledge which flashed upon your mind when, in the processes of infoldment and unfoldment, you made the discovery that the perpetuation of human life depended upon the successive incarnations of Deity. If the same was and is satisfactory to yourself, I cannot complain; but with me it passes for very little. I do not think the perpetuation of human life has any such necessity. Human life is continued upon precisely the same general principles as all other forms of life.

I can only be glad that you are so well pleased that I have shown that Jesus was far from being the first person for whom it was claimed that he possessed deific qualities or was begotten by God himself, and that he was not by any means the first who was believed to be a messiah. If a statement of the fact does you good, I can but rejoice that I made it; though I fail to see how it helps your side of the question. If it is true that Jesus is God, and creator of heaven and earth, does it make the truth any more apparent by showing that nearly a dozen other characters—Christs and messiahs—preceded him, quite as remarkable, and of whom fully as much was claimed? And, again, if Jesus really is God, Creator, etc., why should he needs be the sixth person, as you claim, belonging to the cycle of one immortal evolution? and why should the seventh be necessary?

You still hold that matter is perpetual in existence, never having had a beginning from nothing, but also hold that it had to have a creator, and that in its various forms it has to be created again and again. You seem to regard the universe, including man, something like a bed—"though formed long ago, is made every day."

I will not contend with you as to the nature of Greek roots, or as to what the original meaning of epos was, but am content to be governed by the accepted meaning of the English words we have in constant use. According to that basis, as defined by Webster, create means "to bring into being, to form out of nothing, to cause to exist." Now, if matter, or the universe, or cosmos, has had a perpetual existence, and did not come from nothing, then it was never created, and Jesus was not its creator. That may be regarded as settled. If matter ever existed in some form, the properties and forces which it possesses to-day also ever existed with it. Neither had to be created; neither was brought from nothing; neither required a Jesus to get them up. Your effort to show that something can have a perpetual existence, and yet require creating and re-creating, is decidedly weak.

I claimed that, if mind is a form of substance that perpetually existed, its existence was independent of any organized form, which necessarily must have had a beginning. You deny this, but fail to show wherein I was wrong. My proposition appears a self-evident one. If mind is a substance of eternal existence, it requires no form or organization to produce it or evolve it. On the other hand, we know of no mind but what does depend upon an organization for an existence and can only exist while the organization continues to evolve it. The eternal mind, then, would seem to be a mere chimera that greatly stands in need of proof.

You are polite enough to tell me that my statement that there is no proof that Jesus ever had an existence, save what is found in the writings ascribed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, is an "outgrowth of my ignorance, with an intense repugnance to the fact that Jesus did exist." If my ignorance is so great, why do you not use some means to dispel it? I asked you, if in your power, to give me the proof that either of the four books named had a known existence before some time in the second century. You failed to give it. Now, if your knowledge is not sufficient to cite me the proofs of the matter that exists, it comes with a bad grace for you to taunt me with ignorance. There is, doubtless, quite ignorance enough on either side, but in the argument it devolves upon you to give the proof of his existence, rather than to charge me with ignorance and enmity. I certainly have no "intense repugnance" to the idea that Jesus existed. I only think the question is one of great doubt, and if there are proofs of it I am anxious to know what they are. I am very sorry you have none better to offer than that the existence of Christians and Mohammedans proves it conclusively and the truth of what he taught, as well as all the claims that have been set up in reference to his birth, life, and death, including his miracles, his ascension, etc. The existence of the believers in these two extensive creeds, to my mind, presents no more proof that Jesus lived and did all that is claimed for him, than the existence of the four hundred millions of Buddhists in the world proves that there was once such a person as Buddha, and that he was the Lord from heaven; than the existence of the Mormons—who have increased much faster since they began than the Christians did in the same length of time—proves that Mormon once lived and wrote the Book of Mormon on metal plates, which were found by the prophet Joseph Smith and afterwards improved upon by Brigham Young; than the existence of the Shakers proves that Ann Lee was the person in whom Christ made his second appearing; than the millions of Babists now existing in Persia—a sect that has grown to remarkable proportions in that country within the present generation—prove that the founder, Ali Mohammed, was inspired from heaven and was commissioned to perform a special mission for the authorities above. All that these great sects can do is to prove that they exist themselves. They do not prove the existence of any special personage believed to have flourished some nineteen hundred years ago. It is simply idle to claim it. If there is no better proof that Jesus lived than that people believe he did, the contest might as well be abandoned. If a belief proves the existence of the person believed in, then we must admit that ghosts and witches and fairies and genii and gnomes have a bona fide existence. How many believers does it require to prove the existence of an imaginary personage? When five believed that there had been a Jesus, did that number make his existence a certainty? Would ten, or fifty, or one hundred, or five hundred, or five thousand, or fifty thousand effect it if it were an uncertainty before? You may depend upon it that that is a very weak kind of proof.

Your analogy between the various combinations of oxygen, nitrogen, and carbon, and of Christ and Antichrist; that they blend together, creating friction, and forming compounds, giving you "proof absolute" of the existence of Jesus, is just a trifle amusing, but it is extremely thin—in fact, there is nothing of it. It may be satisfactory to yourself, but it cannot be to others. The analogies between Christ and oxygen, and Antichrist and carbon are very farfetched; but when one engages in the business of analogies, there is no trouble in constructing them indefinitely. I must say the proofs you produce of the existence of Jesus are laughable, and it is a wonder how they can be satisfactory to a person with the intelligence you possess. I am not offended with your making myself one of the constituents of Antichrist. If disbelieving that Jesus was God; that he had anything to do with the creation of heaven and earth or the production of matter, any more than you or I had; if doubting whether such a person ever had an existence, in fact, constitutes me an Antichrist, I accept the appellation. But as an individual of generally amiable character, as an humble Judean reformer and itinerant speaker of parables, I have no objection to him. I only object that these thousand falsehoods should be told about him, and that he should be exalted to the character of the Supreme Power in the universe—that he was superhuman, when it is extremely doubtful if he had an existence as an individual.

I notice it is very convenient for you to pass over the criticisms I offered upon the high character and great merit of the moral teachings ascribed to Jesus. It is probably easier to imagine the various chemical unions between Christs and Antichrists than to dispose of the criticisms I briefly urged; and I am amused at the dexterity with which you endeavor to dispose of one of my points of criticism with the view of making that do duty for all the rest. You endeavor to explain away the great number of defects in his moral teachings by your play upon the word generation, arguing that it may mean thirty years, or several thousand years as may be necessary. In this way you advocate a sort of sliding scale which reasonable men can not accept. The word generation has some meaning, or it has not; it means a definite period in time, or it does not. By general consent the word generation means the lifetime of a class of human beings that may occupy the earth during a given period of time. If Jesus said that certain things should take place before that generation passed away, he meant, if language has any meaning, that it should be before all those then living should die, and not that the time might be deferred two or three thousand years, and the same as he did when he said, "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom." It is not fair to suppose that he was talking in enigmas with a view of deceiving his hearers, and causing them to arrive at false conclusions. He undoubtedly meant what he said, that all those living at that time should not die before the events he predicted should come to pass. He evidently did not defer the fulfillment thousands of years in the future. His remarks, if intended for anybody, were for those who were listening to him. Your effort to show that Jesus gives to the word "generation," the same meaning it has in the first chapter of Matthew, when it is not pretended that Jesus used that language at all, is akin to much that passes for theological argument. It is a weak and unworthy cause which demands the employment of sophistry and a double play upon words—the game of fast and loose that will shorten the term, "generation" to one day, or will elongate it to thousands of years to suit the whims and necessities of the manipulator. But such is the way of theologians, and by such arguments do they aim to establish their system.

And now, friend Teed, it is with some reluctance that I announce to you that our discussion has drawn to a close—prematurely, perhaps, but not sooner, I assure you, than has been desired by many of our readers. A large proportion of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER have not been interested in our discussion, it being more of an ethereal, ideal, metaphysical character than is adapted to their temperaments. Of this fact I have been apprised by numerous letters which I have received from all directions. You are undoubtedly a person who has read and thought a great deal, but your style of thought and reasoning is not in unison with the tastes of most of my readers. What you may evolve from your inner consciousness, what you may be able to arrive at from your analogies and from your metaphysical and aerial flights, may be quite satisfactory to yourself, but not to them. You may have reason to think that you are the coming seventh Avater or the incarnation of the Creator of heaven and earth—that you are an Elijah, Jesus the Second, or some other great prophet or founder of a new dispensation in the great cycle of infoldment and unfoldment of involution and evolution, which, with your mind's eye, you perceive so clearly, but which to my obtuse visual organs is dim and misty. I am satisfied that this discussion might be continued almost indefinitely without any perceptible good results. Your resources in the field of ideality and metaphysical speculation are inexhaustible, and it is as well to quit right here as anywhere. I would cheerfully continue the discussion were it agreeable to my readers and had I the slightest hope of convincing you of your errors, but against all hope of this kind, it seems utterly useless. These columns are hardly a fitting place to promulgate your new revelation. It is better that you start a paper of your own for the purpose.

I was laboring under a misapprehension of the facts when the matter of a discussion between us was first named. I supposed you to be a regular defender of the system of theology which I oppose, and that in discussing with you I would be debating with one in full sympathy with the system of Christianity as it exists in the world; but in time I learned that you had little more sympathy with it than I possess myself, and that in opposing you I was not combating the old system which I have made my life work to combat, but rather a new system, a new revelation, or a new light, which has dawned exclusively upon yourself. My mission is to oppose the rule and ethics of the Christian Church as we find it among us, and not to hunt up individual vagaries and fancies to combat. I can not spend my time with those. I prefer to leave you and every other person to entertain your peculiar views in peace, and to spend my force in opposing and exposing the errors of that theology which aims to control our country and to bring everything into subordination to it. My fight is with error in the aggregate, and not with every individual schism or chimera that may be entertained.

I certainly have no grounds to condemn the conclusions at which you may arrive or the means by which you reach them. If, by the aid of your "divinely illumined mind," you can evolve from your inner consciousness great truths or principles, or can locate the foci of the heavenly spheres and forces, I shall not object. I simply have to say I do not possess that power in any marked degree. To many of my readers, however, as well as to myself, it seems that the space in my columns can be used to better advantage in giving the discoveries and reasonings of Lyell, Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, Draper, Haeckel, Proctor, Newcomb, Lewes, Fiske, and others, than that which is merely metaphysical, speculative, ethereal, and ideal.

I thank you for your courtesy and friendliness. Believe me sincerely your friend, D. M. BENNETT.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.—Such is the title of what is now one of the neatest papers in the country, and is destined to soon have an enormous circulation and influence. It is needless to say that THE TRUTH SEEKER is not devoted to any one sect, party, clique, or society. It is devoted to science, morals, Freethought and human happiness, and it believes in every one's believing just as he chooses, thinking just as he chooses to think, in fact, it advocates liberty of speech, liberty of conscience, liberty in everything. There are many who are not ready to embrace any of the doctrines at present put forth, and to such THE TRUTH SEEKER will be attractive as it must be interesting. It is a large sixteen-page quarto, sixty-four columns in every issue, published weekly at three dollars per year. Every lover of liberty, moral, political, and religious liberty, Freethought, and all that Freethought implies, should send two stamps for specimen to D. M. Bennett publisher, 141 Eighth street, New York.—Lovilia, (Iowa), Gazette.

THE Comstock has come to grief. The suit against Bennett for sending questions to Jehovah through the United States mails has been dismissed by the District Attorney. They found out, although Bennett was guilty of printing and mailing the questions, that the postmasters had failed to deliver them to the person addressed and that Bennett would prove this and go clear; anyhow, Comstock is raving mad.—Seymour Times.

Answers to Inquirers.

J. B.—Was the Rev. C. P. McCarthy expelled from one Liberal club? and did he then become a member of the other? Ans.—Yes; he was expelled from the Manhattan Liberal Club, and was admitted into the New York Liberal Club.

J. B.—Are the two Liberal clubs equally radical, or do they differ in degree? Ans.—The Liberal clubs, as clubs, are neither radical nor conservative. Some of the members of both clubs are radical, others conservative. The radicals predominate in the Manhattan Liberal Club, the conservatives in the New York Liberal Club.

J. W. S.—Do the Egyptian records give any accounts of Moses, the Israelites crossing the Red Sea, the Egyptians being drowned, or of the plagues? Ans.—The only accounts we have regarding the first three queries are those given in the Bible. The plagues occurr to a greater or less extent, every year, as they do in every malarial country.

J. B.—What are the dimensions of St. Peter's Cathedral at Rome? Ans.—St. Peter's Cathedral at Rome is 613 feet long and 450 feet across the transepts. The arch of the nave is 90 feet wide and 152 feet high. The diameter of the dome is 195 1-2 feet. From the pavement to the base of the lantern is 405 feet, and to the top of the cross 434 3-4 feet.

SENECA.—1. What and who was Torquemada? Where can a history of him be found? Ans.—Thomas de Torquemada, the Inquisitor-General of Spain, whose memory is rendered infamous for barbarity, was a monk of the order of St. Dominic, and became Inquisitor-General in 1483. During the exercise of his power, in the course of sixteen years, it is said that no less than 8800 victims were committed to the flames, 90,000 were condemned to perpetual imprisonment and other severe punishments, and above 80,000 Jews were banished from Spain. He was born about 1420, died 1498. We know of no history of Torquemada other than the sketches given of him in the various Encyclopedias.

E. V. W.—Will you please tell me how many times the command to kill appears in the Bible? Ans.—1. The word "kill" appears in the Bible about a hundred different times, and it appears as a command many times, but not always as a command from God. The principal passages are the following: "And it came to pass by the way in the inn, that the Lord met him and sought to kill him" (Exod. iv, 24); "Now, therefore, kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him" (Num. xxxi, 17); "But thou shalt surely kill him; thy hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people" (Deut. xiii, 9); "And I will kill thy root with famine" (Isa. xiv, 30); "And some of them ye shall kill" (Matt. xxiii, 34); "And I will kill her children with death" (Rev. ii, 23). 2. What is the best Infidel text book to the Bible? Give price. Ans.—The "Infidel's Text Book," by Robert Cooper, is considered the best. For sale at this office; price, one dollar. For answer to other question see last number of TRUTH SEEKER.

S. S.—Who were the gods and demi-gods that existed prior to Christ? how did they exist? and what did they do? Ans.—The gods were extremely numerous, and it would require too much space to enumerate them all. Among the more conspicuous were Brahma, Ormuzd, Fohi, Baal, Osiris, Zeus, Jupiter, etc. It is difficult to point the places where they existed, save in the imaginations of men. They could be found nowhere else. They were believed in by all the old Oriental nations. The demi-gods proper were equally fabulous, believed to have been half god and half human. Among them may be numbered Hercules, Castor, Pollux, Æsculapius, Jason, Theseus, Prometheus, Atlas, Orpheus, Amphion, Achilles, Ulysses, Orion, etc. These parties were also called heroes. There was also a class of men distinguished by their able teachings and moral lives, who, after their death, were deified by their admiring followers, and worshiped as gods. Among these may be numbered Zoroaster, Buddha, Confucius, Pythagoras, Plato, Jesus, Apollonius, Mohammed, and many others. All the gods that ever were supposed to exist were either born in the imaginations of human beings or were transformed from men who had had a real existence.

Selections.

The Ethics of Religion.

BY W. K. CLIFFORD, F.R.S.

The word religion is used in many different meanings, and there have been not a few controversies in which the main difference between the contending parties was only this, that they understood by religion two different things. I will therefore begin by setting forth as clearly as I can one or two of the meanings which the word appears to have in popular speech.

First, then, it may mean a body of doctrines, as in the common phrase, "The truth of the Christian religion;" or in this sentence, "The religion of Buddha teaches that the soul is not a distinct substance." Opinions differ upon the question what doctrines may properly be called religious; some people holding that there can be no religion without belief in a god and in a future life, so that in their judgment the body of doctrines must necessarily include these two; while others would insist upon other special dogmas being included, before they could consent to call the system by this name. But the number of such people is daily diminishing, by reason of the spread and the increase of our knowledge about distant countries and races. To me, indeed, it would seem rash to assert of any doctrine or its contrary that it might not form part of a religion. But, fortunately, it is not necessary to any part of the discussion on which I propose to enter, that this question should be settled.

Secondly, religion may mean a ceremonial or cult involving an organized priesthood and a machinery of sacred things and places. In this sense we speak of the clergy as ministers of religion, or of a state as tolerating the practice of certain religions. There is a somewhat wider meaning which it will be convenient to consider together with this one, and as a mere extension of it, namely, that in which religion stands for the influence of a certain priesthood. A religion is sometimes said to have been successful when it has got its priests into power; thus some writers speak of the wonderfully rapid success of Christianity. A nation is said to have embraced a religion when the authorities of that nation have granted privileges to the clergy, have made them as far as possible the leaders of society, and have given them a considerable share in the management of public affairs. So the northern nations of Europe are said to have embraced the Catholic religion at an early date. The reason why it seems to me convenient to take these two meanings together is, that they are both related to the priesthood. Although the priesthood itself is not called religion, so far as I know, yet the word is used for the general influence and the professional acts of the priesthood.

Thirdly, religion may mean a body of precepts or code of rules, intended to guide human conduct, as in this sentence of the authorized version of the New Testament: "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world" (James i. 27). It is sometimes difficult to draw the line between this meaning and the last, for it is a mark of the great majority of religions that they confound ceremonial observances with duties having real moral obligation. Thus in the Jewish decalogue the command to do no work on Saturdays is found side by side with the prohibition of murder and theft. It might seem to be the more correct as well as the more philosophical course to follow in this matter the distinction made by Butler between moral and positive commands, and to class all those precepts which are not of universal moral obligation under the head of ceremonial. And, in fact, when we come to examine the matter from the point of view of morality, the distinction is of course of the utmost importance. But from the point of view of religion there are difficulties in making it. In the first place, the distinction is not made, or is not understood, by religious folks in general. Innumerable tracts and pretty stories impress upon us that Sabbath-breaking is rather worse than stealing, and leads naturally on to materialism and murder. Less than a hundred years ago sacrilege was punishable by burning in France, and murder by simple decapitation. In the next place, if we pick out a religion at haphazard, we shall find that it is not at all easy to divide its precepts into those which are really of moral obligation and those which are indifferent and of a ceremonial character. We may find precepts unconnected with any ceremonial, and yet positively immoral; and ceremonials may be immoral in themselves, or constructively immoral, on account of their known symbolism. On the whole, it seems to me most convenient to draw the plain and obvious distinction between those actions which a religion prescribes to all its followers, whether the actions are ceremonial or not, and those which are prescribed only as professional actions of a sacerdotal class. The latter will come under what I have called the second meaning of religion, the professional acts and the influence of a priesthood. In the third meaning will be included all that practically guides the life of a layman, in so far as this guidance is supplied to him by his religion.

Fourthly, and lastly, there is a meaning of the word religion which has been coming more and more prominently forward of late years, till it has even threatened to supersede all the others. Religion has been defined as morality touched with emotion. I will not here adopt this definition, because I wish to deal with the concrete in the first place, and only to pass on to the abstract in so far as that previous study appears to lead to it. I wish to consider the facts of religion as we find them, and not ideal possibilities. "Yes, but," every one will say, "if you mean my own religion, it is already, as a matter of fact, morality touched with emotion. It is the highest morality touched with the purest emotion, an emotion directed towards the most worthy of objects." Unfortunately we do not mean your religion alone, but all manner of heresies and heathenisms along with it: the religions of the Thug, of the Jesuit, of the South Sea cannibal, of Confucius, of the poor Indian with his untutored mind, of the Peculiar People, of the Mormons, and of the old cat-worshiping Egyptian. It must be clear that we shall restrict ourselves to a very narrow circle of what are commonly called religious facts, unless we include in our considerations not only morality touched with emotion but also immorality touched with emotion. In fact, what is really touched with emotion in any case is that body of precepts for the guidance of a layman's life which we have taken to be the third meaning of religion. In that collection of precepts there may be some agreeable to morality, and some repugnant to it, and some indifferent, but being all enjoined by the religion they will all be touched by the same religious emotion. Shall we then say that religion means a feeling, an emotion, an habitual attitude of mind towards some object or objects, or towards life in general, which has a bearing upon the way in which men regard the rules of conduct? I think the last phrase should be left out. An habitual attitude of mind, of a religious character, does always have some bearing upon the way in which men regard the rules of conduct; but it seems sometimes as if this were an accident, and not the essence of the religious feeling. Some devout people prefer to have their devotion pure and simple, without admixture of any such application—they do not want to listen to "cauld morality." And it seems as if the religious feeling of the Greeks, and partly also of our own ancestors, was so far divorced from morality that it affected it only, as it were, by a side-wind, through the influence of the character and example of the gods. So that it seems only likely to create confusion if we mix up morality with this fourth meaning of religion. Sometimes religion means a code of precepts, and sometimes it means a devotional habit of mind; the two things are sometimes connected, but also they are sometimes quite distinct. But that the connection of these two things is more and more insisted on, that it is the key-note of the apparent revival of religion which has taken place in this century, is a very significant fact, about which there is more to be said.

As to the nature of this devotional habit of mind, there are no doubt many who would like a closer definition. But I am not at all prepared to say what attitude of mind may properly be called religious, and what may not. Some will hold that religion must have a person for its object; but Buddha was filled with religious feeling, and yet he had no personal object. Spinoza, the god-intoxicated man, had no personal object for his devotion. It might be possible to frame a definition which would fairly include all cases, but it would require the expenditure of vast ingenuity and research, and would not, I am inclined to think, be of much use when it was obtained.

Nor is the difficulty to be got over by taking any definite and well-organized sect, whose principles are settled in black and white; for example, the Roman Catholic Church, whose seamless unity has just been exhibited and protected by an Œcumenical Council. Shall we listen to Mr. Mivart, who "execrates without reserve Marian persecutions, the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and all similar acts"? or to the editor of the Dublin Review, who thinks that a teacher of false doctrines "should be visited by the law with just that amount of severity which the public sentiment will bear"? For assuredly common-sense morality will pass very different judgments on these two distinct religions, although it appears that experts have found room for both of them within the limits of the Vatican definitions.

Moreover, there is very great good to be got by widening our view of what may be contained in religion. If we go to a man and propose to test his own religion by the canons of common-sense morality, he will be, most likely, offended, for he will say that his religion is far too sublime and exalted to be affected by considerations of that sort. But he will have no such objection in the case of other people's religion. And when he has found that in the name of religion other people, in other circumstances, have believed in doctrines that were false, have supported priesthoods that were social evils, have taken wrong for right, and have even poisoned the very sources of morality, he may be tempted to ask himself, "Is there no trace of any of these evils in my own religion, or at least in my own conception and practice of it?" And that is just what we want him to do. Bring your doctrines, your priesthoods, your precepts, yea, even the inner devotion of your soul before the tribunal of conscience; she is no man's and no god's vicar, but the supreme judge of men and gods.

Let us inquire, then, what morality has to say in regard to religious doctrines. It deals with the manner of religious belief directly, and with the matter indirectly. Religious beliefs must be founded on evidence; if they are not so founded, it is wrong to hold them. The rule of right conduct in this matter is exactly the opposite of that implied in the two famous texts: "He that believeth not shall be damned," and "Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed." For a man who clearly felt and recognized the duty of intellectual honesty, of carefully testing every belief before he received it, and especially before he recommended it to others, it would be impossible to ascribe the profoundly immoral teaching of these texts to a true prophet or worthy leader of humanity. It will comfort those who wish to preserve their reverence for the character of a great teacher to remember that one of these sayings is in the well-known forged passage at the end of the second gospel, and that the other occurs only in the late and legendary fourth gospel; both being described as spoken under utterly impossible circumstances. These precepts belong to the Church and not to the Gospel. But whoever wrote either of them down as a deliverance of one whom he supposed to be a divine teacher, has thereby written down himself as a man void of intellectual honesty, as a man whose word cannot be trusted, as a man who would accept and spread about any kind of baseless fiction for fear of believing too little.

So far as to the manner of religious belief. Let us now inquire what bearing morality has upon its matter. We may see at once that this can only be indirect; for the rightness or wrongness of belief in a doctrine depends only upon the nature of the evidence for it, and not upon what the doctrine is. But there is a very important way in which religious doctrine may lead to morality or immorality, and in which, therefore, morality has a bearing upon doctrine. It is when that doctrine declares the character and actions of the gods who are regarded as objects of reverence and worship. If a god is represented as doing that which is clearly wrong, and is still held up to the reverence of men, they will be tempted to think that in doing this wrong thing they are not so very wrong after all, but are only following an example which all men respect. So says Plato (Rep. ii, 378. Tr. Davies and Vaughan.):

"We must not tell a youthful listener that he will be doing nothing extraordinary if he commit the foulest crimes nor yet if he chastise the crimes of a father in the most unscrupulous manner, but will simply be doing what the first and greatest of the gods have done before him.

"Nor yet is it proper to say in any case—what is indeed untrue—that gods wage war against gods, and intrigue and fight among themselves; that is, if the future guardians of our state are to deem it a most disgraceful thing to quarrel lightly with one another: far less ought we to select as subjects for fiction and embroidery the battles of the giants, and numerous other feuds of all sorts, in which gods and heroes fight against their own kith and kin. But if there is any possibility of persuading them, that to quarrel with one's fellow is a sin of which no member of a state was ever guilty, such ought rather to be the language held to our children from the first, by old men and old women, and all elderly persons; and such is the strain in which our poets must be compelled to write. But stories like the chaining of Here by her son, and the flinging of Hephaistos out of heaven for trying to take his mother's part when his father was beating her, and all those battles of the gods which are to be found in Homer, must be refused admittance into our state, whether they be allegorical or not. For a child cannot discriminate between what is allegory and what is not; and whatever at that age is adopted as a matter of belief, has a tendency to become fixed and indelible, and therefore, perhaps, we ought to esteem it of the greatest importance that the fictions which children first hear should be adapted in the most perfect manner to the promotion of virtue." [TO BE CONTINUED.]

HUXLEY A HANDICRAFTSMAN.—The fact is, I am, and have been any time these thirty years, a man who works with his hands—a handicraftsman. I do not say this in the broadly metaphorical sense in which fine gentlemen, with all the delicacy of Agag about them, trip to the hustings about election time, and protest that they, too, are working men. I really mean my words to be taken in their direct, literal, and straightforward sense. In fact, if the most nimble-fingered watchmaker among you will come to my workshop, he may set me to put a watch together, and I will set him to dissect, say, a black-beetle's nerves. I do not wish to vaunt, but I am inclined to think that I shall manage my job to his satisfaction sooner than he will do his piece of work to mine. In truth, anatomy, which is my handicraft, is one of the most difficult kinds of mechanical labor, involving, as it does, not only lightness and dexterity of hand, but sharp eyes and endless patience. And you must not suppose that my particular branch of science is especially distinguished for the demand it makes upon skill in manipulation. A similar requirement is made upon all students of physical science. The astronomer, the electrician, the chemist, the mineralogist, the botanist, are constantly called upon to perform manual operations of exceeding delicacy. The progress of all branches of physical science depends upon observation, or upon that artificial observation which is termed experiment, of one kind or another; and the further we advance the more practical difficulties surround the investigation of the conditions of the problems offered to us; so that mobile and yet steady hands, guided by clear vision, are more and more in request in the work-shops of science. Indeed, it has struck me that one of the grounds of that sympathy between the handicraftsmen of this country and the men of science, by which it has so often been my good fortune to profit, may, perhaps, lie here. You feel and we feel that, among the so-called learned folks, we alone are brought into contact with tangible facts in the way that you are. You know well enough that it is one thing to write a history of chairs in general, or to address a poem to a throne, or to speculate about the occult powers of the chair of St. Peter; and quite another thing to make with your own hands a veritable chair, that will stand fair and square, and afford a safe and satisfactory resting-place to a frame of sensitiveness and solidity.—Huxley, in Fortnightly Review.

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier,

CURATE OF THE ROMISH CHURCH IN FRANCE, WHOSE VIEWS UPON THEOLOGY WERE NOT PUBLISHED TO THE WORLD UNTIL AFTER HIS DEATH.

Proof the Second.—Continued.

All the books of the law of Moses and the prophets that could be found were burnt in the days of Antiochus. The Talmud, regarded by the Jews as a holy and sacred writ—and which contains all the divine laws, together with the notable sentences and sayings of the rabbis, their expoundings of the laws divine and human, and a prodigious quantity of other secrets and mysteries of the Hebrew tongue—is looked upon by the Christians as a collection of fables, impostures, and impieties. In the year 1559, twelve hundred of these Talmuds, found in a library of the town of Cremona, were burnt in Rome by command of the inquisitors of the Faith. The Pharisees—who among the Jews constituted a famous sect—accepted only the five books of Moses and neglected all the prophets. Among the Christians, Marcion and his sectarians rejected the books of Moses and the prophets, and introduced in their place other writings, in vogue at that time. Carpocrates and his followers did likewise, rejecting the whole of the Old Testament and maintaining that Jesus Christ was but a man like any other. The Marcionites and the sovereigns likewise repudiated the Old Testament in its entirety as spurious and bad, and also neglected the greater part of the four Gospels and the Epistles of Saint Paul, on the same plea.

The Ebionites admitted the Gospel according to Saint Matthew, but neglected the three others, as also the Epistles of Paul. The Marcionites published a gospel under the name of Saint Matthias, to the end of confirming their own particular doctrine. The Apostolics, on the other hand, introduced other writings to maintain their errors, and to this end made use of certain acts which they attributed to Saint Andrew and Saint Thomas. The Manicheans wrote a gospel of their own, and neglected the writings of the prophets and the apostles. The Etzaites put forth a certain book which they affirmed had come from heaven; cutting from other writings and scriptures according to their fancy. Origen himself, with all his genius, corrupted the Scriptures, inventing and forging silly and rambling allegories, and in this way altered and falsified the books of the prophets and of the evangelists; he even went so far as to falsify and corrupt some of the principal points of doctrine. His writings have been mutilated and corrupted in their turn, and now represent, as a whole, but a few fragments, picked up here and there by his successors, and full of manifest faults and errors. The Alogians attributed to the heretic Corinthus the Gospel and Apocalypse of Saint John, and for this reason neglected them. The heretics of later periods rejected as apocryphal many books looked upon by the Roman Catholics as holy and sacred, such as the books of Tobit, Esther, Judith, Baruch, the canticle of the three children in the fiery furnace, the story of Suzanna, of the Idol of Bel, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, the first and second books of the Maccabees; to all of which doubtful and uncertain books might be added divers others, of equally uncertain origin, but attributed to certain of the apostles. Among these latter may be quoted the Acts of Saint Thomas, his Circuits, and Apocalypse; the Gospels according to Saint Bartholomew, of Saint Mathias, Saint James, and Saint Peter; likewise the Gestures of Saint Peter, and his Apocalypse; the books of Judgment, and of the Childhood of the Savior; and others of the same sort, all of which have been neglected by the Roman Catholics, even by Pope Gelasius himself and all the Fathers of the Romish Communion.

And what confirms more strongly still the fact of there being no certain foundation on which to rest the pretended authority of these books, so that those who proclaim and maintain their inspired origin are themselves forced to admit that they would have no certainty whereon to ground such belief, were it not that their faith testifies to its truth and absolutely enjoins them to consider it as such. Now, as faith is nothing but a principle of imposture and error, how can faith, that is, blind belief, render authentic the books which in themselves constitute the foundations of this blind belief? What pitiable nonsense! But let us examine whether these same books bear within themselves any special character of truth, in other words, do they bear special marks of erudition, of wisdom, of holiness, or of any other of the perfections only to be attributed to a God, and whether the miracles therein recorded agree with any of our own conceptions of the infinite greatness, goodness, wisdom, and justice of an all-powerful Deity? On the contrary, we find on the one hand fabulous tales of a woman formed of the rib of a man, of an earthly paradise, of a serpent who talked and reasoned, and, by the way, who proved himself a great deal more intelligent than man; likewise of a speaking ass, who rebuked his master for striking him without cause; of a universal deluge, and an ark in which every species of the animal creation was shut up; of the confusion of tongues and of the dividing up of the nations; without mentioning divers other stories on rain and frivolous subjects, which any serious writer would disdain to notice. All those narratives look just as much like fables as those that are told us of the handiwork of Prometheus, of Pandora's box, or of the warring of the giants against the gods, and such like, invented by the poets at different periods for the recreation of their fellow men.

On the other hand, we can perceive nothing but a confused medley of laws and ordinances, or of superstitious practices concerning the sacrifices and the purifications of the ancient law, the idle distinctions of animals, certain of which are supposed to be pure and others impure. These laws are not more worthy of credence or respect than those of the most idolatrous nations.

We shall, moreover, find in these writings many a simple story, related in a still more simple style, of the lives of divers kings, princes, or individuals, who lived righteously or unrighteously, as the case may be, and were guilty of some good or bad actions, with a number of other silly and frivolous ones, which are likewise therein recorded.

Now, to do all this, it surely was not necessary to be a very great genius, nor the receptacle of divine revelation. It does but small credit to God, anyway.

In a word, these writings contain little else than the discourses, the conduct, and the actions of those famous prophets who proclaimed themselves specially inspired of God. We are told of their manner of acting and speaking, of their dreams, their visions, their reveries; and it would be easy to prove that they bear a far greater resemblance to fanatics and lunatics than to wise and learned men.

There are, nevertheless, among these books some that contain wise and good teachings and excellent maxims of morality, such as the proverbs attributed to Solomon in the books of Wisdom and of Ecclesiasticus; but this same Solomon, the wisest and most learned of their writers, is likewise the most incredulous of the number. He even doubts the immortality of the soul, and concludes his writings by saying that the only good thing is to enjoy in peace the fruit of one's labor and to live with those whom we love.

But how far above these so-called God-inspired books are the writings of many of those whom it is the fashion to style profane authors, such as Xenophon, Plato, Cicero, the emperors Antoninus and Julien, Virgil, etc. I think I may venture to say that even Æsop's fables are a great deal more ingenious and instructive than any of those coarse, vulgar parables recorded by the evangelists. But that which still further demonstrates that these and similar accounts could not have been written under divine inspiration is that, besides the crudeness and vulgarity of their style and the want of order in the relation of certain facts very imperfectly stated therein, the authors cannot continue to agree among themselves, but are continually contradicting one another. They had not even sufficient acquired culture or natural talent to tell a story well. The following is one among the many contradictions of one another to be found in the four Gospels: Saint Matthew makes Jesus Christ descend from King David, through Solomon, down to Joseph, the at least putative father of Christ; while Luke makes him descend from the same David through his son Nathan, to Joseph.

Matthew says, speaking of Jesus, that the news having been spread abroad in Jerusalem of the birth of a new king of the Jews, and the wise men having come to worship him, King Herod, fearing that the new-born king might one day deprive him of his crown and kingdom, caused to be slain all the male infants to be found in the environs of Bethlehem, in which place he had been told the new king would be born, and that Joseph and the mother of Jesus had been warned in a dream of the wicked design of Herod, and had fled by night into Egypt, where they remained till the death of Herod, which occurred some years later.

Luke, on the contrary, sets forth that Joseph and the mother of Jesus dwelt in peace for the space of six weeks in the place where the child was born, that he was there circumcised according to the Jewish law, eight days after his birth, and that when the time prescribed by that same law for the purification of his mother had arrived, she and Joseph her husband bore him to Jerusalem, to present him to God in his temple, and at the same time to offer a sacrifice, ordained by the law of God; after which they returned to Galilee in their own town of Nazareth, where the child Jesus grew daily in grace and wisdom, and that the father and the mother of the latter went up annually to Jerusalem to keep the feast of the Passover; but not once does Saint Luke make mention of the flight into Egypt, nor of the cruelty of Herod towards the male children of the province of Bethlehem. With regard to the cruel edict of Herod, seeing that not one of the historians of the time notices it, not even Josephus, who wrote a life of this same Herod, and seeing that none other of the evangelists mention it either, it manifestly follows that this journey of the wise men guided by a star, this massacre of poor little children, and this flight into Egypt are neither more nor less than so many absurd fables, not to say lies. For it is not credible that Josephus, who has bitterly reproached this king for his vices and wickedness, would have remained silent on so detestable an action, if what this evangelist records be true.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

And God Said "Let There be Light."

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I have just read the editorial in Paynes Age of Reason, for January 26th, and am not only surprised, but really startled, at the strange, and to me uncourteous charges brought against the Liberal papers of every class in this country. Are you able to give a satisfactory reason for all this to the readers of your paper? If so, I for one will be thankful for the explanation. The attack on the Liberal papers seems to be general with but one or two exceptions, and rather in an unfriendly spirit too, which, on account of its brief debut, I am really sorry for.

With no apology or explanation given, its editor proclaims to the world the startling fact that "it is probable that there was never a class of people more completely humbugged, than have been the Liberals of this country about one Anthony Comstock, and his arrest of Infidel publishers." "They (the Liberal papers) have aided, by all means in their power, to fool their readers, and to bring a lasting odium over the Liberal cause."

After considerable vindication of Mr. Comstock's course, in the faithful discharge of his official duties, he further declares that he, (Comstock) being a Liberalist or rather Spiritualist, has shown a leniency towards Liberals, while in similar cases he had unmercifully prosecuted Christians or church-members. How he can be a Liberalist or Spiritualist, and a leader of the Y. M. C. A., as has been so often stated by you and others, I cannot understand. Neither am I able to comprehend the following: "Not until after complaints by citizens and by the post-office officials had been repeatedly made to him for two years, and not until he himself was threatened with prosecution for refusing to do his duty, and comply with the terms of his oath of office, did he recently notice a well-known Infidel publisher, who was accused of sending obscene matter through the mails; and even then no arrest was made. The publisher was simply asked to go before the United States Commissioner at his convenience, and give bail, etc., and that there the matter would stop. And there the whole matter did stop as far as Mr. Comstock was concerned.

"But to serve personal ends, this little unnoticeable transaction has been magnified and falsified, greatly to the detriment of the Liberal movement all over the world. If the Liberal press of this country wish to stand before the public as falsifiers and maligners; if they wish to attach a lasting odium to the term Liberal, and make it a stench in the nostrils of all fair-minded men and women, they will not apoligoze for the slanders and lies they have published about this Comstock-Infidel-Obscenity matter.

"The Spiritualist papers especially owe Mr. Comstock a personal apology. They would owe him this much even were he not a Spiritualist." "These papers profess to be just; here is an opportunity for an exemplification of their honorable professions." "It would at least be well for these papers to consider that no one's liberties have been put in jeopardy; no one's rights have been abridged." "A U. S. officer was ordered to enforce the law; in place of this, he politely warned the violator, and that was all. There was no imprisonment, no prosecution, no one molested," etc.

Is it possible, brother Bennett, that an apology is claimed by one of our leading Liberals from the Spiritual and Liberal presses in behalf of Anthony Comstock, this much abused man—so shamefully "falsified and maligned by them," and that THE TRUTH SEEKER has resorted to the unprincipled act of lying and humbugging honest laboring people, who were willing, if need be, to make almost any sacrifice to save it from injustice, simply to fill its coffers, as has been intimated? No, my dear friend, my opinion of its editor is too exalted to accept, for a moment, such subterfuge, and I have no doubt that a full explanation will be given in your next issue. Yours for truth, honor, and humanity,

J. S. LYON, M. D.

Springfield, Mo., Jan. 28, 1878.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of Reading Matter than any other Journal of its class.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 2, 1878.

The True Position of F. E. Abbot.

DANVILLE, ILL., Feb. 21, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Some of your correspondents do great injustice to Mr. Abbot of The Index. They misrepresent his position. They assume that he is in sympathy with Comstock in his arrest of Mr. Bennett, and in his abuse generally of his position and authority. Nor is this to be wondered at, since no clear statement of Mr. Abbot's real position on this subject has, to my knowledge, appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, although columns have been published in reply to his editorials in The Index of December 20th, in which he criticised the petition sent out from THE TRUTH SEEKER office. I am sorry to see flings at the editor of The Index from the pens of persons who have not even taken the pains to ascertain what Mr. Abbot has written. I know Mr. Abbot personally. A more heroic or consistent defender of liberty for all, in the widest sense of the word, cannot be found in America For years he has been pointing out to Liberals the dangers which threaten them from gradual encroachments on their liberties through legislative action influenced by orthodox Christianity. I read ringing sentences from his pen appealing to Liberals to unite and organize to secure equal rights and impartial liberty to all persons, and to protect with jealous care their personal freedom against Pharisaical and Puritanical assaults, years ago, while some of those who now refer to him so ungenerously saw no danger and were indisposed to take any steps to resist the aggressions of orthodoxy beyond mere criticisms of the popular faith. Knowing Mr. Abbot, his courage, his uncompromising devotion to personal liberty, his high sense of honor, his self-denial and sacrifices for our common cause, I cannot patiently see him assailed the way he is in a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER without an earnest protest against such gross injustice.

And that your readers may know just what Mr. Abbot's position is in regard to Comstock and the "obscenity act" and the petitions sent out from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, I respectfully request that you publish the following extract from the editorial headed, "Freedom the Friend of Purity," in The Index of December 20th. It will be seen that Mr. Abbot does not approve of the course of Comstock; and his objection to the petition is that it virtually declares Congress has no right or authority to legislate against the circulation of obscene literature by declaring that the States and Territories have provided, or may safely be left to provide suitable remedies, whereas he thinks that as the mails are subject wholly to the authority of the United States, the separate States having no power to meddle with them at all, Congress has the constitutional as well as moral right to prevent the use of the mails for infamous purposes. I do not hesitate to say that I believe Mr. Abbot's position entirely reasonable and consistent. That the law, as it now stands, should be greatly modified, Mr. Abbot and all other Liberals strongly insist.

Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

"While there is very much that is true and indisputable in the above petition, we must point out that it recommends leaving all legislation against 'obscene literature,' etc., solely to the separate States and Territories; which, since the States cannot meddle with the mails, is equivalent to recommending that there be no such legislation at all. Although the petition concludes with the prayer that 'the statutes aforesaid may be repealed, or materially modified,' the preceding recommendation of State and Territorial action alone will be construed as showing that the real purpose of the petitioners is to get rid of all legislation adverse to the hideous crimes against childhood perpetrated by the vendors of the sickening stuff now justly excluded from the mails. Everybody who signs the petition ought to know the character and consequences of his own act; and that is why we speak plainly and at once.

"What will be the effect of this petition, if numerously signed?

"1. It must be to create the impression that the signers are totally indifferent to the real evils at which these statutes were aimed; and this impression will be most unfortunate. Especially if the signers are supposed to represent the great Liberal party of the country, the inference will certainly be drawn, and pressed upon public notice by the Orthodox party, that Liberalism is proved to be in full sympathy with the nefarious business already referred to. Could anything be more certain to array against Liberal ideas in religion the whole force of the moral sentiment of the country? Could anything more powerfully help the vilifiers of Freethought in their attempt to convince the public that 'Infidelity' and immorality are inseparable? Could anything be a more staggering blow to the cause of Liberal principles than the prevalence of such a woful misconception of their practical tendencies? Can those who believe and teach that Liberalism is the seed of a higher social morality afford to go before the world as the champions of 'obscene literature' properly so called? If so, they go alone; we go not with them.

"2. The effect of the petition now circulating can only work disaster to the defense of Messrs. Bennett and Heywood; for it seems to proceed on the assumption that their cause is identical with that of the vile persons engaged in the moral destruction of the young, and that the former cannot be defended except by releasing the latter also from all penalty. Nothing could put their case in a worse light than to permit this opinion to prevail. If these defendants consent to make common cause with the villains who deal out poison for little boys and girls, their ruin is assured. Their only hope is to prove that they have nothing in common with such wretches—that it is a wicked persecution to misrepresent them as coming under the same category. This we believe, and that is why we have already spoken strongly in their behalf; but if we should be driven to consider their case as really identical with that of the disseminators of 'obscene literature,' in the proper sense of those words, our mouth would be shut. Nothing could be more unfortunate for these defendants, we think, than to create the opinion that they are condemned by the existing statutes, when justly interpreted; and yet this is precisely the opinion that would be created by any attempt of theirs to repeal these statutes altogether as a part of their defense. Let them boldly plead that they are untouched by the true intent of those very statutes, since they have never dealt in 'obscene literature' therein proscribed; for if they cannot make this evident to the courts, their case is already lost.

"For these two reasons chiefly—that it tends to the injury of the Liberal cause and to the injury of the two defendants now threatened with unjust penalties—we deeply regret the issuing of the above petition, should decline to sign it, and must dissuade others from signing it. Another and different petition might be circulated with great propriety now, in which it should be urged

"1. That the statutory phrase 'obscene literature' should be strictly confined to publications designed expressly to demoralize, pollute, and corrupt, by ministering to lewd passions for the sake of profit to the publishers; and that it should not be construed to include any publications not so designed, even if they do contain incidental expressions liable to be adjudged obscene by an unprejudiced moral judgment.

"2. That, if the phrase 'obscene literature' is to cover and condemn all publications containing incidental expressions of an obscene character, the Bible should not be exempted from the effect of this sweeping condemnation, but included in the same prohibition which is to suppress Shakspere, Milton, Homer, Dante, Goethe, and almost all the greatest heirlooms of human genius.

"3. That Anthony Comstock, having been proved unfit to exercise the great powers of his present appointment by manifest abuse of them to purposes of bigoted persecution for opinion's sake, ought to be summarily dismissed; and that the possibility of any similar abuses of authority in the future ought to be effectually guarded against by strict and precise legislative provisions."

REMARKS.—Far be it from us to do injustice to the editor of The Index, or to prolong the unpleasantness that has arisen. We cheerfully concede the earnestness of his labors and the great value of his services. We, however, deem it unfortunate and unnecessary that he should have opposed so strongly the petitions which, with the best motives in the world, we sent abroad for signatures; that he should have written five columns to show why the Comstock laws should be sustained and why our petitions should not be signed. He had a right to his opinion, of course, but his objections seemed untimely and his criticisms hypercritical. And when, with evident avidity, he attempted to show us up a forger, it felt like "the unkindest cut of all." We think we showed that we had good reasons for appending to the circular the names of those who tacitly consented that we might do so, and who expressed warm sympathy with our efforts, and thus exonerated ourselves from the charge of forgery. Now, if it should appear that the editor of The Index, on a more important occasion, had appended without authority the name of another person to a document, it would show that the odious boot was on another leg and that the charge of "forgery" rested nearer his door than ours.

Quarreling is probably as distasteful to us as to most persons, and though a number of individuals seem to have heavy charges to prefer against us, we cannot see that we are at fault for their being brought, or for certain professing Liberal editors attacking us for supposed wrongs we have committed. It was for no fault of ours that Comstock arrested us and sought to incarcerate us in prison. It was for no fault of ours that Peterson, Abbot, and Payne accused us of criminal offenses and said very mean things about us. Those attacks and false charges were not justified by any wrong act we had committed. We did not begin the contention. The quarrels were none of our seeking, nor are we responsible for them. We have not raised our hand or our voice save in self-defense. We have heard expressions of opinion from a great number of persons as to the nature and animus of these attacks, and in every instance the course pursued by the attacking parties has been condemned. With regard to Mr. Abbot's course towards us in particular, we have not met a person who has approved of it, nor have we received a letter upon the subject that has not expressed regret that he should have deemed it necessary to pursue such a course. Neither in his own paper has scarcely a correspondent approved of his views, excepting, of course, A. W. Kelsey, who advocates the appointment of a censorship over private letters, and whose remarks Mr. Abbot himself found it necessary to disown by attributing them to inadvertance. It is not likely, however, that the sentiments were inadvertently given, but rather that Mr. Kelsey said exactly what he meant. Our friend Underwood is the first one we have met who takes a favorable view of Mr. Abbot's treatment of us, or has deemed it necessary to apologize for it. We repeat, we have no desire to misrepresent Mr. Abbot nor to hold up his acts in a false or unfavorable light. His course and his remarks relating to us have been open and undisguised, and in referring to them we have brought no secrets to light. If we know ourselves, we would not say a word to injure him save in our own defense, and in reference to his published remarks about us. We appreciate his good character and intentions in the main, but some of his acts referred to, we have good reason to know, are not approved of by many good Liberals in the country.

We have aimed to make ourselves understood upon these Comstock laws in previous issues of our paper, and it is hardly necessary to enlarge upon what has already been said. The facts are patent and in this wise:

1. As a nation, we got along extremely well for nearly a century without such a class of laws upon our statute books, and there was no necessity for such a radical change.

2. There was no demand on the part of the people at large for the enactment of such a code of laws, and the call for them came only from Anthony Comstock and the Young Men's Christian Association and the Society for the Suppression of Vice, which now, through its president, publicly and officially avows the necessity of suppressing Freethought utterances and sentiments.

3. The passage of the laws referred to was procured in a surreptitious manner, and they were rushed through during the expiring hours of a disgraceful session of Congress in a reprehensible manner, with other acts, including the "salary grab," doubling of salaries, demonetization of silver, etc.

4. The laws are unconstitutional. The Constitution confers upon Congress no power to enact any such laws. It gives the right to make post-roads and to establish post-offices, but not the right to fine and imprison citizens for sending letters, pamphlets, or circulars by the mails. This is a power wholly assumed by Congress without the shade of authority derived from the grand charter of our liberties. So long as we have a Constitution for national guidance and control we are in favor of not violating it, especially if by doing so our rights are infringed, or our liberties destroyed. We are opposed to the General Government taking from the States the province and prerogatives that belong to them. We are opposed to gambling-houses, houses of prostitution, gin-shops, and lottery establishments, and many other institutions where morals are corrupted and idleness and recklessness engendered; but we hold that the General Government has no right to interfere with such establishments. However necessary it is that they should be suppressed, it is no part of the province of the General Government to attend to that kind of business. Its duty is to provide for the public defense, attend to the army and navy, and other matters of a national character, but not to constitute itself a police court to punish or suppress petty larceny, cock-fighting, or being absent from public worship on Sunday. The suppression of vice forms no part of the duty of the General Government. As the issuing of money belongs to the General Government, it has a right to protect the people from counterfeits as well as to punish counterfeiters, but no constitutional right to punish ordinary crimes, including post-office offenses. The punishing of obscenity belongs exclusively to the States in their separate capacities, and not to the General Government. If the United States takes upon itself the punishment of any ordinary class of crimes, who is able to say where it shall stop and whether or not the State Governments should not be set aside and the General Government attend to all the peccadilloes and shortcomings of the people. In that case the State Governments might as well be abolished altogether.

5 Obscenity is an offense, not because it is sent through the mails, but because it is wrong per se. The State Governments have the same power to prosecute and punish that crime that they have to prosecute and punish other crimes. The States have the same right to punish the sending of obscenity through the mails as if it were sent by express or other mode of conveyance. The States have the power to punish offenders who send obscenity by express or by freight, though they have no control of the express companies or of the railroads of the country, and there is no reason why they should not be able to do the same by the mails. If obscene books, pamphlets, or circulars are published and sent abroad to any great extent there are certainly abundant ways for the State to find it out, and punish the wrong-doers without infringing upon the mail facilities and liberties of the people.

6. The punishing by the General Government for sending obscene matter through the mails, necessitates a surveillance, a censorship, a system of espionage over the mails, and over the literature of the country most un-American in principle, and most obnoxious to the people. If second and third-class mail matter shall be subjected to this censorship, why not the first, or private letters, also? If the principle is carried out, our letters will all be examined by censors of the Comstock type. If he is a suitable person to say what scientific works may be read by the American people, what may and may not be sent through the mails; if he has the power and right to decide that no works on physiology for instance, shall pass through the mails, why is he not also the proper person to inspect our private letters and decide what we may and what we may not write and send through the mails, as well as what we shall be sent to prison for writing? The entire system of mail espionage induced by the passage of these Comstock laws is more a subversion of the true principle of American liberty than any other act that has been placed upon our statute books. We recently reproduced an article upon the subject of the mails, from The Methodist of this city, which took a most sensible view upon the subject. While deprecating the use of the mails for transporting improper, and even criminal matter, it held that the evil was far less than destroying the liberties of the people, and breaking down our free mail facilities. It said, "an inspected mail-bag is a sign of the vilest despotism." "Despotism may mean well in its sources; it becomes wicked and corrupt long before it reaches the masses under it." It held that Government and postal officials were not responsible for what the mails conveyed through the country, however criminal it might be, and that it was better to let all mail matter be freely transmitted than to break down and destroy our great free mail system.

7. Undue stress is laid upon the amount of vile matter sent through the mail. It is greatly exaggerated. There is not one-tenth the matter passing through the mails of a bad character that is represented, and tons of harmless circulars are denounced as obscene when they are entirely free from obscenity. Comstock is in the habit of holding up to the holy horror of his listeners the vast amount of vile matter being sent through the mails. This he is doing now in his efforts to establish new societies in the western cities for the suppression of vice. He holds up matter that circulated years ago and has passed out of use, and is possessed by no persons but himself—he having made a "corner" in the obscenity market of the country, and monopolized all the obscenity to be had. There is little or no real obscenity passing through the mails save what Comstock is sending himself. That he has recently engaged in this vile business we are prepared to prove in a court of justice or elsewhere. We sent a letter to the Postmaster-General at Washington, inquiring of him if Comstock had any more right to send indecent matter through the mails than other persons; to which he did not see fit to reply. We repeat, the representations about the tons of vile matter sent through the mails, and the tons of stereotype plates and photograph negatives that have been seized by Comstock are either entirely false, or great exaggerations. It is not difficult for him to make almost any representation for the sake of carrying his point. The kind of stuff that years ago passed through the mails he still holds up and dilates upon for the sake of inciting the interest of those he wishes to form into societies of his creation, and there is only a modicum of truth in his whole story. The claim that great amounts of vile matter is sent by mail to pupils in schools and institutions of learning is immensely exaggerated. Very little of the kind takes place. If it is so why do not tutors inspect second and third-class mail matter before it is passed over to their pupils, who are being so wickedly preyed upon? There is the place to correct the evil if it exists. There is where it can be effectually done and without destroying our free mail system and crushing our American liberties. Why is not this safe course resorted to by the extra sticklers for purity, rather than to proceed against our mail system? The Methodist in the article referred to says: "Parents, teachers and ministers must correct the tastes, protect the ignorance, and promote the purity of lads and lasses. They cannot invent a machine to do their work, or lighten it, or make it easy." This is a true view of the case. It is the duty of teachers, parents, and guardians to know what improper reading matter is turned over to those under their charge, and it is very wrong for them to shirk their duty or to turn it over to Anthony Comstock. By all means let the safe and simple remedy of knowing what mail matter is given to children be employed rather than breaking down the free institutions of the entire people. Let this be done and we will need no Comstocks to protect our schools and colleges.

8. The system of intrigue, falsehood, inveigling, and decoy letters that has been employed under the statutes referred to, is most reprehensible and objectionable. The business of the spy and informer is a detestable one, and a system of laws requiring such a branch of service should be wiped from the statutes of the country. We got along well for nearly a hundred years and we can still longer.

9. The injustice, personal injury, cruelty, and wrong that have been perpetrated under those obnoxious laws are terrible to contemplate. The injury that has been done many worthy and well-meaning people is fearful in the extreme. The scores of cases where the cruel malaria of suspicion and disgrace has been cast upon innocent persons by being arrested and thrust into prison upon a charge of obscenity are enough to chill the blood of the most ardent advocates of the laws. Those only who have passed through the ordeal of being arrested upon such a foul charge are fully able to realize the disgrace connected with such arrest. The hundreds of thousands of dollars that in the aggregate have been wrung from the scanty coffers of harmless sufferers, if realized, are quite sufficient to damn those laws in the eyes of all humane people. It is terrible to contemplate that one individual, though appointed as a postal agent, or prime mover in the Society for the Suppression of Vice, should have it in his power to send hundreds of persons, better than himself, to prison, and that upon his own unsupported testimony he should be able to secure their conviction, disgrace, and ruin for life, as has been the case under the operation of their laws.

10. In view of the fact that the passage of those laws was not called for by any considerable portion of the people; that the same was obtained in a surreptitious and disreputable manner; that the laws are positively unconstitutional and subversive of the principles of American liberty and personal rights; that their enforcement in various ways has been most injurious to personal and public rights; that they have established an odious censorship over our mails and publishing houses; that they have placed an undue amount of power in the hands of a dangerous and undeserving person, that those laws have produced no good results that could not have been as easily and as well secured by legal, constitutional, and prudential means, it is to be deprecated that they were ever enacted. Since their enactment was wrong, their repeal is not only desirable but perfectly legitimate. Other laws enacted at the same time have been repealed and there was certainly no wrong in asking for the repeal of these, the worst of the entire lot. The fifty thousand honest, law-abiding persons who have signed those petitions were guiltless of seeking to foster "impurity" and it was most reprehensible to insinuate that they were.

We remain firm in the conviction that those persons are correct who deem Mr. Abbot's opposition to the circulation and signature of those petitions was unfortunate ill-timed and ill-advised. When the numbers of Liberals are so few in comparison to the mass of the people, it seems a species of folly amounting almost to madness to get up bitter oppositions in our own ranks and for one clique to aim to oppose and to kill what others are toiling hard to secure. That self-same petition is just now being presented to Congress for their consideration, and it may well be suspected that an active opposition in the way of counter petitions, and remonstrances will be thrown in. There are hundreds of Young Men's Christian Associations in the country, and with their combined efforts, a much larger number of names can be secured than we have been able to gather. We will submit it, then, to the Liberals of the country that when this conflict opens before Congress, whether it will not be greatly to be deplored if such men as Abbot and Underwood, even in the name of purity, are found fighting side by side with Peterson, Payne, and our common enemies.

Which is the "Forger"?

In Seth Wilbur Payne's Age of Reason for February 16th appears the following:

"Mr. J. C. Miller writes from La Crosse, Wisconsin: 'The way in which you have pricked that bubble of deceit and conceit, D. M. Bennett, deserves, and will receive, the commendation of every Liberal in the land. But for your pungent pen Bennett would still be begging under the Comstock dodge, and thousands of dollars would have flowed into his well-filled coffers from his unsuspecting dupes. I have suspected him from the first, but my eyes were not really opened until I read his whining answer to you in his last TRUTH SEEKER. Here he clearly convicts himself. I would not believe him, now, under oath. Inclosed please find draft for thirty dollars, for which send the Age of Reason one year to each of the following names.'"

Feeling positive that this letter was a vile forgery, we took the trouble to write to the postmaster at La Crosse, and to another esteemed friend there who we knew would tell the truth about the matter. We obtained replies from each, and here follows the one we received from our friend, which will be sufficient to show how much truth there was in the foregoing pretended letter:

LA CROSSE, WIS, Feb. 20, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I went to town to-day and went into all the banks in the city; they all said "there had not been any man in by the name of J. C. Miller for a draft to be sent to Seth Wilbur Payne, for thirty dollars, or for any other amount." I then went to the Directory of our city, which is just out, and found that there is but one man in La Crosse by the name of "J. C. Miller," and he is a Norwegian. He was our City Clerk about a year ago; he is a very inoffensive man, and is considered very honest. I have just seen him, and I asked if he had sent a draft for thirty dollars to Seth Wilbur Payne as a subscription to Payne's Age of Reason, and he said he knew "neither the man nor the paper." I then asked him if he knew D. M. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and he said "No." I asked if he knew Comstock; he said "No." So you see, Mr. Editor, this thing about "thirty dollars and thirty subscriptions" is all a trick, a dodge—yes, a got-up lie, as well as all that stuff about Payne's receiving the commendation of every Liberal in the land for pricking the bubble, the pungent pen, the thousands of dollars, not believing you under oath, and all the rest of it. Now, I have not one particle of bad feeling towards Mr. Payne, but I must say, fellow-Liberals, that such lies and deceit I hate, and they must be stopped, if possible, or we shall be an everlasting disgrace to all decency. What Mr. Payne's object can be in this proceeding I cannot see, unless it is to try and run Mr. Bennett out.

I am, with all due respect, your well-wisher,
J. PETTY.

This letter, which comes from the most trustworthy source, clearly shows how utterly false was that miserable tissue of slander and abuse contained in the letter which Mr. Miller was stated to have written about us, but which now is clearly proven never was written by J. C. Miller, of La Crosse, but was gotten up by the editor of the Age of Reason. This is the man who has had the unprincipled hardihood to accuse us of forgery and falsehood; who pretends to be a relative of the great and truthful Thomas Paine, who would have scorned to slander and vilify a fellow-man. This is the man who, without cause or provocation, has said all manner of false things about us, and seems determined to break us down by falsely casting obloquy and shame upon us. This is the man who makes another person say he has suspected us from the first, and that he would not believe us under oath. Can anything be conceived more villainous and diabolical than that such a course should be taken to injure a person who had done the perpetrator of the villainy no harm? This is the man who pretends to be a Liberal and to publish an Infidel paper. This is one of the men that prates about purity and truth. Comments are scarcely necessary. Every man of reason can see the animus and the motive that must impel a human being to such a despicable course. We leave it for Liberals to decide whether a person capable of committing such deeds shall be considered a man and a brother, and whether anything he states can be believed.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL will lecture in New Haven, Conn., March 4th; Boston, March 5th; Portland, Me., March 6th; Springfield, Mass., March 7th; Worcester, Mass., March 9th.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.—Brother W. S. Bell has re-written and enlarged his work of this title, and we have just been getting it up for him. It is now a pamphlet of good size, with a cover, and goes into the resurrection business in a very exhaustive manner. Thousands of them ought to be demanded. Price, 25 cents.

WE SEE by the Banner of Light that Mrs. Maud E. Lord, the well-known medium, has returned to this city, and will remain here several weeks. She may be found at the residence of Mr. Phillips, 222 West Thirty-seventh street. We have attended a few of her seances, and witnessed remarkable demonstrations. We regard her as an honest, truthful medium.

THE following numbers of the "Holy Cross" series are now ready for patrons: "The Priest in Absolution," 25 cents; "The Popes and their Doings," 50 and 75 cents; "Auricular Confession," 50 and 75 cents; "Maria Monk," same price; "Priestly Celibacy," 15 cents; "Sister Lucy and her Awful Disclosures," 10 cents. "The Mother of Harlots," will be ready in a week or ten days; 50 and 75 cents.

All very readable books.

LET our friends and readers bear in mind that the price of this large paper, filled with such reading matter as cannot be obtained anywhere else, is $3.00 per year, or twenty-five cents per month, postage included. We will send it to new subscribers for one month, two, three, or six months, at the same rate we do by the year. Reader, if your name is not already on our list, please send it in with pay for one month or more. Those who wish to take the paper, and cannot make it convenient to pay all at once, can send it in installments as suits them best. So we get the pay, it does not matter materially whether it comes a part at a time or all. It always comes in opportunely, and we have no trouble in finding uses for all we get. If we have one desire stronger than all others, it is that our list may grow and that we may have a good many more readers. Who will get up clubs? Who will send us new names? Speak all at once if you wish to; we can enter a large number of names in a single day.

For $5.00 we send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and a copy of the "World's Sages," or Lord Amberley's work, or Thomas Paine's great works, or the "Champions of the Church;" and such an amount of reading is worth ten dollars if it is worth a cent. Send in the names.

MOSES HULL, during his present engagement for Sunday evening lectures at Harry Hill's, would be glad to arrange for Sunday morning or afternoon or week-day evening lectures. His general subjects are Spiritualism, Liberalism and the various phases of the social and financial questions. His terms are always liberal. Address him care this office.

LAMB'S PROSE AND POETRY.—As literature is only printed speech, and as man's gift of speech is practically infinite, two-thirds of what most writers can utter must of necessity be truism or nonsense. Yet it must be confessed that there is a certain class of writers of whom this cannot be said—a class which, though not necessarily the highest, must yet be ranked high; those who, lacking for the most part the impetuousity and fire which distinguish writers of a still rarer growth, must always, in their own department of literature, write excellently or not at all; writers who, taking a deep delight in realizing their own ideal of style, find mediocre writing a sheer impossibility, and who, if natural prosateurs, fill an essay or a letter to a private friend with the choicest literary delicacies, and who, if poets, never leave a line that is not polished and quintessential. Among poets, Horace was one of these; Petrarch was one; Collins was one. Among prose writers, the very greatest name since Montaigne is that of Charles Lamb. It is not that these are so much better than all others, but that in their own field of work they are always at their best. Therefore, to collect every prose scrap of the most original, the most whimsical, and the most quintessential of English prose writers is to confer a boon upon English readers. For there is not a single newspaper paragraph by him in which the reader may not expect to come upon some delightful Lambism, rich with a flavor of "self-pleasing quaintness," to be found nowhere else. With his poetry, however, the case is different. Scanty as is his published verse, there is much of it that could have well been spared —The Athenæum.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus

AND HIS MANIFOLD AND WONDROUS ADVENTURES IN THE LAND OF COSMOS.

FROM AN ANTIQUE MS. (EVIDENTLY INSPIRED), DISCOVERED BY I. N. FIDEL, IN CONJUNCTION WITH A. HOOK, ESQ.

CHAPTER I.

Entitled Cosmos.

1. And it came to pass that I, Philo Aletheia, found myself wandering to and fro in a certain country the name whereof was Cosmos; and I know not how I came there, and I know why I came there, neither do I know from whence I came.

2. Thither I came and dwelt many days, and busied myself with many things; and had joys and griefs, but the griefs prevailed. And I was an observer of such things as came before me, and a lover of truth.

3. And the country of Cosmos was very large and wide, and the borders thereof unknown, and the boundaries encompassed with unsearchable mystery; and within the country were great multitudes of men, women, and children.

4. Now, round about the boundaries of the country was a certain deep, and wide, and black river, over which no man could pass; and herein was the great and unsearchable mystery.

5. And all the people of the country did daily journey towards the river, and yet did none of them know where it was till they stood upon the brink therof, whereupon there came forth a grim and fearsome monster and plunged them beneath the blackness of the waters, and henceforth they were not, and their kindred mourned.

6. And the name of the river was Oblivion, and the name of the monster that plunged the people within it was Death.

7. And towards the river all the people of the country traveled, some quickly and in a straight course, and others with long and weary wanderings.

8. Some laden with great and heavy burdens, and others with lightness of heart and mincing steps.

9. And within this country of Cosmos there dwelt a certain ogresome beast, huge and shapeless, and without comeliness, and clothed in a garment of many colors:

10. Yea, very many colors; and he concealed his parentage, and had great need to do it.

11. But I, Philo Aletheia, having truly and faithfully examined his genealogy, have found that his father was a hideous and villainous fellow called Hopeogain—a giant of vast strength; and that his mother was a dissolute woman of Gascony, called Falsehood.

12. And the beast, being a bitter enemy of the people of the country, did yet, by means of his mother, persuade them that he was their friend. And his name was Priestcraft, albeit his friends gave him another.

13. And the beast had with incredible pains and vast labor made a roadway through the whole country, even, as he said, down to the bleak river, and boasted to the people that those who went by his roadway were able, by means of a bridge which he had built, to pass over the river into a great and noble city beyond; the streets thereof were paved with pure gold, and the walls were of precious stones.

14. And he furthermore boasted that such as passed over his bridge into the glorious city were immediately crowned with one of the golden paving stones.

15. And that they were made kings, and sat upon thrones. But when I asked him where their kingdoms were, he spat at me.

16. And when some of the wiser sort of people said unto him, How is it that they are all made kings? and from whence come the subjects? he cursed them, and if they were little, and their friends not by, he kicked them.

17. Mayhap they had no kingdoms, lest they should be wearied with the cares thereof.

18. Verily, the beast was a wondrous liar, for it was at the behest of his father that he made the roadway, and though he cried aloud that his roadway was free, and the entrance open without money and without price, he did not, for that, fail to extort great and heavy toll of all that went by it. Nor was there any advantage in traveling thereby, but the contrary, for the path was exceedingly bleak and desolate, and hard to be traveled, and the pilgrims that used it were continually, and by many devices, robbed by the beast and his servants; and were beaten, and bruised, and kicked, and terrified, and bitten, and spit upon, and tormented, and despoiled, and cheated, and scoffed at, and denied all comfort and all pleasure.

19. And when at last they came to the brink of the river, they found there no bridge, nor any city, but were seized upon by the monster, whose name was Death, and swallowed up by the gloomsome waves of the river, even as they were that came not by the roadway.

20. And the beast furthermore boasted that he had made a league with the king of the great and noble city beyond the river, even the king Jah, and was hand and glove with him in all things, and had agreed with him that all who came not by the roadway should be carried away by the monster of the river, and be plunged into a cauldron of fire, to be tormented with all manner of torments so long as this great and merciful king should live.

21. And for their greater comfort he told them that this great and merciful king would live forever, and that he had power to do whatsoever he would.

22. And I perceived that by these means the beast did persuade and terrify great numbers to go by the roadway, and by exacting from them much money, and much obeisance, he had become exceeding rich, and great, and powerful, and puffed up with pride, and insolent withal; and he hired great numbers of the baser sort of the people to be his servants, and paid them much money to persuade their fellows.

23. And they encompassed the whole country, and went through the length and breadth thereof, persuading and terrifying the people. And they went about continually, babbling upon every occasion, and upon none, and grew fat with the fare, and were clothed in fine cloth, and fared sumptuously every day.

24. And against those who refused to go by the roadway did the beast implacably bellow, and roar, and belch forth unspeakable wrath, and spake all manner of evil against them, and bitterly reviled them, and persecuted them with all persecutions.

25. And I, Philo Aletheia, set myself to watch, and to observe those that were persuaded; and that which by observing I became acquainted with, I have written, and that which I have written do thou read, and great will be thy profit.

. . . . . .

26. About the time when the rivers flow seawards I took my journey, and suddenly I beheld a great multitude of people gathered together, and I began to wonder what might be astir.

27. And one told me, saying, These men thou hearest howling forth exhortations are some who not many days ago were accounted as but the scum and the filth of the city; but having suddenly made a bargain with the worshipful beast—the master of the roadway—are become our guides and teachers, and are persuading great numbers of people to enter the roadway.

28. So I drew near to one of the babblers and listened. And the name af the babbler was Praisethelord, and thus spake he:

29. Men and brethren, hearken, I beseech you, to my speech, for it is the speech of a king, the most high king Jah, he who reigneth over the noble city beyond the river, and who, by me, maketh known to you his will.

30. Mine eyes have beheld him, and mine ears have heard him. In day-dreams I have looked upon him; and in visions of the noontide he hath spoken with me.

31. At his speech my heart melted; and by the light of his countenance my liver expanded. Woe! woe! to the men of this place, and the women thereof. Woe! woe! to the young men, and the sucklings thereof; to the old men, and the virgins thereof. Woe! woe! woe! even thrice-told woe to the scoffers, and those who make light of us, and receive not our sayings.

32. Cursed be they and their children, and their childrens' children to the tenth generation. And there shall be no mercy shown to them; their flesh shall be withered, and their bones ground to powder; evils shall be heaped upon them, and revilings multiplied unto them. Yea, the righteous shall bitterly revile them, and pour out curses upon them like water. Their sustenance shall be snatched from them, and their bread taken away. Their strong men shall be bowed down by want, and their little ones shall famish. In the hour of their extremity their wives shall have no succor, and their daughters have an ill name given them. The waters of confusion shall swallow them up, and the floods of desolation shall overwhelm them. Their destruction shall be swift, and their doom horrible. (See psalm cix.)

33. Then will the pure in heart rejoice, and the righteous sing aloud for joy. Then shall the chosen ones triumph, and the servants of the holy one give a shout. Yea, we will rejoice exceedingly, and magnify our king who hath holpen us, and made our enemies to fall.

34. And I perceived that when the man had made an end of these words, that he put forth his hand and drank somewhot from a vessel that was hard by, and the color of that which he drank was as the color of water, but the smell thereof mightily assaulted my nostrils.

35. And I, Philo Aletheia, would barter mine ears for a false obolus to know what it was that he drank.

36. And when the man had finished drinking, he began to sing, and all the congregation with him. And they sang:

37. We praise our king to whom we know, the blessings of this life we owe. And for the hope (of which we boast) of joys to come, we'll praise the ghost.

38. We are his saints; he is our king, and loveth much to hear us sing. And when his praise employs our lungs, he maketh angels hold their tongues.

39. Then sing and shout, ye sons of grace; awake the echoes of this place. And by your voices strong and sweet, alarm the foe in his retreat.

40. If sinners will not join in praise, then we'll condemn their wicked ways. And thank our king, as we condemn, that we are not as bad as them.

41. And they who scoff at us to-day, and will not tread the king's highway, shall be o'erwhelmed in fire and flame, and live for aye a burning shame.

42. And when they had make an end of singing, I saw a certain man, whose name was Blunt, and oftentimes I perceived that he fell a laughing at the preacher and those who were with him.

43. And the preacher grew angry, and said unto the man, Wherefore laughest thou? Verily, thy laughter is unseemly, and not fitting before the servants of the holy one.

44. And Blunt made answer and said, Mayhap thou wilt tell me who this reverend holy one may be.

45. Then said the preacher, He is the king of the great city beyond the river, and my master.

46. And Blunt said, Prithee, what manner of man is he?

47. He is not a man, said the other.

48. And Blunt said, Then, mayhap, he is a woman?

49. He is not, said the other.

50. Is he, then, a child? said Blunt.

51. He is not a child, said the preacher.

52. Then, said Blunt, needs must, he is an eunuch, or a beast.

53. Thou hast an unruly tongue, and thy speech is unseemly, said the preacher. He is neither eunuch nor beast.

54. Then, said Blunt, I beseech thee show him to me, that I may know what metal he is of, my very soul longeth to have acquaintance with him.

55. No man can see his face and live, said the preacher.

56. Then, said Blunt, I have heard of a certain knave, Moses by name, who saw his rump, do thou therefore, show me that, and I am contented.

57. Thou art unseemly, I tell thee, said the other.

58. Nay, said Blunt, of a verity I do earnestly desire to know this thy master. Prithee, what years hath he numbered?

59. His years are infinite, said the preacher.

60. Then said Blunt, Truly thou astonishest me; he is somewhat of a greybeard then, and doubtless hath a noble family?

61. He hath an only-begotten son, said the other.

62. And Blunt said, Is his wife yet alive?

63. He hath no wife, said the other.

64. And Blunt spoke again saying, Ha, is it so, then he is somewhat of a rover, and sporteth among the maidens, or how came he by his son?

65. And the preacher made answer and said, The son was from everlasting.

66. And Blunt was astonished and said, What, then, is the son of the age of the father? And this ghost of whom thou sang, what manner of thing is it?

67. And the preacher answered, saying, It proceedeth from the father and the son.

68. And Blunt said, Then, I beseech thee, tell which of the twain is the mother? And, while thou art speaking, tell me why it is a ghost?

69. And the preacher answered him not a word.

70. And Blunt inquired further, saying, Of what sex is the ghost? And the preacher said, He is of none.

71. And Blunt said, Ah, then, he is doubtless an eunuch, and, mayhap, of the same age as the father and son? And the preacher said, I know not.

72. And Blunt said, Verily, it is a strange family; prithee, what authority hath the son in the kingdom? And the preacher answered, saying, He is king.

73. And Blunt said, What, hath he then deposed the old man? And the other answered, Nay.

74. And Blunt said, Then there are two kings? And the other said, Nay. And Blunt said, Yea, verily, thou saidest the father was king, and the son was king, therefore there are two kings.

75. And the preacher was angry, and said, I tell thee the three are but one.

76. And Blunt opened his mouth again, saying, Three, didst thou say, then is the ghost also a king? And the preacher said, Yea.

77. And Blunt said, Then, needs must, there are three kings, for one and one, and one over, being well and duly counted, will be no less than three, even though the sea itself be thirsty.

78. And the preacher answered, saying, I tell thee there is but one king.

79. And Blunt said, Mayhap thou meanest that the three do but altogether make a king, each being but a third part of a king.

80. And the preacher made answer and said, I tell thee, blasphemer, they are each of them kings, having all power and dominion.

81. And Blunt said, Then, how sayest thou there is but one king? And the preacher answered, There is but one king.

82. And Blunt said, But thou saidest there were three kings? And the other said, There are three kings.

83. And Blunt said, Seest thou yonder ass? And the other said, I see it. And Blunt said, Seest thou this ass also? And the other said, Yea.

84. And Blunt said, Let, then, this ass be the father, and that the son, and thou shalt be the ghost; canst thou, then, be this ass, and that ass be this ass, and this ass be thee and the other two asses also?

85. And the preacher said, Yea.

86. And Blunt spake again, saying, And canst thou and the other ass be this one ass? And the preacher said, Yea.

87. And Blunt spake further, saying, And can that ass, and this, and thee, be no other than this? And the other said, Yea.

88. And Blunt spake yet again, saying, And wouldst thou be no greater an ass for having the other two joined with thee? And the other said, Never a whit.

89. And Blunt said, And there would be one ass only, and not three? And the preacher said, Yea.

90. And Blunt said, And yet there would be three asses, and not one only? And the preacher said, Yea, of a surety, there would be three.

91. And Blunt said, Tell me, I beseech thee, dost thou comprehend that which thou sayest? And the other made answer, saying, It is not needful, 'tis sufficient that I believe it.

92. And Blunt was wroth, and cried out, saying, Pack thee! pack thee! even as thou sayest, thou art a thrice-told ass! Get thee gone! Away! Avaunt! Avast! Begone! lest I vomit upon thee, for I am sick, even to the death, of thy babbling. Get thee gone, thou three-fold ass, I say, and take thy kings with thee—and, prithee, smother them and thyself in the nearest dunghill.

93. And the preacher looked upon Blunt, and was exceedingly dismayed, and his visage changed, and became yellow, and, mayhap, green; I cannot tell, though I steadfastly regarded him.

94. And the preacher went hastily aside.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Communications.

Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.—CONCLUDED.

We must, too, in our estimate of the evils of Christian persecution, consider the immense numbers that have been ostracized from society, injured in their business, and subjected to a thousand annoyances and hardships, on account of their opinions; the tens of thousands, too, who, in times and in countries where no coercive measures have been used to produce uniformity of opinion, have had to encounter a spirit of intolerance, and who have been forced into the concealment of their opinions, and hypocritical conformity with the popular faith. We must not forget the discords that have resulted from this intolerant spirit, the bad feeling and strife it has engendered in neighborhoods; the animosities and divisions it has produced, lasting sometimes for generations, and making unity, brotherhood, and material prosperity impossible.

"You have heard" says Channing, "of the outward evils religion, when turned into tyranny, has inflicted; how it has dug dreary dungeons, kindled fires for the martyr, and invented instruments of exquisite torture. But to me, all this is less fearful than its influence on the mind. I look with solemn joy on the heroic spirits who have met freely and fearlessly pain and death in the cause of human rights. But there are other victims of intolerance, on whom I look with unmixed sorrow. They are those who, spell-bound by early prejudice, or by intimidations from the pulpit and the press, dare not think; who anxiously stifle every doubt or misgiving in regard to their opinions, as if to doubt were a crime; who shrink from the seeker after truth as from an infection; who deny all virtue that does not mean the livery of their own sect; who, surrendering to others their best powers, receive unhesitatingly any teaching which wars against reason and common sense, and who think it a duty to impose upon such as live within their influence the grievous bondage which they feel themselves." The multitude of this class should be considered, and their condition contrasted with what it might have been but for this slavery imposed upon them.

When we consider fully the history of Christain persecution, the ill-will and bad feeling that have sprung from this faith, the suppression of honest doubt, without which their can be no progress; when we trace it back through centuries and think of the hundreds of thousands that have been scourged, confined in dungeons, tortured by the rack, the thumbscrew, and hundreds of other infernal instruments of religious cruelty; that have had their bones broken, their flesh torn, their joints one by one dislocated; that have expired amidst flames, reproached and mocked while dying; that have been led out clothed in garments covered with horrible representations of devils, and burned to regale royal guests; the countless thousands that have been massacred for their heresy; the millions that have perished in religious wars, which subjected whole nations to their awful curse, giving them over to pillage, torture, and destruction; that "converted Syria into an Aceldama and inundated with blood the fairest fields of Europe;" when, coming down to this age and our own land, we consider the immense numbers that are ostracized from society, injured in their business, subjected to numerous hardships on account of their views, made untrue to themselves, and forced into concealment of their opinions and hypocritical conformity to the popular faith, surely we find sufficient illustration of the truth that Christianity is a religion which by its very nature is intolerant. It has been the cause of more unprovoked strife and war and more unmerited suffering than any other religion of which history gives an account. The multitude of its victims can never be numbered.

Christian intolerance to-day, as in the past, is greatest where its adherents are least divided into conflicting sects; where faith is the strongest, and where scepticism and free thought have exerted the least influence.

Law and Morals.

ITHACA, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As a friend of universal liberty, I feel happy to say that I am engaged in securing signatures to your petition for the purpose of repealing the present existing articles of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to obscene literature. Holding, as I do, my peculiar opinions of what liberty is and should be, I am inclined to believe that every good citizen; that every intelligent person; that every human being who does not wish to encroach upon the natural rights of another, would be proud to sign your petition. Some bigoted characters, however, refuse to sign it, claiming, as I understand it, that brute-force and superstition will outnumber and overpower intelligence and freedom; that the people can have too much liberty; that no matter how obscene the Bible is, it is all right to publish it, because it is "divine"; that my efforts will be futile, and that your object will be defeated. Perhaps I overstep you in regard to the bounds of freedom. I do not believe in what the law terms morality, for who, by the natural laws of the universe, is authorized to determine what is moral for another and what is not. Every person should be left at liberty to judge for himself what is moral and what is immoral, so long as he does not enforce his or her opinions or acts upon another. As regards what the law defines obscenity, I do not wish it suppressed in the manner that has been and is being undertaken. If a person occupying the next door to mine is engaged in publishing and manufacturing so-called obscene literature, I would not interfere with his rights—I would not favor his arrest; so long as he was a good neighbor and peaceful citizen. If I wished anything in his line, I would, by his permission, present myself at his counters, call for the article I wanted, pay the price agreed upon, and then go about my business. If I did not wish anything in his line of business, I should pass on to a place more attractive to my nature. I would not enforce patronage in any line of business. Let the demand govern the supply. If articles of any nature whatever are not wanted, those who offer them for sale will close their doors, and their business will die out. What the people want and need they should have. I trust that the reader will not conceive the idea that I am in favor of having no laws. I believe in having laws to punish crime; that crime consists in violating the rights of our fellow men; that the rights of our fellow-men consist, first, in personal rights, and second, in rights of property. My religion is that "Everything is right that is agreed upon by all interested, provided that the rights of outsiders are not disturbed." That the influence of the so-called obscene literature has a tendency to produce citizens of a bad character more in proportion to the amount sold than many other legal transactions, I deny. At one time it is claimed that obscene literature was the cause of a certain crime; at another time that liquor was the cause of the very same crime; and still at another time that it was the hellish nature of the person that produced the crime. In my experience, the disturbers of peace and harmony in our community are those who are too illiterate to read or too ignorant to reason. I have read much of science, much of fiction, much of history, much of creative philosophy, and much of what is termed obscene literature, still I am known as a peaceable citizen. I have never been accused of violating the rights of any human being. I am not an associate of thieves and murderers. I am not a visitor of gambling-houses or saloons. I do not use tobacco in any form. I do not interfere with the rights of any one. However, I have but few friends. I do not strive to gain friends, to be admired, or to become popular; believing that a person who will do this or that simply because it pleases his companions or observers is of no account. I would not turn my hand over against my will to secure the friendship of the whole State of New York. You are at liberty to publish this letter. Yours for the right,

JEROME S. DAVIS.

Mr. Collins Explains It.

D. M. BENNET, Dear Sir: I have been very much interested in your argument with Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. I think you are giving him all he can carry, even in his wildest metaphysical flights; but I am surprised at the way he takes to shake you off, and at his treatment of the person who takes exception to his statement concerning hydrogen. Chemists and physicists do not, like theologists, ask any one to believe anything that is not demonstrable. They say that hydrogen does not exist in the pure state because it obeys a law of diffusion—a law all liquids and solids obey.

If hydrogen be mixed with oxygen, the hydrogen will gather at the top of the vessel, but they will intermingle with a velocity inversely as the square root of their specific gravities. If the mixture is touched with a lighted match, it will explode. Neither gas in its pure state is explosive, thus proving that they do commingle. Mr. Teed's theory that there is a stratum of hydrogen somewhere in the upper regions cannot exist in fact for the above reason; for as hydrogen is the most attenuated substance known, therefore it is the most diffusive; and there is no doubt in any reasonable mind that there is not a particle of pure hygrogen existing outside of our chemical laboratories. If Mr. Teed would think a little more it would save him some ink; and before he calls those fools who stick to the truths of chemistry until they are shown to be untruths, he should go back and read his articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and see what a confused jumble he has made of it. I should think he is old enough to know that people are never convinced by abuse. He warbles about the effete chemistry of three hundred years ago, and says that evolutionists have completely set it aside. The idea of his that there must be layers of gases, one on top of the other, has no foundation in fact. Diffusion of gases settles that. And his scouting the idea of an imponderable ether pervading all space does not help him any. It is only recognized as a theory, and scientists will be only too glad to have Mr. Teed rise and explain intelligibly.

No one claims that the atmosphere ends abruptly and ether begins. According to the law of diffusion, before mentioned, the air shades off gradually, becoming more and more attenuated.

In speaking of the gun-barrel process of separating water into its elements, Mr. Teed asks, "Has the force used been converted into oxygen?" and several other questions equally pointed. He may with just as much reason ask, "has the force used in converting coal or wood into ashes and carbonic acid gas been converted into ashes and carbonic acid gas?" or, "Has the force used in converting ice into water been converted into water?" They are manifestly absurd, yet they are equally as reasonable as the questions he propounds.

I would not be afraid to accept his challenge to prove that oxygen and hydrogen are the substances that compose the water, and that they are not the substances comprising the force. If he will explain that "Jesus Christ is the Lord God," etc., in half as plain a manner as I have seen water separated into its constituent elements, oxygen and hydrogen, and recomposed again, one unit equivalent of the former to two of the latter, formula H^2 O, I will believe with all my heart. If Mr. Teed has ever taken a thorough course in chemistry and physics, he cannot for one moment doubt that those two gases, and those two alone, constitute water.

I have seen water disintegrated in the way he criticises. I have seen the hydrogen caught and tested as it passed out of the barrel. I have seen the iron-filings oxydized; and I never before heard that the heat used was changed into oxygen and hydrogen. I have heard the question asked, and asked it myself, "Where does the heat go to?" Indeed, that is a question that no one ever expects an answer to. One might just as well ask, "Why is water fluid instead of solid?" I have seen water converted into oxygen and hydrogen by means of electricity, the oxygen collecting in the tube containing one pole of the battery, and the hydrogen in the other tube containing the other pole of the battery. I have held sodium under water and have seen it oxydize, or burn, and have caught the bubbles that arose to the surface and have proved them to be hydrogen. If Mr. Teed ever does one thousandth part as much as chemistry has done to sweep the cobwebs from the human intellect, his fame will be sung for generations to come.

Yours for the truth, W. S. COLLINS.

Inquirer Answered.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, Jan. 23, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: As requested in your issue of January 19th, I propose to answer, honestly and unbiased, the twelve questions put by "Inquirer," and shall begin in the order of numbers.

1. Yes; there is a natural repugnancy to receiving the truth, but it seems to be more a creation of the wrong education of mankind and an effect of not dealing honestly with one another. An honest and intelligent man, with pure motives, will never reject the truth. Truth is mostly rejected in order to serve some other motive, yet it is, in most cases, known by the rejecters, but they have some other cause to serve; and to this end they fight that which, were the surrounding influences and circumstances more favorable, they would uphold. Ignorance is another cause of repugnancy to the truth. Many are educated in certain beliefs, and, after serving them for years, possess not the intelligence to discard them and accept new truths. We must educate properly. Honesty is the best remedy; let us own up our errors and seek the truth.

2. No; not as long as you are honest in that belief. Honesty is a virtue.

3. Yes; and in one school as much as another, provided the truth is sought for; blind sincerity may cause harm and cannot be called a virtue.

4. They are of great benefit, but not more so than a correct knowledge of the laws of life and health and of the effects of the abuses of the same. Were these understood by the masses, no sanitary laws for their protection would be necessary.

5. All that is, is an effect of nature, and therefore natural. Nothing can be more than this. That which is not and cannot be accounted for is generally spoken of as supernatural.

6. Most emphatically, No.

7. Yes; more than two can't mean two.

8. Yes.

9. Not much. It requires contrast or variety to give us ideas. Were there sameness in the universe, there would be nothing to think about.

10. Instead of manner you probably mean matter. Matter is constantly changing form. It can only be an effect of some previous cause and is not destructible. Nothing is lost to nature. The creation of matter has never yet been proved. As it cannot be lost, so it cannot come from nothing.

11. Yes.

12. The answer depends upon what the great end is. If you would imply the Bible story of the crucifixion of Christ, then, as it was God's command, and he being the Supreme Being, I should answer, No; otherwise, Yes. No person has a right to take life, no matter what other great end may be accomplished thereby.

Hoping my answers may be acceptable, I remain,

Yours truly, JOHN JASTER, JR.

Letters from Friends.

MARSHFIELD, IND., Feb. 19, 1878.

SETH WILBUR PAYNE, Dear Sir: If I employ an attorney to prosecute or defend my cause in a court of justice, I do not think it would be expected of me to pay my means to the support of an opponent.

I have employed D. M. Bennett to expound my religious doctrine or belief, and I am well satisfied with the manner in which he is doing it. I do not know how you came in possession of my address, nor do I know whether you are of my creed or not. Some of Mr. Comstock's victims supposed him to be a friend, when they received his decoy letters, and fell into his snare. In your paper I have seen too many apologies for Mr. Comstock to believe that you are opposed to his fanaticism and undermining treachery; and I have also seen too many insinuations and misrepresentations against D. M. Bennett to believe that you are even coöperating with him in clearing away the superstition that inthralls and trammels the mind of man.

I fully intended sending you two dollars to aid in disseminating truth, but I must decline until I know whether you are in the secret service of Anthony or not. I will have to have more evidence before I can believe that Mr. Comstock is or has been in any danger of dismissal from his position for refusing to appear against D. M. Bennett as you say in No. 9 of your paper.

If you are a Liberal, it does seem to me that you can find worse enemies to fight than Bennett and better friends to coöperate with than Mr. Comstock.

But if you are not a Liberal, if you are acting the sneak and pretending to hug me with one arm while you throw sand in my eyes with the other (as most of sneaking detectives do) then I despise you. Please discontinue your paper and oblige a doubting friend. C. W. OSBURN, M. D.

LEBANON, OHIO, Jan. 20, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: I learned by Payne's Age of Reason of the 12th inst. that St. Anthony the Obscenist has been laboring faithfully with the Government authorities for some time for your release and has finally succeeded. Is it true? Is it possible that he is possessed of that amount of humanity? I don't believe it. If he has been working for your release after being the instigator of your arrest, it is because he has learned by THE TRUTH SEEKER or otherwise that Liberals are more numerous than he expected, that you have a host of friends who will back you in the course you are pursuing, and he is fearful it may yet be the means of cutting off his supply from the public crib.

He knew just as well before as he did after your arrest that you were not guilty of the charges alleged against you, and his change of tactics is another evidence of his dishonesty. His motives being selfish, he deserves no credit for anything that he may have done in your behalf. He is not governed or influenced by the Golden Rule of Confucius. "What you do not want done to yourself, do not do to others," but rather by the spirit of the Christian Inquisition. Had he lived in the twelfth century he would have made a good tool of Pope Innocent III, and perhaps had the honor of wearing the Inquisitorial robes.

Since your arrest I have re-read the Marsupial tract and find nothing for which I would think it necessary to hide it or lock it up for fear my family, either male or female, might read it. If that is obscenity, I would like to know their name for many Bible passages, which I dare not quote. See Genesis xxxviii, 9; 2, Kings xviii, 27.

Fraternally yours, D. M. WORLEY.

LEBANON, OHIO, Feb. 17, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have received several copies of Payne's Age of Reason, and have been solicited by its editor to become a subscriber, which I had concluded to do. As its cost was only one dollar a year, I intended to take it for the purpose of distributing Liberal reading in my neighborhood, and to do my share in supporting it as a Liberal paper. But when I read the articles concerning your wealth and that of the editor of the Investigator, I concluded his intention was to try to build up his paper by tearing down other and older Liberal journals.

I take THE TRUTH SEEKER, The Investigator, and The Religio Philosophical Journal, and like to assist all the Liberal papers on the continent. I care not how much Liberal reading is scattered broadcast throughout the country, but I will not knowingly assist in any new enterprise intended to be erected on the ruins of our old tried and faithful Liberal papers.

Enclosed find draft for fifteen dollars which place to my credit to be taken in books. Respectfully yours,

D. M. WORLEY.

DUNLEITH, ILL, Feb. 18, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., My Dear Friend: I consider the treatment you received from Abbot, Payne, and Peterson unkind, unjust, and of a nature I deeply regret they were capable of. I did not consider them sufficiently weak for such an exhibition of envy and jealousy, though it were great and fondly cherished. Their pelting you so cruelly will not long be as it was with the boys, sport to them, and death to the frogs. They will quite soon enough find it reversed—death to them and sport for you! I have not met with either a Liberal or orthodox but that condemns their treatment of you; adding, most generally, that you are receiving blessings in disguise. That is my opinion, most clearly. All people despise a traitor, one false to his country's cause or flag; and the most despicable conduct in this connection is delivering a fire in the rear on friends. I was kindly interested in the success of these men, believing them true to the principles they publish, and sincere in their professions of love for humanity, and had taken measures for obtaining a club for The Age of Reason; and had his attack on you been delayed one week, there would have been from six to ten of his papers taken in this place, where not one will now be taken. There are some who can profess love and brotherly feelings for those that are not true to the cause they profess to defend, are not true to humanity, and are morally as corrupt as a devil. I ask that you never class me with these. I cannot love an enemy, or pray for those that despitefully use or persecute me. Will try to let them severely alone, as your friend A. said of your petition, and save my love for my friends.

D. R. BURT.

COBDEN, ILL., Feb. 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed find one dollar to be paid upon the subscription of H. A. Richardson. We like THE TRUTH SEEKER much better since it has been enlarged. I sent twenty cents for trial numbers of the Age of Reason, and I am very sorry I did so. I would not knowingly give one cent towards supporting a paper that even apologizes for the course of Anthony Comstock, for I consider him one of the meanest men living. I believe you will triumph over all your enemies in the end. "We must learn to labor and to wait." Let me know in some way if you receive this. Respectfully yours,

H. A. RICHARDSON.

MADISON, O., Feb. 19, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: A few days ago I received a printed letter soliciting my aid in getting subscribers to the Age of Reason, and I had made up my mind that the paper was worthy of support, and would have worked for it with zeal, but I soon discovered that he had his guns pointed at you, and my suspicions were aroused that he intended to reduce your works and then reconstruct for himself a great name upon your ruins. Does he think that the old tried and true followers will desert their old general when the victory is so nearly won? As yet he has fired nothing but blank cartridges, and when the smoke clears away, the Age of Reason will be among the things that were, as the recoil of its own guns will have kicked it to death; so don't waste your precious time and space any more about the Age of Reason. When I get a little more time I shall go to work again for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Respectfully yours in the cause of truth, H. C. GILL.

GLENWOOD, PA., Feb. 19, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed find three dollars, for which send your paper to the new subscriber herein named. I have received some circulars with a specimen copy of the Age of Reason from Seth Wilbur Payne, and was surprised to see the course taken by him in regard to you and your circumstances. I think that he is jealous, like two or three more. I cannot like such meanness. I did think I would try and get some subscribers for him, but will not, unless he takes a different course.

We are having a revival in this place at the present time, for a change. It has been running about a week, and nary a convert yet. They cannot get up power enough to convert one sinner. I have been to hear them, and I thought I was in an animal show, for the groans and roars were terrible; and when I heard some of the saints tell their experience, how the devil would get the upper hand of them very often, and how sweet it was to obtain pardon, and they knew there was pardon for sin, and so on, I could think of nothing but sinning on credit, and having it charged every time. It was ridiculous to hear the women tell sentimental stories about their Jesus, what he had done for them, etc. It is time this nonsense was buried in oblivion, and it soon would be if these clerical teachers would stop preaching their trash and engage in some honorable employment to gain a livelihood. We must have liberty for man, woman, and child. THE TRUTH SEEKER enlarged is a gem. It comes loaded with genuine common sense. Long may it wave. Fraternally yours,

G. B. TERWILLIGER.

BENNETT'S CORNERS, N. Y., Feb. 18, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: Your quarrelsome neighbor, Seth Wilbur Payne, will, like Comstock, find that your friends are not his. I had intended to subscribe for his paper, but shall not now. We like Ingersoll's lectures and hope you will continue to print them. We are not sorry that Train has jumped the track. We like some of his, but like to have the space filled with more solid information. Keep right on. THE TRUTH SEEKER suits me, and I may have more money sometime. Yours for the truth, even if it does not leave a little God or a big devil, F. S. HAMMOND.

WORCESTER, MASS., Feb. 20 1878.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: I notice that Payne is issuing circulars, not content with what he can do to misrepresent you through his paper. Allow me to say, that I do not at all see the consistency of Payne's talk in regard to Comstock. He claims to represent the Liberal thought and morality of the country, but I always have and always shall mistrust the "morality" that begins by misstating persons' positions and interests. Let us ignore this man, who, coming late into our ranks, assumes that he alone stands for Liberalism.

You have alluded to Peterson of the Common Sense. Our mutual friend Stephenson's expose of him, put forth so boldly, scared some of the Liberal editors, or their caution prevented their noticing it. Believing its statements substantially correct, I noticed it, and for this, Peterson refused longer to send me his paper in exchange. Very well.

If now Mr. Abbot thinks the moral tone of Peterson superior to yours, it is well that he accepts him, and strikes hands with Payne. Regarding the Index editor, it does seem to me that no right spirit actuates him in his wanton statements. It is a worthy maxim that in order to do a person justice we must wish him well, and the best evidence that Abbot is inimical to THE TRUTH SEEKER, is that he is so willing to put you, or find you in the wrong. THE TRUTH SEEKER, as enlarged, is a most worthy power for good, and the best wishes of my heart go with you in your irksome and often thankless toil, evinced in its weekly issues.

I wish you would say to your readers that I have five styles of Anti-Sectarian Envelopes which, for Liberals to use is to further the cause and pull down the Comstock tyranny. Send at once for samples. A. BRIGGS DAVIS.

BRONSON, MICH., Feb. 20, 1878.

Is Payne insane, or is he only downright jealous and mean? I am ashamed of his treatment of you. By the way, I see Comstock's name is dropped from the January Postal Guide. J. FRANCIS RUGGLES.

HANSON, KY., Feb. 21, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Enclosed you will find seventy-five cents, for which you will please continue THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address, and when my time expires you must write me, for I don't want to read your good paper without paying for it. I have seen one copy of the Age of Reason, and I must confess that I think that it is the grandest fraud that I have seen since Hayes was put in office. I am the only man in our neighborhood that takes your valuable paper, and I appreciate the lectures of Col. Robert Ingersoll; we love and cherish them very much. I am at the office every time THE TRUTH SEEKER comes, and I take a perfect delight in explaining the science of the paper. Yours truly,

DANIEL HAYNES.

LINDSAY, ONT., Feb. 18, 1878.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: Before writing to you again, I decided to wait until I saw how the Comstock affair turned out, and now I most heartily congratulate you on your escape from a man so unscrupulous and vindictive. Nothing, however, in relation to the matter has astonished me more than to find Liberal papers rejoicing, as it were, over your prosecution, thereby defending to a great extent the truly Christian proceedings of a bigoted organization and the vilest acts of its mercenary agent. This action, of course, I am unable to understand; the reasons so far given being simply frivolous. No one who knows you as well as I think I do would say that you ever willingly published anything through an impure motive. I prefer that Liberals would leave others to publish works of alleged indecency. Freethought editors will have plenty to do and plenty to contend with in attacking and exposing Christian theology. The Bible itself is a huge mountain, black and desolate enough, which needs united effort to remove it from the highway of progress and humanity.

I am satisfied that every dollar of the defense fund which you have received has been honestly expended, and that not a single donor has any just reason to complain of the manner of outlay. 'Tis painful to be attacked by those who ought to be friends, and still more painful to find the friends in whom you had placed the greatest reliance wantonly desert you without cause. WM. MCDONNELL.

Communications.

Is Mr. Teed the Seventh Christ?

AVA, ILL., Feb. 17, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: What is the use of your disputing with Cyrus Romulus Regulus Teedus? As he is neither a vocating nor defending modern orthodoxy or Christianity, it seems like a waste of words on your part to carry on a controversy with him. It must be apparent to all your readers that Mr. Teed has "fecundated" some religious ideas not known to the world, and the time for them to be "incubated" is at hand. Or, in plain English, he has been sitting on a nest of ideal eggs (focal points in space, maybe), and is now hatching out a new system of religion.

I really hope that not one out of his nest will prove to be a "bad egg." But, oh! oh! we begin to smell the sulphuretted hydrogen already! Decomposition has surely taken place; yea, the very water and atmosphere are full of the stinking hydrogen! Some of his eggs were not properly "fecundated"; surely they are rotten! However, I am anxious to hear Mr. Teed all through, and am willing to put up with this "sweet savor" for a time.

He keeps hinting at the great fund of wisdom or knowledge which he has drawn from a study of the universe, as well as the Bible, and which he will present to your readers by and by as convincing evidence of the truthfulness of his philosophy, and making things so plain that he who reads can get up and run.

But, Mr. Editor, the real object of my writing you is to make the motion (and I hope some one will second it) that you give Mr. Teed two or three columns in THE TRUTH SEEKER each week, that he can, unopposed, tell the world his new story concerning Jesus. New the story will be to us, though he will insist that it is old with him. And why should he object to this? If the world is suffering from a want of the information which he alone possesses, should it not hold him criminally guilty for the continuation of that suffering if he does not reveal, as soon as possible, the knowledge which will make the condition of mankind better and happier, and not withhold it for the purpose of gaining a point or two over an opponent in debate? The discussion between you and him, Mr. Editor, will last for weeks, maybe for months, yet, and in that time many people will die, still doubting that Jesus was the creator of heaven and earth, and, not knowing the true plan of salvation, they will be lost past all redemption!

Mr. Teed has said, in some of his former letters, if I understand rightly, that different men, or incarnated Jesuses, have risen, and will continue to rise, at different periods of time, to proclaim new truths to the world and save his people anew; and, further, that one of those points in time for another Jesus to appear is near or quite at hand.

Now, can it be that Mr. Teed, who has displayed such a surprising familiarity with the laws of mind, matter, motion, evolution, and involution—in short, all the governing laws of the universe, including "fecundation and incubation"—as would make Huxley, Darwin, and Tyndal ashamed of themselves, and far transcending the knowledge of any mortal on earth—can it be, I say, that he is the Christ, the Jesus, who is about to appear in these propitious times? Oh! glorious thought for the true Christian!

If such is the case, Mr. Teed, why hesitate longer to proclaim the joyful news to the world? Oh! write immediately to Mr. Bennett, informing him of the fact (?) that we, your Infidel readers, if convinced of its truth, may be the first to fall at your feet and worship you, shouting, "Great is Diana of Ephesus! Great is Cyrus of Moravia!"

CHAS. GOODMAN.

A Specimen Comstockian United States Judge.

HEYWOOD ON THE BRAIN.—A GODLY ZEAL TO CONVICT HEYWOOD THAT COULDN'T COOL DOWN AFTER SUCCESS.

After Heywood's conviction by pressure of the judge's rulings and charge to the jury, in the next trial, The Word says:

"Still bent on our conviction, when charging the second jury—subsequently, on a liquor case—he said, 'You will bring Mr. Heywood in guilty on this count,' repeating our name in place of the liquor dealer's, until the foreman said, 'May it please your honor, is Mr. Heywood to be brought in guilty on this liquor case as well as the other?' The whole court enjoyed a roar of laughter at his honor's expense."

Are the Comstock courts courts of justice? Should not the people do something more and different from laughing at such judges?

The Word for March reports a Rev. Mr. Graves as saying, in a public meeting of Comstockians, that, to obtain evidence to break up houses of ill-fame, he would not hesitate to visit them and commit sin himself, and "he believed God would approve the act."

That we should call good! "Better as good!" Excellent! Lucky man to have such an accommodating God! Whether or not he is conscious of having been seen going to such places by some gossipy brother in the Lord, who he fears will feel a duty to tell, of course we cannot say; but, if so, his cunning way of forestalling the report quite caps the climax of wit and originality and sublime cheek—not stopping to look too closely into the honor of betraying his companion in the "God-serving sin" to screen his own reputation. The pious plan, in his case, seems to us Infidels to be rather thin; too thin for us, or for any but the pious to make; but if he is a popular, talented clergyman of the "moral-purity" profession, who gives his talent to the Comstock plan of using the false pretense of obscenity to insure convictions for so-called blasphemy, and for subjugating the press to Church morals' censorship when Church creeds can no more avail for persecuting purposes—if such is the man, doubtless his explanation will seem abundant to his fellow-servants of the Lord who run the modern moral-purity machine. Comstock Christians must greatly admire such devotedly pious moral zeal. And, indeed, who but Infidels, or those consciously or unconsciously tinctured with Infidelity, free-loveism, etc., can fail to do so? Christians, rally for the suppression of vice! Your true leader appears!

Hark from the Graves the key-note's sound!
Ye saints attend the cry!
Your battlefield is pleasure's ground.
Your arms but skill to lie! C. S. W.

The Apocryphal Gospels.

The Rev. Mr. Frothingham in his lecture on the "Apocryphal Books of the New Testament" describes six of the thirteen apocryphal gospels, and says it is doubtful whether any of them were in existence as early as the year 325; that the oldest of them "go back no further than the fourth century;" that they were "all written in Greek," and that "they never had any respect among the dignitaries of the Church."

If he will read the translator's introduction to these gospels in vol. xvi. of the "Anti-Nicene Christian Library," he will find that the above statements are opposed to the best Christian authorities and cannot be successfully maintained. Some of these gospels were referred to by Justin (A. D. 150), by Irenæus (190), by Origen (230), and other early fathers. Several of them were written originally in other languages than the Greek, and they were certainly held in high esteem in the primitive and middle ages. Mr. Frothingham's conjecture that "they were probably rejected simply because they were unpopular and fell out of use," is to me no more reasonable than what he calls the infected or antichristian assertion that "they were repressed by the orthodox authorities because they were dangerous to the authority of the Church or to the other gospels." We know that the Catholic Church sought to repress the general reading of the canonical gospels as dangerous to the authority of the Church, and it is begining now to be understood that each one of the four gospels is dangerous to the authority of the rest.

Washington, D. C., Feb. 24, 1878. W. H. B.

[From The Evolution.]

The Captious and Fractious.

Quarrelsome people who lose all common sense at sight of an irregular piece of paper by the highway, or go wild at sight of a red rag, are not the most suitable animals to hitch to the car of Progress. Neither do they make good drivers. They may, if sufficiently good-looking, take a front seat among the passengers, but they must be laughed or frowned down when they undertake to obtrude their skittishness. Liberalism in this country is just now suffering from internal "Miss Nancyism." It is not the first time nor the most serious case, but it is disgusting enough.

Since we first became identified with the Liberal movement in this country, eight or ten years ago, we have avoided its internal dissensions when it was possible, and in two or three other cases have taken the side of the defendant. The present is not an exception. The Evolution is not sectarian in any sense. By its position as a monthly review of science and literature it is raised above the petty squabbles for place and precedence in which its weekly brethren too often engage.

But, while we do not purpose to take a hand in any hot and dusty quarrel, it is quite within our province to lay down a few general principles which are more or less involved in steady progress.

1. Every man is to be held innocent until he is proven guilty.

When a man enters the field of Liberal propagandism, and especially when he succeeds in it, it is fairly presumable that he does so con amore, that he is earnest and honest. It has ever been the least promising field in which to invest the time and money of a business man.

A man might go into it with a view of swindling the public; but, if so, that man has yet to appear, especially if he is to any extent a capitalist. The selfish and insincere men in the ranks are likely to be, if any, its writers and speakers, who might sooner be suspected of a desire to sponge a support from moneyed men. There are ten professional men with no money to one practical man with money enlisted in this cause. In brief, we argue that if D. M. Bennett had been purely a self-seeker instead of a truth-seeker, he would have taken another road to self-interest than the investment of his business talents, time, and money in the propagation of Liberalism; therefore, the mere assertions of a rival aspirant that he is dishonest and insincere are not to be taken unsupported against his record.

2. The suspicious man is most to be suspected. Detectives are usually chosen, or, rather, developed from the criminal classes. "It takes a rogue to catch a rogue."

The man whose "imaginations are as foul as Vulcan's smithy" is not likely to be immaculate. When "Miss Nancy" with her sharp nose goes prying about to discover some irregularity in the conduct of her neighbors, if she is in hot haste to publish her scandals to the world, we may be sure that something is rotten in her own state; and, however her tongue may extol virtue, and vaunt the superior quality of her own, she nurses a secret, powerful, and, sooner or later, overmastering appetite for the other thing. Recurring to Mr. Bennett, we have to say that to this day we have had no personal relations with him. In him we have carefully watched one of the most active warriors in a grand army, with whom we heartily sympathize. We have, since he came to New York, had business transactions with him, amounting, perhaps, to a score or two dollars per month. In this way one or the other of us is now indebted to the other, to the amount of five dollars, or about that. We care not. There is no obligation upon us to treat him with partiality. We know his shortcomings as well as any one.

The only fault we need to mention here is a certain exaggeration, or excess, of his easy-going good nature, which makes him too heedless of appearances. He reposes serene and strong in his good intentions, and never thinks that some carping critic may be taking him different from his own transparent uprightness.

He has always been too busy with the enemy in front to keep a watch against a stab in the rear. The first time we saw the McKesson & Robbins circular, it was in the hands of the gentleman who was displeased at the use of his name. We did not immediately publish our aged friend as a forger, but went to him privately and said, "Mr. Bennett, here is some mistake." He replied, "Now, those men did virtually consent to a use of their names on a modified circular, and I thought this would satisfy them, and have printed it so as to let them see it in print. I have sent out none with their names, and will not, without formal consent." This was satisfactory to us, and we troubled ourselves no more in the matter. As to the martyrdom business, we know that Mr. Bennett avoided it. Some months ago we urged him to undertake the publication of the Bradlaugh Besant book. He declined, because he wished to avoid martyrdom. The papers for which he was indicted were published some years ago. We have not time or space to pursue this matter; but the Liberal public should not allow itself to be deceived. They will never have occasion to discredit the application of the terms "pure and sincere," which were applied to Mr. Bennett recently by O. B. Frothingham. They may rely upon this: that D. M. Bennett is as far above fraud and malice as he is above nosing about to find some imaginary occasion to scandalize his neighbors and co-laborers.

"Champions of the Church."

We have received orders from the following persons for copies of this work, now in course of production, and which will be issued this spring. We hope to be able to add to this list every day and that in a few weeks it will have assumed very generous proportions. Let every one who thinks he would like a copy of the work when completed just send us his name to be added to this list. As we said upon a former occasion, those who feel able to advance the pay will confer a favor upon us by aiding us in defraying the heavy expenses we have to meet, and they shall receive a twenty-five-cent pamphlet as a premium, which will be forwarded at once. When we brought out the "World's Sages," etc., the aid we received in this way was a great benefit to us in prosecuting our labors. Every person who ordered a copy of that work and advanced the pay for it was fully satisfied with what he received. We think it will be the same in this case. Extracts from the work will be given from time to time. Let the names flow in, and, we repeat, let all advance the price who feel able to do so, and we will prosecute the work with as little delay as possible. Cloth, $3.00; leather and red edges, $4.00; morocco and gilt edges, $4.50.

Judd Griswold, Oliver Gardner, T. L. Jackson (paid), A. A. Bell, Dan'l Davis (paid), E. C. Walker, Wm. W. Scholes (paid), Mary Hazen (paid), J. Hobson, Geo. A. Croon (paid), Jesse Matteson, G. W. Chapman (paid), J. Melendy, John Blain, A. M. Alexander, N. R. Zediker, M. J. Hines, C. H. Deming, Jas. P. Cool, A. H. Roe, Henry Allen, C. T. Spurgeon, Alex Cochran (3 copies, paid), A. Minski, (2 copies, paid), Jas. R. Neal, L. T. Wells, A. A. Barnes, Ed Payne, M.D., J. F. Green, Chris Brown (paid), F. Stansbury (paid), A. McQueen, G. Utz, G. Cole, J. C. Eckles, H. F. Johnson, Dr. E. W. Stevens, Joseph Goldsmith (paid), Geo. W. Guisinger, H. W. Johnson, Alfred Burgess, J. Straight, M. P. Thurston (paid), Joseph Frankowski (paid), Adin Gaunt, Alex McCullough, J. G. Jenkins, Wm. Smith, Durett White, Joseph Noyes, Seneca Behymer, W. F. Porter, John Cleminson, L. L. Dawson, M. Munson, J. Van Shoick, F. O. Clark, D. R. Sparks, W. T. Collier, John Barry (paid), Isaac A. Poole, Philip Cowen (paid), J. W. Moorman, D. J. Parsons, E. W. Miner, J. G. Kendall, Jas. Price (paid), Chas. S. Wiltse (paid), John Vanderlyn (paid), Dr. J. Creighton (paid), Dr. Israel Betz (paid), S. Hartman, G. W. Carver (3 copies), S. M. Dutton, P. V. Walker, S. A. Bradner (2 copies), Mrs. M. Samson, D. T. Culver (4 copies), A. N. Vernon, G. W. Coffin (2 copies), P. L. Barton, A. T. Gordon, Jane Cudworth, Chas. P. Newman, T. J. Kirby, Geo. W. Sutton, Peter Ayers, Miss Nellie Brown, Samuel Searles, Asa Culburton, Addison James, David T. Osgood (3 copies), Stephen Panborn, Thomas Buckley, Eugene Montague, Henry Jerome.

Useful Recipes.

Corn Muffins.—One quart wheat flour, two teaspoonfuls royal baking powder; add to it one cupful yellow meal; cream together one cupful butter, one cupful sugar, three eggs; add one pint milk; stir well; then add flour and meal. Bake in muffin rings; hot oven.

Eggs in the Nest.—Beat to a froth the whites of six eggs which have been seasoned as for an omelette, and pour into a buttered baking-tin; pour across it, at equal distances, six spoonfuls of cream, into each of which drop the yolks whole; bake, but not too briskly, and serve hot.

Verona Cake.—Take two pounds and a half prepared flour; add pint and a half cold milk, a pound butter, a pound sifted sugar, a pound currants, a quarter pound lemon and orange-peel, and a little grated nutmeg, cinnamon, and allspice. Put in a round tin and bake an hour. This rich cake may be iced or ornamented.

Good Baked Ham.—Boil the ham till nearly done; remove the skin and cover with a layer of grated bread-crumbs, seasoned with sugar and a very little pepper, and bake an hour in an oven hot enough to brown the crumbs. The ham should be raised from the pan in which it is baked, that it may not taste as if fried in the fat which may exude from it.

Buns.—One potato boiled very soft; mash, and add the water in which it was boiled (one pint); let it cool; make a batter of this with wheat flour and a tablespoonful Indian meal, also a two-cent compressed yeast-cake; let it rise in a warm place for two hours; then add one cupful light brown sugar, two eggs, and two tablespoonfuls butter, all beaten together; knead very soft; form into buns; let them rise again, and bake about fifteen minutes in a moderate oven.

Stewed Turkey.—An old turkey is more tender stewed than when cooked in any other way. Put into a large pot half a pound of bacon cut in slices, a quarter of a pound of knuckle of veal, three sprigs of parsley, two of thyme, six small onions, one carrot cut in small pieces, three cloves, salt, and pepper, and then the turkey; add a pint each of broth and white wine, cover as closely as possible, and simmer gently about two hours and a half; then turn the turkey over and put it back on the fire for another two hours and a half; dish the turkey; strain the sauce; put it back on the fire, and after reducing it to a glaze spread it over the turkey and serve. Some prefer stewed turkey when cold.

Roast Turkey.—In very cold weather, a turkey in its feathers will hang for a fortnight with advantage. Pluck, draw, and singe very carefully; wash, and then dry it thoroughly with clean cloths; fill with common bread-crumb stuffing, or with sausage-meat or chestnuts; truss firmly, and lay the bird before a clear, hot fire; roast from an hour and a half to two hours, basting constantly and bountifully with butter. Serve with its own gravy and cranberry sauce. A turkey should be laid at first far from the fire, and drawn nearer when half done, though never sufficiently near to scorch it. It is usual to fold and fasten a sheet of buttered writing-paper over the breast to prevent its being too much browned. This should be removed twenty minutes before the bird is done.

Ragout of Turkey.—Cut the cold turkey that is left over from a roast or boil into bits an inch long; put into a sauce-pan the gravy left from the roast, adding a little water if the quantity be small; add a tablespoonful of butter, a tablespoonful of some pungent sauce, half a teaspoonful of cloves, a little grated nutmeg, and a little salt; when it boils up, put in the meat; stew very gently for ten minutes, and then stir in a tablespoonful of cranberry or currant jelly, a teaspoonful of browned flour wet in a little cold water, and a wineglassful of sherry or madeira; boil up once, and serve in a covered dish. A ragout without spice, jelly, or wine is generally preferred.

Stewing.—Stewing differs from boiling only in this, that the heat is never raised to the boiling point, but only to a very gentle simmering, with a very small quantity of water. It requires a much longer time to cook in this manner; but in stewing, the texture of the meat is rendered more tender, the gelatinous parts are more completely dissolved, and instead of a considerable part going into the water, as in boiling, the whole of the juices are preserved in the stew, which is, therefore, very nutritious. Stewing is, therefore, one of the best modes of cooking; and it is also one of the most economical, for a very small quantity of fuel, properly applied, is sufficient to keep up the required simmering for a great length of time. The constant practice of stewing is one of the secrets of the perfection of French cookery. The enameled or porcelain-lined stew-pans are much superior to the old-fashioned metal ones for most purposes. They should always be filled with water immediately after being used, and will then merely require to be well washed and rinsed with more boiling water; but when they have been neglected, strong soda and water should be boiled in them for a few minutes.

What was his Creed?

He left a load of anthracite
In front of a poor widow's door,
When the deep snow, frozen and white,
Wrapped street and square, mountain and moor.
That was his deed;
He did it well;
"What was his creed?"
I cannot tell.

Blest "in his basket and his store."
In sitting down and rising up;
When more he got, he gave the more,
Withholding not the crust and cup.
He took the lead
In each good task;
"What was his creed?"
I did not ask.

His charity was like the snow,
Soft, white, and silken in its fall;
Not like the noisy winds that blow
From shivering trees the leaves: a pall
For flower and weed,
Dropping below.
"What was his creed?"
The poor may know.

He had great faith in loaves of bread
For hungry people, young and old;
And hope inspired kind words he said
To him he sheltered from the cold.
For he must feed
As well as pray.
"What was his creed?"
I cannot say.

In words he did not put his trust;
In faith his words he never writ;
He loved to share his cup and crust
With all mankind who needed it;
In time of need
A friend was he.
"What was his creed?"
He told not me.

He put his trust in heaven, and
Worked ever on with hand and head;
And what he gave in charity
Sweetened his sleep and daily bread.
Let us take heed,
For life is brief.
"What was his creed?"
"What his belief?"

—Burlington Hawkeye.

Aspirations of Youth.

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

Deeper, deeper, let us toil
In the mines of knowledge;
Nature's wealth and learning's spoil
Win from school and college.
Delve we there for richer gems
Than the stars of diadems.

Onward, onward, may we press
Through the path of duty;
Virtue is true happiness;
Excellence true beauty.
Minds are of celestial birth:
Make we, then, a heaven of earth.

Closer, closer, let us knit
Hearts and hands together,
Where our fireside comforts sit
In the wildest weather.
Oh! they wander wide who roam
For the joys of life from home.

The Babes in the Wood.

Now, grandma! why don't you look jolly,
Instead of that sorrowful way?
Don't you know Hal and I have been married
Just a fortnight ago yesterday?

And we're perfectly happy, and will be;
Folks needn't be doleful, I know,
If they don't look for troubles and worries,
And heart-aches. My Hal thinks just so.

Now you're sighing! I know what you're saying:
"The Babes in the Wood." But you see
That Hal's twenty-one in November,
And I shall soon seventeen be.

And we've seen a great deal of the world, too,
We know how to battle with life:
And Hal says, "There can be no sorrow
When a man has a true little wife."

You've had lots of troubles and trials,
But maybe we won't. Seems to me
You old folks bring sorrow by looking.
There! you want to say, "Wait, and you'll see."

But you only look over your glasses,
And clasp hands, as though you would pray,
And whisper, "God bless you, my children,
And keep you in sunshine alway."

FIVE YEARS AFTER.

Grandma, won't you come out and help us?
I'm worn out with watching and work,
For the children are sick, baby teething,
And the cook (that old Biddy MacQuirk)

Went away in a huff, without warning,
And I cannot manage the range;
So Hal takes his meals in the city—
You know a man must have a change.

All night I was up with the children,
For Hal says, "It's hard on a man
To be wakened all night with the baby,"
Oh, grandma, dear, come if you can.

TEN YEARS AFTER.

Tell me, grandmother, dear, the old story
Of the heavenly home and its rest,
And hold me close up, as you used to,
And lay my head down on your breast;

I'll try to look yonder to meet them,
My two little saints gone before,
And forget the sharp pain of the arrow
That shattered the ring I once wore.

Ah! I see it all now why you whispered,
"The Babes in the Wood," long ago,
When I trusted the reed that has broken,
The sand-chain, the knot made of snow;

And though neither gray hair nor wrinkle
Has come to me, now I can see
Other babes in the wood, and am silent,
Foreboding, as you looked at me.

—Ethel Lynn, in the N. Y. Ledger.

orthern Lights.

A NORSE SUPERSTITION.

"Nay, mother, nay; the pictured coal is glowing
Dully and redly on the hearthstone there;
You was no flame of careless idlers' throwing,
Nor rocket flashing through the startled air;
'Twas but the gleaming of the Northern Lights—
Ah, there again, they reddened Huntcliff heights.

"So, let me raise you softly on the pillow,
See, how the crimson lustre flares and dies,
Turning to red the long heave of the billow,
And the great arch of the all starless skies;
The fishers say such beauty bodes them sorrow,
Telling of storm, and wind to blow to-morrow."

"No, child, the busy wife may bait her lines,
And net and gear lie ready for the morning,
No presage in that wavering glory shines,
No doom in the rich hues the clouds adorning;
They do but say the lingering hours are past,
The gates, the golden gates, unclose at last.

"Won, the long hill so steep and drear to climb,
Done, the long task so bitter hard in learning;
The tears are shed, and garnered up by time,
The heart beats, freed from all its lonely yearning;
The bar swings back, and, flooding seas and skies,
Burst out the deathless lights of Paradise.

"See, see, by the great valves of pearl they stand,
Friend, children, husband; see glad hands outreaching!
For me, for me, the undiscovered land.
Its promise in that roseate signal teaching;
Aye, kiss me, child, the lips will soon be dumb,
That yet in earthly words can say, 'I come.'"

Again the banner of the Northern Lights
Waved broad and bright across the face of heaven;
And in the cottage on the rugged heights,
The passing radiance by their glory given
Showed a pale orphan weeping by the bed,
And the calm smiling of the happy head.

—All the Year Round.

Modern Miracles and Mysteries.

The rapid march of scientific discovery is one of the marked features of this age. But marvelous as our achievements have been in this direction, we are continually confronted with new problems. No sooner is one disposed of than others still more profound rise up before us and demand explanation. For more than a quarter of a century scientists have been called on to explain certain phenomena which has been variously designated as clairvoyance, Spiritualism, mind-reading, etc., all of which appear to belong to the imperfectly explored domain of nervous physiology. Spiritualism has been, and still is, a subject, in regard to which scientists have engaged in controversies as bitter and acrimonious as the disputes of the theologians of past ages. For several months past Professor Carpenter and Mr. Alfred Russell Wallace have been carrying on a heated controversy in the columns of the London papers and magazines on the subject of Spiritualism. Both of these gentlemen are distinguished scientists, and yet they hold the most opposite views in regard to Spiritualism. Mr. Wallace, it is well known, is an unflinching advocate of the reality of much of the phenomena called Spiritualism. He is known to be a man of ability, a keen observer, candid and sincere; it would therefore be unfair and unjust to say that he is entirely the victim of delusion or imposture. Whatever may be thought of Spiritualism as an explanation, it is hardly safe to say that the phenomena, which is claimed to be produced through such agency, have no foundation in fact. The impartial mind is still forced to admit that there are things which if not dreamed of in our philosophy are at least not yet solved by it. It may, perhaps, be ultimately discovered that these phenomena are purely subjective creations; but even so, we must remember that subjective phenomena are quite as much the object of science as objective things, though they require to be interrogated and explained by different methods. The experiments performed by Professor J. R. Buchanan, a few evenings ago in the presence of a party of ladies and gentlemen at the residence of Dr. R. S. Newton, resulted in the production of phenomena both strange and curious. Professor Buchanan has long been recognized as the advocate of a theory which he terms "Psychometry," through which, it is claimed, physical and mental effects are produced by methods which have hitherto been ridiculed by men of science. One of these experiments was performed by placing between the palms of the hands of each person present a piece of brown paper, each of which had been saturated with different medicines in solution and subsequently dried, the nature and properties of the medicine being unknown to those who held the several pieces of paper. In a short time a number experienced strange sensations, which they described. It was found by examining the nature of the medicine with which the paper had been impregnated that in every instance the effect was such as is usually produced by such medicines when administered in the ordinary manner. As none of them knew the kind of medicine they held, it can hardly be claimed that it was the result of imagination. Another kind of experiment consisted in furnishing each of the company with some manuscript letters, which they were directed to hold in their hands or place against their foreheads. They were requested to describe the impressions they felt, when several of them gave remarkably accurate descriptions of the mental, moral, and bodily condition of the authors of the manuscript in their possession. Now, such facts as these do certainly indicate the existence of phenomena that scientists have not yet fully explained. But the defenders of such phenomena are by no means warranted in claiming for them either a supernatural or supersensual origin. The main error on the part of the scientists in dealing with this class of phenomena appears in the assumption that the exact limit of receptivity by the nervous system has been accurately determined, whereas no such limit has been defined even approximately. We are still in the dark in regard to the manner in which physical effects are transformed into psychical effects, and until the science of nervous physiology is advanced to the condition of a positive science, we are likely to remain so. But when this shall have been accomplished, there is every reason to believe that many of the problems which now perplex us will then submit to a satisfactory solution.—N. Y. Graphic.

THE CAREER OF RELIGIOUS IDEAS: Their Ultimate, the Religion of Science. By Hudson Tuttle. D. M. Bennett: New York. 1878. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

In this work the author, after sketching the fundamental religious proposition, dependent propositions, and results, in comparison with the fundamental scientific proposition, dependent propositions and results, follows out the inquiry, "What is religion?" in his characteristic terse and searching manner. He says: "Those who regard man as fallen from a high estate, see in the savage, not a primitive, but a degraded condition. This conclusion conflicts with the facts of human history. The races of mankind began, like the individual, ignorant and brutal. The early man was a savage, a cannibal, whose religion—if he posessed a religion—was of the grossest form. Our pride may revolt against such a view of our ancestors, but it makes it no better by denying it, and it is flattering to know that man is subject to progressive growth and unlimited achievements."

He then goes over the history of the race as revealed by geology, archeology, written history, and known scientific facts, disclosing the workings of the human mind under the various developments of intellect and reason, hewing out religious ideas to suit the various races, peoples, and stages of development according with the superstitions of the times and general masses which constituted the prevailing religious opinions of those times.

While he shows conclusively that all religious ideas had their origin in fetichism, we think he carries the argument a little further than he can prove, in assuming that "a kitten mistakes a ball for a living being as readily as a savage sees a life like his own in the wind;" or that "the thoughts awakened in the mind of a dog by presenting a watch to his ear are of the same kind—he regards it as a living being; the savage thinks it possessed of a demon."

After tracing the career of religious ideas down the ages and comparing its known operations with scientific facts, the contest in the present narrowed to the supremacy of Church in State, of superstition and theology over rationalism he truly says: "The battle is no longer waged with the uncertain weapons of theology and metaphysics, but the thinker now wields the Damascus blade of positive knowledge, and the result will be decisive. Infallible authority, antiquity, miracles, saints, martyrs, popes, priests, majorities, dogmas, faiths, consciousness, all the trappings that have hitherto been received as divine, holy, and sacred, will perish before the keen flame of what is known, and no more shall blight the expansive spirit forever."

It is a volume pregnant with thought, and will be read with great interest. It has already been published in England.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

The following appears in the Shaker Manifesto for March.

"BEYOND THE VEIL." By P. B. Randolph. Published by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth St., New York.

A new arrival from the emerald soil was once asked: "What is a posthumous work?" He answered quickly: "It is the work a man does after he is dead!" Here we have a work which is purported to have been done by its author since his death. It comes by inspiration through two venerable ladies, and is most elegantly compiled. If the truth of this volume could be as easily substantiated as even we can vouch for its most beautiful diction, then it would be most well for everybody to get a copy and read it. Whosoever does so, will suspend, every now and then, spell-bound.

GHOSTS! GHOSTS!! GHOSTS!!

Send five cents for COL. INGERSOLL'S lecture on "Ghosts," as delivered at Albany, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1878. Just out, flashing with wit and genius. It is crammed with logic, arguments, sarcasms and facts. It is beautiful, it is grand, and more, it is true. Only five cents. With a photograph of its eloquent author for fifteen cents. With cabinet size of the same, thirty cents.

"Ghosts and other Lectures." A new work by Col. Ingersoll, soon to be issued. Send me stamp, and as soon as the book is out, will send you descriptive circular and price thereof. Send three-cent stamp for Catalogue of Books, Tracts, Photographs, etc.; also, club rates for Liberal and scientific newspapers and periodicals. Address, E. C. WALKER,
616 Lock Box B. Florence, Iowa.

Hell! Hell! Hell!

Send five cents for COL. INGERSOLL'S Lecture at Chickering Hall, New York, on Feb. 3d, upon that warm subject. "HELL," "GHOSTS," and "LIBERTY," in one pamphlet, for 15 cents.
Address E. C. WALKER,
318 Lock Box B., Florence, Iowa.

ART OF PROPAGATION.

Is a highly-illustrated practical work on the rapid increase and multiplication of stock. Published by JENKINS' GRAPE AND SEEDLING NURSERY, Winona, Columbiana County, Ohio. Price, prepaid, by mail, 50 cents. Catalogue free. Agents wanted. Address as above. 118

NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.
THE
Great Magnetic Remedy.

DO YOU SMOKE?
DO YOU CHEW?
DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective. Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed we warrant the REMEDY to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.

Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.
Address,
J. A. HEINSOHN & CO., Manufacturers.
918 CLEVELAND, OHIO.

JUST OUT!
AURICULAR CONFESSION
AND
Popish Nunneries.

BY WM. HOGAN.

Twenty-five years Confessing Priest. A very interesting work. 220 pages. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents. D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

The Popes and Their Doings.

NO. 3 OF THE "HOLY CROSS SERIES."

Being brief stories of fully one hundred and fifty of the conspicuous and sinful Popes—the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God—who filled the chair of the Holy See in Rome during several centuries. The cheapest and most popular history of the Popes ever written. A friend styles it "rich, rare and racy." 278 pp., 12mo. Sent by mail at the very low price of 50 cents in paper; 75 cents in cloth.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE. Truly one of the most valuable works that have appeare within the last ten years. By PROF. DRAPER. Price, $1.75.

PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATUEAL RELIGION; or an answer to the question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Divinely-Inspired and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

POSITIVELY

$50 WOHTH OF INFORMATION

in form of a nice book of over 100 pages, well illustrated, sent post-paid, for $1.00

BY A PRACTICAL CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep the hens and hen-roosts free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in mid-winter. How to manage setting hens, chickens, etc., and how to preserve eggs a great length of time. Best breeds of hens, etc. Enclose $1.00 with order.

E. D. BLAKEMAN, Circleville, Ohio.

[Mr. Blakeman is a school-boy friend of ours. We know him well; he is entirely reliable, and the information he has to impart upon the poultry subject is valuable.—ED. T. S.] 9tf

TWO BOOKS ON FINANCE.

SPECIFIC PAYMENTS BETTER THAN SPECIE PAYMENTS.

BY EDWARD D. LINTON.

CONVERSATIONS ON THE CURRENCY.

BY EDW'D D. LINTON AND GEO. D. DRURY.

The question to be met and settled now is, Shall money continue to rule and curse mankind, or shall it be made to serve and bless?

Price 25c. For sale at this office.

The Priest in Absolution,

The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

☞ The other twenty-five numbers of the "Holy Cross Series" are being brought out as rapidly as possible.

Positive Thinker,

SCIENCE HALL,

NEW YORK,

Advocates Positive Philosophy and the Religion of Humanity.

One Year, $1.50; Six Months, 75 cents; Three Months, 40 cents; five to one post-office, $5.00; ten and one to getter-up of Club, $10.00. Issued weekly after the first three numbers. Subscribers will be entitled to the full number. Send five cents for copy and circular. 4t8

THE MYSTERY UNVEILED.

The miraculous conception and birth of JESUS CHRIST exposed and explained. A book for thinking men. Price, post-paid, 35 cents

Address BENTON BEMENT,
4t8 St. Johns, Mich.

LECTURES,

BY MRS. CLARA NEYMAN.

This talented lecturess will give the following lectures, at a reasonable compensation, before Liberal audiences, as may be desired:

1. German Skepticism.
2. What is True Religion?
3. Woman's Reform Work in Europe.

Address MRS. CLARA NEYMAN,
97 Maiden Lane, New York.

THE MAGNETIC TREATMENT.

Send 25 cents to DR. ANDREW STONE, Troy, N. Y., and obtain a large, highly-illustrated book on the system of Vitalizing Treatment. Also The New Gospel of Health for $1.25, a masterly work on progressive medicine and healing by magnetism, 519 pages, illustrated with 120 cuts for personal manipulations, explanatory of the sublime science of healing without medicine. 1y5

...WATCH! An old, original, and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," the "FAMILY FAVORITE" and above paper for THE MILLION. Established, 1863. There's nothing like it. All and young, rich and poor, saint and sinner,—"it waves for ALL." It is a large 40-column, 8 page paper, crowded with Stories, Tales, Sketches, Stories, Poems, Wit, Humor, Fun, Recipes, Puzzles, Humorous Poems, etc., etc. In its "ROGUE'S CORNER," every Swindler, Quack, Humbug, and Fraud is fully, freely, and truthfully exposed. No one can be swindled who reads the "BANNER." 100,000 people read and rely upon this National Paper. TRY IT ONCE AND NOW. Only 75 cents a year, or with Premium of SIX Charming Chromos, or a fine Dictionary, cloth, 25 pages, only $1. Trial Trip, three months, 15 cents. Specimen FREE. Don't put it off but SEND NOW. Address, "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

THE OUTCAST.

By WINWOOD READE, author of "Martyrdom of Man."

This is his last work. Mr. Reade was unquestionably one of the ablest writers of the present century. His "Martyrdom of Man" attracted extraordinary attention in Europe and in this country, for its ability, brilliancy and boldness. This last work is regarded with equal favor. The English edition was published at two dollars. We give it entire for THIRTY CENTS IN PAPER.

ASTROLOGY.

PROF. LISTER, Astrologer, 505 W. 23d st., New York. 44 years' practice, 27 in Boston. Can be consulted by letter. Send for Circular. Address all letters 505 West 23d st., New York City.

SPERMATORRHŒA

should be in the hands of those suffering from this LIFE-WASTING DISEASE. It is an external application, and has thoroughly and permanently cured over one thousand cases, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had falling-sickness-fits; others on the verge of consumption, while others again had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information, address, with stamp, Vineland, N. J., where DR. FELLOWS is permanently located, and obtain his private circular, with cures sworn to, which is unimpeachable testimony to the doctor's skill and reliability as a physician in treating this prevalent and most dangerous of all diseases, SPERMATORRHŒA. 1tf

☞ TERMS WITHIN THE REACH OF ALL. ☜

BOOK BUYERS,

And all who wish to subscribe to periodicals should send 15 cents for No. 16 of The Evolution. Address THE EVOLUTION, 34 Dey Street, N. Y.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

Address D. M. BENNETT, Publisher
141 Eighth St., New York.

JUST ISSUED.

BEYOND THE VEIL.

A very neat and entertaining volume, giving beautiful descriptions of life, occupations, etc., in the Spirit World. Dictated by the spirit of Percy B. Randolph, through the mediumship of Mrs. Francis H. McDougal and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson of California. With a steel-plate engraving of Dr. Randolph.

Price $1.50, post-paid by mail.

D. M. BENNETT
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

BOOKS FOR THINKERS,

PUBLISHED BY

CHARLES P. SOMERBY, No. 139 Eighth Street, New York,
(A few doors East of Broadway.)

PROF. TYNDALL'S GREAT ADDRESS,

ON

"The Advancement of Science,"

At Belfast, August 19, 1874, before the

BRITISH ASSOCIATION

FOR THE

ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

COMPLETE.

THE volume contains also a Biographical Sketch and fine PORTRAIT of PROF. TYNDALL, with a descriptive Essay by PROF. H. HELMHOLTZ, and Prof. Tyndall and Sir Henry Thompson's noted aticles on

"THE PRAYER-TEST."

Price, at Retail, in heavy tinted paper, extra cloth $1.00; pamphlet form cheaper paper, 50 cents; address and portrait only 25 cents. To the trade 17 and 33⅓ cents in paper, 67½ cents in cloth. On orders of 100 copies 5 per cent. and of 500 copies 10 per cent., additional discount from these rates.

Good Discounts on Orders of $5 and Upward, according to quantity.
Send 10 cents for Prometheus containing 28 pp. choice reading matter and a Full List of Liberal Publications; or for List only, Free.

CHARLES P. SOMERBY,
PUBLISHER, BOOKSELLER, IMPORTER, AND PRINTER,
139 EIGHTH ST., Bet. Broadway and Fourth Ave., NEW YORK.

FULL DESCRIPTION OF OTHER LIBERAL WORKS FROM TIME TO TIME.

READ OUR ADVERTISEMENTS EVERY WEEK, AS FREQUENT CHANGES WILL BE MADE.

Works of Thomas Paine.

COMMON SENSE. His first and most important political work. Clear type. Paper, 15 cts.

THE CRISIS. Containing Nos. I. to XVI., inclusive. Written in the "times that tried men's souls" during the American Revolution. 12mo. Full, clear type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth 80 cts.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN. Written in defense of his fellow man. A work almost without a peer in the world. On full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON. On large, clear type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON AND AN EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Full, bold type, 12mo. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. Complete in one volume, on full, bold type. Containing "Common Sense," "The Crisis" (sixteen numbers), and "The Rights of Man," with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. Complete. 12mo. Composed of the "Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "An Essay on Dreams," "Of the Religion of Deism," etc., etc., with a life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

THOMAS PAINE'S GREAT WORKS. Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Containing a Life of Paine, his POLITICAL WRITINGS—"Common Sense," "The Crisis," "Rights of Man"—his THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS—"Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine" "An Essay on Dreams," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "Of the Religion of Deism"—all in one large volume, crown-octavo, of THE TRUTH SEEKER LIBRARY, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3.00; colored leather, red burnished edges, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. By Calvin Blanchard. 12mo. Large, clear type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Published by

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

SEEDS.

Best and Cheapest in America, or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from Grower, postage or express paid, and get fresh, true, and reliable seeds. I can and shall beat any firm in America in quality and low prices. Beautiful illustrated Seed Catalogues and Garden Guide free.

Address R. H. SHUMWAY,
10t5 Seed Grower, Rockford, Ill.

BROUGHTONS
INVIGORATING
SYRUP. 25 CTS.

A certain cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Stomach, Liver or Kidney Diseases, Weakness, &c. 25 cents per bottle. Incurable cases solicited and cured or money refunded. The same ingredients put up in powders to be sent by mail. Sample bottle, circular, and 2815

Advice Free, 495 Broome St., N. Y.

READER, that little cottage contains one of the choicest libraries in the country. I buy my books of J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole, Bronson, Mich. Rare O. P. works a specialty. Lists for stamp. 8m1

DO YOU WANT Photographs, Albums, Gold Pens, Pencils, Paper, Stationery, Knick-knacks, Notions, Novelties of every description? Beware of unreliable parties—send only to the old, original and only "HEADQUARTERS." Established, 1865. We originated what is now an enormous trade. We import books weekly. Supply all Scientific, Legal, Medical, scarce, foreign and other books not often to be obtained—in fact, supply ANYTHING AND EVERYTHING in the Book or any other line. Our large store has four floors crowded with cords of books on every known subject, and all offered very low. CATALOGUES FREE. Information given. Send stamp, and send now. Address, HUNTER & CO., PUBLISHERS, HINSDALE, N. H.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COLLECTION

OF

FORMS, HYMNS, AND RECITATIONS.

Forms for organizing Societies, Forms for Constitutions and By-laws, for Funeral Services, Marriage Services, Naming of Infants, Obituary Notices, Epitaphs, Wills, etc. Also, nearly 500 Liberal and Spiritualistic Hymns, original and selected; for Public Meetings, Funerals, Social Gatherings, etc., etc. The whole supplemented by a fine selection of Recitations, comprising many of the finest poetical gems in the language. Nearly 600 pages, at the extremely low price of 75 cents in cloth. The price is made low, so that every family can have a copy. Let none fail to have it.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

Professor Martinez, the great Spanish Seer and Wizard, will for 25 Cents, with your age, height, color of eyes and lock of hair, send to you a correct picture of your future husband or wife, initials of name, the time and place where you will first meet, and the date of marriage. Address, Prof. MARTINEZ, 42 Tremont St., Boston, Mass. This is no humbug!

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. H. HALLELT & CO., Portland, Maine. 1y7

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine. 1y7

GOLD Any worker can make $12 a day at home. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine. 1y7

RICH, RARE, RACY reading. The Lantern With catalogue of novelties, rubber goods. 10c. A. T. THAYER, 10 South Fifth ave., N. Y. 4t7

TRUE TIME. 20,000 SOLD. The GENUINE Swiss Magnetic COMPASS, INDICATOR AND TIME-KEEPER. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveller, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERYBODY desiring a reliable Time-Keeper and also a superior Compass. Usual watch size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat OROIDE case. Perfection guaranteed. WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of combination will be sent in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1.00; 3 for $2.50. Circulars sent Free. BEWARE of a "cheap" article offered as a "premium"—Get the BEST. Or the Genuine. Send all orders to the sole Agents, J. J. KING & CO., Brattleboro', Vt.

Gems of Thought.

ALL religion and all ethics are summed up in justice.—Conway.

THERE is not so much danger in a known foe as in a suspected friend.—Nabb.

HEAR one side, and you will be in the dark; hear both sides, and all will be clear.—Haliburton.

CLAP an extinguisher upon your irony, if you are unhappily blessed with a vein of it.—Lamb.

I WILL chide no heathen in the world, but myself, against whom I know most faults.—Shakspere.

JUDGE thyself with a judgment of sincerity, and thou wilt judge others with a judgment of charity.—Mason.

IF Judges would make their decisions just they should behold neither plaintiff, defendant, nor pleader, but only the cause itself.—Livingston.

SCOFF not at the natural defects of any which are not in their power to amend. O, it is cruel to beat a cripple with his own crutches!—Fuller.

MEN are not to be judged by their looks, habits, and appearances, but by the character of their lives and conversations, and by their works.—Estrange.

THINGS should not be done by halves; if it be right, do it boldly; if it be wrong, leave it undone. Every day is a little life, and our whole life is but a day repeated.—Hall.

A MAN would have no pleasure in discovering all the beauties of the universe, even in heaven itself, unless he had a partner to whom he might communicate his joys.—Cicero.

BEWARE of biting jests; the more truth they carry with them, the greater wounds they give, the greater smarts they cause, and the greater scars they leave behind them.—Laater.

THE vulgar mind fancies that judgment is implied chiefly in the capacity to censure; and yet there is no judgment so exquisite as that which knows properly how to approve.—Simms.

WE ought always to deal justly, not only with those who are just to us, but likewise with those who endeavor to injure us; and this, too, for fear lest by rendering them evil for evil, we should fall into the same vice.—Hierocles.

IT appears an extraordinary thing to me that since there is such a diabolical spirit in the depravity of human nature as persecution for difference of opinion in religious tenets, there never happened to be any Inquisition or crusade among the pagans.—Sterne.

SOPHISTRY may perplex truth, ingenuity may warp the decrees of justice, and ridicule may raise an undeserved laugh; but where free inquiry prevails, errors will be corrected, justice will be revered, and ridicule will be retorted on those who have abused its influence.—Ennius.

IRONY is an insult conveyed in the form of a compliment; insinuating the most galling satire under the phraseology of a panegyric; placing its victim naked on a bed of briers and thistles, thinly covered with rose-leaves; adorning his brow with a crown of gold which burns into his brain; teasing and fretting, and riddling him through and through, with incessant discharges of hot shot from a masked battery; laying bare the most sensitive and shrinking nerves of the mind, and then blandly touching them with ice, or smilingly pricking them with needles.—Whipple.

IT may be stated with all the force of a law that all the inferior races of mankind will ultimately disappear before the fair-skinned white race from all those regions of the earth inhabited by them. Sentimental humanity has nothing to do with the result. The decree is inevitable—advance or perish! Philanthropy, with praiseworthy motives, has engaged in teaching the children of the wild, forcing them in a few years over the distance the white race has been countless centuries in passing, but the results are not encouraging. On the Sandwich Islands and all the islands of the Pacific, Tasmania, and the vast continents of America, extinction and not progress is the fate of unprogressive man.—Hudson Tuttle.

ALL new discoveries have to win their way into popularity in spite of the opposition of the churches if they seem to infringe in the least upon a single one of their dogmas. But truth and scientific fact always conquer in the long run, because they are demonstrable and force themselves involuntarily upon the mind when once fairly presented. As soon as science proves a thing, religion steps back and gives up her opposition or bends herself to meet the issue. As the world grows older she grows wiser, just as an individual does. The child clings to the ideas it embodies in its youthful years with such tenacity that it has gone into a proverb that "as the twig is bent the tree's inclined." It is precisely so with the world of grown up men and women. They have so long believed one way that they cannot see how any other can be true. But if a single individual could live right on for a thousand years, that individual would inevitably become an Atheist, because he would have time to test and try his faith and see how unstable it was. But now one-fourth of life is childhood, and is spent in imbibing opinions, one-fourth more in analyzing them, another fourth perhaps in doubt, perhaps in indifference, then old age comes, and if the individual has not become decidedly and practically Infidel, he again falls back upon his boyhood faith and dies in the old-time belief, if he has any belief about it.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

BAD gas is a burning shame.

THE minute-gun is not used in killing time.

HOW to make a Maltese cross—tread on its tail.

TIME shall be no mower when he breaks his scythe.

THE man who went out on a lark returned on a barrow.

THE song called "The Apple of My Eye" has a core-us.

MINCE pie, eaten late at night, is food for repentance.

THE members of the sixty-second regiment are called minute men.

THE widower now-a-days cremates his wife, and then re-mates himself.

DUE-DROPS.—Dunning postal cards. Molasses drops—mighty slow in cold weather.

A POPE'S a feather and a monk a rod;
A non-est hell's the no-blest work of God

AS WEEK after week brings need after need, how can we but confess ourselves a week-need community.

WANTED MORE.—The old saying that some men would want more if they had a billion was exemplified yesterday when a Windsorite and a Detroiter got into a dispute at the ferry dock. Said the Canadian:

"You ought to be well pounded, and I'm the man who can do it. However, I don't understand the laws over here and don't want to be locked up. If you will come over to Canada I'll pay your fare both ways on the boat, buy your dinner, treat you to cigars, lick you till you can't squeal, and send you home with beef on your eyes."

The American thought of the proposition a while and then asked:

"If I go over with you will you buy me a new overcoat?"

"I—I—yes, by thunder, I will!" replied the mad Windsorite.

"And a suit of clothes?"

"No, I won't. That's asking too much."

"Well, those are the only terms I was ever licked on," calmly replied the other; "and your rejection of them shows that you are all blow and no fight."

They took it out in jawing.—Free Press.

A SOLID CASE AT LAST.—An Irish matron enters a lawyer's office: "Is this the place, sur, where people git divorces?"

"Yes, occasionally we engage in that kind of business. What can we do for you, madam?"

"Faith, sur, I'd loike to get a divorce from me husband Pathrick."

"What is the matter with Patrick, madam?"

"Shure and Pathrick gets drunk, sur."

"That's bad. But I hardly think that alone will be sufficient cause. Have you no other complaint?"

"Indade I have, sur; Patrick bates me."

"Yes, yes; I see. That adds cruelty to drunkenness. But, madam, you do not appear to suffer much in your appearance from Patrick's cruelty. I think you must find a stronger reason before the court will grant you a divorce."

"Well, sur, besides all that, I fear, sur, that Pathrick isn't thrue to me."

"Ah! now, madam, you begin to talk business. What reason have you for thinking that Patrick is unfaithful to you?"

"Well, sur, I may say that its mesilf that has a sthrong suspicion that Pathrick is not the father of me last choild."

BRIC-A-BRAC CHINA.

Miss Clio Jones was twenty-three,
And wonderful at repartee;
In all her life, her parents say,
She never gave herself away.

Young Tongo Yangtse Chiang Chaw
From Pekin came to study law
At Harvard's university;
He, too, was great at repartee.

Miss Clio Jones had often said
She knew that she would die unwed;
She ne'er had seen a fellow smart
Enough to captivate her heart.

Young Tongo Yangtse Chiang Chaw
Had vowed to die a bachelor;
"There are no clever girls," said he;
"I ne'er will marry a Chinee."

They met and loved amid the hum
And splendor of a kettle-drum;
A tawny skin to persons clever
Can make no difference whatever.

"Oh, Clio, do you mind my shade?"
Said he. "My Tongo," lisped the maid,
"You are a snow-drop to Othello."
Ah! Tongo was a lucky fellow.

To tell her love ran Clio Jones,
Of her mama she made no bones;
Her pa replied that he'd be d—
If she should marry a Chinee.

She shrieked; she sobbed; she stormed; she blew;
She raved about his lovely queue;
"Oh, boil it down!" the father said;
"A Chinaman you shall not wed."

Then Clio Jones became emphatic;
Her father locked her in the attic,
And left a horsewhip in the hall,
In hopes that Tongo Chaw would call,

Oh, gentle friends, my tale is done,
Poor Clio Jones became a nun,
And clever Tongo did not marry,
But died instead by hari-kari.

The moral is that it is never
Advisable to be too clever;
If Clio had not been, you see,
She might have wed with you or me.

—Harvard Lampoon.

Truth Seeker Tracts.

No.	(REVISED LIST.)	Cts.
1.	Discussion on Prayer. D. M. Bennett and two Clergymen.	3
2.	Oration on the Gods. Ingersoll.	10
3.	Thomas Paine. "	5
4.	Arraignment of the Church. Ingersoll.	5
5.	Heretics and Heresies. "	5
6.	Humboldt, "	5
7.	The Story of Creation. Bennett.	5
8.	The Old Snake Story. "	2
9.	The Story of the Flood. "	5
10.	The Plagues of Egypt. "	2
11.	Korah, Datham, and Abiram. [illegible]nnett.	2
12.	Balaam and his Ass. "	2
13.	Arraignment of Priestcraft. "	3
14.	Old Abe and Little Ike. Syphers.	3
15.	Come to Dinner. "	2
16.	Fog Horn Documents. "	2
17.	The Devil Still Ahead. "	2
18.	Slipped Up Again. "
19.	Joshua Stopping the Sun and Moon. D. M. Bennett.	5
20.	Samson and his Exploits. Bennett.	2
21.	The Great Wrestling Match. "	2
22.	Discussion with Elder Shelton. "	10
23.	Reply to Elder Shelton's Fourth Letter. D. M. Bennett.	3
24.	Christians at Work. Wm. McDonnell.	5
25.	Discussion with Geo. Snode. Bennett.	5
26.	Underwood's Prayer.	1
27.	Honest Questions and Honest Answers. D. M. Bennett.	5
28.	Alessandro di Cagliostro. C. Sotheran.	10
29.	Paine Hall Dedication Address. B. F. Underwood.	2
30.	Woman's Rights & Man's Wrongs. Syphers.	2
31.	Gods and God-houses. "	2
32.	The God's of Superstition and the God of the Universe. D. M. Bennett.	3
33.	What has Christianity Done? Preston.	3
34.	Tribute to Thomas Paine. "	2
35.	Moving the Ark. D. M. Bennett.	1
36.	Bennett's Prayer to the Devil.	2
37.	Short Sermon. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	1
38.	Christianity not a Moral System. X. Y. Z.	3
39.	The True Saint. S. P. Putnam.	3
40.	Bible of Nature vs. The Bible of Men. J. Syphers.	3
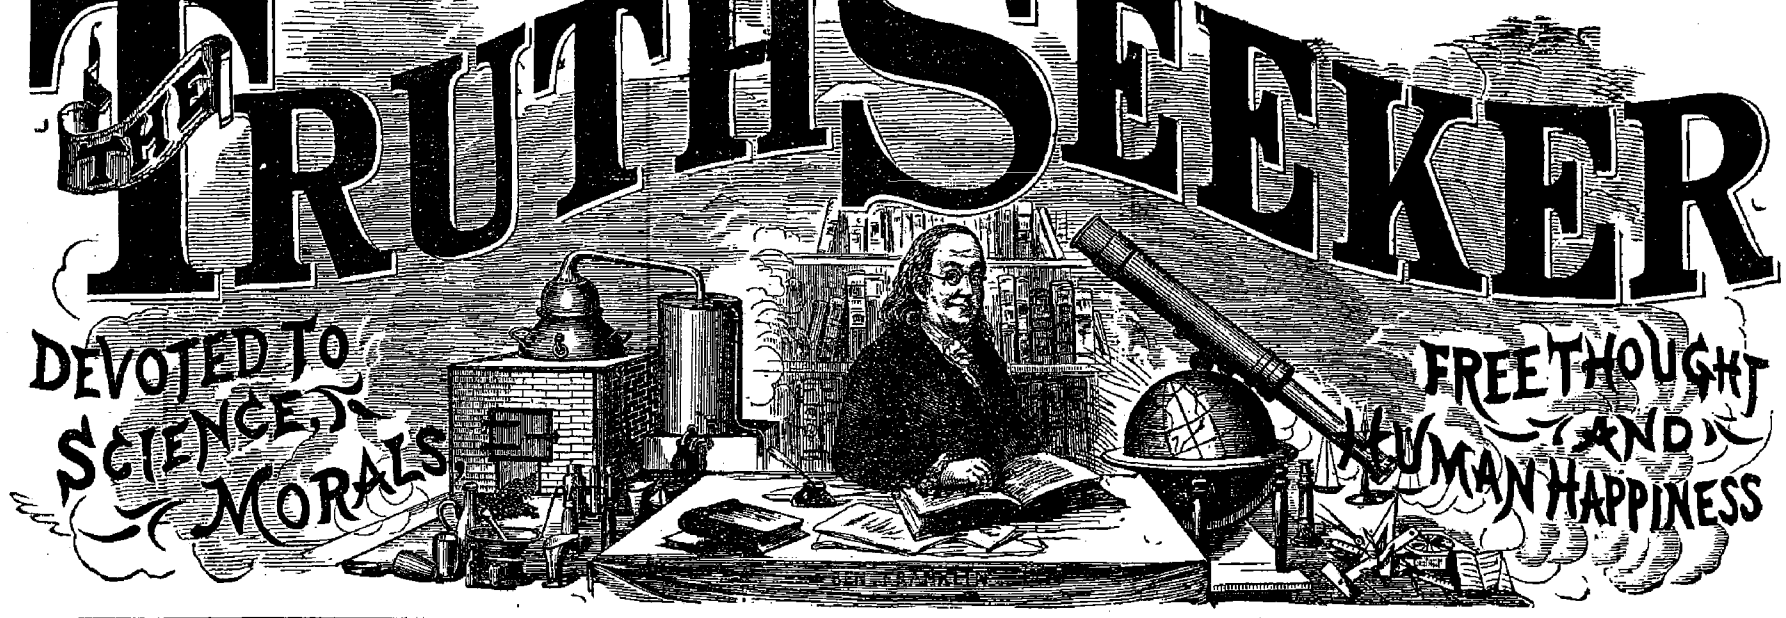
41.	Our Ecclesiastical Gentry, Bennett.	1
42.	Elijah the Tishbite. "	3
43.	Christianity a Borrowed System. "	3
44.	Design Argument Refuted. Underwood.	2
45.	Elisha the Prophet. Bennett.	3
46.	Did Jesus Really Exist? "	3
47.	Cruelty and Credulity of the Human Race. Dr. Daniel Arter.	5
48.	Freethought in the West. G. L. Henderson.	5
49.	Sensible Conclusions. E. E. Guild.	3
50.	Jonah and the Big Fish. D. M. Bennett.	1
51.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets. No. 1.	5
52.	Marples-Underwood Debate, Underwood.	3
53.	Questions for Bible Worshipers. B. F. Underwood.	2
54.	An Open Letter to Jesus Christ, Bennett.	5
55.	The Bible God Disproved by Nature. W. E. Coleman.	3
56.	Bible Contradictions.	1
57.	Jesus Not a Perfect Character. Underwood.	2
58.	Prophecies.	2
59.	Bible Prophecies Concerning Babylon. B. F. Underwood.	2
60.	Ezekiel's Prophecies Concerning Tyre. B. F. Underwood.	2
61.	History of the Devil. Isaac Paden.	5
62.	The Jews and their God. "	10
63.	The Devils Due-Bills. John Syphers.	3
64.	The Ills we Endure—their Cause and Cure, D. M. Bennett.	2
65.	Short Sermon No. 2. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	2
66.	God Idea in History. H. B. Brown.	5
67.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets No. 2.	5
68.	Ruth's Idea of Heaven and Mine. Susan H. Wixon.	2
69.	Missionaries. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	2
70.	Vicarious Atonement. J. S. Lyon.	3
71.	Paine's Anniversary. C. A. Codman.	3
72.	Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. D. M. Bennett.	2
73.	Foundations. John Syphers.	3
74.	Daniel in the Lion's Den. Bennett.	2
75.	An Hour with the Devil. "	10
76.	Reply to Erastus F. Brown. D. M. Bennett.	3
77.	The Fear of Death. D. M. Bennett.	5
78.	Christmas and Christianity. D.M.Bennett.	5
79.	The Relationship of Jesus, Jehovah, and the Virgin Mary. W. E. Coleman.	2
80.	Address on Paine's 139th Birthday, Bennett.	5
81.	Hereafter, or the Half-way House. John Syphers.	1
82.	Christian Courtesy. Bennett.	2
83.	Revivalism Examined. Dr. A. G. Humphrey.	5
84.	Moody's Sermon on Hell. Rev. J. P. Hopps, London.	2
85.	Matter, Motion, Life and Mind. Bennett.	10
86.	An Enquiry about God's Sons. "	2
87.	Freethought Judged by its Fruits. B. F. Underwood.	1
88.	David, God's Peculiar Favorite. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	3
89.	Logic of Prayer. Charles Stephenson.	3
90.	Bible-Mania. Otter Cordates.	2
91.	Our Ideas of God. B. F. Underwood.	1
92.	The Bible; is it Divinely Inspired? Dr. D. Arter.	5
93.	Obtaining Pardon for Sins. Hudson Tuttle.	1
94.	The New Raven. Will Cooper.	5
95.	Jesus Christ. D. M. Bennett.	10
96.	Ichabod Crane Papers.	10
97.	Special Providences. W. S. Bell.	2
98.	Snakes. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.	2
99.	Do the Works of Nature prove a Creator? Sciota.	5
100.	The Old and the New. R. G. Ingersoll.	5
101.	110th Anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday, Bennett et als.	5
102.	The Old Religion and the New. W. S. Bell.	1
103.	Does the Bible Teach us all we Know. Bennett.	2
104.	Evolution of Israel's God. A. L. Rawson.	10
105.	Decadence of Christianity. Capphro.	2
106.	Franklin, Washington and Jefferson Unbelievers. Bennett.	2
107.	The Safe Side. H. B. Brown.	5
108.	The Holy Bible a Historical Humbug. S. H. Preston.	1
109.	Ghosts. Ingersoll, 4 pp.	5
110.	Materialistic Prayer. Bennett, 4 pp.	1
111.	Reply to Scientific American. Bennett.	1
112.	Sensible Sermon. Savage, 8 pp.	2
113.	Come to Jesus. Bennett, 8 pp.	2

SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

1.	Hereditary Transmission. Prof. Louis Elsberg, M.D.	5
2.	Evolution; from the Homogeneous to the Heterogeneous. B. F. Underwood.	3
3.	Darwinism. B. F. Underwood.	3
4.	Literature of the Insane. F. R. Marvin.	5
5.	Responsibility of Sex. Mrs. Chase, M.D.	3
6.	Graduated Atmospheres. J. McCarroll.	2
7.	Death. Frederic R. Marvin, M.D.	5
8.	How do Marsupial Animals Propagate their kind? A. B. Bradford.	5
9.	The Unseen World. Prof. John Fiske.	10
10.	The Evolution Theory — Huxley's Three Lectures.	10
11.	Is America the New World? L. L. Dawson.	10

Discount on one dollar's worth 10 per ct. off; on two dollars' worth 20 off; on five dollars' worth 40 off; on ten dollars' worth 50 off.

As few or as many of any given kind may be ordered as desired.



RADICAL BOOKS.

SENT POST PAID AT THE PRICES ANNEXED.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

Age of Reason. Paine. Paper covers.	25
" " " Cloth "	50
" " and Ex. of Proph. Paper 50; cl.	75
A Few Days in Athens. Frances Wright.	70
Apocryphal New Testament.	1 25
An Eye Opener. Paper, 50; cloth,	75
Antiquity of Christianity. Alberger,	25
Analysis of Religious Belief. Viscount Amberly. $3.00, 4.00, and	4 50
Apples of Gold. Susan H. Wixon.	1 50
Anti-Theological Lectures. Rev. R. Taylor.	2 00
Antiquity and Duration of the World.	25
Astronomy and Worship of the Ancients.	25
A. J. Davis' Entire Works,	27,00
Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub.	15
Bible in India. Jacolliot.	2 00
Buckle's History of Civilization. 2 Vols., 8vo.	4 00
Burgess-Underwood Debate. 50 and	80
Bible in the Balance. Fish.	1 00
Bacon's Novum Organum.	2 00
Bhagvad-Gita, or Dialogues of Christna and Arjuna.	1 75
Buechner's Man, Present and Future.	4 00
Christianity before Christ. Craven.	25
Chapters from the Bibles of the Ages.	1 50
Criticism on the Theoligical Idea of Deity.	1 00
Childhood of Religion. Clodd.	1 25
Childhood of the World. Clodd, 40 and	60
Christianity and Materialism. Underwood.	15
Cause of Religious Ideas. Tuttle,	1 00
Conway's Sacred Anthology.	4 00
Colenso on the Pentateuch, Abstract of.	25
Devil's Pulpit, Rev. Robt. Taylor,	2 00
Diegesis "	2 00
Denton's Irreconcilable Records,	50
" Our Planet, Past, Present, and Future,	1 50
" Radical Rhymes.	1 25
" Who are Christians, Deluge,
Denton's Common Sense Thoughts, Be Thyself, What is Right? Man's True Saviors, Sermon from Shakspere's Text, God Proposed, Spiritualism True, Orthodoxy False. 10 cents each.
Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science,	1 75
" Intellectual Development of Europe, 2 vols.,	3 00
Darwin's Origin of Species,	2 00
" Descent of Man, (Impr'd Ed.)	3 00
Descent and Darwinism, Schmidt,	1 50
Einstein's Origin of Religious Ideas,	1 00
Exeter Hall, Wm. McDonnell,	50 & 80
Errors of the Bible, Wright,	35 & 60
Essence of Religion. Fuerbach. 40 and	80
Eight Scientific Tracts.	20
Frothingham's Religion of Humanity,	1 50
" Child's Book of Religion,	1 00
" Stories of the Patriarchs,	1 00
" Safest Creed,	1 50
" Transcendentalism in New England,	2 50
Faraday's Various Forces of Nature.	2 00
Fiske's Myths and Myth-Makers.	2 00
God Idea in History, Tuttle,	1 25
Good Sense, D'Holbach,	1 00
Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages,	2 50
" Lost and Hostile Gospels.	3 25
Graves' Sixteen Crucified Saviors.	2 00
" Biography of Satan.	60
Grey's Enigmas of Life.	2 00
" Creeds of Christendom. 2 Vols.	7 50
Heroines of Freethought, Mrs. Underwood,	1 75
Heathens of the Heath, McDonnell.	1 00 & 150
Hume's Essays and Treatises,	1 50
Huxley's Lay Sermons,	1 75
" Man's Place in Nature,	1 25
" Critiques and Addresses,	1 50
History of all Religions Sects. Evans.	1 00
Haeckel's History of Creation. 2 Vols,	5 00
Hollick's Nerves and the Nervous.	1 00
Humboldt's Works.
Ingersoll's Gods and other Lectures. 30 and	50
" " etc., Large Edition.	1 25
Influence of Christianity on Civilization.	25
Infidels' Text Book, Cooper.	1 00
Jehovah Unveiled.	35
Jamieson's Clergy a Source of Danger.	1 00
Josephus' Complete Works.	2 50
Johnson's Oriental Religions. 8vo.	5 00
John's Way.	15
Kneeland's Review.	1 00
" Hymns.	35
Koran, with Notes and Life of Mahomet.	2 75
Lecky's Rationalism in Europe. 2 Vols.	4 00
" History of European Morals.	6 00
Life of Thomas Paine. Blanchard. p 50; cl	75
Lewes' Biographical History of Philosophy.	3 50
" Problems of Life and Mind.	3 00
Lizzie Doten's Poems of Progress, and Inner Life, each	150
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization.	2 00
" Pre-Historic Times Illustrated,	6 00
Lyell's Elements of Geology, 770 cuts,	3 40
" Principles " " 2 vols. and maps,	3 00
Monks and Popes. Alberger.	1 00
Morley's Life of Voltaire,	2 00
Martyrdom of Man. Winwood Reade.	3 00
Peeble's All Around the World.	2 50
" Seers of the Ages.	2 50
Plato's Divine and Moral Works,	2 20
Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion,	30 & 50
Physical Man, Tuttle.	1 50
Paine's Common Sense.	12
" Crisis. Paper, 50; cloth	30
" Rights of Man. Paper, 50; cloth	30
" Theological Works, with portrait	1 50
" " " paper,	1 00
" Political Works, cloth,	1 50
" Great Works Complete. Crown octavo, with life and portrait.	3
" Political Works, steel portrait.	1
" Life, by Calvin Blanchard with portrait Paper, 50; cloth	75
Parturition without Pain,	1 00
Plain Home Talk and Medical Common Sense, E. B. Foote, M.D.,	1 50
Proctor's Six Lectures on Astronomy,	20
Reason, the only Oracle of Man. Ethan Allen	60
Syntagma, Taylor,	1 00
System of Nature, D'Holbach,	2 00
Self-Contradictions of the Bible,	25
Studying the Bible, Mrs. Slenker,	75
Spencer's (Herbert) Entire Work,
Strauss' Old Faith and New,	2 00
" New Life of Jesus, 2 vols.,	12 00
Supernatural Religion, 2 Vols., 8vo.,	8 00
Sexual Physiology. Trall,	2 00
Talleyrand's Letter to Pope Pius vii.	25
Tyndall' (Prof. John) Entire Works,
The Christ of Paul,	2 00
The Case against the Church,	75
The Relations of the Sexes. Mrs. Duffey,	2 00
The Voices, Warren Sumner Barlow.	1 25
The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers. Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 5
The Champions of the Church, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 50
Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, etc., 75 &	1 00
Truth Seeker Tracts, Vols. I, II, III, and IV., by the lot, 50 &	75
The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations,	75
The Outcast, Winwood Reade,	30
Talks with My Patients. Mrs. Gleason, M.D.,	1 50
Underwood-Marples Debate.	35 & 60
Underwood's Twelve Tracts,	20
Vestiges of Creation.	75
Volney's Ruins,	1 00
Volney's New Researches in Ancient History.	1 50
Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.	3 00

THE TRUTHSEEKER

Vol. 5. No. 10. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, March 9, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

It is estimated that 3,500,000 tons of ice will be cut in Maine this winter.

There is no hell now, it being unable to compete with Scranton and Pittsburgh.

"Who was the author of the Psalms?" asked the Sunday-school teacher of a little girl. "I know, ma'am. It was Sam."

Dr. Dureea of Brooklyn says, "vulgar Universalism" is dead. He raps the knuckles of Talmage for what Talmage said of Canon Farrar.

A hopeful minister says he thinks that the time will come when the members of the church choir will behave just as well as other people.

As though there were not already enough men preachers and women preachers, a boy preacher is busily conducting revival services in Indianapolis, and drawing large throngs.

In Urbana, Ohio, the young ladies are holding revival meetings, which are attended principally by persons of their own sex. Yet the young men come to see them home, and do it with great success.

A negro preacher described hell as icy cold, where the wicked freeze to all eternity. Asked why, he said, "'Cause I don't dare tell dem people nuffin else. Why, if I say hell is warm, some dem ole rheumatic niggers be wantin' ter go down dere de very fus' fros'."

We learn from the Ottumwa Times that the female voters of Cheyenne, Wyoming, have the exclusive use of the hotel reading-room on election and caucus days, thus doing away with the old objection to their "having to encounter insults from rude men at the polls."

A creditor in Kentucky tried to get an attachment on the ground that his debtor had said, "I am going to sell out and go to hell," thus justifying a belief that he intended to quit the State. The justice decided that the remark was no indication that the debtor meant to go out of Kentucky.

Boston has a society for the Elevation of the Stage, but it is undecided how to begin the work indicated by its title. At an Episcopal convocation in that city, the Rev. Mr. Winslow suggested that the society should send a committee to witness the different entertainments and decide which might be visited by Christians. This is the same plan proposed by the Rev. Mr. Graves for the investigation of the prostitution question.

The Rev. Simeon Dixon, formerly pastor of Bishop chapel at South Third and Eleventh streets, Brooklyn, was before Justices Elliott and Gluck, in that city on Saturday last, charged with being the unlawful father of a child of whom Sarah Williams, a member of his flock, is the mother, whom he had promised to marry. He is about twenty-eight years of age and is said to be gay and fascinating. The decision in the case was reserved.

The Maine House of Representatives has refused, by a vote of 117 to 25, to pass a bill allowing apothecaries to have in their possession spirituous liquors for compounding medicines. It is claimed, however, that as apothecaries already have the right under the State Pharmacy act to keep all "medicines and poisons authorized by the United States Dispensatory and Pharmacopœia," they may keep spirituous liquors, though the same act provides that the sale of liquors is not authorized thereby. The question must be decided in the courts, and in the meantime a druggist who has brandy on hand will be liable to punishment.

Nature's Laws and God's Decrees.—The Independent of Feb. 7th admits a great deal when it asks, "What is the Bible and the Christian doctrine of hell? It is absolutely nothing more than nature has always taught everybody, Bible or no Bible. It is only that the same law holds in the moral world which in the physical world science has formuluted as the last and best result of all her investigations—the law of the persistency of force. . . . The laws of nature will not fail. Causes will inevitably produce their effects. Goodness brings bliss, badness brings misery." What do we want of a man-made bible or so-called revelation to tell us what are nature's inducements to life of purity and justice which is its own reward?

The Pittsburgh ministers do not seem to be particularly happy over the Rev. Leonard Woolsey Bacon, who has temporarily become one of them, and whose well-known and excessive fondness for thinking differently from other people sometimes vexes them. At a recent meeting of the Temperance Alliance, Mr. Bacon made a speech in opposition to the views of the prohibitionists. This brought upon him the wrath of the other brethren, which found expression in a speech by the Rev. Mr. Brown. Brown characterized Bacon as an enemy to the cause, and a man whose views of Christianity were so low that he ought to step down and out of the pulpit. One of the brethren moved that the Baconian speech be printed in the Liquor Men's Advocate. This made Mr. Bacon so angry that he quit the house.

The nature of Jesuitism in this country may be inferred from the following clipping from the New York Sun of the 4th inst.: "The mission which for the past two weeks has been conducted by the Jesuit missionaries in the Church of the Transfiguration in Hooper street, Williamsburgh, was closed last night with a solemn and impressive act. The great multitude at the command of the Rev. F. Damen arose, and in clear, loud tones, repeated after him the creed, the profession of their faith. Then the missionary, arrayed in his vestments, again ascended the altar, holding aloft a large crucifix. They at his command, with hands uplifted, repeated with him this solemn oath: 'I do solemnly promise and swear to live and die in the Roman Catholic faith. I do solemnly promise and swear before Almighty God to shed the last drop of my heart's blood before I will give up any article of faith of the Holy Roman Catholic Church, so help me God.'"

The Congregationalists of Illinois are in a snarl over the affairs of Wheaton College and the church at Wheaton. Brother Chapman charged President Blanchard with stealing $3,000 of college money. Prof. Webster charged President Blanchard with slandering him. Brethren generally charged President Blanchard with using course and vulgar language. Blanchard charged Chapman with falsehood and slander in what he said about the "diverted" $3,000. A council met to consider these and several other things, but failed to reach any decided result. One of the propositions before this council was to dissolve the Wheaton church. This the council declared its inability to do, however desirable it might seem to break up such a nest of ecclesiastical hornets. The various Congregational papers have taken the matter up, and are now holding a free council over it, with no particular prospect of satisfying anybody. The combatants on each side accuse the other side of lying; and also, incidentally of "theit, misappropriation, slander, bribery, autocracy, hypocrisy," and several other things.

The Illustrated Christian Weekly is evidently favoring the important study of stirpiculture when it says, "A writer in the Evangelist gives particulars of Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll's early life, from which it appears that his own mother died when he was very young; that he had two step-mothers, neither of whom lived with his father any length of time, the cause being violence of temper and austerities on his father's part, though the father was a Christian minister and a revivalist of much power and success. The writer narrates these events to show how an unhappy childhood may bear fruit in later life." What are we to conclude from these profound expressions, in view of the well-known fact that Mr. Ingersoll is one of the happiest and best "family men" alive; who is devoted to his wife and children, believes in the morality of home influences, and "hates the hell idea?" It would not be strange if the above narration of his father's hypocritical and inconsistent life is true, if he hated him (as he evidently would have cause to), who attempted to inaugurate a little hell on earth for him to live in. We can account for "Bob's" good humor and exemplary moral life, only on the ground that he resembles his step-mother!

A mission church in Lebanon, Pa., occupies a frame building, and is enjoying a revival The other evening the mourners crowded the anxious bench in great numbers, and there was such unusual fervor that the congregation manifested their enthusiasm by stamping on the floor, as well as by wringing their hands and shouting hallelujah. These proceedings might have resulted happily if the church had been founded on a rock. But the light frame structure was so greatly jarred that the stovepipe suddenly parted and fell to the floor, discharging soot on the heads of some of the worshipers, and filling the place with smoke and dust. For a little while the confusion was frightful. The mourners ceased their mourning, and pushed for the door with as great alacrity as the rest of the people. Some of the sisters, in their haste to escape, ran against the stove and nearly upset it. Lamps were knocked down by the falling stovepipe, and thus the sacred edifice narrowly escaped combustion. Hallelujah gave place to hullabaloo. After most of the people had got out of the house those who remained restored order, and continued what was left of the meeting. But the glory of the occasion had departed, and it was generally agreed that a falling stovepipe was not a means of grace.

Brother Moody continues his severe denunciations of the people who try to help the Church with oyster suppers, fairs, amateur theatricals, and the circus business generally. He says that some of these things do, indeed, attract the worldly people, but that the effect is to lower the standard of Christianity, and make the Church more worldly than it ought to be. He insists that the Church loses by this far more than it can hope to gain. A singular feature of the way in which Moody is regarded by his followers is seen in the manner in which they regard his advice on this matter. They all agree to what he says, and while they continue in his meetings do not hold fairs, circuses, shows, or oyster suppers. But as soon as his meetings are over they turn their backs and do according to their own sweet will. It is a notorious fact that the three principal churches in Brooklyn which gave him the most conspicuous support are those which engage in the biggest festivities. So it has been in most other places, and to a very noteworthy extent in Philadelphia. It is natural enough, too. The great strain on these good people during the Moody meetings must be followed by a wholesome degree of relaxation. Careful observation shows that a little of what some of the brethren are pleased to call "worldliness" must enter into the life of every reasonable Christian.

A Much Married Minister.—The Springfield, Ill., papers contain full details of the matrimonial achievements of the Rev. J. McWells, alias Chenowith, who is now confined in jail in that city, awaiting trial. His first marriage was in Ohio, where he lived with his wife seven years. One day he left suddenly and was seen there no more. He went to Iowa and acted as class leader in a Methodist church. He married one of the sisters and lived with her two years, when he left her to journey alone, while he took another wife in Manchester, Scott county, Ohio, and led a gay life. After seven months he became very pious and joined the Church anew. He joined the Baptists this time and was soon licensed to preach, when he deemed it prudent to take for his fourth wife a Miss Ruth Clement, and he devoted himself to the work of the ministry, preaching in some eight different towns. In the fall of 1855 his Manchester wife died, and in the following July he married a Miss Wrightsman, of Auburn. In 1874 he got into serious financial difficulty, and left Auburn. He changed his name and passed himself off as the Rev. Mr. Chenowith, preaching at Aurora. Then he married again. He next returned to his former home, Ohio, and found his first wife had got a divorce from him and married again, and that her husband had died, leaving her some property. Our hero made love again to his first wife, protested that he was unmarried, and promised all sorts of faithfulness. They were re-married, when he tried to get possession of her property. She refused; he treated her cruelly, and she left him. He returned to Aurora, forged the name of one of the deacons, and fled. The friends of his Aurora wife pursued him, caught him, and locked him up.

Events of the Week.

Gold is down to 101¼.

Silver is remonetized.

Ben Wade died on the 2d inst.

The insurrection in Greece is spreading.

Money can be had on call in this city at 4 to 5 per cent.

A second cable has been successfully laid between Jamaica and Cuba.

Active preparations are being made at the mint for the coinage of the new silver dollar.

An incendiary fire in Portsmouth, N. H., on the 4th inst., destroyed $10,000 worth of property.

Pope Leo was crowned on the 3d inst. Cardinal Franchi has been appointed Secretary of State.

The business part of the town of Hot Springs, Ark., was destroyed by fire on the night of the 4th inst.

The Freethinkers of Chicago talk of erecting an immense Temple of Freethought and securing the services of Col. Ingersoll as a regular preacher.

We are having very pleasant weather in this section for this time of year. Winter touched us lightly this year, and now spring is upon us with all the mildness imaginable.

The President has nominated Albert Gallatin Porter, of Indianapolis, for the position of First Comptroller of the Treasury. The nomination has been confirmed by the Senate.

The Senate has confirmed the following nominations: Bayard Taylor, Minister to Germany; John Baker, of Illinois, Minister to Venezuela; and Wm. C. Goodloe, of Kentucky, Minister to Belgium.

The Catholic bishop of Vancouver's Island is establishing missions in Alaska. He will have to preach a cold hell to the Alaskans. The old-fashioned hell would have no terrors for a half-frozen native of that country.

A row took place at a colored people's revival meeting in New Jersey, on last Sunday evening, in which razors played a leading part. The blood in which the participants were baptized was not drawn from Immanuel's veins. How those Christians do love one another!

The Turco-Russian war is ended. A treaty of peace has been signed. Russia takes the lion's share of Turkey in Europe and sixty millions of dollars as her price for fighting the "holy war." The question concerning the possession of the Dardanelles has been reserved for further consideration.

The House Committee on Banking and Currency have agreed to report a postal savings-bank bill. Deposits may be made as low as twenty-five cents, for which postal orders are to be issued. These orders may be converted, in sums of ten dollars each, into "postal savings bonds of the United States." If this bill becomes a law it will be a great convenience to the people, and will make savings banks as safe as the United States Government.

The medical superintendent of the New York State Lunatic Asylum, Dr. Strew, has been experimenting upon the unfortunate inmates of that institution with music instead of medicine. He has had a band giving concerts in the Asylum, and the effects upon the patients are said to be marvelous. Dr. Strew is so convinced of the magical curative power of music that he intends to introduce regular musical treatment, to be applied, in certain cases, in place of medicine.

The Spanish authorities in Cuba assert that the insurrection is suppressed and the war ended, but they appear to be fighting as fiercely as ever there yet. The Cuban army appears to be ignorant of the fact that they have been conquered, so they keep on fighting. The insurrection has been suppressed about four times a year for the last eight or nine years, but it does not appear to stay suppressed more than fifteen minutes at a time, and Spain is constantly sending new armies to Cuba. It is time some outside assistance was given to the brave Cubans in their struggle for liberty.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER III.—Continued.

"It's no laughing matter, Myra, I am sure. Only think for how many generations that book has been the guide and stay of our race, and how it has been loved, worshiped, and idolized. Rivers of blood have been shed in its defense, and millions of money spent in its support. It is no light thing to think of its dethronement, even if it does embody some errors and misstatements.

"That good old Book of Life
For centuries has stood
Unharmed amid the strife
When the earth was drunk with blood;

And wouldst thou scorn it now?
And have its truths forgot?
Skeptic, forbear thy blow!
Thy hand shall harm it not.

It's very name recalls
The happy hours of youth,
When in my grandsire's halls
I heard it's tales of truth.

I've seen his white hair flow
O'er that volume as he read;
But that was long ago;
The good old man is dead.'

"It's a serious thing, Myra dear, to rob people of their idols and destroy their faith in all that has been most sacred to them. I, too, have been wondering and thinking much of late; but the more I think, the more I tremble at the idea of going deeper beneath the surface of things so long held in reverence by all the civilized world. I love to see every one happy, joyous, and hopeful, and would bear a great deal rather than be the cause of inflicting sorrow or pain on a single individual. But should I by any means lose my faith in God and religion, I should then feel it my duty to teach and preach against both just as strongly as I have hitherto worked for their advancement, even though I knew I was giving pain rather than pleasure; for I should be conscious that in the end truth would bring happiness—thorny though the road might be that led thereto."

"You are right in all you say, Edith. The question is a serious one, and I mean to study at it till I feel satisfied one way or the other; but I must go, now, and get father's supper," said Myra, and bidding Edith good evening, she hastened home, and was surprised on going in to find Mr. Darwin there talking with her father as if they were old friends. She shook hands with him, telling him she was glad he had come; for her father had been wishing to make his acquaintance, but his professional practice left him very few hours of leisure for social visits with his neighbors.

"Yes," said Mr. Darwin, "I was aware of that; for I heard he had a wide practice, and as we are rarely any of us ill, I knew I should not be apt to see him unless I came on purpose. I find, too, that we are distantly related, as Mr. Scott's grandfather was from my native town, and a cousin of my grandmother's."

"Oh, I'm glad of that," said Myra; "for now we shall feel as if we had a claim on you, and can come and see you ever so often."

"You will always be very welcome," said Mr. Darwin. "We are plain, every-day people, and like to be sociable and friendly with our neighbors. The actual pleasures of life are made up mainly of little things, and social intercourse with those whose company is pleasant to us is one of the greatest of enjoyments."

"I always like to go where people talk sense," said Myra; "and that is why I like to visit your family. They don't just gossip about their neighbors, and dress, and such little frivolities, but converse, as men do, of science, philosophy, and the more important things of life."

"You see, Mr. Darwin," said the doctor, smiling, "Myra is not like the generality of women. She has been brought up more as a boy would be, having only her father for teacher, companion, and associate, and a housekeeper to do the work till she was old enough to take charge herself; and so she has grown to like men's ways in many respects better than she does those of her own sex, and she almost forgets sometimes that she is a gentle, loving woman," and the old man patted the curly head that rested upon his knee. "But she is a good girl, and a good housekeeper for all that, as you will see for yourself if you come here as often as I hope you will."

Myra now rose and prepared the supper, and the three drew their chairs about the little round table, and partook of the simple fare. Light bread, fresh butter, canned fruits, custard, apple jelly, sweet-cakes, and milk; but all were the very best of their kind, proving Myra to be, as her father had said, a thoroughly good housekeeper.

"We eat light suppers," said the doctor; "but few sorts at once, and but little in quantity, as sleep is much more refreshing when the stomach has but little to do."

"That is the correct doctrine, according to my way of thinking," said Mr. Darwin. "Some people say, eat but two meals a day, and no supper, but I never could think it a good plan to go so long without eating. Not only is one apt to over-eat at breakfast, after so protracted a fast, but as the stomach gets empty, the gastric juices begin to attack the membrane and coatings, and this causes irritation and often inflammation. I never hear of a child being punished by depriving it of a meal but I wish the ignorant parent could look with a physician's eye, and see the state of the little stomach which is suffering from need of its wonted nourishment. I long for the great and glorious day to come when all punishments shall forever cease, and men become wise, gentle, thoughtful, and good. The world is full of unavoidable aches and pains, and people have to undergo suffering enough without inflicting it upon themselves. There was a time when men thought that the more they crucified the flesh, the nearer they were to heaven; but now they have evoluted beyond that, and the sooner they progress on past all desire to inflict wilful pain upon others, the better it will be for the world."

"I don't know but you are right, Mr. Darwin, but if you are, you will have man wiser than his maker, for God punishes the guilty here and hereafter."

"Are you sure of that?" asked Mr. Darwin, smiling.

"The Bible says so, and so we have always been taught," said Mr. Scott; "but as you do not believe in the Bible as a criterion of truth, nor in a god either, Myra tells me, perhaps you do not think there will be any future punishment. But you must own that the wicked are punished here, as we see evidence of that every day."

"I see no evidence of punishment in nature. It is only ignorant man that has ever punished, ever revenged himself upon his unfortuate fellows, and perhaps the lower animals also sometimes do something of the kind. But nature never does. If the wicked or wrong-doing meet with sorrow and misfortune, it is generally because of their having trampled upon the moral and physical laws of their being. We are taught that a thing is wrong, and whether it be wrong or not, if we only believe it to be so, we always suffer in conscience if we perpetrate the deed. Our associates find out our moral delinquency, and blame and shun us for it, and that afflicts us even if they mete out no actual punishment for our offense. If we touch fire, it burns us, not as a punishment, but only as a necessity of the situation. If we would suffer no pain from excess of heat, we should be apt to maim or murder ourselves by too great an application of it, both inwardly and outwardly. Do you suppose the Brooklyn theatre was burned as a punishment to either actors, owners, or those who were there to enjoy the play? No! it was a natural sequence of causes that might have been remedied had proper caution been observed in regard to the danger of fire under such circumstances."

"You may be right, Mr. Darwin, but I confess I can't see how one can get along and never punish. Would you let a robber and murderer go free and escape all punishment for their crimes upon society?"

"Certainly I should, if I were sure they would 'go and sin no more,' for the past would be irremediable, and what would be the use of punishing for that which could not be undone again? You might say, to reform the criminal, but if it has been ascertained that kindness has a far better effect upon wrong-doers than any form of punishment could possibly have; and it is certainly more pleasant to do good than harm, even to a man who has broken every moral and social law in the calendar. If the patient (for all who commit wilful wrongs are morally sick) be one from whom more overt acts of criminality are to be expected, it is best to put him in a place of confinement, not as a punishment, but as a safe-guard against future injuries he might perpetrate upon others. But even in this confinement he should be allowed every privilege that is possible, every means of enjoyment or improvement that is practicable; for what a man is, does not depend upon himself, but upon his nature and environments, so why punish him for the unavoidable?"

"And have you raised all three of your children, Mr. Darwin, upon this plan of no punishment?"

"I used to punish Willie and Rose when they were small, and they were often slapped, scolded, and otherwise abused, just as most children are by young and ignorant parents. But by the time Minnie was born we had grown wiser, and she has never known what it is to be punished, struck, or harshly blamed; and as a consequence of this, her disposition and temper, are sweet, gentle, and tender, and love guides her every action."

"But how do you control them and keep them under subjection?"

"By persuasion, reason, and criticism. Wilful wrong they rarely do; and if they err ignorantly, a knowledge of the better way, kindly presented, is all that is needed to induce them to do right in future."

[TO BE CONTINUED].

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.—CONTINUED.

CHAPTER VII.—Continued.

PROPAGATION OF MONERA.

Just as simple as the process of nutrition is the propagation of these primitive creatures, which in reality we can neither call animals nor plants. All Monera propagate themselves only in an asexual manner by monogony; and in the simplest case, by that kind of monogony which we place at the head of the different forms of propagation, that is, by self-division. When such a little globule, for example a Protamœba or a Protogenes, has attained a certain size by the assimilation of foreign albuminous matter, it falls into two pieces; a pinching in takes place, contracting the middle of the globule on all sides, and finally leads to the separation of the two halves. Each half then becomes rounded off, and now appears as an independent individual, which commences anew the simple course of the vital phenomena of nutrition and propagation. In other Monera (Vampyrella), the body in the process of propagation does not fall into two, but into four equal pieces, and in others, again (Protomonas, Protomyxa, Myxastrum), at once into a number of small globules of mucus, each of which again, by simple growth, becomes like the parent body. Here it is evident that the process of propagation is nothing but a growth of the organism beyond its own individual limit of size.

The simple method of propagation of the Moneron by self-division is, in reality, the most universal and most widely spread of all the different modes of propagation; for by the same simple process of division, cells also propagate themselves. Cells are those simple organic individuals, a large number of which constitute the bodies of most organisms, the human body not excepted. With the exception of the organisms of the lowest order, which have not even the perfect form of a cell (Monera), or during life only represent a single cell (many protista and single-celled plants), the body of every organic individual is composed of a great number of cells. Every organic cell is to a certain degree an independent organism, a so-called "elementary organism," or an "individual of the first order." Every higher organism is, in a measure, a society or a state of such variously shaped elementary individuals, variously developed by division of labor. Originally every organic cell is only a single globule of mucus, like a Moneron, but differing from it in the fact that the homogeneous albuminous substance has separated itself into two different parts, a firmer albuminous body, the cell-kernel (nucleus), and an external, softer albuminous body, the cell-substance or body (protoplasma). Besides this, many cells later on form a third (frequently absent) distinct part, inasmuch as they cover themselves with a capsule, by exuding an outer pellicle or cell membrane (membrana). All other forms of cells, besides these, are of subordinate importance, and are of no further interest to us here.

SELF-DIVISION OF CELLS.

Every organism composed of many cells was originally a single cell, and it becomes many-celled owing to the fact that the original cell propagates itself by self-division, and that the new individual cells originating in this manner remain together, and by division of labor form a community or state. The forms and vital phenomena of all many-celled organisms are merely the effect or the expression of all the forms and vital phenomena of all the individual cells of which they are composed. The egg, from which most animals and plants are developed, is a simple cell.

The single-celled organisms, that is, those which during life retain the form of a single cell, for example the Amœbæ, as a rule propagate themselves in the simplest way by self-division. This process differs from the previously described self-division of the Moneron only in the fact that at the commencement the firmer cell-kernel (nucleus) falls into two halves, by a pinching in at its middle. The two young kernels separate from each other and act now as two distinct centres of attraction upon the surrounding softer albuminous matter, that is, the cell-substance (protoplasma). By this process finally the latter also divides into two halves, and there now exist two new cells, which are like the mother cell. If the cell was surrounded by a membrane, this either does not divide at all, as in the case of egg-cleavage, or it passively follows the active pinching in of the protoplasm; or, lastly, every new cell exudes a new membrane for itself.

The non-independent cells which remain united in communities or states, and thus constitute the body of higher organisms, are propagated in the same manner as are independent single-celled organisms, for example, Amœba. Just as in that case, the cell with which most animals and plants commence their individual existence, namely, the egg, multiplies itself by simple division. When an animal, for instance a mammal, develops out of an egg, this process of development always begins by the simple egg-shell forming an accumulation of cells by continued self-division. The outer covering, or cell membrane, of the globular egg remains undivided. First, the cell-kernel of the egg (the so-called germinal vesicle) divides itself into two kernels, then follows the cell-substance (the yolk of the egg). In like manner, the two cells, by continued self-division, separate into four, these into eight, into sixteen, thirty-two, etc., and finally there is produced a globular mass of very numerous little cells. These now, by further increase and heterogeneous development (division of labor), gradually build up the compound, many-celled organism. The egg of a mammal might as well be that of a man as of an ape, dog, horse, or any other placental mammal.

Now, when one examines this simplest form of propagation, this self-division, it surely cannot be considered wonderful that the products of the division of the original organism should possess the same qualities as the parental individual. For they are parts or halves of the parental organism, and the matter or substance in both halves is the same, and as both the young individuals have received an equal amount and the same quality of matter from the parent individual, one can but consider it natural that the vital phenomena, the physiological qualities, should be the same in both children. In fact, in regard to their form and substance, as well as to their vital phenomena, the two produced cells can in no respect be distinguished from one another, or from the mother cell. They have inherited from her the same nature.

But this same simple propagation by self-division is not only confined to simple cells—it is the same also in the higher many-celled organisms; for example, in the coral zoophytes. Many of them which exhibit a high complexity of composition and organization, nevertheless, propagate themselves by simple division. In this case the whole organism, with all its organs, falls into two equal halves as soon as by growth it has attained a certain size. Each half again develops itself, by growth, into a complete individual. Here, again, it is surely self-evident that the two products of division will share the qualities of the parental organism, as they themselves are, in fact, halves of that parent.

PROPAGATION BY FISSION.

Next to propagation by division we come to propagation by the formation of buds. This kind of monogony is exceedingly widely spread. It occurs both in the case of simple cells (though not frequently) and in the higher organisms composed of many cells. The formation of buds is universal in the vegetable kingdom, less frequent in the animal kingdom. However, here also it occurs in the tribe of Plant-like Animals, especially among the Coral Zoophytes, and among the greater portion of the Hydroid Polyps very frequently, further also among some worms (Planarian Worms, Ring-Worms, Moss Animals, Tunicates). Most branching animal-trees or colonies, which are exceedingly like branching plants, arise like those plants, by the formation of buds.

Propagation by the formation of buds (Gemmatio) is essentially distinguished from propagation by division in the fact that the two organisms thus produced by budding are not of equal age, and therefore at first are not of equal value, as they are in the case of division. In division we cannot clearly distinguish either of the two newly produced individuals as the parental, that is, as the producer, because, in fact, both have an equal share in the composition of the original parental individual. If, on the other hand, an organism sends out a bud, then the latter is the child of the former. The two individuals are of unequal size and of unequal form. If, for instance, a cell propagates itself by the formation of buds, we do not see the cell fall into two equal halves, but there appears at one point of it a protuberance, which becomes larger and larger, more or less separates itself from the parental cell, and then grows independently. In like manner we observe in the budding of a plant or animal that a small local growth arises, on a part of the mature individual, which growth becomes larger and larger, and likewise more or less separates itself from the parental organism by an independence in its growth. The bud, after it has attained a certain size, may either completely separate itself from the parental individual, or it may remain connected with it and form a stock or colony, whilst at the same time its life may be quite independent of that of its parent. While the growth which starts the propagation, in the case of self-division, is a total one affecting the whole body, it is in the formation of buds only partial, affecting merely a portion of the parental organism. But here, also, the bud—the newly-produced individual which remains so long most directly connected with the parental organism, and which proceeds from it—retains the essential qualities and the original tendency of development of its parent.

THE DEATH OF NERO.—Nero wandered out into the streets of Rome, knocked at the doors of friends; none would answer or let him in. He came back to his bedroom, called for Spicillus the gladiator to kill him, but Spicillus was gone. "What!" said he to Epaphroditus, his Secretary, who had now joined him, "have I neither friend nor foe?" and he rushed out again to throw himself into the Tiber; but his courage failing him, and his reason growing clear once more in the face of appalling calamity, he wished for some quiet place where he might consider his strange and sudden position, and collect his thoughts for death. With his head muffled up, and covering his face with a handkerchief, dressed only in a tunic, with an old soiled cloak thrown over his shoulder, he trudged along barefoot in the gloom of the early twilight, accompanied by Phaon, Sporus, and Epaphroditus. As these four slunk out of the Nomentane gate together like common wayfaring men, they could hear the soldiers in the Prætorian camp on their right cursing Nero the beast, and hailing Galba as Father of his country, "They are in pursuit of Nero," said a man as he passed them. "Any news in the city about Nero," asked another. There was no time to spare. They found him a broken-down horse, which he mounted, and they hurried on. At last they reached the villa of Phaon, parched with thirst; the Emperor lapped up some water with his hands from a running tank, with the bitter jest, "This is Nero's diluted water," He crept quietly into the house on all-fours through a hole in the wall, and threw himself on the first mattress, prostrate with hunger, misery, and fatigue. Then he ordered a grave to be dug before his eyes, for he refused to fly. He bade them to pave the pit with marble, and, weeping theatrically, he prepared, surrounded by his only remaining friends, to play his last act. "What an artist is now about to perish!" he exclaimed, but ere the words had left his lips a dispatch from Rome arrived, which he snatched out of Phaon's hands. He read it and shuddered. He had been condemned by the Senate to be beaten to death, and dragged by the heels, and flung into the Tiber. Seizing two daggers he felt their points. Greek verses occurred to him, and he began to recite. He begged Sporus to set up a wail for him—to kill him—to kill himself first. At this moment the tramping of horses and clash of armed men were heard below. He broke out in a verse from the Iliad: "The noise of swift-heeled steeds assail my ear." In another moment he would be taken alive. "Come then, courage man!" he cried, and feebly pushed the point of the dagger into his throat. But his nerve was gone, and Epaphroditus came to his help and pressed it home. The guards burst in and would have seized him. "Is this your fidelity?" he murmured, and expired, with staring eyes to the terror of all who beheld him. It was his last pose, and, as the end of such a life, it could not have been outdone. "Is this your fidelity?" "He had never made a better comic hit," writes M. Renan. "Nero uttering a melancholy plaint over the wickedness of the age, and the disappearance of good faith and virtue! Let us applaud! as the drama is ended and the curtain falls. Once in history, O Nature, with a thousand masks, thou hast had the wit to find an actor worthy of such a role!"—Good Words.

The Ethics of Religion.—Continued.

BY W. K. CLIFFORD, F.R.S.

And Seneca says the same thing, with still more reason in his day and country: "What else is this appeal to the precedent of the gods for, but to inflame our lusts, and to furnish license and excuse for the corrupt act under the divine protection?" And again, of the character of Jupiter as described in the popular legends: "This has led to no other result than to deprive sin of its shame in man's eyes, by showing him the god no better than himself." In Imperial Rome, the sink of all nations, it was not uncommon to find "the intending sinner addressing to the deified vice which he contemplated a prayer for the success of his design; the adulteress imploring of Venus the favors of her paramour; . . . the thief praying to Hermes Dolios for aid in his enterprise, or offering up to him the first-fruits of his plunder; . . . youths entreating Hercules to expedite the death of a rich uncle" (North British Review, 1867, p. 284).

When we reflect that criminal deities were worshiped all over the empire, we cannot but wonder that any good people were left; that man could still be holy, although every god was vile. Yet this was undoubtedly the case; the social forces worked steadily on wherever there was peace and a settled government and municipal freedom; and the wicked stories of theologians were somehow explained away and disregarded. If men were no better than their religions, the world would be a hell indeed.

It is very important, however, to consider what really ought to be done in the case of stories like these. When the poet sings that Zeus kicked Hephaistos out of heaven for trying to help his mother, Plato says that this fiction must be suppressed by law. We cannot follow him there, for since his time we have had too much of trying to suppress false doctrines by law. Plato thinks it quite obviously clear that God cannot produce evil, and he would stop everybody's mouth who ventured to say that he can. But in regard to the doctrine itself, we can only ask, "Is it true?" And that is a question to be settled by evidence. Did Zeus commit this crime, or did he not? We must ask the apologists, the reconcilers of religion and science, what evidence they can produce to prove that Zeus kicked Hephaistos out of heaven. That a doctrine may lead to immoral consequences is no reason for disbelieving it. But whether the doctrine were true or false, one thing does clearly follow from its moral character; namely, this, that if Zeus behaved as he is said to have behaved he ought not to be worshiped. To those who complain of his violence and injustice, it is no answer to say that the divine attributes are far above human comprehension, that the ways of Zeus are not our ways, neither are his thoughts our thoughts. If he is to be worshiped, he must do something vaster and nobler and greater than good men do, but it must be like what they do in its goodness. His actions must not be merely a magnified copy of what bad men do. So soon as they are thus represented, morality has something to say. Not indeed about the fact; for it is not conscience, but reason, that has to judge matters of fact; but about the worship of a character so represented. If there really is good evidence that Zeus kicked Hephaistos out of heaven, and seduced Alkmene by a mean trick, say so by all means; but say also that it is wrong to salute his priests or to make offerings in his temple.

When men do their duty in this respect, morality has a very curious indirect effect on the religious doctrine itself. As soon as the offerings become less frequent, the evidence for the doctrine begins to fade away; the process of theological interpretation gradually brings out the true inner meaning of it, that Zeus did not kick Hephaistos out of heaven, and did not seduce Alkmene.

Is this a merely theoretical discussion about far-away things? Let us come back for a moment to our own time and country, and think whether there can be any lesson for us in this refusal of common-sense morality to worship a deity whose actions are a magnified copy of what bad men do. There are three doctrines which find very wide acceptance among our countrymen at the present day: the doctrines of original sin, of a vicarious sacrifice, and of eternal punishments. We are not concerned with any refined evaporations of these doctrines which are exhaled by courtly theologians, but with the naked statements which are put into the minds of children and of ignorant people, which are taught broadcast and without shame in denominational schools. Father Faber, good soul, persuaded himself that after all only a very few people would be really damned, and Father Oxenham gives one the impression that it will not hurt even them very much. But one learns the practical teaching of the Church from such books as "A Glimpse of Hell," where a child is described as thrown between the bars upon the burning coals, there to writhe for ever. The masses do not get the elegant emasculations of Father Faber and Father Oxenham; they get "a Glimpse of Hell."

Now to condemn all mankind for the sin of Adam and Eve; to let the innocent suffer for the guilty; to keep any one alive in torture for ever and ever: these actions are simply magnified copies of what bad men do. No juggling with "divine justice and mercy" can make them anything else. This must be said to all kinds and conditions of men: that if God holds all mankind guilty for the sin of Adam; if he has visited upon the innocent the punishment of the guilty; if he is to torture any single soul for ever, then it is wrong to worship him.

But there is something to be said also to those who think that religious beliefs are not indeed true, but are useful for the masses; who deprecate any open and public argument against them, and think that all skeptical books should be published at a high price; who go to church, not because they approve of it themselves, but to set an example to the servants. Let us ask them to ponder the words of Plato, who, like them, thought that all these tales of the gods were fables, but still fables which might be useful to amuse children with: "We ought to esteem it of the greatest importance that the fictions which children first hear should be adapted in the most perfect manner to the promotion of virtue." If we grant to you that it is good for poor people and children to believe some of these fictions, is it not better, at least, that they should believe those which are adapted to the promotion of virtue? Now, the stories which you send your servants and children to hear are adapted to the promotion of vice. So far as the remedy is in your own hands, you are bound to apply it; stop your voluntary subscriptions and the moral support of your presence from any place where the criminal doctrines are taught. You will find more men and better men to preach that which is agreeable to their conscience, than to thunder out doctrines under which their minds are always uneasy, and which only a continual self-deception can keep them from feeling to be wicked.

Let us now go on to inquire what morality has to say in the matter of religious ministrations, the official acts and the general influence of a priesthood. This question seems to me a more difficult one than the former; at any rate it is not so easy to find general principles which are at once simple in their nature and clear to the conscience of any man who honestly considers them. One such principle, indeed, there is, which can hardly be stated in a Protestant country without meeting with a cordial reponse; being indeed that characteristic of our race which made the Reformation a necessity, and became the soul of the Protestant movement. I mean the principle which forbids the priest to come between a man and his conscience. If it be true, as our daily experience teaches us, that the moral sense gains in clearness and power by exercise, by the constant endeavor to find out and to see for ourselves what is right and what is wrong, it must be nothing short of a moral suicide to delegate our conscience to another man. It is true that when we are in difficulties, and do not altogether see our way, we quite rightly seek counsel and advice of some friend who has more experience, more wisdom begot by it, more devotion to the right than ourselves, and who, not being involved in the difficulties which encompass us, may more easily see the way out of them. But such counsel does not and ought not to take the place of our private judgment; on the contrary, among wise men it is asked and given for the purpose of helping and supporting private judgment. I should go to my friend, not that he may tell me what to do, but that he may help me to see what is right.

Now, as we all know, there is a priesthood whose influence is not to be made light of, even in our own land, which claims to do two things: to declare with infallible authority what is right and what is wrong, and to take away the guilt of the sinner after confession has been made to it. The second of these claims we shall come back upon in connection with another part of the subject. But that claim is one which, as it seems to me, ought to condemn the priesthood making it in the eyes of every conscientious man. We must take care to keep this question to itself, and not to let it be confused with quite different ones. The priesthood in question, as we all know, has taught that as right which is not right, and has condemned as wrong some of the holiest duties of mankind. But this is not what we are here concerned with. Let us put an ideal case of a priesthood which, as a matter of fact, taught a morality agreeing with the healthy conscience of all men at a given time, but which, nevertheless, taught this as an infallible revelation. The tendency of such teaching, if really accepted, would be to destroy morality altogether, for it is of the very essence of the moral sense that it is a common perception by men of what is good for man. It arises, not in one man's mind by a flash of genius or a transport of ecstasy, but in all men's minds, as the fruit of their necessary intercourse and united labor for a common object. When an infallible authority is set up, the voice of this natural human conscience must be hushed and schooled, and made to speak the words of a formula. Obedience becomes the whole duty of man; and the notion of right is attached to a lifeless code of rules, instead of being the informing character of a nation. The natural consequence is that it fades gradually out, and ends by disappearing altogether. I am not describing a purely conjectural state of things, but an effect which has actually been produced at various times and in considerable populations by the influence of the Catholic Church. It is true that we cannot find an actually crucial instance of a pure morality taught as an infallible revelation, and so in time ceasing to be morality for that reason alone. There are two circumstances which prevent this. One is that the Catholic priesthood has always, practically, taught an imperfect morality, and that it is difficult to distinguish between the effects of precepts which are wrong in themselves and precepts which are only wrong because of the manner in which they are enforced. The other circumstance is that the priesthood has very rarely found a population willing to place itself completely and absolutely under priestly control. Men must live together and work for common objects even in priest-ridden countries; and those conditions which, in the course of ages, have been able to create the moral sense, cannot fail in some degree to recall it to men's minds and gradually to reinforce it. Thus it comes about that a great and increasing portion of life breaks free from priestly influences, and is governed upon right and rational grounds. The goodness of men shows itself in time more powerful than the wickedness of some of their religions.

The practical inference is, then, that we ought to do all in our power to restrain and diminish the influence of any priesthood which claims to rule consciences. But when we attempt to go beyond this plain Protestant principle, we find that the question is one of history and politics. The question which we want to ask ourselves, "Is it right to support this or that priesthood?" can only be answered by this other question, "What has it done or got done?"

In asking this question, we must bear in mind that the word priesthood, as we have used it hitherto, has a very wide meaning, namely, it means any body of men who perform special ceremonies in the name of religion; a ceremony being an act which is prescribed by religion to that body of men, but not on account of its intrinsic rightness or wrongness. It includes, therefore, not only the priests of Catholicism, or of the Obi rites, who lay claim to a magical character and powers, but the more familiar clergymen or ministers of Protestant denominations, and the members of monastic orders. But there is a considerable difference, pointed out by Hume, between a priest, who lays claim to a magical character and powers, and a clergyman, in the English sense, as it was understood in Hume's day, whose office was to remind people of their duties every Sunday, and to represent a certain standard of culture in remote country districts. It will, perhaps, conduce to clearness if we use the word priest exclusively in the first sense.

There is another confusion which we must endeavor to avoid if we would really get at the truth of this matter. When one ventures to doubt whether the Catholic clergy has really been an unmixed blessing to Europe, one is generally met by the reply, "You cannot find any fault with the Sermon on the Mount." Now, it would be too much to say that this has nothing to do with the question we were proposing to ask, for there is a sense in which the Sermon on the Mount and the Catholic clergy have something to do with each other. The Sermon on the Mount is admitted on all hands to be the best and most precious thing that Christianity has offered to the world; and it cannot be doubted that the Catholic clergy of East and West were the only spokesmen of Christianity until the Reformation, and are the spokesmen of the vast majority of Christians at this moment. But it must surely be unnecessary to say, in a Protestant country, that the Catholic Church and the Gospel are two very different things. The moral teaching of Christ, as partly preserved in the first three gospels, or—which is the same thing—the moral teaching of the great Rabbi Hillel, as partly preserved in the Pirkè Aboth, is the expression of the conscience of a people who had fought long and heroically for their national existence. In that terrible conflict they had learned the supreme and overwhelming importance of conduct; the necessity, for those who would survive, of fighting manfully for their lives and making a stand against the hostile powers around; the weakness and uselessness of solitary and selfish efforts; the necessity for a man who would be a man to lose his poor single personality in the being of a greater and nobler combatant—the nation. And they said all this, after their fashion of short and potent sayings, perhaps better than any other men have said it before or since. "If I am not for myself," said the great Hillel, "who is for me? And if I am only for myself, where is the use of me? And if not now, when?" It would be hard to find a more striking contrast than exists between the sturdy, unselfish independence of this saying, and the abject and selfish servility of the priest-ridden claimant of the skies. It was this heroic people that produced the morality of the Sermon on the Mount. But it was not they who produced the priests and the dogmas of Catholicism. Shaven crowns, linen vestments, and the claim to priestly rule over consciences—these were dwellers on the banks of the Nile. The gospel indeed came out of Judea, but the Church and her dogmas came out of Egypt. Not, as it is written, "Out of Egypt have I called my son," but, "Out of Egypt have I called my daughter." St. Gregory of Nazianzum remarks with wonder that Egypt, having so lately worshiped bulls, goats, and crocodiles, was now teaching the world the worship of the Trinity in its truest form.* Poor, simple St. Gregory! it was not that Egypt had risen higher, but that the world had sunk lower. The empire, which in the time of Augustus had dreaded, and with reason, the corrupting influence of Egyptian superstitions, was now eaten up by them, and rapidly rotting away.

Then, when we ask what has been the influence of the Catholic clergy upon European nations, we are not inquiring about the results of accepting the morality of the Sermon on the Mount; we are inquiring into the effect of attaching an Egyptian priesthood, which teaches Egyptian dogmas, to the life and sayings of a Jewish prophet.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Lessons in Popular Science.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.
BY D. M. B.

Introduction.

Astronomy is the most ancient of the physical sciences, and may be regarded as the basis of all the other branches of science. It embraces the study of all of the universe that is visible, including the planet we inhabit. It is the grandest of all the sciences, and the most elevating in character to the human mind. Its origin among the ancients is lost in antiquity. The rising and setting, as well as other motions of the heavenly bodies early attracted the attention of man. They were greatly revered by the inhabitants of earth, and the sun and moon as well as some of the most brilliant stars were worshiped and prayed to as controlling the destinies of the human family.

Of course, crude and erroneous ideas were the first entertained by the unlearned ancients, and it was only the observation and experience of centuries that enabled them to approximate the truth as to the sizes, distances, and forms of the heavenly bodies, as well as to the form of our own earth. The idea entertained for thousands of years was, that the earth was the center of the universe and much the largest body in it; that it was a vast extent of country, undulating but flat; that it was stationary, and that the sun, moon, and stars passed around it every twenty-four hours. But with increased knowledge and attentive observation these mistakes were, in time, removed, and more truthful conclusions arrived at. In the words of Laplace:

"The spectacle of the firmament must have taken the attention of primitive man, especially in countries where the serenity of the air lent to the observation of the stars. In the pursuit of agriculture he must have needed to know the various seasons and to be able to prognosticate their recurrence. He would soon have discovered that the rising and setting of the principal stars at the moment of their plunging within the solar rays or of their emerging therefrom facilitated him in his purpose. Thus it is that we find the traces of astronomical observations dating back to such a remote period in the history of every nation."

Some nations, have distinguished themselves more than others in astronomical investigations. The Chinese, Egyptians, and the Babylonians were distinguished for their proficiency in this grand study. The Hindoos were also noted for their explorations in the limitless fields of the universe, and here they exhibited marks of their contemplative mind. The ancient Chaldeans were attentive students of astronomy. The study of the stars was the basis of their religion and their worship. The learned priesthood of that country ascended to the tops of their highest mountains, where they offered sacrifices to the heavenly bodies and rendered thereto the most devout service. The religion of Zoroaster had an intimate connection with a study of the sun, moon, and stars.

The Chinese, in their early studies in astronomy, celebrated the epoch of the solstice, having invented a sphere representing the vault of the starry heavens, and divided it into sections. They were acquainted with the use of the dial, and measured time by the aid of the clepsydra. They manufactured astronomical instruments for various purposes, and calculated eclipses with remarkable accuracy; and this some two thousand years before our era.

The Greeks obtained from the more ancient nations the knowledge of astronomy. It is claimed of Pythagoras that he taught that the sun was the real centre of the heavenly bodies, and that the earth and planets revolved around it. This anticipation of the discoveries of Copernicus—which seem later to have been lost—points him out as one of the greatest minds that ever lived.

The later Greek astronomers nearly rejected many of the vague speculations of older times, but proved themselves careful observers of their times and, as has truthfully been observed, made astronomy worthy the name of science. From the Greek school of the astral science has descended many of the views upon the subject that are current in our own time. Were it not, however, for the almost total absence of a historic record, we could, doubtless, trace back to the ancient Chaldeans many of the views entertained by scholars in the present age of the world. On the plains of Chaldea the zodiac was mapped out and the constellations named many hundred years before the commencement of critical observations took place; and when these marked an advanced stage of development among the eminent Grecian astronomers, it must be admitted that Hipparchus held an eminent position. Indeed, he has been called the father of this science. His observations of the heavenly bodies were more accurate than those of any of his predecessors. He determined the laws of the apparent motion of the planets and prepared tables by which these motions could be calculated. He has been credited with being the first propounder of the theory of epicyclic motions of the planets, commonly called after the name of the celebrated Ptolemy of Alexandria, who lived some three centuries later.

Among the ancient nations, the Hebrews seemed to have the least knowledge of the grand science of astronomy of any nation. They paid little or no attention to its study, and from their history and literature we learn they were extremely ignorant upon the subject. In what are called their sacred writings, scarcely a word is spoken which indicates that they had any acquaintance with the science of astronomy, save a few passages which occur in Job, which book is acknowledged not to be of Hebrew origin, but is believed by many to have been borrowed from Chaldea by the Jews. The allusions therein made to the heavenly bodies are among the grandest in the entire Bible. In other branches of education, it is only fair to observe, they were also far behind other nations which surrounded them. In marauding warfare and internal contentions, they were perhaps adepts, but in the study of the sciences they did not distinguish themselves.

In the progress that from century to century has been made in the knowledge that men have possessed of the starry universe, the various stages of development may very properly be divided into three schools or systems. 1. What is called the Ptolemaic system, though which more properly should be attributed to Hipparchus, who lived three centuries earlier. In this system the earth was held to be stationary, as has been observed, with the sun, moon, planets, and stars revolving around it; 2. The Copernican system, which teaches that the sun is the center of the solar system, and that its planets and stars course around it, revolving also upon their own axes. This system effectually struck a death blow to the theologies of ancient times, and opened the door for the establishment of true science or demonstrated fact in place of dogmas and superstition; 3. The Newtonian system, taught by Sir Isaac Newton, who lived in the seventeenth century, in which all the celestial motions are explained by the one law of universal gravitation. Some more modern scientists disagree with Newton as to gravitation being the sole cause of the motion of the heavenly bodies. Doubtless the other forces inherent in the universe, light, heat, magnetism, attraction, repulsion, etc., play their part also in the grand machinery of the countless starry worlds on high.

Previous to entering into the consideration of the study of astronomy proper, the three systems here indicated will be taken up and briefly examined in the order here given. It is probable that in no science which man has investigated has the steady progress of the race been more correctly marked from age to age than in the science under consideration.

* See Sharpe, "Egyptian Mythology and Egyptian Christianity," p. 114.

When an observer views the starry hosts on a clear night, he notices that the heavenly bodies move from hour to hour. By observing from month to month, and from year to year, he will perceive that material changes in location have been made. By combining the observations thus made, he naturally enough adopts the Ptolemaic theory. The passage then to the Copernican system is not difficult. When the facts are presented to the mind, the transit is perfectly easy. It consists in showing that certain oscillations, common alike to the sun and planets, are due to the revolutions of the earth around the sun, and that the apparent revolutions of the celestial spheres arise from the rotation of the earth on its own axis. The laws of the motions of the planets, as perfected by Kepler and Newton, will be duly presented as we proceed in our investigations.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Correspondence Extraordinary.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. VI.

MY DEAR READERS: I do not wish to detain you too long with my recital about my brother Jah and myself getting up a universe full of matter from the great expanse of nothing. My object is only to give you as comprehensive an idea of the difficult process as is possible under the circumstances. Let me tell you, then, that after making the third grand journey to the confines of space, through which we darted like rays of light, traveling hundreds of thousands of miles in a second, and loading up as before with the still attenuated matter, which by our marvelous process we had succeeded in manufacturing, and returning with the velocity of electricity to headquarters with the extensive samples, and putting our freight through the same wonderful process employed on the two former occasions, our labors were attended with the same or similar extraordinary results. We again produced a form of matter which, though still aerial, was some tenfold denser than before. From our previous experience this result was not unexpected, but we nevertheless rejoiced greatly. And Jah said to me:

"Luce, we have succeeded beyond my most sanguine expectations. We have worked hard for a long period of time; now let us take a good rest and talk over matters, and decide what we shall do next."

"Very good, my brother," said I. "I do not object to taking a rest with you; and while we are enjoying ourselves I will give you my views about our future operations. I have been calculating the thing in my own mind, and have come to the conclusion that we have now got our aerial fluid or vapor to a consistency that will justify our beginning to gather it together in bodies or spheres. There is so much of this thin matter—and it extends beyond all extent, there is such a profundity of it in every direction—that I have concluded we can now begin to get up a vast quantity of worlds, but of course they will have to be great distances apart so as not to interfere with each other."

"How do you think, my dear Brother," said Jah, "that we can get this thin form of matter we have now made into a solid form so that it will answer for worlds suitable for living beings to dwell upon?"

"We will have to adopt," said I, "a process by which we can concentrate thick air into spheres, keeping them suitable distances apart. I think if we use the forces which we have gotten up in attracting this thin matter together, the masses thus aggregated will from the first be charged with an increased amount of those same forces, and the globes thus formed will assume motion and activity. Another thing has occupied my attention, and that is the getting up a diversity of kinds of matter. Now it is homogeneous—all alike—while it inherently possesses the ability or elements to produce varied forms and substances; and it is not yet accomplished, it is all one thing. We must get up a great variety of substances. We want gases, fluids, and solids. These we will call primates or simple substances, and from these we can get up any quantity of compound and varied forms."

"Oh, Luce," said Jah, "what a long head you have got, to be sure. When you put your studying cap on, you can just think out grander projects and processes than I have ever been able to conjure up. Your mind is deep and active. I could not get along in this grand enterprise without your valuable aid. But tell me, Brother, how do you think we can succeed in getting up several different kinds of substances from one general homogeneous aeriform mass? and how can we make these combine so as to produce interminable compounds?"

"Ah, Jah, leave that to me," I answered, "Those subtle forces which we have brought into existence, I see are capable of producing wonderful results. By manipulating them in an occult and skilful manner, establishing polarities, positive and negative influences, action and reaction, and currents within currents, I believe the thing can be done."

Thus did my brother and myself rest and talk. It flattered me, of course, when he complimented upon my shrewdness and deep thought, and if I am not mistaken I have maintained, with considerable credit these qualities to this day.

After we had passed in repose the time that would be equal to a few weeks, we rolled up our sleeves and girded our loins—speaking after the manner of men—and we applied ourselves to the task before us. We spent several weeks in experimenting upon the feasibility of manipulating the subtle forces already alluded to, and creating centres or foci, which would gradually attract the surrounding aeriform matter. We found that by concentrating these subtle forces upon a given point, and by afterwards correllating them into attraction, that we could establish such a powerful magnet that the thin matter would be drawn thereto for hundreds and thousands of miles. Here was another great point gained.

The next experiments consisted in getting up the fundamental primates, of which all forms of matter are compounded; and this was accomplished by such a dextrous use and manipulation of the subtle and invisible forces we had at command that I presume I shall not be able to make the matter perfectly clear to your minds. It was not, however, until after the making of thousands of experiments that we succeeded in evolving hydrogen, nitrogen, oxygen, chlorine, carbon, sulphur, phosphorous, potassium, sodium, magnesium, aluminum, calcium, iodine, manganese, iron, lead, mercury, silver, gold, platinum, and all the other metals, common and rare, from the homogeneous composite mass that before existed. And I may as well tell you that we did not fully succeed in achieving this until the fluid mass had been attracted together in a semi-solid state; and even then it required a great deal more of labor and attention than I have the patience to explain to you.

The first necessity to be met was locating the centres for suns, worlds, and constellations. To accomplish this, Jah and I started out, and, by a system of measurement we had adopted, we laid out the vast territory before us into divisions of immense magnitude, and in each we started a world, a sun, a star, a system, or a constellation of suns and systems, according to dimensions. Having thus decided where to start our suns, worlds, and spheres, setting the powers and forces into operation by which contiguous matter was attracted, we prosecuted a very extensive campaign through the entire domain of boundless space, starting constellations, systems, suns, planets, moons, and satellites on every hand, in all possible directions. This work was so important, and required such a vast amount of practical ability, that we deemed it best to go together; for you must know that Brother Jah confessed to me that he did not feel able to accomplish the arduous task of sun and world making without my aid. I saw he felt decidedly more sure of success when I was with him. It would, doubtless, be considered vain in me to tell you all the compliments he paid me during that long campaign. He praised me for my activity, for my quickness of apprehension and comprehension, for my great energy and industry, for my practical talent, for my refined judgment, and for my capability of overcoming all obstacles that might oppose us. Of course I paid him an equal number of compliments, and expatiated upon his devotion to the work in hand, his far-seeing penetration, his wonderful discernment, his ability to adapt means to ends, and his willingness to coöperate with me in the extraordinary enterprise we had undertaken.

We did not literally go forth hand in hand, but we journeyed side by side, and toiled with a will, and heartily seconded each other's efforts. Sometimes we failed to take the same view of things, and questions arose as to where we should locate a new sun, or at what point we should establish another system or an additional constellation; and not unfrequently we came to emphatic expressions of opinion. High words were indulged in on a few occasions; but, knowing my Brother's irascible turn and his predisposition to dictation and authority, I usually gave way to him, and let him have his notions gratified without opposition. Even if I was sure he was headstrong and his judgment at fault, I was so much in favor of peace and quietness that I yielded gracefully, which I knew to be the wiser part. In this way some conspicuous blunders were made in the size and location of suns and worlds. I feel confident, that if I had insisted on the execution of my plans, it would have been better for several of the solar systems and worlds. But I have always been for peace, and am yet.

It is hardly necessary for me to tell you that this job of star-manufacturing and world-making was one of the most extensive contracts I ever engaged in. We worked hard at it, and stuck to it early and late from year's end to year's end, from century to century, and from millennium to millennium. O dear! we worked so hard and got so wearied that it almost makes me tired now to think of it. And, lest my letter may weary you in a corresponding degree, I will close right here, and bid you, for another week, an affectionate adieu. Your own LUCIFER,

Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Answers to Inquirers.

J. H. G.—How are dog and cat skins tanned? Ans.—Dog and cat skins are tanned in the same manner as other skins, only they being small and thin it does not take so long for the tan to penetrate. If you want to tan them into leather, remove the fat and hair, and clean with lime-water, then with water acidulated with sulphuric acid, so as to open the pores; then immerse in a bath of dissolved tannic acid, or an infusion of oak or hemlock bark. Let them remain in about a fortnight, then they may be dressed and grained.

I.—What is Bismarck's religious belief? Ans.—We learn from a German journalist of this city—a gentleman conversant with affairs in Prussia—that Bismarck is just such a Protestant as Lincoln was; that is, he is really an Infidel, but his position at the head of the Government compels him, from motives of policy, to keep his ideas upon religious subjects to himself. As the State policy of Prussia is closely allied to Protestantism in its opposition to the Papal power, Bismarck is generally considered a Protestant; but his opposition to Catholicism does not arise from any love of Protestantism, but simply from a desire to keep the power of the State above and superior to the power of any and every Church.

J. D. R.—A dispute has arisen among a party of young men as to who killed Jesus Christ. Some of the party contend that it was the Jews, and some that it was the Romans. We leave it to you. Please answer, and oblige a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Ans.—The Romans were rulers in Jerusalem at the date referred to, and, as the Jews had not the power to condemn persons to death, it, of course, was the Roman governor who sentenced Jesus to death, and it was Roman soldiers who executed him. They were Jews, however, who performed the mean part of informing upon Jesus and procuring his trial, conviction, and death. They were the Comstocks of the time, and performed the mean and ignominious part of spies, detectives, and informers—that is, of course, if the events ever occurred.

SENECA.—Does joining the United States army make one a citizen of the United States? Ans.—No. Any adult foreigner whose native country is at peace with the United States may become a naturalized citizen only upon the following conditions: 1. Provided, after three years' residence in the United States, he shall declare his intention to that effect (according to a form provided by law); 2. Provided he shall have resided one year within the State where the court is held to which he makes his application; 3. Provided he shall have sustained a good moral character up to the time of his admission; 4. Provided he shall have satisfied the court, and declared on oath, that, during the three years prior to his application, it was his real intention to become a citizen and to uphold the laws and Constitution of the United States. In becoming a citizen he must renounce all allegiance forever to his native country, and also every title or order of nobility, if he have any.

N. S.—1. Did Col. Ingersoll have an attendance at his lecture in Gilmore's Garden of less than 200? and if so, what was the reason? Ans.—The attendance at Ingersoll's lecture in Gilmore's Garden was a little over three hundred. The reasons for this slim attendance were many. The night was very inclement, cold and wet, and Gilmore's Garden is a large, barn-like structure, formerly used for a circus. People don't care to sit in a cold, comfortless building on a stormy night to hear even so eloquent a speaker as Col. Ingersoll. When he lectured in Chickering Hall every seat was full, and even the standing room was all occupied, and hundreds were turned away, unable to gain admittance. 2. Is Girard College run in the interest of the Church now? and if so, how long has it been so? Ans.—Within the past few years the Church has gained such an ascendancy over the management of Girard College that the express stipulations made in the will of Girard have been violated, and now a chapel is being built on the college grounds. Girard tried to establish an Infidel college, and donated five or six millions of dollars for that purpose, but the Christians, knowing that their religion cannot live unless it is drilled into its professors by constant teaching, have seized on the college, and henceforth the students of that institution will have to learn from their arithmetic that two units and one unit are three units, and, at the same time, learn from their Bible that two gods and one god are but one god. As it now stands, Girard College is a monument to the nobleness of an Infidel and the perfidy of the Christians. It is to be hoped that the students of that institution will not imbibe the spirit of moral rectitude exhibited by its managers in converting it from its original purpose.

KINSFOLK, friends and dead ones salute who, far-traveled, returns home safe—so the good deeds done welcome him who, going from this world, enters the other.

The Radical Pulpit.

The Sectarian Spirit.

A SERMON BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The subject of my discourse this morning is the sectarian spirit. I wish you to carefully distinguish between sectarianism and the spirit of sectarianism. They are very different things. There is no special harm, or need be none, in sectarianism. Sectarianism means merely a division of opinion upon subjects where opinion is open. It comes with freedom of thought. We find it in every department of philosophy, in the region of science and of history. There are schools of art, of painting, of sculpture, of architecture. Those schools are properly sects, aiming to educate people in the peculiar views of culture which the men of the school represent. Sectarianism, therefore, meaning simply difference of opinion, difference in the interpretation of facts or in the proportions of knowledge, does not necessarily imply evil feeling or intention. Nay, the opinions may be warmly held and vigorously professed, with the spirit of conviction, with very intense emotion, and still no harm may exist. So long as it is remembered that the object of pursuit is truth and truth only; so long as there is no conflict for party triumph but simply a zeal for the prevalence of knowledge, the sects may respect one another in the attainment of a common object.

The sectarian spirit is another thing. This has not ceased to prevail in philosophy, in science, even in history; and wherever it does prevail it is an unmixed evil; for the sectarian spirit is the spirit of strife, bitterness, partisan envy, and jealousy; it is the spirit of mutual conflict. It leads directly to persecution; it ends usually in violence. Still, all over the domain of human inquiry the sectarian spirit is rapidly passing away. It is rebuked in the scientific world. It is under reprobation in the philosophical world; now, almost everywhere, men of ability and character may pursue truth in the spirit of truth, may hold their convictions with warmth of feeling, may advocate them with intensity of expression, always remembering that their view is not the only view, that however well founded and important it may seem to them, other views may seem equally reasonable and essential to other people.

But in the department of religion, sectarianism still holds its own and is always associated with the sectarian spirit. Where sectarianism prevails, there the evil of sectarianism prevails, over the extent of the religious world, in Christendom and out of it; the saints fight each other. And it is this spirit of contention, of antagonism deepening into hate, which drops the one bitter drop of gall into the cup of sectarian division, and makes it a fatal poison. I say everywhere, I say from first to last, from centre to circumference, sectarianism and the sectarian spirit go hand in hand with religion; and the object that honest and right-minded men ought to have in view is the separation of those two things, the exorcising of the sectarian spirit from sectarianism.

It began very early. In the earliest period of the Christian Church we see it; in the quarrel, for that is the only word that describes it, between Paul and Peter which Paul describes in one of his letters, and describes with so much heat, with so much expressed and suppressed passion that we cannot doubt that even then, between two men who were apostles, the rancor of the sectarian spirit had struck root. For what did these men dispute about? Not about a matter of opinion, but upon a matter in which, as they thought, the veracity of God himself was implicated. Peter took the ground that the revelation of the kingdom, in which the divine promise was conveyed, was given to the Jews only, simply to the family of Israel; and to him it was an apostasy, a fatal heresy, a flying in the face of the divine revelation, to extend the truth to outlying people. Paul took the opposite ground. To him the revelation was an interior experience and not an outward fact. Christ came to the soul and not to the person. It mattered not to him that men had listened to the voice of Christ. He had had spiritual communications from the risen Messiah, and the voice of his own private experience was as authoritative, in his judgment, as the spoken words of the Master. To him, Peter's narrowness and exclusiveness was a frank denial of the very essence of revelation.

At this point, therefore, the division of opinion became a dispute, a bitter altercation which separated the two apostles finally and fatally, and left its mark upon the whole history of the Church for a hundred years. A spirit of rancor and quarrel I say. Paul says, "When Peter came to Antioch I withstood him to the face, because he was to blame." And of John and James and others who called themselves pillars of the Church because they had known Christ in the flesh, he speaks contemptuously. Of those people who claim to be something, he says, I know nothing at all, they are nothing to me. So early as this, then, back in the very beginning, the sectarian spirit declared itself, in the very circle of the apostles.

The first fact that is conspicuous in the history of the early Church is the rise and prevalence of heresy. Bossuet, two hundred years ago, published his great work called "The Variations of Protestantism," the argument of which rests upon the simple fact that Protestantism was merely a group of sects, not merely divided against each other in opinion, but pitted against each other in war. To the mind of Bossuet, to the mind of the Roman Catholic and of a great many people who are not Roman Catholics, the argument was conclusive. Here was a great religion split into feuds and factions. How is it today? According to the last authentic record, there are in England ninety-nine different persuasions, exclusive of twelve kinds of Baptists and thirteen kinds of Wesleyan Methodists, making in all one hundred and twenty-four sects, supporting among them all twenty thousand places of worship, churches and chapels. A minister of the free kirk in Scotland is said to have offered the prayer that his people might be baptised into "the gospel of disruption." Now, it is not, I repeat, merely because there are so many schools of thought; it is not merely that there are so many distinctions in criticism; it is not merely that in studying the truth people come to all these different classes of views, that such a picture is disagreeable. This is a matter of necessity. People can not think at all without differing; they can not think earnestly without disputing. But can not they differ without hating? Can they not seek the truth with the ardor of earnest minds without detesting one another? That is the question.

The evils of the sectarian spirit have always been acknowledged; they lie upon the surface. Consider the costliness of it, the enormous expense of maintaining a half-dozen ministers where one is enough; of building three or four churches where one suffices and more than suffices to hold all who wish to worship; of maintaining missionary boards, domestic and foreign, sending out apostles, preachers, colporters with tracts for the purpose of converting people into peculiarities of dogma. Think of the enormous expense of covering a land with ecclesiastical institutions which represent division, disagreement, and animosity. Consider again the waste in men and in mind. Every sect at present maintains a great many more preachers, missionaries, and officials than are required to do its work. Put the demand for the clergy at the highest possible mark, and there are about four times as many ministers in the market as are needed to do the actual work of religion. To support and fill the theological schools, to educate young men for the ministry, to encourage men to enter the ministry, is simply subtracting from the active brain of the community men that are needed for business, needed in the service of science, literature, philosophy, and art. We withdraw them from vital and vigorous uses and waste their time and mind in a service that does not need to be done, that had better not be performed. Consider the waste of mind that is accomplished in all this. These are living brains. These thin, bloodless, divinity students might be dropped upon the world and become men. You are simply subtracting from the amount of brains there is in society, and heaven knows there is little enough of it; at any rate, you are simply abstracting from it the very quality that is needed for doing the practical business of the world. Can we afford this?

See the evil effect of the sectarian spirit on education. We are told on responsible authority that in the United States there are three hundred and sixty colleges, not one of them thoroughly accoutred or equipped, all poorly officered, poorly provided with the material of study, poorly organized; when the same amount of money would maintain one hundred first-class universities in different parts of the country for the thorough education of men and women. Why this waste of money? Why this waste of brain? Why this squandering of educational force? Simply because the sectarian spirit demands it. These three hundred and sixty colleges are, each of them, under the direction of some sect. No other sect may come in. They are "feeders" of a denomination, and they are made energetic as possible and kept useless, simply, that the denomination may be able to point to them as nurseries for its children.

And yet, these are superficial objections, hardly worth speaking of. Of what moment the expenditure of a few thousands of dollars more or less? We can, perhaps, afford men, we can possibly afford the men and the mind. But the sectarian spirit drops the poison into the heart of truth itself, and takes the passion for it away. The pursuit of truth, the one fine inspiration of noble minds, the thing that has become even fascinating to the best spirits, that is pervading the community, that is possessing men of science and philosophy, that is touching with light and kindling with fire the best brains of the modern world, is simply made impossible by the sectarian spirit. How impossible? Because, the moment a man is wedded to an opinion, wedded to it as a sacred treasure, the moment a man considers that his belief is enjoined by sacred books, confirmed by miracles, communicated by the Lord of Heaven, that moment a wall is built about his intellect and he can read no speculative books but such as defend his own opinion. He cannot look over the fence to study any outlying philosophies; he cannot appreciate any facts but those he considers himself to be facts, fiats of the Eternal; he cannot enjoy the book of science; chemistry is suspected and laid under the ban, aye, even matters of meat and drink are adjudged by the sectarian spirit and are pronounced upon as by a divine authority! It is simply impossible that the belief in a divine revelation as associated with any church, identified with any creed, made cardinal with any religion, can exist in cordial companionship with the liberal pursuit of knowledge, because such belief sets tradition, conjecture, surmise, guess, above knowledge, and the word knowledge has no intelligible significance.

Hence it is that an able-bodied man, and such a man I know personally, who bought books of science, the treatises on modern philosophy, had them on his shelves, but never opened the covers. He was a Christian preacher. He was familiar with the books of his sect; he had the current theology on the shelves of his library. Sickness compelled him to leave his profession and he became a man at once. The theological books became worthless and were sent to the auctioneer. The scientific books were kept and studied for the first time. Thus it appears how fatal a disqualification this spirit must be to any earnestness or persistency in the pursuit of knowledge; it has passed into a proverb, true in these days if never before, that knowledge, and knowledge alone, is power.

These are grave accusations, but there is a more serious and solemn charge than this to be brought against the sectarian spirit. It corrupts goodness; it abolishes charity; it takes away the faith that men should have in virtue; and this too is from the necessity of the case. For if the Christian believes that he and he only has a divine revelation; that the truth has come to him supremely if not exclusively; that his books are the sacred books and all others are profane, then he must believe that the man who does not accept his belief does not accept the truth, is in the bonds of error, is on the way to death. And believing that truth and truth alone saves, he is convinced that the unbeliever—the more sincere the more stubborn—is not in the way of salvation, and must be reclaimed from his delusions. Hence the melancholy condition of the religious press all over the country, a condition that is a reproach to intelligence and a scandal to charity. I undertake to say that I have never seen a religious paper of any denomination whatever that had the conscience to be fair to opponents, that ventured to be honest, that could be just, that was able to give its due to any form of hostile opinion, that could take a position of even ordinary kindness towards the heretic.

The organs of the Roman Catholic Church are necessarily unjust to the representatives of Protestant opinion. The organs of the different Protestant sects are inevitably unjust towards the rationalist, are inimical towards the scholars, suspicious of the inquirers, hard hearted towards the skeptics, doubters, disbelievers, and verbal Atheists. They are under a dispensation that bids them be unkind. Disengenuousness is an element of their piety. Detraction is an arrow in their quiver. Listen to the speech in regard to rationalists, materialists, "Infidels," as they are called, unbelievers, misbelievers, disbelievers, that is current in orthodox circles, not in all orthodox circles, but in the more intense centres of the faith. I have heard, myself, from the lips of an orthodox preacher, that by the necessity of the case the disbeliever in a personal God must steal and lie; as if he were under a sort of moral compulsion to do it! The speaker could not say anything else, could not think otherwise than he spoke. Of course he believed what he asserted. He was honest and candid; but what a spirit it must be that can make an honest man conceive and utter a blasphemy like that! For this was said not a year ago in my own hearing, and said in the face of the fact that there are disbelievers in a personal God among ourselves, in our own community, in England, France, Italy, Germany, bearing the highest stamp of character, men of consecrated lives, who devote themselves with the full capacity of their conscience to the task of making the world better; men like Huxley, Herbert Spencer, Tyndall, who cannot confess any definition of Deity, who are yet irreproachable in their lives and spotless in their character.

Such a saying as that which I have quoted is stated in open presence of the fact that the "religion of humanity," as it is called, which makes a point of excluding the belief in a supernatural world and confines itself strictly to the social arrangements of this world, is entertained by people who, having rejected Christianity altogether, are exerting a wonderful power over the working classes, urging them to be honest, faithful, loyal, economical, considerate of their fellow-men. The "religion of humanity" claims as its peculiarity, that it makes men simple, disinterested, consecrated, and in the true sense, saintly. The sectarian spirit compels this uncharitableness; and we never shall have done with it until the sectarian spirit is forever abolished.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier,

CURATE OF THE ROMISH CHURCH IN FRANCE, WHOSE VIEWS UPON THEOLOGY WERE NOT PUBLISHED TO THE WORLD UNTIL AFTER HIS DEATH.

Proof the Second.—Continued.

With regard to the duration of the time of the public life of Jesus Christ, three months at most could have elapsed from the moment of his baptism by John to that of his death, if we are to believe what the first three evangelists have to say on this head, assuming that he was then, as St. Luke has said, thirty years of age, and that he was born on the 25th of December. For, between the date of his baptism, which took place in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, and the year in which Ananias and Caiaphas were high-priests, and the next Passover following, there was but a lapse of about three months, seeing that this feast of the Passover fell in the month of March. The first three evangelists say that he was crucified on the eve of the Passover following his baptism, and the feast was the time that he came to Jerusalem with his disciples; for all that they say about his baptism, his journeyings, his miracles, his sermons, his death and passion, must of necessity relate to this same year, seeing that these evangelists speak of no following year; and it even appears that, according to the account they give of his acts, they were all performed immediately after his baptism, consecutively, one after the other, and in a very brief space of time—there being but one single interval of six days before his transfiguration, during which six days no act of his do they record.

Hence, it will be seen that he cannot have lived more than about three months after his baptism; from which, if we take the forty days and nights he passed in the wilderness immediately after his baptism, it will follow that his public life, from his first preachings down to his death, could have lasted but little more than six weeks; and, according to St. John, it must have lasted at least three years and three months, because it would appear from the gospel of this apostle that, during the course of his public life, he went three or four times to Jerusalem to keep the feast of the Passover, which occurred only once a year.

Now, if it be true that he went three or four times to Jerusalem subsequently to his baptism, as St. John testifies, it is false that he lived only three months after it, and that he was crucified the first time he went to Jerusalem.

It may be said that these first three evangelists in effect spoke of but one and the same year, but did not note distinctly the others that elapsed from the time of his baptism; or, that John meant to speak of only one Passover, though he seems to speak of several, and that it is by anticipation he repeats several times that the feast of the Passover of the Jews was at hand, and that Jesus went to Jerusalem; and, consequently, that there is but an apparent contradiction between these evangelists. I admit it may be so; but it is certain that this apparent contradiction proceeds from the fact of their not having duly noticed and explained many of the most noteworthy circumstances of their narratives. At all events, there is good reason to conclude that they were not inspired of God when they wrote their respective accounts.

Another contradiction, with regard to the first act of Jesus immediately after his baptism; for the first three evangelists say that he was immediately transported by the spirit into the desert, where he fasted forty days and nights, and was several times tempted by the devil; and, according to St. John, he departed two days after his baptism for Galilee, where he worked his first miracle by changing water into wine at the wedding of Cana, in which place he found himself three days after his arrival in Galilee, at a distance of more than thirty leagues from the place where he had been.

With regard to the place of his first sojourn after coming out from the wilderness, Matthew says (iv, 13) that he came to Galilee, and that, leaving the town of Nazareth, he went and dwelt at Capernaum, a seaport town; and Luke (iv, 16, 41) says that he came first to Nazareth, and afterwards went to Capernaum.

Again, they contradict one another with regard to the time and manner of the apostles' joining and following him; for the first three say that Jesus, while passing on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, saw Simon, and Andrew his brother, and, a little further on, James, and John his brother, with their father Zebedee. John, on the contrary, says that it was Andrew, the brother of Simon Peter, who was the first to follow Jesus, with another of the disciples of John the Baptist, having seen him pass by while they were with their master on the banks of the Jordan.

On the subject of the eucharist, or the last supper, the first three evangelists lay down that Jesus Christ instituted the sacrament with his own body and blood, under the appearance of bread and wine, as our Romish Christians tell us he did; and John makes no mention of this mysterious sacrament. In the Gospel according to St. John (xiii, 5), he says that after this last supper Jesus washed the feet of his disciples, that he commanded them to do likewise one to the other, and records a long speech he made to them during the operation. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, on the contrary, testify that immediately after this supper he went with his disciples up to the Mount of Olives, where he abandoned his spirit to sadness and discouragement, and finally was seized with agony and a bloody sweat, his followers slumbering, the while, a short distance off.

They contradict each other with regard to the day on which he held the last supper; for, while it is said, on the one side, that it was held on the eve of the Passover—that is to say, the evening of the first day of Azimes, or of the use of unleavened bread, as it is set down in the books of Exodus, xii, 18; Leviticus, xxv, 5; and Numbers, xxviii, 16—on the other side they testify that he was crucified on the morrow of the day on which the last supper was held, towards the hour of noon, his trial having lasted all through the preceding night and the earlier hours of the morning. Now, according to their own words, the morrow of the day on which he held the last supper could not have been the eve of the Passover. And, if he died on the eve of the Passover, towards noon, it could not have been on the eve of that feast that he held the last supper; consequently here is a manifest error.

They contradict each other in what they report concerning the women who followed Jesus from Galilee; for the first three evangelists say that all these women—among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, and the mother of the children of Zebedee—stood and contemplated from afar what was going on while he was being hanged and tied to the cross. John, on the contrary, says in his gospel (xix, 25) that the mother of Jesus, and the sister of his mother, and Mary Magdalene, were standing at the foot of the cross together, with the apostle John. The contradiction is evident; for if these women and this disciple were with him, they were not standing and looking on from afar, as the others have it.

They contradict one another touching the first appearances that Jesus made after his pretended resurrection; for Matthew (xxviii, 16) mentions only two of these appearances, one when he appeared to Mary Magdalene and another woman likewise named Mary, and the other when he appeared to his disciples, who had gone up to the mountain in Galilee which he had assigned as the place where he would meet them. Mark speaks of three appearances; the first when he appeared to Mary Magdalene, the second when he showed himself to two of his disciples who had gone to Emmaus, and the third when he appeared to his eleven disciples and reproached them with their incredulity. Luke, like Matthew, records but two appearances of Christ after his resurrection, while John the Evangelist mentions four, and adds to the three mentioned by Mark another that he made to seven or eight of his disciples who were fishing in the Sea of Tiberias.

Again, they contradict one another with regard to the locality in which these appearances occurred. Matthew says it was in Galilee, on the top of a mountain; Mark says it was while they were at table; Luke says that he led them out of Jerusalem and conducted them to Bethany, where he left them and ascended into heaven; and John says it was in the city of Jerusalem, in a house the doors of which they had shut, and, another time, on the Sea of Tiberias.

Here are, indeed, a considerable number of contradictions in these divers accounts concerning his appearances after his resurrection and his pretended ascension into heaven, seeing that Luke and Mark say most positively that he ascended into heaven in the presence of his eleven disciples; but neither in the gospels of Matthew nor of John do we find any mention of this pretended ascension. Moreover, Matthew testifies pretty clearly that Jesus did not ascend into heaven, since he explicitly declares that he assured his disciples that, as he was with them then, so he would ever dwell with them to the end of all time. "Go," he said to them during this pretended appearance, "and teach all nations; and be assured that I will be ever with you to the end of all time."

And here Luke contradicts himself on this head; for, in his gospel (xxiv, 15), he says that it was in Bethany that he ascended into heaven, in the presence of his apostles; and in the Acts of the Apostles—supposing that he is the author of them—he says that it was on the Mount of Olives. Again, he contradicts himself in another detail of this same ascension; for in his gospel he records that it took place on the day of his resurrection, or the following night, while in his Acts of the Apostles he says that it occurred forty days after his resurrection; which is by no means the same thing.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

By gentleness overcome anger; by good, evil; by liberality, greed; by truth, dissembling and falsehood.

Selections.

Two American Scientists.

Two works have been lately published which set forth the sum of modern research and interpretation in fields of peculiar interest, not only to the student of science, but to the general reader. We refer to Elements of Geology, by Joseph Le Conte, of the California University (Appleton's), and to Popular Astronomy, by Simon Newcomb, of the United States Naval Observatory (Harpers). The authors of these singularly lucid and exhausive treatises do not assume to instruct the professional investigator, but to present the educated public with a survey of the history, methods, and accepted results of inquiry in their respective departments. They have both been at great pains to employ such language as should be intelligible without mathematical study, and in each case the philosophic side of the subject has been treated with greater fullness than is usual in text books.

In Prof. Newcomb's work we naturally turn to the chapter in which he discusses such questions as the radiation of solar heat, the nebular hypothesis, and the plurality of worlds. These are the matters about which we have heard so much from Mr. Proctor. In connection with the first named topic Prof. Newcomb makes a statement which, if established, would be pregnant with considerable danger to the evolution hypothesis, but in which, however, many astronomers and physicists do not concur. He abridges the time during which life could have been possible on the earth to a period which, vast as it is, falls far short of that contemplated by some biologists. Reminding us that a diminution of solar heat by less than one-fourth its present amount would probably make our earth so cold that all the water on its surface would freeze, while on the other hand an increase by much more than fifty per cent. would probably boil the water all away, he concludes, keeping in view, of course, the observed rate of radiation, that "the balance of causes which would result in the sun radiating heat just fast enough to preserve the earth in its present state has probably not existed more than ten millions of years." That, in other words, would be the extreme limit of time during which he would suppose water to have existed on the earth in a fluid state.

The posture of the best scientific opinion toward the nebular hypothesis is fairly and distinctly indicated by Prof. Newcomb. He points out that the dynamical conditions under which a nebulous mass would or might condense into a system possessing the symmetry of our solar system have not yet been explained in a manner at all satisfactory. On the other hand, the hypothesis has not been shown to be inconsistent with any fact. Unquestionably its truth is indicated by the general tendencies of the laws of nature. It is, indeed, almost a necessary consequence of the only theory by which we can account for the origin and conservation of the sun's heat. The professor cautiously adds that all the arguments for the nebular hypothesis, as for a good many theories of modern science, involve the assumption that the laws of nature are constant. But on this head we do not apprehend that the genuine investigators will express any skepticism. As regards the plurality of inhabited worlds our author has very little to say, merely reminding us that speculations on that subject are wholly sterile, since the attainment of any direct evidence is entirely hopeless, and has ceased to occupy the attention of working astronomers.

Prof. Le Conte's attitude toward the theory of evolution coincides with that maintained by the majority of competent geologists. He recites at length the chain of evidence made out by Huxley and Morse in the case of the horse, and allows due weight to that remarkable genealogy. Moreover, he is unwilling to affirm the existence of any fact in the geological record which is essentially inconsistent with that hypothesis. On the other hand, he is by no means disposed to ignore the tremendous chasm yet to be bridged over in the testimony of the rocks touching the point at issue. We best illustrate his impartial and trustworthy treatment of vexed questions by some reference to his statement of the facts bearing on the antiquity of man. He points out that the signs of man's existence in the miocine period are extremely faint, and not accepted as conclusive by a single careful investigator. As to the pliocene era, where we might naturally have expected the truth to be stronger, it is in reality still more meagre and uncertain. But Prof. Le Conte concedes that of man's existence, both in Europe and America, as early as the middle of the quaternary age, there is abundant evidence. He describes the most famous relic of that epoch—the Neanderthal skeleton—and after citing the various opinions regarding its true place in the scale of development enables the reader to judge for himself by giving a diagram of the skull interposed between those of the modern European and the chimpanzee. It would be difficult to convey an evolutionary suggestion in a more cautious and effective way. We observe that the professor is led to favor the opinion that man came in with the quaternary age, not only on account of the absence of direct evidence for prior existence, but on deductive grounds. Because, namely, not a single specimen of mammal now living is found in the tertiary. But it would not be difficult to assign special reasons for the exceptional survival of man. As to the length of time that man has lived upon the earth, the author says it may be 100,000 years, or it may be only 10,000, but more probably the former. That is a very mild way of appraising the balance of probabilities. In relation to the character of primeval man, Prof. Le Conte makes a very sensible remark. Reminding us that the cradle of mankind was apparently in Asia, he suggests that the intermediate link between man and the anthropoid ape, if there be any such, ought to be looked for in the quarternary system of that continent.—N. Y. Sun.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of Reading Matter than any other Journal of its class.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1878.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 37.

Great Jehovah: Has not the occupation of writing the sacred scriptures of the different nations of the world, as well as the descriptions of the various deities which men have believed in, been a part of the labors of the class of men known as the priesthood?

Have they not in the prosecution of this work used their natural powers and abilities the same as though they had been engaged in other occupations?

Did they employ, while pursuing this particular occupation, any powers or functions not entirely natural? and was there anything supernatural in what they thus wrote?

Is it not easy for enthusiastic, zealous, and imaginative persons to become possessed of the idea that they are charged with a mission from a power above themselves, and that they are to convey the intelligence which they have received to their fellow-men?

Has not the world in all ages and in all nations been amply supplied with this class of men who have assumed to be priests and prophets to their fellow-men? and have they not considered it their duty and province to be guides and leaders to their fellows?

Is it not one of the easiest things in the world for that class of men to become infatuated, and be carried away with an undue importance of their views, thoughts, and meditations?

Is it not easy for persons of a dreamy, poetical, imaginative turn of mind to become imbued with the conviction that they have received light superior to those by whom they are surrounded? and that they have been placed in communication with thee? and that they are able to make known thy will and purposes?

Like other avocations which attract the attention of human beings, is not this altogether natural and wholly independent of anything supernatural?

Is it not absurd for men to imagine there is a force or existence that is supernatural?

Does not the universe contain all the powers and principles that have an existence?

Is it not the effects of ignorance and error that incite man to believe there is a domain or state of existence outside of or above the universe?

Does not the universe contain all domains, all states, all stages and conditions of life and being that have an existence?

Have not designing, ambitious men often made untruthful assertions with a view to misleading their fellow-beings as to the commission of leadership which they had received from thee?

Have not those who—in the forty or fifty centuries that have last passed—have claimed to interpret the will of the gods, used much of design and misrepresentation in what they have done? and have they not found a plenty of credulous, gullible people ready to swallow that which was claimed came from a divine source?

Has it not been perfectly easy for this class of men to cry out to their dupes, "Thus saith the gods!" "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts?" Is it not safe and proper to watch this class of persons, who claim to have received, in an unnatural way, information not equally accessible to all other classes?

As a rule, is it not vastly safer to take the results of human experience and observation than to take on trust what this designing class may endeavor to foist upon our attention and credulity?

Have not mankind in past ages made great mistakes in throwing away fact for fiction, certainty for uncertainty, and natural truth for supposed light from on high?

Has not a belief in a host of imaginary supernatural beings, whether deities, demons, fairies, sprites, gnomes, genii, or any other of that numerous class, been a detriment to man? and have they not kept him in the chains of ignorance, darkness, fear, and dread?

Would it not be better for man to have used his powers of investigation, observation, and reason, than to have taken without question all that the imaginative, designing class have been pleased to hand over to him?

When man has depended upon his own natural abilities and powers of observation as a means of acquiring knowledge, studying the laws of nature and the phenomena of the universe, has not the knowledge thus acquired been of far more practical benefit to him than all that prophets, priests, and so-called inspired writers have been able to impart to him?

Are not facts and realities always greatly to be preferred to imaginings, conjectures, and visionary speculations?

Have not the natural sciences of astronomy, geology, chemistry, biology, physiology, mechanics, etc., been of vastly more use to man in performing the journey of life and in making this world a habitable dwelling-place than all he has ever been told about gods, devils, ghosts, and witches?

Is there any better study for man while his dwelling-place is here in this world than the knowledge, the facts, and conclusions that pertain to this stage of existence and his relations thereto?

Is not his knowledge of the after life—if there is one—with its wants and duties, altogether too vague and uncertain for him to make any accurate calculations as to what his condition and needs there will be, and how to meet them and make necessary preparations for them?

Is not present duty paramount in all cases to the duties of the past or the future? Can we better prepare for the future than by well performing our present duty according to our best knowledge and judgment?

When there is so much requiring our attention and best efforts here, is it not a waste of time and energy to be wasting our strength and opportunities by directing our attention to a world beyond the reach of our vision, and of which we can have no positive information?

Can we be engaged in any better employment than in making as much of a heaven of this world as is within our power by removing ignorance, superstition, and mental darkness, and increasing practical knowledge and useful information?

Is not the practice of love to man, whom we can always see around us, now and here, far better than the love of imaginary gods above the clouds, whom we can neither see nor comprehend?

Are not our duties far more to our fellow-beings, our friends and neighbors, and to ourselves, than to the unknown gods, whom no man has seen nor ever can see?

If there are gods ruling in ethereal space, are they not too far removed from us to be affected either for good or ill by anything within our power to perform?

Have we any more power over them than we have over the sun or any of the other heavenly bodies in their unchangeable courses and orbits?

If it is not in our power to harm them, is it any more in our power to do them the slightest benefit?

Hast thou, Jehovah, ever received the slightest injury or benefit from any act that feeble and diminutive man has been able to perform?

Is it it not far better for man to attend to his own work here in this world and leave the gods to attend to theirs in the unseen and unknown world?

Can we not do vastly more good by attending to our own business here in this life than by attending to the business of the gods or any of their subordinates in another life?

Is it not altogether a mistake of the priests and mouthpieces for thee that thou hast been made angry at the conduct of thy children on the earth—that thy anger has been excited and thy passions aroused to the point of doing them great harm or of sending them, by way of retaliation, to a place of cruel and eternal torture?

Have not all these tales about thy anger and vengeance, thy fierce judgments, thy disposition to punish without purpose or object thy weak and fallible creatures, done far more harm to the inhabitants of the earth than any possible good they have accomplished?

Have not these doctrines of vengeance and judgment been the basis and apology for the cruel wars and persecutions that the adherents of the various systems of religion—notably those who have claimed to believe in thee—have practiced, by which countless millions have been brought to premature and cruel death?

Is not devotion to the great family of humanity, with the purpose and object of improving the condition of those around us, by the performance of good deeds, and following out the better impulses of our natures, incomparably better than all the intolerant zeal and proscription that grow out of the worship of and belief in tyrants and rulers above the clouds? and is it not better to keep our minds on our duty here than for it to wander in the vacuity of interplanetary space?

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Credentials of Anthropology.

Professor J. R. Buchanan will soon commence in this city a course of lectures upon this interesting theme, the ability for teaching which he has hardly an equal in the world. For nearly a generation he has given this study the closest attention, and he has become a perfect master of the entire philosophy connected with it. The Democratic Review bore this testimony respecting the Professor's acquirements and ability:

"To Dr. Buchanan is due the distinguished honor of being the first individual to excite the organs of the brain by agencies applied externally, directly over them, before which the discoveries of Gall, Spurzheim, and Sir Charles Bell, men who have justly been regarded as benefactors of their race, dwindle into comparative insignificance. This important discovery has given a key to man's nature, moral, intellectual, and physical; for by this means in 'impressible' subjects have become discoverable the various cerebral organs, which are not only connected with the phenomena of thought and feeling, but control the corporeal function.

"The demonstrations of anthropology as a science does not absolutely require the numerous and delicate experiments by which Dr. Buchanan, over thirty years ago, enforced its claims upon all who approached him. As the discoveries of Galileo rested for verification upon his telescope, so do the discoveries of anthropology rely for verification upon the exploring instrument in psychometry, an art and science now extensively practised and easily illustrated."

The Professor will soon commence his course of most instructive lectures. The time and place will be duly announced.

Death of Thomas F. Hamilton.

Our highly esteemed friend, Thomas F. Hamilton, of New Haven, Conn., breathed his last on Friday morning, the 1st inst., of asthmatic consumption, after a lingering and painful illness of many months, in fact, for years has his health been greatly impaired by this troublesome disease. We do not know his precise age, but think it not far from fifty. He was born in Ireland, and was reared in the Catholic Church, but having an unusually clear, strong, and investigating mind, he many years ago was able to see the fallacy of the claims of Christian theology, and he became a Freethinker of the most pronounced type. He was a strong reasoner, with a decidedly scientific turn of mind. He was thorough and deep in his investigations, and he possessed the candor and honesty to firmly avow his convictions, regardless of popularity or the opinions of his fellow-men. Astronomy was a favorite study of his, and some of his theories in connection with this science showed the grasp of his mind, and were worthy of being placed on record before the world.

He was a man of great cheerfulness of disposition and had a great amount of the sunshine element in his nature. Had he been favored with good health he would have been one of the happiest of men. As a companion and friend, few men could be more highly valued. Despite his unpopular religious views he was highly esteemed as a man of truth and honor by those who knew him.

He was a successful business man, and was able, notwithstanding his many years of impaired health, to secure a comfortable competence for his family.

Death, in his case, made slow but steady advances. For years he has been aware that his life could not be a prolonged one and that death was sternly staring him in the face. But he met the grim monarch with perfect calmness and fearlessness. He was not afraid to live an honest man, and he died an honest man, as unterrified at the steady approach of the "king of terrors" as at the serene setting of a summer's sun. He died steadfast in the belief which for many years he had entertained. Up to the very hour of death his mind was clear and composed, and he repeatedly gave assurance to surrounding friends that he died perfectly happy and devoid of fear.

Some weeks previous to his death, knowing his end was near, he made known to his friend, Frank Hermance, his wishes as to how the funeral ceremonies should be conducted, and these were carried out to the letter. He wanted no sanctimonious priest to officiate at the last rites over his dead body. His first choice was that his warm personal friend, B. F. Underwood, should attend his funeral and deliver the discourse. His next choice was T. B. Wakeman, for whom he entertained a high regard, and next Hugh Byron Brown, with whom he had been intimately acquainted many years. Mr. Underwood being engaged in Illinois, it was impossible for him to be present. Mr. Wakeman, however, went to New Haven and delivered a funeral oration of one hour and a half to an audience of twelve hundred persons, and as dense as could be packed in Loomis' Temple of Music.

It was Mr. Hamilton's wish that he might die in the latter part of the week, so that his funeral might be held on Sunday. His wish in this respect was answered. His funeral took place last Sunday afternoon. His numerous friends and acquaintances, including persons of all shades of belief, attended in large numbers, and many hundreds were unable to gain admittance to the hall.

Mr. Wakeman's discourse on the occasion gave the highest satisfaction. In the course of his remarks he said that Mr. Hamilton's scientific studies, and especially the Copernican system of astronomy, had taught him that there was no place for the Christian heaven. He died regretting only the separation from friends.

Men are in hell without knowing it, and heaven is all around them if they will see it. The discourse was preceded by an original poem, written by Mrs. L. F. Johnson and read by Mr. Hermance. At the close, "Home Sweet Home" was sung, as Mr. Hamilton had requested. As an emblem in place of the Christians' symbol of hope—the cross—Mr. Wakeman presented a bouquet of flowers, so arranged that only one color occupied a given space. The lower color was blue, to recall the sky and sea; the next, tawny color recalled Mother Earth, who sustains man; blood-red flowers symbolized the martyrdom of man in the pursuit of knowledge; white flowers, bordering the red, told of moral and intellectual purity; green leaves typified a preserved memory.

Thus were performed the last rites over the body of an upright, honorable man and brother, who will long be remembered by his many admiring friends.

"OBSCENE LITERATURE."—Gen. Butler presented to Congress a petition signed by 50,000 or more persons, asking for the repeal of the law under which Anthony Comstock prosecuted Messrs. Bennett and Heywood.

The petitioners urge that such a law militates against liberty of the press, and they are correct in their opinion. Obscenity can be punished without the aid of a law whose only object seems to be to furnish a bigot with the power to injure useful and honest men. The corrective of obscenity is EDUCATION, rather than law, and therefore never let that be done by law which can be done by public opinion.—Boston Investigator.

More Falsehoods.

Seth Wilbur Payne has been sending out to our patrons a private circular, insinuating that we have taken unfair means to prejudice our readers against his paper; that he has not favored Anthony Comstock; that he has always spoken of us and our labors in the highest terms, and cannot account for our opposition on any other ground than that he is giving the public a first-class weekly Infidel paper at one dollar a year. He says by our misrepresenting him and his paper we have done his new enterprise much harm. All this is false. We have not misrepresented him in the first particular, and have not even stated the most damaging facts against him. It is he who has used misrepresentation, falsehood, slander, and malignancy against us with a view of damaging us in the eyes of our numerous friends, and to promote his own interests by so doing; and the sequel will show how successful that kind of villainy will prove.

So far from wishing to oppose his enterprise, when he issued his prospectus we joined with him, and he put in our price list of books, and we paid half the postage. We paid him between fifty and one hundred dollars for postage stamps thus employed. Does not this simple fact disprove the charge that we were jealous of him and tried to injure his enterprise. Had we such a motive we would hardly have given him money to help spread his circulars, bills, and prospectuses. This was before we had learned the man's true character. True, we entertained doubts about the feasibility of his publishing an eight-page weekly paper at one dollar a year, and Paine's Theological Works "well bound" at five cents per copy (we pay fifteen cents for the binding alone), but we were perfectly willing he should make the experiment to his entire satisfaction. We did not print a word or say a word against him or his enterprise until he began to use the most barefaced falsehood and slander to injure us, and which he kept up week after week.

During the last five months it has been our fate to receive, from Comstock down, from open enemies and pretended friends, a great amount of injustice, abuse, and vilification, but none of our enemies has treated us so meanly, so basely, as this slanderer, Seth Wilbur Payne. We do not wish to do him wrong, but his unprincipled conduct towards us is beneath the contempt of every honorable person.

Information Wanted.

Some two months ago our mail list of subscribers was stolen from the office, late one night after we had retired to rest, and at the same time from ten to fifteen dollars in postage stamps, denominations one, five, and ten cents, were taken from us and our heirs. We cannot expect to recover the stamps, perhaps, nor the list, but we wish to identify the thief without a shadow of doubt. But few persons have need of the list, and one would hardly take it who had no use for it, but those who have been in the publishing business understand the value publishers attach to their mailing list, it being often prized higher than gold.

We will thank our friends and the public generally to help us ferret out the thief. Those who receive begging circulars, and other documents, from any person who has no means of obtaining their address save from our mail list, are requested to give us information by postal card or letter. We hardly suspect the theft was committed by any person outside of this building, as we did not retire on the night the crime was committed until the outer door had been closed and locked, and we were in our office again by five o' clock the next morning.

A fact that may be taken into account is that the locks in this building are nearly all of the same pattern and one key unlocks several doors. On the day following the theft, the landlord put a new lock on our door, since which time we have retired to rest with a tolerable sense of security.

We wish to find the thief.

Ethics of Spiritualism.

For more than a quarter of a century it has been said by the scoffing opposers, that Spiritualism was not a moral system, that it, in fact, lead to immorality; and, as Spiritualism discarded the old religion, the accusation was, at least, plausible. No one had, from the new ground of Spiritualism and Evolution, presented the new system of morals demanded—which placed man on the throne previously occupied by an arbitrary deity, and made him amenable to the laws instead of the ipse dixit of Jehovah.

Hudson Tuttle has at length entered upon this task, the difficulty of which can only be understood when we consider that its course must be diametrically opposed to the current system; and its conclusions arrived at by entirely new methods.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal is now publishing weekly installments of this work, which is attracting much attention from Liberals, as well as from Spiritualists. We know the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be interested in the following paragraphs we extract from the last issue:

"There are two states in which all the virtues may exist, a passive and an active. A man may not do an unjust act; he may never utter a falsehood; he may never be cruel, yet he has small credit if he has never acted justly, truthfully, mercifully. He may exist in a passive state, and, while doing nothing bad, do nothing good. The virtues exist, but in a latent form; they are asleep, and the individual is not bad, simply because his appetites and desires are also asleep. The harmonious, or ideal man, is the reverse. A thousand desires, purposes, and motives draw him diverse ways, but the conscious intellect and love impell him in the direction of truth and right. Does he stumble? Does he at times go astray? Yes, but he rises and seeks the right path. He grows strong by experience, and his feet become sure. He cannot be always right, for he is fallible, but he is conscious that he must put forth his best endeavors. The young eagle that would cleave the empyrean and soar above the clouds, at first may lose its balance on its untried wings. It is not by failures it gains control, but by its success. The child learns to walk, not by its falls and misses, but by the command acquired over its limbs by repeated efforts. We may not always be just, yet the absolute justice is ever before us. Man, while on earth, may never gain that high ideal.

Religion has lamentably failed in teaching justice. It has allied itself with the government and taught obedience to Cæsar instead of to the commands of the absolute. It has been the servant of rulers, and taught the divinity of kings and autocrats. It has disdained the temporal affairs of this life for the next, and offered the gloomy consolation for its injustice, compensation in the next. In fact, its idea of justice has been compensation. They who mourn in this life shall rejoice in the next, and they who receive their good things here, shall there receive their evil. The main evidence of immortal life, as stated by the popular religion, is its necessity, in order to compensate the injustice received on earth. This is the religious idea of justice, though sometimes it changes to that of vengeance. The infinite father is pictured as terribly just, and his divine vengeance on sinners no more than absolute justice! The awful pictue is intensified by being thrown on a back. ground of omnipotent wrath. Faith, interpreted to mean belief in dogmas, has been taught to be of more value than actions, and often the so-called religion has been divorced from morality.

JUSTICE

in the material universe moves in the channels of law. From the star to the dancing mote there is no accident or chance. Of these laws we know nothing, except by means of their phenomena. We know certain causes inevitably move to certain effects. The same is true in the domain of mind. The relations individuals sustain to each other, in the family, the state, and to the world, that each may revolve in his own personal sphere, having all his rights, yet never infringing on the rights of others, this is justice. The knowledge of what is just and unjust, was not suddenly acquired. Mankind had at first a dim and vague conception of the absolute right. In their attempts to enforce justice they often were excessively unjust. But they felt that this absolute existed and that they must conform thereto. They constantly recognized the blindness of their predecessors, and reformed their laws. The laws are the practical expression of the moral feeling of a people and determine what is their sense of justice. If the laws are severe and cruel, the people are equally severe and cruel as a whole.

Love is the social element, and nature has so exquisitely organized man that he is surrounded by an atmosphere through and by which its attractions and repulsions are expressed. As animals are drawn together in flocks and herds, men unite in social life. Half the joys of existence flow from the amenities of friendship. To be true, it must be founded on similarity of soul, and be free from selfishness. To use one's friends for selfish purposes, is to lose them. Only the attachments formed on the highlands where self enters not are lasting.

We may think, and no second being need enter the current of our thoughts, for our ideas may be purely abstract. We cannot love, or feel any of the innumerable changing sensations which it includes without an objective personality—Justice, Mercy, Benevolence, Charity, Pity, Devotedness, go outside of ourselves.

It is claimed that all these conceptions have grown up out of experience. That man knew nothing of them, until he learned by observation that honesty, justice, charity, were the best policy. He trimmed his course by expediency, until thereby, there grew up in his mind a sense of absolute Right, Justice, Benevolence, and the other virtues. This is simply referring to the Intellect the promptings of Love, and then declaring the Intellect itself to be an effect of long accumulating forces. This, however, does not affect our argument. Whatever may be the cause of mind, or however the mental manifestations may be classified, the Virtues have a distinct place, nor can it be successfully shown that they are resultants of experience, and hence entirely selfish in their inception. We cannot believe that these virtues, which in their perfection make man angelic, began in utter selfishness: that the experience of the inconvenience of falsehood, taught man truthfulness, when he had no sense of what truthfulness was, is contradictory. Light could never be known were it not for the receiving eye, nor could truth be known unless there was a receptive faculty of truth in man's nature. We believe that because there was light in the world, the living beings it evoked, were modified by its rays; that the diffused nerve tissue, equally sensitive, became more sensitive in some one point, and from this starting point, growth proceeded until our eye was beaten out of living matter by the waves of light. So the principles of truth and justice are comprehended by man, because he embodies the essence of these virtues.

The theory of evolution leads directly to this conclusion. Organs grow into exquisite form after a given type, by the accumulation of advantages, so faculties of the mind increase by the accretion of observations. As the perfecting of physical organs tends to unitize the being, so the perfecting of mental qualities unitizes the mind. As the foundation of physical man is laid in the interminable series of forms beneath him, so is the Spiritual. Because he is a spirit, his minds reaches into and grasps spiritual truths. This gives him a tendency towards virtue, and repugnance to vice. That man has such tendency is proved by history. Had he not had, there could have been no progress, more than in the ox. The virtues are a part of his organization and as such impel him in their pursuit. He loves to be good and to do good, and countless examples of the opposite do not invalidate this claim. A whole race of people inclined to evil without tendency to the good, would never become good, nor would an individual ever do a good act. Nor can we escape this conclusion by saying that from time to time individuals far better than the average arise and teach their higher truths. Nor by claiming that as man is incapable himself of the discovery of moral truth, he must have received and has received a revelation. If such perception is not in human nature no individual can advance sufficiently to acquire it, nor can it receive a revelation, more than a sightless person can the beauties of light.

The fact revealed in colossal proportions by the interminable pages of history, that man has advanced in morality, proves that he has within himself the germinal power of growth in that direction.

PROMETHEUS, a Poem. By S. P. Putnam, New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1877. We have too few Freethought poets. Though all poets must of necessity be Freethinkers to a certain extent, still very few of them dare break through the bonds of conventional restraint, and give their inspiration to the world in all its native boldness. Occasionally a Shelley or a Swinburne or a Whitman will brave public opinion, and, cherishing a hearty contempt for priestly tyranny and orthodox superstition, will offer to the world his glorious inspirations in the unshorn strength and beauty of Nature's scathing truths. Mr. Putnam's poem, though it fails to give us all the careful attention to detail and delicate finish of Swinburne, or the broad, bold nature-touches of Whitman, yet contains much of the grandeur of thought and beauty of expression of Shelley. Under the cover of the ancient myth of Prometheus, stealing fire from Heaven for the use of man, this poem paints in glowing language the struggles of down-trodden humanity to free itself from the thraldom of superstition. By making a parallel case to existing circumstances, the poet has been able to give free expression to his wealth of imagery, and through the inspiring powers of the Past and Present to depict the woes of mankind from the Radical standpoint, while at the same time he expresses no thought that would offend the most conservative mind. The argument of the book is as follows: In the Evolution of Life, Jove represents the beginning of the power of Free Will, but Free Will seeking solely self aggrandizement. Prometheus symbolizes Moral Insight; Venus, Asia, Apollo; Love, Reverence, Imagination without Moral Insight. Man is the power of free will consecrated in "the long result of time" to the good of all.

The deep, soulful spirit of love that glows with richest and rarest imagery, that breathes, in sweet pathetic tenderness and earnest devotion, its loyalty to nature's truth, are constantly before the mind of him who peruses the pages of this beautiful poem. We regret that lack of space permits us only the following quotation:

"Do I not pity man? Could I revoke
The sentence passed against him by high Jove,
He should rejoice in my divinest love.
Oh, I would scatter flowers upon his way;
I would enchant him with my brightest ray;
I'd fill his spirit with the sweetest mirth;
I'd make resplendent the fair fields of earth;
I'd build him happy homes midst gleaming light;
Beautiful children should make glad his sight;
And all the sunny years should opening flow
To fruitful blisses that no cloud should know.
Oh, what is love but universal joy?
To give; to give to all without alloy?
To least, to greatest sweeps its kindly beam;
It will not be confined to petty stream;
Oh, I would eagerly o'er earth display
My richest gifts, if one would only slay
Tremendous Jove, repeal his stern decree,
And give my glowing heart full liberty."

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.—We have just completed Nos. 10 and 13 of this series, and patrons can now be supplied in any quantity. The first, "Priestly Celibacy Exposed," is, as its name indicates, an exposure of the dark doings of the "celibate" priesthood; and the second, "Sister Lucy and her Awful Disclosures," is the truthful narrative of a woman who escaped from New Hall Convent, England. Price, "Priestly Celibacy," 15 cents, "Sister Lucy," 10 cents.

THOSE wishing copies of the "Bennett-Teed Discussion," just closed, can be furnished them in a very few days. Price, paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Donations.

The following donations to the Defense Fund have not hitherto been acknowledged. J. Petty, $1. Susan Ruchter, $1. Isaac Applegate, $1. Mrs. L. F. Johnson, $10. Charles A. Sherman, $1. J. G. Dow, $5. John L. Mason, $1. C. M. Miller, $1. Dr. D. Bodifield, $1. James Fell and friends, $11.

These kind friends will please accept our warmest thanks for their kindness. We shall continue to strive to be worthy the kindness and confidence of our numerous friends.

TRANSMISSION; or, Variation of Character through the Mother, is the latest and best work of Georgiana B. Kirby. Every married couple should, through this reliable medium, prepare themselves to inaugurate proper conditions in producing healthy, intelligent, good, and beautiful children. We extract the following pertinent quotation: "All variation in character, physical or mental, takes place in fœtal life." Published by Wells & Co., 737 Broadway, New York city.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus

AND HIS MANIFOLD AND WONDROUS ADVENTURES IN THE LAND OF COSMOS.

FROM AN ANTIQUE MS. (EVIDENTLY INSPIRED), DISCOVERED BY I. N. FIDEL, IN CONJUNCTION WITH A. HOOK, ESQ.

CHAPTER II.

The Journey.

1. And, as I looked, there came forth a man from the multitude, whose name was Simon, and desired to be admitted into the roadway.

2. And the preacher gave a loud shout, and rejoiced, and taking Simon by the hand, said unto him, Seest thou yonder little gate?

3. And Simon said, Yea, I see it.

4. Then said the preacher, Do thou make haste thither, and when there, do thou knock, and the gate shall be opened unto thee.

5. And the preacher gave unto Simon a guide-book, and bid him God speed.

6. And Simon made haste towards the gate.

7. Now, the gate, which was the entrance into the roadway, opened into a certain wide and filthy conduit, which the beast, and his children, and their servants had made.

8. And the conduit passed through a certain high and lofty mountain, and led such as entered therein to the city of Conversion.

9. And the name of the mountain through which the conduit passed was Rationality; and the mountain was exceedingly steep, so that no man could have passed over it into the city.

10. And the beast, seeing that the mountain was impassable, had, with vast pains, made the conduit which passed under.

11. And in the conduit there dwelt some of the beast's children, to wit, a son whose name was Bigotry, and a certain lachrymose harlot called Contrition: she it was who presided over the gate and admitted the pilgrims into the roadway; and her mother's name was Fearohell, one of the beast's concubines, who had borne him many children.

12. And Fearohell, the beast's concubine, dwelt without the gate; albeit she had entrance when she chose to the conduit and the roadway, and that not seldom.

13. And through the conduit there flowed down to the city of Conversion a very filthy stream called Theology; and mixed with the stream was much lambs' blood, and not a little of a certain sticky slime called Graceogod, and many other abominations.

14. And when Fearohell perceived Simon coming towards the gate, she quickly took her scourge, and ran to him, and belabored him heartily therewith, for though she was old and withered she had yet much vigor in her limbs.

15. And Simon cried out amain, and ran for the gate, and the beldame scourged him with all good will.

16. And when he came to the gate, there came forth the lachrymose damsel; and Simon embraced her, and besought her to give him admittance.

17. And the lachrymose damsel, whose name was Contrition, opened the gate; and the beldame, lifting up her foot, lent Simon a kick, and he fell headlong into the mud and the slime and filthiness of the conduit, and the gate was shut.

18. And Simon gathered himself up, and shook himself.

19. And the beast's son, whose name was Bigotry, came towards him, and shook him by the hand, and bid him welcome.

20. And Bigotry took a certain vessel, and put therein some of the filthy stream called Theology, and mixed therewith three handfuls of a certain ill-flavored powder called Biblical education, and, having added a little mother's milk, he made a paste, and therewith did anoint Simon, and plentifully besmeared him, even from head to foot.

21. And the name of the paste which Bigotry made was Prejudice.

22. And Bigotry charged Simon, saying, Take heed of the snares of our enemy the evil one, who spreadeth deep nets for the unwary.

23. And Bigotry continued his discourse to Simon, and warned him when he came out of the end of the conduit, that he should neither look back nor loiter upon the way, but to get from the mountain with all speed, and by no means to stray upon the mountain, nor get out of the gutter, for that the mountain was full of pitfalls, and a woesome dangerous place, inhabited by many terrible creatures, who were continually sending down great stones at the pilgrims.

24. And, in sooth, the great stones which fell from the mountain did well-nigh make the gutter impassable and block up the conduit.

25. And the stones which fell were called Arguments.

26. And there came another beldame to Simon, Credulity by name; and she was the sister of the beast, and old and hideous, and had but one eye, and squinted therewith horribly; and her mouth was like unto an open sepulchre, and her throat exceeding wide, so that she was a mighty swallower.

27. And Credulity gave Simon an eye-glass, wherewith to read his guide-book, and by which he might perceive his enemies.

28. And the name of this eye-glass was Imagination.

29. And Credulity bid him, when he would use this glass, to first dip it in the stream of Theology, and the slime thereof, so that he might see clearly.

30. And Simon put on his eye-glasses, and immediately the whole conduit appeared a delightsome pathway, and the filthy waters thereof clear as crystal, and the stinking mud as fragrant spices.

31. And Simon made haste, and bedaubed himself with mud and slime, and drank plentifully of the waters.

32. And when he had wallowed sufficiently therein he addressed himself to the journey, and went forward, manfully drinking and bedaubing himself.

33. And when he came near to the end of the conduit, he began to be amazed at the stones which had fallen and been cast down from the mountain, for they well-nigh filled up the conduit, and he began to clamber over them with much labor, and grew afraid, and knew not what to do.

34. But there came forth one of the guides, and threw some of the mud and the slime of the gutter upon him, and bespattered him about the eyes therewith.

35. And the guide also took a certain rope called Sophistry, and fastened it about Simon, and drew him along over the stones therewith; and, albeit Simon many times fell down among the stones, and bruised himself very sore, yet was he at last dragged over them, and got out of the conduit and into the gutter which led to the city.

36. Then did the guide show him the city of Conversion, and bid him haste thitherward with all speed, saying, There is no safety for thee till thou hast entered the gate thereof, nor on this side wilt thou find any peace; and I do warn thee that thou take heed to thy footsteps, for thou art now on the domains of Ahrimanes, our great and bitter enemy.

37. Then began Simon to be sorely afraid, and said, Wherewithal shall I defend myself against so great a foe, if he appeareth unto me?

38. And the guide made answer and said, Fear not, my son; he will not harm thee, if thou wilt but bestir thyself and get thee into yonder valley, called the Valley of Repentance: at the extremity is the city of Conversion.

39. So Simon, taking heart, girded up his loins, and ran for the valley; but when he had run awhile, he began to slacken pace, and to look about him; and, seeing nothing terrible on the mountain, nor any danger near, he little by little got out of the gutter, and presently sat down to rest him somewhat, meaning shortly to go forward.

40. And forthwith he fell asleep and dreamed a dream.

41. And in his dream the Ancient of days appeared to him in his shirt.* And the Ancient one had no hair upon his head, but instead thereof a piece of white wool: neither had he any legs, but, instead thereof, two brazen wheels.

42. And the Ancient one sat upon a caldron of fire, and the flames thereof entered his body and issued forth at his navel; and from his nostrils came forth, as it were, a great stream of water; and the water was hot and scorching, being heated by the flame which proceeded from the caldron of fire.†

43. And Simon admired exceedingly that the shirt was not consumed.

44. And the Ancient one looked upon Simon with a fierce and terrible look, and pointed towards the city of Conversion; and immediately he vanished.

45. And Simon awoke, and was amazed; and, lo! the thunders pealed forth, and the lightnings ran swiftly hither and thither, and the cattle of the fields erected their tails and made to the water-pools for shelter.

46. And Simon quaked exceedingly, and ran towards the valley of Repentance.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

COL. INGERSOLL CONVERTS A D.D.— Two weeks ago last Sabbath the Rev. Dr. Babbitt, pastor of the Universalist church, spoke at length against Col. Ingersoll and his teachings. On that occasion he said some very bitter things against the man. A week later he desired to make an apology for some of his utterances made the Sunday before in reference to R. G. Ingersoll. While he did not believe as Mr. Ingersoll does about the inspiration of the Bible, he agreed with him in his views of humanity and very much else that he said in Watertown, and he would rather take him by the hand than some of the D.D.'s who preach the doctrine of a place of eternal punishment. Mr. Babbitt said he had been misled by the published lectures he had read.

At this point, much to the astonishment of Mr. Babbit, his remarks were greeted with applause that lasted some minutes. Nearly every person in the church joined in the clapping of hands. At the close of the sermon he was surrounded by very many who congratulated him upon having the manliness to correct a wrong.—Watertown Times.

* Here the text is somewhat obscure, and we are unable to say whether the shirt here spoken of belonged to Simon or to the Ancient of days, but, from the context, we presume the latter.—TRANSLATORS.

† See Daniel vii, 9. Daniel's description of the "Ancient of days" is evidently a bad translation of the one here given; and, as the learned Dr. Tresham Gregg surmises, both visions are a mystic and prophetic shadowing forth of that triumph of modern invention, the steam-engine.—TRANSLATORS.

Communications.

Mr. Truesdell's Reply to the Editor.

MY DEAR BENNETT: Allow me to thank you for your very courteous reply to my article on the Bland silver bill, published February 2d. We can "agree to disagree" admirably. The question of our national finances is strictly one of principles wherein the welfare of the whole people, and not the individual, should be considered. The greatest good to the greatest number should be our motto in the discussion of this subject. You say I "present the conservative side of the question, but the best interests of the masses lie on the other side. The capitalists and bankers have a direct interest in the money question, but that of the people does not rest in that quarter." In my last letter I tried to make it plain that the best interests of the whole people were upon the conservative side and opposed to inflation. I am not in favor of legislation for the benefit of a few individuals at the expense of the masses; and for this reason I oppose the inflation of our paper currency, or the remonetization of a short-weight silver dollar with full legal tender power. I believe that it is impossible for a nation to maintain a double monetary standard of unequal value. To-day one dollar in gold will purchase 440 grains of standard silver. How absurd then to suppose that by any act of Congress 412½ grains can be made equal in value to 440. Every dollar of such silver coin issued will drive into the jeweler's crucible or out of the country a dollar in gold. And silver must eventually become our sole standard. It is generally conceded that the Bland bill will soon become a law.

The loss entailed upon the people by its passage will fall principally upon the poor who are least able to bear it. Already speculators, bankers, brokers, and others who comprehend the situation are preparing for the change. They can protect themselves from loss before its evil effects are known to the community, but the laboring man, the poor sewing-girl, the factory-hand, the man servant, the maid servant, and millions of other working people who are unacquainted with the laws of finance, must be the victims of this cruel legislation. For a long time they will continue to draw the same scanty pay from their employers. The dollar will look as big, and everything will appear to them as bright as it did during the early part of our greenback inflation, but when these poor people come to spend their meager earnings for the necessaries of life, slowly but surely they will find that nearly every purchasable article has mysteriously advanced in price. The grocer, the butcher, the baker, and other retail dealers will be the last to inform them in regard to the true nature of the advance, for as yet many of them do not know it themselves; they live on, scrimping, cutting, patching, and hoping for better times, but alas! they wait in vain. Not till the wholesale dealer, the speculator, and the capitalists generally, have made their loss more than good does the poor consumer awake to the fact that the value of commodities has not advanced but the standard for their measurement has declined.

There is, however, one consolation in the Bland silver bill. It means something; and its passage may for a time stop the wail of the greenback men who sigh for a flood of irredeemable paper currency, believing that to be the great panacea for all our financial difficulties.

It is these impractical people who imagine that the Government, now in debt over two thousand millions of dollars (sixteen hundred millions of which is bearing interest at four and one-half to six per cent. per annum in gold, with less than two hundred millions in the Treasury), can lend to her people without loss all the money they desire at a lower rate than she is paying. How this financial feat of legerdemain is to be accomplished does not appear.

It is claimed by the inflationist that we have not currency enough for the demands of business; that an increase of our paper circulation will revive all branches of trade. But this is a serious mistake. A redundancy of the circulating medium will no more create trade than a superabundance of mechanic's tools will bring labor to the workshop. We have already more currency per capita than any nation on the globe, and more by two hundred per cent. than we ever had before the war. Prior to 1861 the entire paper circulation of the banks in the United States never exceeded two hundred millions, except in 1854, when it reached two hundred and four millions, and in 1857, two hundred and fourteen millions. The average paper circulation per capita from 1850 to 1860 was less than five dollars. To-day we have, in round numbers, seven hundred millions of dollars in paper currency, or over fifteen dollars per capita. How absurd, then, is the cry of the greenback men that the contraction of the currency has brought about the depression in trade! Our financial troubles began with civil war and kept even pace with the expansion of the currency. Contraction or repudiation was the inevitable result of expansion. The disease was contracted when the debt was created. Its fatal effects, however, were not discovered by the whole people until we began to approach the day of payment.

Many a man attributes his financial ruin to the pressing demands of his creditors, while the true cause existed long before such demands were made. The Government upset values by an inflation of the currency and an attempt to force a new or imaginary monetary standard upon the people. As the volume of irredeemable currency began to increase, its purchasing power declined. Anything of real value was preferred by her subjects to such uncertain, undefined promises.

The buyers soon outnumbered the sellers; the average price of all commodities, as measured by the new legal-tender standard, advanced just in proportion to the decline in the value of greenbacks as measured by the world's standard.

When gold was quoted at $2.85, greenbacks were worth but thirty-five cents on the dollar. A bushel of wheat was worth three dollars in the new standard, or one dollar and five cents in gold. Fortunately, the war closed; the Government stopped running in debt and began to pay. As the financial tides receded, many an unsuspecting victim who had ventured out into new channels created by the flood, found himself floundering upon the shoals of bankruptcy.

It is principally this class of people who style themselves the "greenbackers." They would raise the flood of inflation to its highest point, even at the risk of drowning us all, in the vain hope to unload their debts upon others, and float back unincumbered into the old channel. There are people, claiming financial ability, too, who really believe that something can be made out of nothing; that a value can be created by legislation alone; that a promise is equal to the pay; that a mere stamp upon a piece of paper, saying, "this is a dollar," makes it a dollar, or that irredeemable currency is equal in value to the money it promises to pay and does not pay. Such people are blind to reason and beyond the reach of argument when applied to the science of our national finances. JOHN W. TRUESDELL.

Syracuse, Feb. 20, 1878.

The Workingman in Politics.

All of the political aspirants, of whatever party, have suddenly awakened to the immense importance of being considered the workingman's friend. Every bill now introduced by our misrepresentatives in Congress is urged by them to be the universal panacea for all the ills the workingman is heir to, and while they are consuming precious time in advocating their pet theories with all the loud-mouthed vehemence natural to politicians the workingman is sinking lower and lower in poverty and distress, becoming daily less able to resist both political and religious oppression. The advocates of silver tell him that they are his only friends, and the specie resumptionists are also anxious to create the same impression, and then comes the greenbacker with his evidences of friendship in the shape of one kind of currency for all the rich and the poor, the high and the low. The great difficulty with this class of labor-reformers is that their remedy does not cover ground enough. Their principles are excellent, and could they have been established much earlier in the day would have undoubtedly prevented some of the present distress; but they take a surface view of the causes of the great inequalities existing between the producer of wealth and the monopolizer of production. The settlement of the money question will not solve the labor problem. The system which robs labor of its just rewards would still be in full working order. The opportunity to absorb all the wealth and concentrate it in the hands of the few would yet remain. There are many writers upon the labor question whose sympathy and sincerity is unquestionable, but the time for lip sympathy is almost past. It is useless for the mass of the producing classes to rely longer upon the promises of any political party. If any concession is made, it will ameliorate their condition, and that only for a time; for when the opportunity presents itself, there will be plenty standing ready to take advantage of the necessities of their fellow-man and reduce him again to servitude.

Much is said about the education of the laboring classes. Many believe that education will lift the toiler from out of the toils that environ him, but what kind of education is meant? The road to learning, like all other avenues, is difficult of approach to the man whose whole time is necessarily consumed in obtaining the bare necessities of life, leaving out the "pursuit of happiness" (which the Constitution is supposed to guarantee to every citizen); but there is one kind of education which is doing more to enlighten the workingman and show him his true position and enable him to realize his condition of servitude than a thousand silver-tongued orators could do in as many years, and that is the bitter experience of the present times. Experience and circumstances teach us lessons that no amount of reasoning or argument could ever convince us of. Harsh though it may apparently be, experience is eventually one of the kindest of teachers; and just now the laboring classes are forced by circumstances (not of their own making) to take lessons from this great instructor of mankind; and that they are profiting by their enforced instruction is evinced by the manner in which many of them meet the arguments of the surface-reasoners on the labor problem. They are rapidly learning that the cause and remedy for their deplorable condition is not a political but a social one, and that the long years wasted in following the political demagogues have not resulted in political liberty, but in social degradation.

Organized and determined efforts on the part of the wage-receiving classes themselves is the only thing worthy of a single thought. They can then march solidly to the polls and taste the fruits of political liberty in all its purity, but they should first make the idea of political liberty subservient to social education.

To argue with those who compose our present society is almost useless. They meet arguments with assertions, and reasoning with ridicule. They assert it to be the intention of social reformers to tear down and destroy all our most cherished institutions and upon the ruins build another form of society based upon a Utopian idea, which accusation is as false as the society they move in. It is not individuals, but the system which enables individuals to legally rob and oppress their fellow-men, which should be destroyed; and that can only be done by the complete emancipation of the white slave familiarly known as the workingman. F. B. PARSE.

Answer to Taunts and Queries in Truth Seeker, Feb. 7, 1878.

To A. S.—I have not overlooked that if the large number of unemployed were employed, more goods, which are now required, would be sold than are now sufficient to "overstock" the market. I said only that "the silver bill" will not cause the unemployed to be employed, and that an irredeemable paper currency would be the most crushing instrument on workingmen that can be devised. I had twenty-five years experience of such a system in England, while I was under the teaching of Paine and Cobbett. Financiers and statesmen had tried to crush Cobbett, as an earlier race of them had tried to crush Paine, because he (Cobbett) predicted the consequences of the English system of paper money. After that system had worked its dire effects, these financiers and law-makers denounced Pitt as one of the greatest enemies of his country; though, as the Minister under whom the irredeemable paper money was authorized, he had been long called "the heaven-born Minister."

The French have the heavy burden of the enormous expenditure on account of the war with Germany; yet, in France the amount of irredeemable currency was limited by the conviction that the time of its existence was limited. The people have (by comparison with other nations) prospered under that limitation; and they are able to bear, without complaint, the reduction of the amount of that currency; for, within the last two years, the Bank of France withdrew from circulation $200,000,000 of her paper (Cincinnati Daily Gazette, Feb. 11). And the French "Resumption Act" is now in operation.

The French Resumption Act compelled the Bank of France to pay its notes in coin, on and after the 1st of Jan., 1878. Therefore the amount of paper money has been comparatively limited, so that, in France, "accounts are kept and commerce transacted on a gold basis." As the Bank was reducing its "circulation," it "resumed specie payments long before the 1st of Jan., '78; since then, it has been issuing coin largely in redemption of its notes; but, it is paying in silver five-franc pieces, "the coin of the fathers," but now worth eleven per cent. less than gold, which is causing remonstrance (S. W. in New York Tribune, Feb. 8).

France has not, and England never had notes for only one dollar; the lowest note in England was for five dollars. "In this country we have now $60,000,000 in $1, and $2, notes, and $150,000,000 in $5 notes, while in France, in 1876, the notes of all kinds under $10 each amounted to only $17,000,000; in this country we have of notes of less than $20 each, $377,000,000; while in France in notes of less than $20 each there were but $52,000,000; since the report in 1876 the amount has been reduced (S. W. in N. Y. Tribune, Jan, 29).

Such cases as "Central New Yorker" states, I have known an enormous number of in England, as the result of a delusive system of currency, which paper money is; especially when it is "inconvertible." The experience of the world shows that it cannot be maintained. Paine says "it is strength in the beginning, weakness in the end"; and that it will die a natural death. And whenever it dies, many people must suffer as "Central New York" and those around him are suffering. I cannot have room to explain the intricate question of how such a system works, nor to show that the prosperity of the laborers was not caused by gold being "worth 280"; if it was, then, the condition complained of as giving an advantage to the bondholders was of great advantage to the laborers. But it was not, and prosperity will not be restored by a restoration of that monetary state of affairs.

Burke said, "But this paper may, and does increase, without any increase of trade; nay, often when trade greatly declines, for it is not the measure of the trade of its nation, but of the necessities of its government; and it is absurd and must be ruinous, that the same cause which naturally exhausts the wealth of a nation," etc. (Burke obtained a pension of $20,000 a year for four generations, as a bribe to him to recant and to oppose Paine.)

Those who understand the inevitable operations and results of a large increase of currency by paper money do not in the time of "inflation" make bargains for futurity; they buy for present use, and do not buy land, or anything else on long credit. My father, myself, and husband have acted on this principle, and escaped the ruin that abounded around us.

To S. Marshal I say: During forty years I have advocated in public and in private that system of society which would secure that production would be limited only by the wants of the producers, and not, as now, by what can be sold by those who hire producers—the "Social System" of Robert Owen, which is exemplified by the system of production and distribution of the Shaker and the Oneida communities, but is opposed by the regulations as to sexual intercourse of both communities. It is in this direction that labor should seek to help itself, with such help as good conduct would obtain from those who do not need the system.

Forty years ago, Robert Owen said to me, "The existing low rate of wages [in England] cannot be permanently raised. Machinery can be made that is not now made, because human labor is cheaper; but if wages rise, that machinery will be made." The facts of every year show that he was right.

Our civil war took a large proportion of men out of the labor market, and the war caused a great demand for the products of labor. A large proportion of the men did not come back to the labor market, for they were killed or maimed; and many workers, helped by the money saved by them during the war, became independent of hire; therefore, the number of laborers in 1865 was not in disproportion to the demand for them, and therefore, in place of every one dollar formerly paid for a piece of work, they obtained two dollars or more of the depreciated paper, and therefore they did not suffer from the depreciation of the paper money; they received, compared with other times, and with workers in other nations, good wages. But "good wages" prompted to the production of machinery which is worked at less cost, unfortunately, than human labor is. In every department of industry, the farm, the workshop, and the manufactory, machinery is superseding human labor, while laborers have become more numerous. Under "the Social System," machinery would be a blessing.

Irredeemable paper money enabled speculators to buy, for sale and renting, lands and houses, and so to raise prices of sales and rents to a scale that has been ruinous to those who agreed to pay them; other speculators made useless railways, and ruined those that invested in them. These speculators, directly and indirectly, employed laborers, but the results of their speculations tended to prevent a succession of them, and helps to prevent a return to a system of "inflation." After a trial of "contraction," reproducing the state of affairs that existed prior to the contraction, experiments with "re-inflation" in England did not restore the desired prosperity, and it was decided that the system must be curbed by a return to cash payment, on demand of note-holders.

That money is too abundant to generally obtain a high interest is seen in the fact that U. S. bonds, at 5 per cent. interest, have, I believe, always sold in the market for more than the gold price; those at 4½ per cent. have not ever been below the gold price, and even at 4 per cent. par in gold is given, and, evidently all that is offered of them would be taken at that low rate of interest but for the agitation about silver and irredeemable paper. I know that people of this place who keep large balances in city banks cannot obtain more than 5 per cent; the N. Y. Tribune Association borrowed $400,000 (for their new building) on long time, at 6 per cent., and their journal (semi-weekly, Feb. 8) states that money can be had "on call" at 4 per cent.

The money does not get distributed westward for higher rates of interest, probably because of the uncertainty that prevails as to what is to be the value of money, and consequently of the securities that may be obtained.

I cannot expect Mr. Bennett to allow me any more space in the T. S., therefore I shall not offer any more "nonsense."

MARGARET CHAPPELLSMITH.

The Financial Problem.

MR. EDITOR: I am very desirous just now, while the financial question is agitating the public mind, to advance a few thoughts to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, if you have no objection. All the articles I have seen on the subject are lacking in the main principles which I think would give it a lasting and permanent basis of success. Now, it seems to me that in order to have a permanent basis for a monetary circulation, whether it is gold, silver, or paper, to make it healthy and useful, it must be based on the Government, managed and controlled by it; and all banks and bank speculations in money must be annulled and destroyed, before we can have a healthy and prosperous trade and business.

Let the Government make it unconstitutional for any person to speculate in money in any way whatever. And it should be only a circulating medium of exchange for produce; and the Government of the United States should be the head banker, and should authorize the establishing of State banks in each State, and those banks should establish a bank in each city for the purpose and convenience of doing business. Money should never be allowed to be put out on usury, nor yet speculated in by any one, and if any should do so, let it be a constitutional offense, and be punished accordingly. And it should always be in demand sufficient as a medium of exchange for all business purposes. And if our Government was good for anything, it would see that this was carried out, so that all were protected alike, and all its citizens well educated, free from superstition and falsehood; not as it is now, a kennel of rascals, swindlers, and cheats. But before any reform can take place that is likely to benefit the whole people, they must be educated in freedom from all superstition, so they can think rationally on matters pertaining to their welfare and happiness.

All the railroads in this country ought to be owned by the Government, or each State in the Union should own the roads that run through them, and have managers in each State to keep them in good running order for the benefit of such State, and not, as now, for the benefit of grasping, selfish, and avaricious speculators to traffic in and live off of workingmen. I will give you my candid opinion on this matter. You will never be relieved from slavery and serfdom till you are enlightened enough to combine together as one man, and vote for the most intelligent men in your own ranks, and send them to Washington to legislate for you. You must know that you are a majority, and have the ballot in your hands; if you will but combine you can send whom you please to legislate for you. You must pay no attention to the wire-pulling caucuses; you know what they are, and who they are, and whenever you act wisely on this subject the tyrant's doom is sealed and your liberty and freedom is at hand. I am, with all due respect, your well-wisher, J. PETTY.

La Crosse, Wis.

Letters from Friends.

MILL BROOK, CT., FEB. 27, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In a late number (No. 9) of Payne's Age of Reason, is a column article, copied from the Winsted Press, and not only without giving credit, but, purporting to have been written for the former paper, commencing with the usual salutation: "Editor, Age of Reason." It is headed, "Hell in a Hamlet." Now, I know the writer of that article, who is a regular correspondent of the Winsted Press, and I know he never sent it to the Age of Reason for publication, much less as having been written expressly for that paper.

In the same number of the Age is another little item which the Press clipped from an exchange, respecting a man that was cured of the opium habit by attending Moody and Sankey's meetings. This, with the comments of the Press, is copied by the Age, leaving it to be inferred that the comments are its own. Now, Mr. Editor, I am not a newspaper man, and don't know but this is all right and honorable among editors, but it seems a very easy way to make up a paper, and Mr. Payne boasts of his knack of taking it easy. A friend at my elbow, who always reads my papers, suggests to me, and with some little show of reason, that the Liberal papers published at 141 Eighth St., may be leagued together, and playing into each other's hands, like lawyers, who abuse each other in the court-room, but are the best of friends outside.

How does Mr. Payne get the Press unless he has access to your exchanges?—they do not exchange. How does he get the names of your subscribers, if he has not free access to your office? Please rise and explain, friend B.

Yours truly, H. W. PINNEY.

HARTFORD, CONN., March 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: "After prayers" on each holy Sabbath it is my custom to read the blessed Bible, or "New Testament" according to St. Bennett, issued the day before. I have just enjoyed my "communion" with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and feel like returning thanks for my divine privileges. Please accept 'em. But I am sorry that that miserable scoundrel, madman, or eccentric nondescript, Seth Payne, manages to occupy so much of your attention. True, I don't well see how you can avoid some sort of reply to the more ingenious of his libelous falsehoods; for it is evident that some of your backwoods readers are half inclined to believe them; yet it strikes me that, were I in your place, I would pillory the rascal in one of his villainies, post at masthead the facts, under the motto Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus (liberally, "Thus he lies, forever and ever"), and let the statement stand there for, say, six months—only that. It isn't of the slightest use for this fellow Payne to talk against you to us who have known you for years, and watched you struggling earnestly—and, in my judgment, against obstacles which no other man could have surmounted—to give us Liberals and Freethinkers an "organ," or, what is better, a means of intercommunication all over the land. But no matter for this now. You don't want compliments or gratitude, having had enough of these of late, exclusive even of the indirect compliments which Payne has rendered you in attempting to filch from you your good name.

Let me help you to an "item" regarding Payne, which, if correct, is all you will need to set him in his true light before all intelligent readers. I cannot vouch for the truthfulness of the statement, but you can determine that, pro or con, for yourself. I have not seen a copy of Payne's Age of Reason, but I am informed, by a friend who is not apt to blunder, that, some time within the last month (February), Payne published, as an original communication to his paper, an article which originally appeared in the Winsted Press (a very able and spicy paper published in the borough of Winsted, Litchfield county, in this State) on the 31st of January last, under the caption, "Hell in a Hamlet." I did not think to inquire if Payne preserved the caption, but I presume he did. I send you, by same mail with this, my copy of the Press of that date (Jan. 31st), containing the article in question. By examining Payne's paper issued since that date (for of course the scamp hands you copies), you can readily determine whether he has played the literary thief in this instance. If he has, "that's enough," isn't it? He not only copies an article without crediting the journal from which it is taken, and so writes "no gentleman" on his brow, but also, practically, steals it, by his method of appropriation, and thus brands "thief" on his forehead, too. "By these signs" let all men know him hereafter. Please let us know what the facts are. LEX.

REMARKS.—The issue of Payne's Age of Reason in which appears the article from the Winsted Press alluded to in the two foregoing letters is No. 9, dated Feb. 16, and the article is in the second column of the third page. With the exception of a single paragraph, the article is transferred bodily, caption, signature, and all; and the word Connecticut is added to fix the locality, and "Editor Age of Reason" is placed at the beginning to convey the false impression that it was written for the latter paper. It would, of course, have been far more honorable to have given credit to the Press for the article—which, by the way, is a very good one—instead of filching it and claiming its paternity. It is to be feared that this borrowing without giving credit is a constitutional tendency with the Age of Reason. We noticed that on several occasions in its earlier issues, before it got to thinking our editorials were so "thin," it took several of our articles, wholly or in part, without giving the slightest credit. In our opinion, it is more honorable to write "thin" editorials than to thicken them with the stolen thoughts of others. Whatever is worth copying is worth giving due credit for. We have on file in our office No. 31 of the Winsted Press and No. 9 of the Age of Reason, containing the same article. If any friends wish to compare the two they can be accommodated.—[ED. T. S.]

BUCHANAN, MICH., March 2, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We have organized a local Independent Liberal Society here. We hold meetings every two weeks, on Sunday. The following persons are the officers of the society: President, Geo. W. Reese; Vice-President, L. W. Spaulding; Secretary, J. E. Coveney; Treasurer, Mrs. M. E. Reese; and Trustees, L. W. Spaulding, Joseph Coveney, and Ezekiel Spaulding. We propose to make a judicious distribution of the tracts we have ordered, and to do all that we can to advance the cause of Freethought and Liberalism. GEORGE W. REESE.

SCRANTON, PA., March 4.

D. M. BENNETT: It is much to be regretted that the proprietor of the Opera House in this city refused the use of his building for the Ingersoll lecture, simply because he did "not think Mr. Ingersoll preached the right doctrine." But such was the case. When he lets his house for such immoral plays as the "Pink Dominos," and other low ballet-dancing shows, we wonder whether he ever thinks what an injury is being done to the public morals! But we were not deprived of hearing Mr. Ingersoll, after all. The management arranged a special train to convey all who wanted to hear him to Wilkesbarre, and there were about two hundred who availed themselves of the opportunity. And I must say that I think he can double discount any speaker or preacher I ever heard.

Respectfully yours, A. H. HARTLEY.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., March 3, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $2.00. The times are so hard that a man with a family to care for finds it hard to spare money at all times. I will send the balance for the year's subscription in a few weeks. I received one of Payne's Age of Reason's the 1st of March. I don't know where he got my address, unless he stole it from your list. I don't want the paper, as THE TRUTH SEEKER is good enough for me. I did intend to take the Age of Reason as soon as I could afford to; but, under the circumstances, I don't want it. I think it advisable for you to keep your list of subscribers out of his way. Friendly enemies are bad ones to deal with, as one dislikes to quarrel with a friend. Yours with respect, H. FOOTE.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Feb. 24, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I learn with much regret, and no surprise, that you are not worth two hundred thousand dollars! I wish you were. And if you had made it by the sale of your cheap Liberal literature, the world would be the better for it, and not one in a thousand of your patrons would doubt that he had received the worth of his money.

Please place the amount of postal order inclosed ($10) to my credit for works hereafter to be ordered. The tidal wave of hard times has reached our city, and I find more men who can spare seventy-five cents than those who are willing to part with three dollars at a time. For the convenience of such I like to have always a small credit on your books. A like arrangement might be useful in other places. I am desirous to retain for you all your present patrons here, and to add to their number, and shall try hard to do so, "if it takes all summer."

Yours, as ever, ALMOND OWEN.

MARION, MASS., March 1, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am glad that you give the labor question so much room, for it needs it, and will need it more now that The Radical Review is gone. I am not surprised that Payne, Peterson, and some others are jealous of you, and try to kill THE TRUTH SEEKER, for it far excels all other Liberal papers that I have ever seen, not alone in quantity, but also in quality. But they may as well try to drain the Mississippi as to kill THE TRUTH SEEKER. A little opposition will do no harm, but, rather, good. You have the best of Cyrus Romulus so far, and, of course, will come out ahead. Harry Hoover expressed my opinion of him, in No. 8 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in very good shape. I will not take up your time with a long letter, for I know that you have a better use for it; so will bid you good-by. Yours truly, C. M. HAMMOND.

DEADWOOD, D. T., Feb. 24, 1878.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I don't believe you are worth two hundred thousand dollars; but I really wish you were worth ten times that amount, for I don't know of a man that makes more effective use of his means.

Respectfully, H. M. EASTMAN.

LAINGSBURGH, MICH., Feb. 20, 1878.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed $2.00, the amount due for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your paper is rightly named. I could not think of doing without it—wish it came twice a week. I have received two circulars from Seth Wilbur Payne, asking me to subscribe for his Age of Reason. He is altogether too much of a Comstock advocate for me, so I shall decline. How despicable, how much beneath a man, to try to injure you, when you have been, and still are, toiling to elevate humanity! I did get him three trial subscribers on receipt of the first circular, before I knew the sentiments of the brainless puppy. With many wishes for your welfare and prosperity, I am,

Respectfully, MRS. N. P. MCCLINTOCK.

COSHOCTON, O., Feb. 16, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: When Rev. G. H. Humphrey accuses Bob Ingersoll of inconsistency, as a "free" thinker and advocate of "free" thought, in charging a fee to hear his Freethought lectures, he unwittingly acknowledges that he is himself opposed to liberality; free thought, or even a "free gospel," because he places the barrier of an admission fee between every man in the universe and the sound of his voice when he preaches the gospel, so called. And, more than that, he works for hire on the "holy" Sabbath day when he teaches the common herd that they must not labor for gain on that particular day. Just cut off brother Humphrey's Sunday salary, and his great zeal in the salvation of other people's souls would become an indefinite quantity, and he would be apt to say to those who refused him a fat salary that their souls might "go to hell," and he would go to hoeing corn or doing something else to earn an honest living; so fifty thousand others of his trade would do under the same circumstances. He even placed the barrier of fifty cents between my reading his book, "Hell and Damnation," and my soul's salvation.

W. S. W.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, March 2, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have been an attentive reader of your paper for some time past, and have often felt like shaking the hand of a worthy brother like yourself—one who is so earnestly engaged in showing up the follies, errors, and superstitions of past ages, and mainly, the inconsistencies of the present so-called Christian religion. The manliness of the positions in your debates are to your credit; and were it in my power, you should be rewarded for your indefatigable efforts to place man on a higher and a nobler plane, by showing up his errors, and teaching him to accept truth, and to reason out for himself what tends most to his happiness in this world, for not till we do our own thinking shall we be rid of creeds, dogmas, and superstitions, accompanied by bishops and priests; and to this end, you are doing a splendid work; offering your readers the thoughts of such choice heads as Spencer, Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, Draper, Haeckel, Lewes, and others, which are indeed valuable. The clear, practical thoughts of Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker are always appreciated. Such lectures as Col. Ingersoll's should also find a place in your paper.

Now, friend Bennett, this letter does not contain dollars; but for myself, I feel that labors such as yours should at least be appreciated, and I know your little sheet is doing a vast amount of good. Being convinced of your honesty, and knowing your views, as I tread my humble path in life, you may consider me a defender of them; and should the dollars flow in upon me, I may have a few left for your cause. With sincerity I remain, JOHN JASTER, JR.

WOLCOTT, N. Y., March 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As I see my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER has expired, inclosed you will find the amount for renewal for the ensuing year. Press on, friend Bennett! You are doing more for the cause of Liberalism than all the other Liberal editors combined. I had intended to take the Age of Reason, but when I saw what I knew to be the false and slanderous charges against you, I at once concluded that its editor was either a fool or a knave. Hoping you may live long to enjoy the blessing your valor has brought, I remain, Fraternally yours, J. M. COSAD.

NAPLES, N. Y., March 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am heartily glad to hear that the "Bennett-Teed Discussion" is brought to a close. His baloon ascensions make me dizzy. I have read of men whose great misfortune was being born a hundred years before their time, but his misfortune is in being born millions of years too late. He could have rendered immense service to "old Splitfoot" and "Jah" could he have been in at the creation and helped them to manipulate the ether and bring something out of nothing. He is too ethereal for me. I find myself unable to follow the high-down-low-up-ring-tail-puppy-diddle-boodle-thread of his argument. Good-by Mr. Cyrus Romulus Redeemer Teed.

Truly yours, JOHN PECK.

SNOWVILLE, VA., MARCH 1, 1878.

FRIENDS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Do you want to do a good deed for Bro. Bennett, a better one for the cause, and one best of all for yourself? If so, go at once, secure a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, add two dollars of your own and get, as a reward, "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." A chance to get a book like this is not one to be slighted. It is a book you will want on your table whenever you read and write. The biography of one thousand and thirty-seven of the thinkers of this world is a valuable treasure. We all have a natural desire to know the private life of a great and good man or woman. We read their articles in the papers and hear of their noble deeds, and long to know a thousand little things about them; well, here they are, and all written out in an entertaining manner, too. As highly as I value every volume of my Truth Seeker Library, I must say, of them all, this is the book I would be least willing to part with. It seems to make me personally acquainted with so many of our dead champions and living co-workers for the cause of mental freedom. I love the book. and I want every Infidel to have it as a companion and household friend. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

MANKATO, MINN., FEB. 28, '78.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have watched your rise and progress from the first, and glory in your late triumph over the Inquisition sought to be established in this country. You will remember us when we exchanged our Kingdom of Heaven for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I came here to this State, now over a year ago, to work as State Lecturer for the State Association of Spiritualists, but neither Spiritualism nor this State is wide enough for me, so I am on my way to labor in Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas. Please notify Liberalists, through THE TRUTH SEEKER. Give them my address, Farmington, Dacota Co., Minn., and send specimens to Winnebago City, Minn., care of Stephen D. Hatcher, and we will send you all the subscribers we can.

Yours truly, THOS. COOK.

VICTORIA, VANCOUVER'S ISLAND, B. C., Feb. 15, 1878.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Enclosed I send you the small sum of eleven dollars which has been handed to me by a few friends here for the purpose of your defense against that miscreant, Comstock, or to be applied to any other purpose you think proper. I also enclose my subscription of three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Go on, Bro. Bennett, and may the good angels comfort you.

Yours truly, JAMES FELL.

P. S. I enclose you a letter that I received yesterday from one of the directors of our Public Hospital, where I visit nearly every Sunday; and for leaving a few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with one of the patients have aroused their pious ire, as you see by the contents of the enclosed. Poor deluded Christians; are they not to be pitied?

CLAY, N. Y., Feb. 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: I find it is more than we can bear to part with our old friend, THE TRUTH SEEKER. At one time I concluded I could not continue it at its present price, and continue our other reading matter, but as each week brings your valuable paper well freighted with interesting matter, I have concluded to send small installments from time to time as circumstances will permit. Inclosed you will find one dollar to be placed to my credit, and before that is exhausted I will remit again. I have just read your last letter to Cyrus Romulus R. Teed in the discussion, and my convictions are that he had better "throw up the sponge" and own up, that he is handsomely whipped. I think Teed is in a transition state, passing from orthodoxy to the Infidel ranks. Soon as he outgrows his early teachings and gets his mental freedom, he too will, in my opinion establish and publish an Infidel paper. "I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet," but bear in mind, friend Bennett, I am good at guessing. "The world does move," and THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the great levers that has given it an impetus (the mental world).

With my hearty wishes for your success in fighting the battles for mental freedom. I bid you a happy good night.

Thine for truth, ORRIS BARNES.

KALAMAZOO. MICH., March 1, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Enclosed find money order for $3, for the renewal of my subscription to the best of papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the enlargement, and I like its internal growth since the New Year. It is full of interest, and worth the money it costs. I, too, did not like the uncalled-for attempts of the Age of Reason to injure you financially. I have read several copies of said paper, but I prefer the peerless and outspoken TRUTH SEEKER. There is much at the present time to cheer and give hope. Your arrest by Comstock, Rev. Beecher's and other divines' punching a hole in the bottom of hell and letting out the brimstone, and many other questions of a local and public nature, are causing agitation of thought upon the subject of life and the hereafter. LEVI WOOD.

CONCORD, ILL., Feb. 13th, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: I am a truth seeker, and a great lover of the truth, but I do not find truth in all that Eugene Macdonald says in your issue of Jan. 5, 1878, on "The Labor Question." His first proposition seems absurd to me, and would to every other thinking man in the land if he would lay aside his prejudice. He says, "the prosperity of the nation lies in the prosperity of the individual." Now, let us see. Suppose I illustrate a little: There was once a President of the United States; his name was U. S. Grant. There never was another so prosperous an individual known in the history of our benighted country as he, and what was the effect upon the nation? That it is anything but prosperity is plainly to be seen. If Macdonald would reverse the proposition and say the prosperity of the people depended upon the honest administration of the Government, then he would have hit the nail squarely on the head. Again, he says: "A country in which every person has a moderate competency would never suffer from hard times." Great God! What does he call a moderate competency? Does he suppose that this people can pay a debt of $48 per capita with a competency of about $12 per capita and prosper? Is there an idiot in all the land who would not say we must suffer from hard times when we are in debt four times as much as we have got to pay with? How is an individual to prosper under these circumstances.

He further says: "That there is an overproduction of people in this country." I do not think Mr. Macdonald means that this country will not hold them all, but that there are too many people for the amount of money in circulation. If he does not mean that, he certainly is very ignorant of this vast domain in which we live. You hear overproduction preached on every hand. Overproduction of what? Money? No! What then? People, cattle, hogs, corn, machinery, and everything under the sun. The same people who tell us this also tell us we must economize, which would of course make the surplus greater. A gentleman of my acquaintance who keeps a little variety store said to me not long since that "the trouble in this country is, that we are too extravagant; that we ought to economize."

"All right sir," said I. "We will economize; we will not buy any of your goods for six months, and see how you like economy."

"Well," said he, "I have a little piece of land; I will go to producing."

"All right, sir. So, economy ruins your business on one hand and overproduction on the other, then how do you better your condition."

Oh! Ignorance where is thy bliss?

Mr. Macdonald further states that education is the only remedy for the hard times, the only doctor that can make us well. I will agree with the gentleman on the last propositions, but I do not propose to stop in this hour of great need to place the whole American voting population in college. Let us try to educate the people in the way they should go by having them read THE TRUTH SEEKER (barring such articles as Mr. Macdonald's) and Pomeroy's Democrat, and also Pomeroy's "American Finance." If the people do not heed the great truths set forth by these great newspapers, then they may die in ignorance, unless the God of nature, through some other medium, should open their prejudiced eyes. ROBERT H. CRAIG.

CLEARFIELD, PA., Feb. 13, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I confess I felt a little "dubersome" about the propriety of enlarging THE TRUTH SEEKER, but after a two-months trial I am so well pleased with it that I heartily approve of your action. I enclose a contribution which I trust you may be able to find room for.

Tell friend Macdonald to put on the gaffs and lay the feathers of some of the numerous game birds that feel inclined to crow over him. Go in Mac! Brother Bennett, I heartily approve of the position you take on the labor and financial question. I have frequently been tempted to write on the subject myself, especially when I see people who have the credit of having brains writing in defense of the sacred rights of bondholders, land pirates, and public thives generally—helping the very class which is abundantly able to protect and help itself. I am in favor of more money, gold, silver, and greenbacks. More work, more pay, more and better food and clothing. More education, amusement, culture, liberty, health, and happiness.

Yours truly, HARRY HOOVER.

The Law of Liberty.

EXTRACT FROM A SUNDAY MORNING DISCOURSE BY THE REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, MARCH 3, 1878.

There is a society in this city organized for the suppression of vice. The spirit and purpose of this society, I take to be honestly and simply this—to suppress vice, to keep down the elements that are perpetually demoralizing and rooting out the best seeds of human nature. With the methods by which this society seeks to achieve the results, I have no sympathy whatever. Indeed, I protest with all my heart against some of the methods which they conspicuously employ, acting the spy, creeping into houses under false pretenses, lying, betraying men to their harm, speaking as though they meant well when they mean ill.

Was truth ever furthered by falsehood? Was deception ever a minister to virtue? Shall we set Beelzebub to cast out Beelzebub? Not so! If the higher powers are to subdue the lower, it must be by open and honorable warfare. It is of their essence that they are dignified, elevated and pure, taking every advantage which nobleness gives, scorning all advantage which only baseness allows.

Again, I protest with all my might against the inquisition into the mail service of the United States. If there is one thing upon which a free people must plant themselves firmly, never to be moved, it is this principle that there must be no tampering with the mails, and that whatever is deposited in the mail must go to its destination. Let the harm be checked on the spot where it falls. If injury is done, let it be repaired where it is done; not on the way, not after it has started. Meet it where it occurs.

Again, what honorable, high-minded soul does not blush with indignation when he sees the confusion that is made by people who insist upon it that liberty of thought, freedom of speculation, freedom of speech, involves license of conduct, and when war is openly made upon free-thinking on the ground that in that very movement, and by that very process, war is made against licentious doing. The two things are not only different, but absolutely and forever hostile, the one to the other, and when the society adopts such methods as it commonly does, methods of confusion, then it is difficult even to make allowance for the spirit with which the association works, and not doubt the heart of that society.

I imply to arrest whatever endeavors are made to corrupt youth, to mislead the young and inexperienced, to sow the seeds of demoralization in the soul, where virtue must grow if society is to flourish, is not the question. It is whether there be, or be not, a hierarchy in moral qualities; whether some men are not superior to others; whether there are not ranks in character, and whether there is not such a thing as higher and lower. Are we to put Jesus and Judas on the same plane? Are we to classify together under one definition those who destroy and those who build up—those who civilize and those who would ruin the world? No. I appeal here to the common sense of the the world itself; I hear human nature through all its voices protesting against this confusion of ideas.

A Correction by Mr. Frothingham.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: The reporter of my free and easy talk about the Apocryphal Gospels apparently misunderstood some of my statements, and my critic at Washington might easily have been severe on such blunders as he detects. My "lecture" was popular and unstudied, but it was intended to be accurate, and I could not have said that no apocryphal gospels were in existence beyond the year 325; that they were all written in Greek, or that "they never had any respect among the dignitaries of the Church." The mistake came of trying to say too much in too short a time, and thus confusing points. Yours truly, O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

50 W. 36th street, March 1, 1878.

Prison Reform.

Nothing to-day demands more attention and a more thorough overhauling than the prison system of this country. The recent revelations concerning the New Jersey State Prison reveal a state of affairs that few could have been induced to believe could have existed. Prisoners have not only been whipped and put in cold, dark, damp cells, and in some instances, in violation of law, confined there a whole year, but they have been hung up by the thumbs, put on stretchers, and at least one has been killed. A portion of the testimony before the legislative committee is reported in the N. Y. Sun as follows:

"Dr. W. W. Phillips, the prison physician, testified to having seen men gagged and stretched up; also to having seen convicts with the placard 'Thief' on their backs. Never watched to see how men in the stretcher endured it. Had been called by keepers Wilson, Howell, and Robinson to examine prisoners, to see whether they had been punished too much. Was summoned on the morning that Snook died. Found him lying dead on the floor of a dark cell. Inquired of Perry, the marshal, who said that he had been strung up, and seemed to be suffering severely; that he was taken down and died. Did not know that he died while in the stretcher until Perry testified to it on the stand. Said to County Physician Mackenzie, after he came, that there was a peculiarity about Snook's death, as he had been undergoing punishment. Did not say what kind of punishment. Would have told the County Physician had he known that Snook died in the stretcher. Snook was suffering from chronic menengitis, and was liable to sudden death, and the punishment may have hastened it. The stretcher is a severe punishment. Did not hear that Snook was sick on the night before or that he had asked for a physician.

"Witness testified to using alcohol as a test for men who were shamming. Only used it twice. One turned out to be insane. One time it exposed the imposition. Never knew the burning with alcohol to be used anywhere else, and never used it in his practice elsewhere. Never knew any cruelty to be inflicted in the prison. Witness denied describing the stretcher, boot-heel gag or paddle to Dr. Corson. Had known men under Mr. Wilson to be kept three or four weeks chained down to the floor of a cell, and not allowed to get up. The punishment under other keepers was the same as it is now. Short and severe punishment is more humane than long confinement in the dungeon. Have known refractory prisoners to refuse to work, and to avoid doing so almost cut off their fingers.

"Robert H. Howell, a former keeper, testified that the punishments used by him were the same as those now used except the gag. Always kept a man on his feet when in the stretcher. Visited the Albany (N. Y.) Penitentiary. There they fasten the prisoners to the floor and stretch them up. Was a delegate to the International Prison Congress in London. Think that short and severe punishment is the best.

"Frank H. Sayler, an ex-inspector, testified that the stretcher was used under Mr. Wilson, and that men had been kept in it for over two hours. Once a man was kept in the dungeon chained down for over a year. It was the darkest dungeon in the prison."

Is there no way to imprison and care for dangerous men without subjecting them to the mercies of those liable to be worse than themselves? It is true the commissioners make their regular visiting rounds, but what good does it do? The officers feed, flatter, and pet them; show them just what they choose and make them believe that paradise is not much of a place for happiness compared with the particular prison under their charge. If prisoners are asked how they are treated, they know it is about as much as their life is worth to complain. Every complaint is stoutly denied by the officers, and the prisoners' testimony is taken as only the word of criminals as against that of honest men, and, when the commissioners are gone the prisoners are punished for having made complaint.

Now, that the New Jersey legislature has gone into this matter it is to be hoped it will make thorough work. Let there be no whitewashing. If the general courts of other states will follow the example of that of New Jersey it will be well for a helpless class. MOSES HULL.

More of my Thoughts.

BROTHER BENNETT: You seem to be undergoing some very sharp criticisms. Dr. Carl H. Horsch quite overreached decency in his "Open Letter No. 2." It is painful to see such a spirit of bitterness manifested among those claiming to be Liberalists. We hope for better things in the future. One writer in speaking of Madam Restell's arrest says: "Thanks to the energy and tact of Anthony Comstock, this creature was dragged from her palatial home and lodged like a felon in a cell of our city prison. Among all her former companions not one dared to come forward to go upon her bail bond." The same writer gives a glowing description of her home and furniture and great wealth obtained by her "shameful trade." What class of citizens have patronized this woman for nearly forty years? How has she accumulated such a vast amount of wealth; surely it has not been accomplished by the patronage of the poor. The rich, the upper-ten, of society must have been her employers. And why are they afraid to stand by her now in her time of trial? Has she not stood by them in their time of trial, and done for them all they required of her to do to cover their shame? has she forced her services upon any one? is it a greater crime for her to practice abortion than for doctors to practice it? It is a business that is and always has been practiced to a great extent, and always will be until people learn a more legitimate and natural way of sexual association without procreation than is now generally understood. This sexual matter seems at present to be controlled by Comstock. He will not permit anything to pass through the mails giving wholesome instructions how to prevent the necessity of abortion, and has now turned his attention to abortionists, although at one time he claimed to be in a situation to require their skill. Perhaps "Madam Restell" relieved him of his burden; if so, it must have required great skill; and I do think it is mean to turn upon the old lady so ungratefully if he has received relief at her hands. Perhaps Anthony would like to drive all the world to become Shakers. Now, seriously, does any thinking person believe Madam Restell's arrest was executed for any other purpose than to obtain a portion of her wealth. ZUBA.

Will Religious Teachers Awake to the Danger of the Crisis?

The following unhappy remarks we take from a late article in the N. Y. Sun:

The threatening form which Infidelity has lately put on, and its rapid progress among educated minds demand counteracting efforts from the friends of religion which they do not seem to be making. With the exception of the Rev. Joseph Cook, none of our divines even attempt to meet in a popular way the objections of modern science to hitherto accepted dogmas of faith. The bold challenge of Dr. Tyndall to submit the efficacy of prayer to the best of actual experience was not taken up as it would have been by a prophet of old, but was avoided in a manner indicating a lack of confidence in a favorable result. Recent critical researches tending to discredit the authenticity and inspiration of the Scriptures call forth only a repetition of time-worn arguments; the belief in miracles receives a feeble and half-hearted support, and the eternal punishment of the wicked is formally denied by numerous ministers of what were once orthodox sects. Added to these symptoms of weakness, a decline is everywhere to be noticed of that interest in the spread of religion which prevailed thirty or forty years ago. The revivals which have invariably followed our former great business reverses have been wanting during the whole of the present long-continued season of financial distress—the meetings of Moody and Sanky forming no real exception to the general state of religious indifference. Preachers and religious journals constantly complain that the churches are not gaining in numbers and influence at home, and that the missionary work abroad languishes. We have entered, in fact, upon a period of deadness in religion; and it prevails most among the most educated kind of people.

As we said at first, the advocates of religion are either not awake to the importance of the crisis or else feel themselves unable to meet it. We do not refer to the old and familiar form of Infidelity of which Mr. Ingersoll is now the most conspicuous disciple; but to the more radical and destructive philosophy of modern science. Animated by its spirit, skeptics are now demanding evidence of the existence of a personal God, of a life after death, in the inspiration of the Scriptures, of an overruling Providence, of the efficacy of prayer, and of the reality of all that immense fabric of religious doctrine which has been building up for the past eighteen hundred years; and they will not rest content with mere denunciation of their unbelief, nor with arguments based upon unconceded and undemonstrated assumptions. Ever since the revival of learning, in fact, the Church, or, at least, one or the other branch of it, has been yielding as untenable one dogma after another. The process has now reached a point where its very citadel is threatened, and yet its appointed guides do not seem to be aware of the peril which is at hand, and make no efforts to avert it. Thousands of honest and educated minds are already shaken from the ancient moorings of faith and peace. It is not enough to say that the Church, being divine, will stand against every assault, for that ultimate security will not avail for the myriads of souls that are now in danger. Something must be done soon or the mischief may become serious indeed. Will the clergy and the teachers of religion awake to the incomparable duty of the hour?

Letter from Mr. Butts.

NEW YORK, Feb. 24, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I am sorry that an undue excess of frankness on your part impelled you to publish the jealous fault-findings and mad maunderings of mean souls who look with green eyes upon your herculean labors in the cause of Liberalism. I believe not one of them all deserves your magnanimity less than the Dover doctor, Carl H. Horsch. For his sake and the sake of his favorite, whose superior virtue needs to be vouched for so constantly, and aired in the highways and hawked in the market places, and, seriously, for the sake of a cause which these men, in a narrow and self-seeking way, are believed to be still serving, you should have omitted the M.D.'s "Open Letter, No. 2," which you published on page 120 of the current volume. Having done so, however, you cannot refuse me a chance to defend myself against the petty and malicious insinuations of his first two questions.

"Did you act in accordance with the advice of Asa K. Butts regarding the introduction and circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER?"

I wish you could have truthfully replied in the affirmative. You remember you asked my advice about coming to New York, and I advised you not to come. The event is not so creditable to my judgment as my pride might have desired. But what was the motive of our little M.D. in asking this first question? Because he knew that I had been, in its most prosperous days, the largest stockholder and the business manager of The Index and he hoped by his next question to insinuate that you had obtained the mail list of The Index surreptitiously through me.

Perhaps it is a good thing for the Dover doctor and his prince of purity that he opened upon me at this juncture. We will see. Perhaps it is a good thing for the cause of Radicalism that a certain shining bubble should be pricked here and now. Whether it is or not, the responsibility rests entirely with the Dover doctor and the "pure" party who inspired him. And here let me say that I ignore these people when I can. I have never attacked them. My defense when attacked by them has been too meagre for my own good. Out of sheer disgust, I will leave such termigants to themselves when I can. I will leave to time the rectification of certain mistakes into which those who should be my friends have fallen.

You say you presume "some of the names on a list of six thousand, given you by a friend, were Index subscribers." Very likely. A man could hardly pick up six thousand names of Liberals in this country without getting a few Index subscribers among them. I will tell Dr. Horsch who gave you the list of six thousand names and where it was obtained. And after I have confessed my sins I will ask Dr. H. to listen to a very true little story about the first eminent "purist" who used an unauthorized name, and beside it the use of McKesson & Robbins' name by you shows whiter than snow. To every statement I make I will show all the proof Dr. H. will care to see. Let him give the gentlest intimation that he would like to see the documents and they shall be forthcoming.

First. I gave you the list of six thousand names, and some one thousand or one thousand two hundred of them were in the Index mail list in 1871, when I came to the aid of the sinking Index. But for my exertions The Index would never have seen the end of its second year. The society which had previously supported its editor had become disorganized, so much so that it could not support him. The two business men who had supported The Index had become weary. Its editor didn't know what was to become of himself and family. He professed himself under the deepest obligation to me for coming to the rescue.

At first I gave money, and more of it than the Dover doctor ever did. Then I gave the time and talents of a successful business man. Yes, time, and plenty of it, to the serious neglect of my own business. Business hours and evenings, and all day Sunday, in season and out of season, all through my usual summer vacation, I labored unceasingly to increase the "mail list of The Index" and its stock list, too. But for my encouragement the latter affair would never have been started. I and my employees secured about one-half of the $100,000 pledges, and the rest came because of our success. I employed several men to assist me. Wherever we went we inquired out the Radicals and Liberals. We went to places where no Index or other Liberal paper had ever been seen. There we asked of booksellers and newsdealers if there were any men in town who didn't go to church and read church papers and who did read Paine and Voltaire.

When we found such men, we ransacked their memories for names of similar men far and near. All these names we put on my books first, and thence on The Index mail list. I paid for scores, and I think hundreds of three months, subscribers out of my own funds, and the parties, some of them, never themselves gave a cent to The Index fund. I gave some time and hundreds in money to Mr. Towne of The Examiner and Mr. Morse of The Radical. From them I obtained many names. I searched files of all the Liberal papers for names. I was paying $100 per year for a seat in an Independent church in New York. I asked its secretary for a list of its members. Of course I got it. Each one of these became the centre of others, and so The Index mail list grew to about five times what it was when I found it on its last legs. The stock list pledged nearly $10,000 per year. This list was published openly, and so was the name of any man who sent a dime to The Index. These names so procured and so used, to whom did they belong? When the senior partner of a firm finds a small mare's nest in his suspicious soul, and out of pure cussedness kicks over the house they have built together, was it ever claimed that the junior partner should go out of business—should never communicate with the customers of the firm? Four thousand of its highest number of names it would never have seen but for me. But the thousand which it had at the start I should have found without it in some of the ways above mentioned, for I was in earnest when I went into Radical propagandism. I didn't go into it because I was too quarrelsome and impractical to get a living elsewhere. I immediately went to publishing books and pamphlets. No man in this country has done more of that in so short a time, unless you, Mr. Editor, may be an exception. In twelve months I published about a dozen bound books, and five or six dozen tracts and pamphlets. I advertised widely in all sorts of papers, and so my list grew to six thousand or so, and then I offered it to you. I was careful to tell you that I obtained it from various sources. I remember you asked me if it was The Index list, and I told you, "No! it is my list." I foresaw this very sharp-nosed ferret, the M. D., in the distance, so you are blameless, at any rate.

Another word as to the list, for it may be said that while I obtained the names or part of them, I was in the employ of the organization which I had created. So I was nominally—and further, that I was paid for obtaining these names; this is not true. Of course I did not keep three or four travelers at work in those expensive days without some assistance, but I did not receive anything like adequate compensation, nor what was agreed on, either. Nearly all my contracts with the Index Association were cancelled on one pretense or another, and my hard efforts were neutralised, my interest rendered valueless, and The Index a beggar.

I can show Dr. H. proofs of the above statements in the handwriting of his own man, for I preserved these documents, at first from a tenderer motive, and now for self-protection. Does Dr. H. desire me to publish them in THE TRUTH SEEKER?

Now for a parable of the Pharisees. I prefer to use initials, and to bring into this story as few names as possible, leaving it quite to Dr. H. to call for names in full and documents in full, which are ready in my hands. The initials I use may or may not be the right ones. Those who have been behind the scenes will recognize some of them, and I would not spread the scandal even to show the insincere malice of those who have tried to stab you in the rear.

The scene of this parable is Boston and New York. The time some three or four years ago. A small room near Tremont Place, Boston. A business meeting of the Pointer's Association. Mr. A., the "business manager," is in the chair. He has before him a "Private circular to the friends of the P. A." It is a carefully and deliberately concocted three pages of foul and wicked libels upon a certain Mr. B. of New York. It is absurd on the face of it. The very figures in it lie in each other's faces. Mr. A. thinks it will be effective as a martyr's cry. The funds of the Pointers are low. He signs the paper without hesitation. He hands it to Messrs. C., D., and E., members present, declares it is all right, and they—being also residents of Boston, and like Mr. A., quite irresponsible, pecuniarily, for what they say—sign it also.

At this stage enters Mr. F., also a member of the P. A., a wealthy man, and one reputed calm and just, and withal a resident of New York. We can not vouch for the exact words which followed. We are certain that A. saw the importance of having a name of some weight on the paper. Mr. F. was the most eminent man among all the Pointers, Setters, and Ferrets. A. handed him the paper and said that his signature was necessary to make it effective. Mr. F. read it over hurriedly and said: "I cannot sign this about B. I do not know or want to know if it is true, but enough of this abuse has been published before. I don't wish to see any more of it. Our whole P. A. has run a long time on the pecuniary impetus given it by this B. Our people are disgusted with the continual harping on this same string, and if we can't raise money on any better cry, let us go down". A. tried to show the logical necessity of the situation. "If people can only see what a rascal B. is, they can infer what a saint and holy martyr am I." Mr. F. would listen to no logic. He simply said, "I cannot sign it unless you leave out all this about B.," and he turned on his heel, without signing it, and left for New York.

A.'s logic came into play at once. It is a powerful organ—his reasoning organ. He communed with himself thus: "Now, to leave out all about B. would make it like the play of Hamlet with Hamlet's part omitted. Mr. F. must have meant that the vituperative adjectives must be left out. Perhaps it will be all the more forcible to leave some of these out." He passed his pen through a few of those which meant merely a coarse "damn B.," signed Mr. F.'s name at the bottom, printed it, and sent it out. Mr. F. did not see the circular till it had been in circulation a long time. In grief and astonishment, he wrote to A. for an explanation. A. replied that he had not sent out but a thousand or two, and these to those who were firm friends to the Pointers. He did not think B. would find it out. B. did find it out after several weeks or months had passed, and immediately wrote to Mr. F. asking how he could have allowed his name to be signed to such a mess of lies. The great, eloquent President of all the Pointers replied with the most kind, full, and emphatic apologies that one gentleman could ask of another. It embodied all the facts we have stated, and more. He hinted very strongly to B. that the matter ought to drop, that it was now stale, and he would never allow such a thing to occur again if he could help it. Does Dr. H. wish to see this letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER? He has only to send you a word or two of insinuation against me, and I will put it at your service. Mr. F. made oath before an officer of the law to the same thing. It was in this wise: B., thinking he ought to have a public retraction and a vindication, and seeing that Mr. F. did not care or dare to give him one, sent his attorney to Boston to see what could be done. He reported that though the law of libel was much the same as in New York, yet the practice was different. In Massachusetts the most flagrant cases are only punished by nominal damages. The expense would be great, and the parties in Boston are protected by their impecuniosity.

Why don't you take this Mr. F., who is a responsible man and lives right here?

B. replied that "In the first place, Mr. F. is not so guilty as the others, and was only a sort of accessory after the fact by his neglect to publicly disavow it and expose the real perpetrator of the libels.

"Secondly, Mr. F. is my friend. I am in business relations with him. I have always admired him. He is a bright and shining light. I don't want to bring him into it. Besides, he will say that he never authorized such use of his name."

"Very well! If he does that under oath you are vindicated all the same."

B. followed the advice. Suit was commenced. Mr. F. sent his attorney to B. with assurances of the most innocent and kind intentions. B. replied that he valued not kindness less, but vindication more. So Mr. F. was forced to make a formal answer, which he made oath to. Perhaps Dr. H. will be in great haste to see this affidavit, which convicts his model of purity and honor of forging and publishing another man's name to a false and malicious libel, "utterly without my knowledge and against my wishes, and contrary to my express injunction," in effect says Mr. F., over his sworn signature. Of course B.'s attorney told him that his suit was at an end; nothing more could be done. A libel suit could not go on against a man whose name had been forged to the libel.

Now, friend Bennett, you will bear witness that I am not fond of "entrance to a quarrel." I am willing to leave to time all comparisons between me and my work and the Pharisaical ring which goes up and down the land shouting, "I am holier than thou." I will leave you to defend yourself when they come down here throwing mud about your gray head. You are abundantly able to defend yourself. But these quarrelsome people must keep away from me. I am comparatively young yet. I must defend myself, or no one will lift a hand for me. If Dr. H. wants to see this letter and this oath of Mr. F.'s, he will use my name again in a public print. Perhaps the comparison between you, Mr. Bennett, and the chief of Pharisees would not be so greatly to your disadvantage. Why don't these men act like men, and not like sneaks? If it is absolutely necessary that Dr. H. should periodically abuse, vilify, and libel me, why does he not take up and go on with the suit he began against me years ago? Why does he not get some responsible man of his clique, if it has a representative in New York, to publish these libels, over his own signature, in New York, where I can reach him?

Mr. Editor, so long as these men will fight by our side in the cause of mankind, I am content to let bygones be bygones. I am willing to fight beside them, or under them, or below them, wherever my place is, and to trust them so far as they have the sagacity to see that the interest of the great cause we serve is coincident with their own, but no further; but when they undertake to stab you in the back, for fear they shall not have it all their own way in the New Jerusalem, then I think you should throw off your coat, roll up your sleeves, and handle these fellows without gloves.

Sincerely yours, ASA K. BUTTS.

GHOSTS! GHOSTS!! GHOSTS!!

Send five cents for COL. INGERSOLL'S lecture on "Ghosts," as delivered at Albany, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1878. Just out, flashing with wit and genius. It is crammed with logic, arguments, sarcasms and facts. It is beautiful, it is grand, and more, it is true. Only five cents. With a photograph of its eloquent author for fifteen cents. With cabinet size of the same, thirty cents.

"Ghosts and other Lectures." A new work by Col. Ingersoll, soon to be issued. Send me stamp, and as soon us the book is out, will send you descriptive circular and price thereof. Send three-cent stamp for Catalogue of Books, Tracts, Photographs, etc.; also, club rates for Liberal and scientific newspapers and periodicals. Address, E. C. WALKER,
6t6 Lock Box B. Florence, Iowa.

JUST OUT!

AURICULAR CONFESSION
AND
Popish Nunneries.

BY WM. HOGAN,

Twenty-five years Confessing Priest. A very interesting work. 220 pages. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents. D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF

CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact fac simile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is in England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on live issues with a promptitude unequaled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest, cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers.

The following are a few of the contributors: Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, Goldwin Smith, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Lionel A. Tallemache, M. E. Grant Duff, M. P., Hon. Robert Lowe, Leslie Stephen, John Morley (the editor), G. H. Lewes, Alfred R. Wallace, Frederick Harrison, Prof. Tyndall, Prof. Huxley, Prof. Darwin, Prof. Clifford (author of supernatural religion), Sir John Lubbock, Anthony Trollope, T. Adolphus Trollope, Sir H. S. Maine, Sir David Wedderburn, and numerous others.

Published every month,
Rose-Belford Publishing Co.,
tf 60 York St., Toronto, Ont.
Subscription Price, $5.00 per year.

A WIDOW lady, 37 years of age, medium height, good disposition, of sanguine temperament, deep experience, and broad sympathies, would like to make the acquaintance of a middle-aged gentleman (dark complexion preferred), who is possessed of sense and culture, and able to provide a comfortable home—one understanding the laws of the higher monogamic marriage, willing and able to live them. Communications strictly confidential; but to secure attention gentlemen will please enclose return postage.
MRS. M. C. ELLSWORTH,
2t10 Box 144, Worcester, Mass.

NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.
THE
Great Magnetic Remedy.

DO YOU SMOKE?
DO YOU CHEW?
DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective. Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed we warrant the REMEDY to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.

Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.

Address,
J. A. HEINSOHN & CO., Manufacturers.
9t8 CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Hell! Hell! Hell!

Send five cents for COL. INGERSOLL'S Lecture at Chickering Hall, New York, on Feb. 3d, upon that warm subject, "HELL," "GHOSTS," and "LIBERTY," in one pamphlet, for 15 cents.
Address E. C. WALKER,
3t8 Lock Box B., Florence, Iowa.

ART OF PROPAGATION.

Is a highly-illustrated practical work on the rapid increase and multiplication of stock. Published by JENKINS' GRAPE AND SEEDLING NURSERY, Winona, Columbiana County, Ohio. Price, prepaid, by mail, 50 cents. Catalogue free. Agents wanted. Address as above. 1t4

The Popes and Their Doings.

NO. 3 OF THE "HOLY CROSS SERIES."

Being brief stories of fully one hundred and fifty of the conspicuous and sinful Popes—the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God—who filled the chair of the Holy See in Rome during several centuries. The cheapest and most popular history of the Popes ever written. A friend styles it "rich, rare and racy." 273 pp., 12mo. Sent by mail at the very low price of 50 cents in paper; 75 cents in cloth.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE. Truly one of the most valuable works that have appeare within the last ten years. By PROF. DRAPER. Price, $1.75.

PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION; or an answer to the question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Divinely-Inspired and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

POSITIVELY

$50 WOHTH OF INFORMATION

in form of a nice book of over 100 pages, well illustrated, sent post-paid, for $1.00

BY A PRACTICAL CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep the hens and hen-roosts free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in mid-winter. How to manage setting hens, chickens, etc., and how to preserve eggs a great length of time. Best breeds of hens, etc. Enclose $1.00 with order.

E. D. BLAKEMAN, Circleville, Ohio.

[Mr. Blakeman is a school-boy friend of ours. We know him well; he is entirely reliable, and the information he has to impart upon the poultry subject is valuable.—ED. T. S.] 9tf

TWO BOOKS ON FINANCE.

SPECIFIC PAYMENTS BETTER THAN SPECIE PAYMENTS.

BY EDWARD D. LINTON.

CONVERSATIONS ON THE CURRENCY.

BY EDW'D D. LINTON AND GEO. D. DRURY.

The question to be met and settled now is, Shall money continue to rule and curse mankind, or shall it be made to serve and bless?

Price 25c. For sale at this office.

The Priest in Absolution,

The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

☞The other twenty-five numbers of the "Holy Cross Series" are being brought out as rapidly as possible.

Positive Thinker,

Advocates Positive Philosophy and the Religion of Humanity.

One Year, $1.50; Six Months, 75 cents; Three Months, 40 cents; five to one post-office, $5.00; ten and one to getter-up of Club, $10.00. Issued weekly after the first three numbers. Subscribers will be entitled to the full number. Send five cents for copy and circular. 4t8

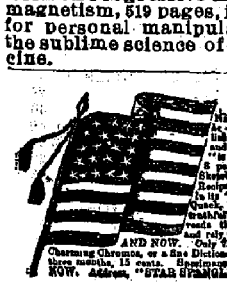
THE MYSTERY UNVEILED.

The miraculous conception and birth of JESUS CHRIST exposed and explained. A book for thinking men. Price, post-paid, 35 cents

Address BENTON BEMENT,
4t8 St. Johns, Mich.

LECTURES,

BY MRS. CLARA NEYMAN.



This talented lecturess will give the following lectures, at a reasonable compensation, before Liberal audiences, as may be desired:

1. German Skepticism.
2. What is True Religion?
3. Woman's Reform Work in Europe.

Address MRS. CLARA NEYMAN,
97 Maiden Lane, New York.

THE MAGNETIC TREATMENT.

Send 25 cents to DR. ANDREW STONE, Troy, N. Y., and obtain a large, highly-illustrated book on the system of Vitalizing Treatment. Also The New Gospel of Health for $1.25, a masterly work on progressive medicine and healing by magnetism, 519 pages, illustrated with 120 cuts for personal manipulations, explanatory of the sublime science of healing without medicine. 1y5

"IT STILL WAVES!" The old, original and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," the "FAMILY FAVORITE" and "Ne ne paper for THE MILLION. Established 1853. There's nothing like it. Old and young, rich and poor, saint and sinner,—"It waves for ALL." It is a large 6-column, 8 page paper, crowded with charming Tales, Sketches, Stories, Poems, Wit, Humor, Fun, Recipes, Puzzles, Humorous Poems, etc., etc. In its "EDITOR'S CORNER" every Saturday Quick, Humbug, and Fraud is fully, freely, and truthfully exposed. No one can be swindled who reads the "BANNER." 100,000 people read and rely upon this National Paper. TRY IT ONCE AND NOW. Only 25 cents a year, or with Premium of SIX Charming Chromos, or a fine Dictionary, cloth, 351 pages, only $1. Trial Trip, three months, 15 cents. Specimens FREE. Don't put it off but SEND NOW. Address, "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

THE OUTCAST.

By WINWOOD READE, author of "Martyrdom of Man."

This is his last work. Mr. Reade was unquestionably one of the ablest writers of the present century. His "Martyrdom of Man" attracted extraordinary attention in Europe and in this country, for its ability, brilliancy and boldness. This last work is regarded with equal favor. The English edition was published at two dollars. We give it entire for THIRTY CENTS IN PAPER.

ASTROLOGY.

PROF. LISTER, Astrologer, 505 W. 23d st., New York. 44 years' practice, 27 in Boston. Can be consulted by letter. Send for Circular. Address all letters 505 West 23d st., New York City.

SPERMATORRHŒA

should be in the hands of those suffering from this LIFE-WASTING DISEASE. It is an external application, and has thoroughly and permanently cured over one thousand cases, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had falling-sickness-fits; others on the verge of consumption, while others again had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information, address, with stamp, Vineland, N. J., where DR. FELLOWS is permanently located, and obtain his private circular, with cures sworn to, which is unimpeachable testimony to the doctor's skill and reliability as a physician in treating this prevalent and most dangerous of all diseases. SPERMATORRHŒA. 1tf

☞ TERMS WITHIN THE REACH OF ALL. ☜

BOOK BUYERS,

And all who wish to subscribe to periodicals should send 15 cents for No. 16 of The Evolution. Address

THE EVOLUTION, 34 Dey Street, N. Y.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

Address D. M. BENNETT, Publisher
141 Eighth St., New York.

JUST ISSUED.

BEYOND THE VEIL.

A very neat and entertaining volume, giving beautiful descriptions of life, occupations, etc., in the Spirit World. Dictated by the spirit of Percy B. Randolph, through the mediumship of Mrs. Francis H. McDougal and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson of California. With a steel-plate engraving of Dr. Randolph.

Price $1.50, post-paid by mail.

D. M. BENNETT
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

BOOKS FOR THE THOUGHTFUL.

PROMETHEUS. "To Destroy, you must Replace." PROMETHEUS is a Weekly Magazine designed as an aid to the Reconstruction of Society on the basis of the Philosophy of Science. It gives prominence to the best efforts of Constructive Thinkers in Europe. It is also a Record and Review of the best and latest Philosophical, Scientific, Oriental, and Rationalistic Literature, and contains a Select List of these works. Octavo, 32 pp. $3 per year, in advance, postpaid; single copy, 10 cents.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN. By WINWOOD READE. (Second edition,) Extra cloth, toned paper, 12mo, 543 pp. Post-paid, $3.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill.—[Literary World.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—[Penn Monthly.

NATHANIEL VAUGHAN. A Novel. By FREDERIKA MACDONALD, author of the "Iliad of the East," etc. 3 vols. in 1, extra cloth, black and gold side stamp, 12mo, 404 pp. Postpaid, $1.50.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not have been ashamed to own. . . . It is a really artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—[Westminster Review.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT THE DEVIL, and Other Biographical Sketches and Essays. By CHARLES BRADLAUGH. Portrait, 2d edition, extra cloth, gold side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp. Postpaid, $1.50.

In a handsome volume before us Charles Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his Few Words, and the Devil will, we presume, at no distant day, have a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—[Chicago Interior.

ISSUES OF THE AGE; Or, Consequences Involved in Modern Thought. By HENRY C. PEDDER. Extra cloth, beveled, gold back and side stamp, 12mo. Postpaid, $1.50.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—[New York Tribune.

THE POLITICS OF THE GOSPELS; Or, the Socialistic Element in the Early Christian Movement. By AUSTIN BIERBOWER. Extra cloth, 12mo. Postpaid, $1.50.

An interesting statement of the Socialistic tendencies, and purposes of the primitive Christians.

THE CHRIST OF PAUL; Or, the Enigmas of Christianity. St. John never in Asia Minor; Irenæus the author of the Fourth Gospel; the Frauds of the Churchmen of the Second Century Exposed. By GEORGE REBER. Extra cloth, 12mo, 400 pp. Postpaid, $2.

The purpose of this book is to convince the world that the greater part of the New Testament, as at present received by Christians, was fabricated by the dogmatists of the second century, to enforce doctrines which were not warranted by the original teachings of Christ and the Apostles. —[New York Daily World.

HEROINES OF FREETHOUGHT. By SARA A. UNDERWOOD. Large new type, heavy toned paper, broad margins. Extra cloth, 12mo, 327 pp. Postpaid, $1.75.

A series of brief biographies of the most distinguished Freethinking women of the past and present centuries, including Madame Roland, Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, Harriet Martineau, Frances Power Cobbe, George Eliot, and half a dozen others.

PERSONAL IMMORTALITY, and Other Papers. By JOSIE OPPENHEIM. Extra cloth, 12mo, 98 pp. Postpaid, $1.

A woman's modest and considerate statement of her dissent from current theological ideas—in which Immortality and Prayer are discussed with ability, from a standpoint of pure Rationalism.

THE HISTORICAL JESUS OF NAZARETH. By M. SCHLESINGER, Ph. D., Rabbi of the Congregation Anshe Emeth, Albany, N. Y. Extra cloth, 12mo, 98 pp. Postpaid, $1.

This little volume of less than a hundred pages contains what a conscientious and learned Jew of the nineteenth century has to say about Jesus Christ as an historical figure and character.—[St. Louis Republican.

THE ULTIMATE GENERALIZATION. An Effort in the Philosophy of Science. Extra cloth, 12mo, 56 pp. Postpaid, 75 cents.

The statement, accompanied by strong evidence, of a new law named "Correlation," larger or more inclusive than that of Evolution; claimed to be the ultimate inductive basis of the Philosophy of Science, and by implication to have a bearing more or less direct upon all the great questions of the time.

THE CASE AGAINST THE CHURCH. A Summary of the Arguments against Christianity. "Not giving heed to Jewish fables."—Titus i, 14. Extra cloth, 12mo, 72 pp. Postpaid, 75 cents.

An attempt is here made to apply the principles of scientific materialism to the investigation of the myths and legends of Christianity.

ESSAYS ON MIND, MATTER, FORCES, THEOLOGY, ETC. By CHARLES E. TOWNSEND. Extra cloth, 12mo, 404 pp. Postpaid, $2.

The author advances some novel theories on theological and scientific questions, leading to somewhat original conclusions.

THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE. Tyndall's Belfast Inaugural Address, and the Famous Articles of Professor TYNDALL and Sir HENRY THOMPSON ON PRAYER. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of Professor Tyndall. And opinions of his services by the eminent scientist Professor H. Helmholtz. Postpaid, paper, 35 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Inaugural and portrait, paper, 15 cents.

Professor Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world.—[New York Tribune.

CHARLES P. SOMERBY,

PUBLISHER, BOOKSELLER, IMPORTER AND PRINTER,

139 EIGHTH ST. (Between Broadway and Fourth Avenue), NEW YORK.

Works of Thomas Paine.

COMMON SENSE. His first and most important political work. Clear type. Paper, 15 cts.

THE CRISIS. Containing Nos. I. to XVI., inclusive. Written in the "times that tried men's souls" during the American Revolution. 12mo. Full, clear type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth 80 cts.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN. Written in defense of his fellow man. A work almost without a peer in the world. On full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON. On large, clear type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON AND AN EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Full, bold type, 12mo. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. Complete in one volume, on full, bold type. Containing "Common Sense," "The Crisis" (sixteen numbers), and "The Rights of Man," with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. Complete. 12mo. Composed of the "Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "An Essay on Dreams," "Of the Religion of Deism," etc., etc., with a life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

THOMAS PAINE'S GREAT WORKS. Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Containing a Life of Paine, his POLITICAL WRITINGS—"Common Sense," "The Crisis," "Rights of Man"—his THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS—"Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "An Essay on Dreams," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "Of the Religion of Deism"—all in one large volume, crown-octavo, of THE TRUTH SEEKER LIBRARY, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3.00; colored leather, red burnished edges, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. By Calvin Blanchard. 12mo. Large, clear type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Published by

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

SEEDS.

Best and Cheapest in America, or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from Grower, postage or express paid, and get fresh, true, and reliable seeds. I can and shall beat any firm in America in quality and low prices. Beautiful illustrated Seed Catalogues and Garden Guide free.

Address R. H. SHUMWAY,
10t5 Seed Grower, Rockford, Ill.

BROUGHTONS INVIGORATING SYRUP. 25 CTS.

A certain cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Stomach, Liver or Kidney Diseases, Weakness, &c. 25 cents per bottle. Incurable cases solicited and cured or money refunded. The same ingredients put up in powders to be sent by mail. Sample bottle, circular, and 26t5

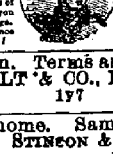
Advice Free, 495 Broome St., N. Y.

READER, that little cottage contains one of the choicest libraries in the country. I buy my books of J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole, Bronson, Mich. Rare O. P. works a specialty. Lists for stamp. 3m1

DO YOU WANT Printing Inks, Albums, Gold Pens, Pencils, Paper, Stationery, Rack-Jackets, Notions, Novelties of every description? Beware of unreliable dealers—send first-named only to the old, original and only "HEAD-QUARTERS." Established, 1865. We originated what is now an enormous trade. We import books weekly. Supply all Scientific, Legal, Medical, scarce, foreign and other books not often to be obtained—in fact, supply ANYTHING AND EVERYTHING in the Book or any other line. Our large store has four floors crowded with stock of books on every known subject, and all offered very low. CATALOGUES FREE. Information given. Send stamp, and send now. Address, HUNTER & CO., PUBLISHERS, HINSDALE, N. H.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COLLECTION

OF



FORMS, HYMNS, AND RECITATIONS.

Forms for organizing Societies, Forms for Constitutions and By-laws, for Funeral Services, Marriage Services, Naming of Infants, Obituary Notices, Epitaphs, Wills, etc. Also, nearly 500 Liberal and Spiritualistic Hymns, original and selected; for Public Meetings, Funerals, Social Gatherings, etc., etc. The whole supplemented by a fine selection of Recitations, comprising many of the finest poetical gems in the language. Nearly 600 pages, at the extremely low price of 75 cents in cloth. The price is made low, so that every family can have a copy. Let none fail to have it.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

TRUTH IS MIGHTY. Professor Martinez, the great Spanish Seer and Wizard, will for 25c. Coin, with your age, height, color of eyes and look of lady, send to you a correct picture of your future husband or wife, initials of real name, the time and place where you will first meet, and the date of marriage. Address, Prof. MARTINEZ, 42 Province St., Boston, Mass. This is no humbug!

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine. 1y7

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine. 1y7

GOLD Any worker can make $12 a day at home. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine. 1y7

RICH, RARE, RACY reading. The Lantern With catalogue of novelties, rubber goods. 10c. A. T. THAYER, 10 South Fifth ave., N. Y. 4t7

TRUE $5,000 SOLID. The GENUINE Swiss Magnetic COMPASS AND INDICATOR and TIME-KEEPER. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveller, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY-BODY desiring a reliable Time-Keeper and also a superior Co. Compass. Usual watch size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat SOLID CASE. Perfection guaranteed, WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect little instrument will be sent in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1.00; 3 for $2.00. Circulars sent free. BEWARE of a "bogus" article offered as a "premium;"—get the BEST.—Get the Genuine. Send all orders to the sole agents, J. J. KING & CO., Strasburg, Va.

Gems of Thought.

A WISE man is never less alone than when he is alone.—Swift.

A LAUGH is worth a hundred groans in any market.—Hume.

KINDNESS in ourselves is the honey that blunts the sting of unkindness in another.—Landor.

ASK thyself daily to how many ill-minded persons thou hast shown a kind disposition.—Marcus Antoninus.

WE could not endure solitude were it not for the powerful companionship of hope or of some unseen one.—Richter.

IT is impossible to live pleasurably without living prudently and honorably and justly; or to live prudently and honorably and justly without living pleasurably.—Epicurus.

I CAN think of no Christian doctrine which does not contain within it the elements of intolerance; hence the exclusiveness, self-righteousness and intolerance of Christians.—W. S. Bell.

THE last, best spirit which comes to late perfection, even in the kindliest soul, is tenderness toward the hard-hearted, forbearance toward the unforbearing, warmth of heart toward the cold, philanthropy toward the misanthropic.—Richter.

LET but the public mind once become thoroughly corrupt, and all attempts to secure property, liberty, or life, by mere force of laws written on parchment, will be as vain as to put up printed notices in an orchard to keep off canker-worms.—Horace Mann.

ALWAYS say a kind word if you can, if only that it may come in, perhaps, with singular opportuneness, entering some mournful man's darkened room like a beautiful firefly, whose happy circumvolutions he cannot but watch, forgetting his many troubles.—Helps.

REST is not quitting the busy career;
Rest is the fitting of self to one's sphere.
'Tis the brook's motion, clear without strife,
Fleeting to ocean after this life.
'Tis loving and serving the highest and best;
'Tis onward unswerving—and this is true rest.

TO GO to law is for two persons to kindle a fire at their own cost to warm others and singe themselves to cinders; and because they can not agree as to what is truth and equity, they will both agree to unplume themselves, that others may be decorated with their feathers.—Feltham.

A TENDER-HEARTED and compassionate disposition which inclines men to pity and feel the misfortunes of others, and which is, even for its own sake, incapable of involving any man in ruin and misery, is of all tempers of mind the most amiable; and though it seldom receives much honor, is worthy of the highest.—Fielding.

OUR ideal angel is a being perfect in the supremacy of conscience and reason. The animal nature has no part in its choice. Even the inclination to wrong has disappeared, and a calm, undisturbed serenity ever fills its being. Temptation may be a test of moral strength, but it is not true as held by many that morality depends on its presence. The estate of the angel is the desirable goal, and the nearer it is approached by man, the more perfect he becomes.—Hudson Tuttle.

PLEASURE is a shadow, wealth is vanity, and power a pageant; but knowledge is ecstatic in enjoyment, perennial in fame, unlimited in space, and infinite in duration. In the performance of its sacred offices, it fears no danger, spares no expense, looks in the volcano, dives into the ocean, perforates the earth, wings its flight into the skies, explores sea and land, contemplates the distant, examines the minute, comprehends the great, ascends to the sublime—no place too remote for its grasp, no height too exalted for its reach.—De Witt Clinton.

THERE is no day so sacred but that the laugh of a child will make it holier still. Strike with a hand of fire, O wierd musician, thy lyre, strung with Apollo's golden hair. Fill the vast cathedral aisles with symphonies sweet and dim, deft toucher of the organ key. Blow, bugler, blow, until your silver notes do touch and kiss the moonlit waves and charm the lovers wandering on the vine-clad shores; but know yours sweetest strains are discord all compared with childhood's merry laugh, the laugh that fills the eyes with light. O rippling river of laughter, thou art the blessed boundary line between the beast and man, and every wayward wave of thine doth drown some fretful fiend of care. Laughter should make dimples of joy enough in the cheeks of the world to catch and hold and glorify the tears of grief.—Ingersoll.

OUR leading Infidel champions do not profess to be infallible or inspired, nor do they profess to act as mouthpieces for Deity, as the preachers do; so, if they come short now and then of what we wish them to be, it is no more than we ought to expect of fallible humanity. They do the best they can with the light they have. They ask no one to accept or reject a belief or theory on their assertion, or because any god-book endorses or condemns it, or because it was held as true or false by any of the numerous "Begotten sons of God." But they say to each one, "Study, read, think, and then decide according to your best understanding." Our guides being a few decades ahead of the communities by which they are surrounded, they cannot be understood or comprehended by the masses who have so long rested satisfied with the fables, myths, and antiquated errors of their priests. But the veil is being rent, old things are pasing away, and the light of a new and glorious dawn is arising. All honor to the great pioneers who have broken the chains of bigotry and oppression.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

WHEN at home do as the home 'uns do.

THE Philistines are not the only people on record who were jawed to death.

THE blood of the turnip is the seed of the Church in some of the stingy instances.

THE ear of charity is as deaf as an adder at work on a long column of figures.

WOMEN are generally very smart, but they cannot hold a candle to a can of kerosene with safety.

VIRTUE is its own reward; but a little besides, that will buy something, is generally quite handy.

THE old bummer smelleth the bottle from afar off when it is set up for a free treat to the crowd.

"NEITHER bribe nor lose thy right," except in working a bill through the Legislature—then scratch out two n's.

"GOOD words quench more than a bucket of water"; but slap on the water while you send some to turn in an alarm.

"REMOVE not the old landmarks," pleadeth the venerable tramp when they bid him peel off and get into the bath-pool at the workhouse.

ON a tombstone in a churchyard in Ulster is the following epitaph: "Erected to the memory of John Phillips, accidentally shot as a mark of affection by his brother."

A LITTLE girl said to her mamma, "Mamma, have you heard of the man that got shot?" "No, child; how did he get shot?" asked mamma. "Oh," said the young precocious, "he bought 'em."

AN old Methodist preacher, going around among the members of his congregation, came across an old lady in spectacles. "Do you love the Lord?" he asked. "Well, parson, I ain't got nothin' agin him!"

"DO YOU call that a veal cutlet, waiter?" said an old gentleman dining at a restaurant; "why, it's an insult to every true calf in the country." "Well, sir, I didn't mean to insult you," returned the waiter.

HERE lies the body of John B. Gordon,
Mouth all mighty, and teeth accordin'.
Tread lightly, stranger, o'er this wonder.
For if he opens his mouth,
You're a goner, by thunder!

THERE was a little gathering the other evening, and a lady, with a desire to chasten the conversation, asked a young man if he had ever felt a deep and subtle thrill, a fullness of feeling, so to speak, that reminded him of another life. He said he had. It was when he was in the country, and the doctor called it cholera morbus and charged him four dollars a visit.

A LADY stopped the milkman as he was passing the house the other day, and inquired the price of milk by the quart, putting up her ear-trumpet to catch the reply. The milkman drew a quart of milk and emptied it into the trumpet, and the result has been that he has to go a mile out of his way to keep out of sight of the lady, who sits on the front porch with a shot-gun, waiting for him to pass.

ESSEX JUNCTION.

With saddened face and battered hat,
And eye that told of blank despair,
On a wooden bench a traveler sat,
Cursing the fate that brought him there.
Nine hours, he said, we've lingered here,
With thoughts intent on distant homes,
Waiting for that delusive train,
Which, always coming, never comes;
Till, weary and worn, sad and forlorn,
And paralyzed in every function,
I hope in ——
Their souls may dwell
Who first invented Essex Junction.

I've traveled north, I've traveled south,
O'er mountain, prairie, field, and river,
In ocean's storm, in desert's drouth,
Through railroad smash and steamboat shiver:
While hope and courage faltered not,
Nor strength gave way, nor faith was shaken,
Until I reached this dismal spot,
Of man accursed, of God forsaken,
Where strange, new forms of misery
Assail men's minds without compunction;
And I hope in ——
Their souls may dwell
Who first invented Essex Junction.

Here Boston waits for Ogdensburg,
And Ogdensburg for Montreal,
And late New York long tarrieth,
And Saratoga hindreth all;
From far Atlantic's wave-swept bays
To Mississippi's turbid tide,
All accidents, mistakes, delays,
Are gathered here and multiplied.
O fellow-man! avoid that place
As you would plague or Peter Funk sham—
And I hope in ——
Their souls may dwell
Who first invented Essex Junction.

And, long and late, conductors tell
Of trains remote, shipwrecked and slow,
Till even the engine's dismal bell
Takes up the cry—"No go—no go!"
Oh, let me from this hole depart,
By any route, so 'tis a long one,
He cried, and, with a sudden start,
He jumped on board a train (the wrong one);
And as he vanished in the smoke,
He shouted with redoubled unction,
I hope in ——
Their souls may dwell
Who first invented Essex Junction.

—E. J. PHELPS, in The Rutland Leader.

Truth Seeker Tracts.

No.	(REVISED LIST.)	Cts.
1.	Discussion on Prayer. D. M. Bennett and two Clergymen.	5
2.	Oration on the Gods. Ingersoll.	10
3.	Thomas Paine.	5
4.	Arraignment of the Church. Ingersoll.	5
5.	Heretics and Heresies. "	5
5.	Humboldt. "	5
7.	The Story of Creation. Bennett.	5
8.	The Old Snake Story. "	2
9.	The Story of the Flood. "	5
10.	The Plagues of Egypt. "	2
11.	Korah, Datham, and Abiram, [illegible]nnett.	2
12.	Balaam and his Ass. "	2
13.	Arraignment of Priestcraft. "	3
14.	Old Abe and Little Ike. Syphers.	3
15.	Come to Dinner.	2
16.	Fog Horn Documents. "	2
17.	The Devil Still Ahead. "	2
18.	Slipped Up Again. "
19.	Joshua Stopping the Sun and Moon. D. M. Bennett.	5
20.	Samson and his Exploits. Bennett.	2
21.	The Great Wrestling Match. "	2
22.	Discussion with Elder Shelton. "	10
23.	Reply to Elder Shelton's Fourth Letter. D. M. Bennett.	3
24.	Christians at Work. Wm. McDonnell.	5
25.	Discussion with Geo. Snode. Bennett.	5
26.	Underwood's Prayer.	1
27.	Honest Questions and Honest Answers. D. M. Bennett.	5
28.	Alessandro di Cagliostro. C. Sotheran.	10
29.	Paine Hall Dedication Address. B. F. Underwood.	2
30.	Woman's Rights & Man's Wrongs. Syphers.	2
31.	Gods and God-houses. "	2
32.	The God's of Superstition and the God of the Universe. D. M. Bennett.	8
33.	What has Christianity Done? Preston.	3
34.	Tribute to Thomas Paine.	2
35.	Moving the Ark. D. M. Bennett.	1
36.	Bennett's Prayer to the Devil.	2
37.	Short Sermon. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	1
38.	Christianity not a Moral System. X. Y. Z.	3
39.	The True Saint. S. P. Putnam.	3
40.	Bible of Nature vs. The Bible of Men. J. Syphers.	3
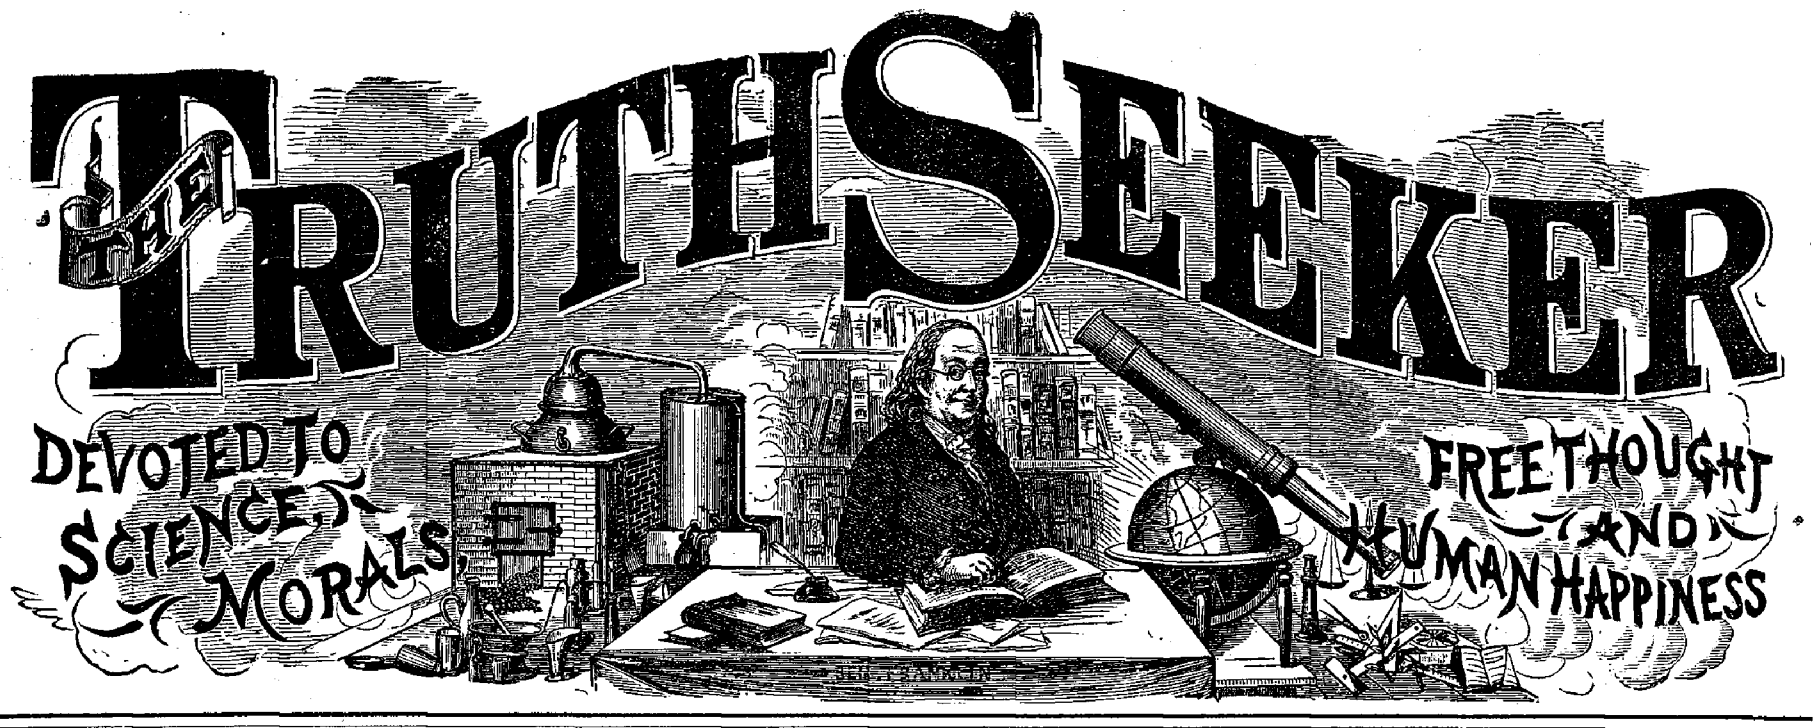
41.	Our Ecclesiastical Gentry. Bennett.	1
42.	Elijah the Tishbite. "	3
43.	Christianity a Borrowed System. "	3
44.	Design Argument Refuted. Underwood.	2
45.	Elisha the Prophet. Bennett.	3
46.	Did Jesus Really Exist? "	3
47.	Cruelty and Credulity of the Human Race. Dr. Daniel Arter.	5
48.	Freethought in the West. G. L. Henderson.	5
49.	Sensible Conclusions. E. E. Guild	3
50.	Jonah and the Big Fish. D. M. Bennett.	1
51.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets. No. 1.	5
52.	Marples-Underwood Debate. Underwood.	3
53.	Questions for Bible Worshipers. B. F. Underwood.	2
54.	An Open Letter to Jesus Christ. Bennett.	5
55.	The Bible God Disproved by Nature. W. E. Coleman.	8
56.	Bible Contradictions.	1
57.	Jesus Not a Perfect Character. Underwood.	2
58.	Prophecies.	2
59.	Bible Prophecies Concerning Babylon. B. F. Underwood.	2
60.	Ezekiel's Prophecies Concerning Tyre. B. F. Underwood.	2
61.	History of the Devil. Isaac Paden.	5
62.	The Jews and their God. "	10
63.	The Devils Due-Bills. John Syphers.	3
64.	The Ills we Endure—their Cause and Cure. D. M. Bennett.	2
65.	Short Sermon No. 2. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	2
66.	God Idea in History. H. B. Brown,	5
67.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets No. 2.	5
68.	Ruth's Idea of Heaven and Mine. Susan H. Wixon.	2
69.	Missionaries. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	2
70.	Vicarious Atonement. J. S. Lyon.	3
71.	Paine's Anniversary. C. A. Codman.	3
72.	Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. D. M. Bennett.	2
73.	Foundations. John Syphers.	3
74.	Daniel in the Lion's Den. Bennett.	2
75.	An Hour with the Devil. "	10
76.	Reply to Erastus F. Brown. D. M. Bennett.	3
77.	The Fear of Death. D. M. Bennett.	5
78.	Christmas and Christianity. D.M.Bennett.	5
79.	The Relationship of Jesus, Jehovah, and the Virgin Mary. W. E. Coleman.	2
80.	Address on Paine's 139th Birthday. Bennett.	5
81.	Hereafter, or the Half-way House. John Syphers.	1
82.	Christian Courtesy. Bennett.	2
83.	Revivalism Examined. Dr. A. G. Humphrey.	5
84.	Moody's Sermon on Hell. Rev. J. P. Hopps, London.	2
85.	Matter, Motion, Life and Mind. Bennett.	10
86.	An Enquiry about God's Sons. "	2
87.	Freethought Judged by its Fruits. B. F. Underwood.	1
88.	David, God's Peculiar Favorite. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	3
89.	Logic of Prayer. Charles Stephenson.	3
90.	Bible-Mania. Otter Cordates.	2
91.	Our Ideas of God. B. F. Underwood.	1
92.	The Bible: is it Divinely Inspired? Dr. D. Arter.	5
93.	Obtaining Pardon for Sins. Hudson Tuttle.	1
94.	The New Raven. Will Cooper.	5
95.	Jesus Christ. D. M. Bennett.	10
96.	Ichabod Crane Papers.	10
97.	Special Providences. W. S. Bell.	2
98.	Snakes. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.	2
99.	Do the Works of Nature prove a Creator? Sciota.	5
100.	The Old and the New. R. G. Ingersoll.	5
101.	110th Anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday. Bennett et als.	5
102.	The Old Religion and the New. W. S. Bell.	1
103.	Does the Bible Teach us all we Know. Bennet	2
104.	Evolution of Israel's God. A. L. Rawson.	10
105.	Decadence of Christianity. Capphro.	2
106.	Franklin, Washington and Jefferson Unbelievers. Bennett.	2
107.	The Safe Side. H. B. Brown.	5
108.	The Holy Bible a Historical Humbug. S. H. Preston.	1
109.	Ghosts. Ingersoll, 4 pp.	5
110.	Materialistic Prayer. Bennett, 4 pp.	1
111.	Reply to Scientific American. Bennett.	1
112.	Sensible Sermon. Savage, 8 pp.	2
113.	Come to Jesus. Bennett, 8 pp.	2

SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

1.	Hereditary Transmission. Prof. Louis Elsberg, M.D.	5
2.	Evolution; from the Homogeneous to the Heterogeneous. B. F. Underwood.	3
3.	Darwinism. B. F. Underwood.	3
4.	Literature of the Insane. F. R. Marvin.	5
5.	Responsibility of Sex. Mrs. Chase, M.D.	3
6.	Graduated Atmospheres. J. McCarroll.	2
7.	Death. Frederic R. Marvin, M.D.	5
8.	How do Marsupial Animals Propagate their kind? A.B. Bradford.	5
9.	The Unseen World. Prof. John Fiske.	10
10.	The Evolution Theory — Huxley's Three Lectures.	10
11.	Is America the New World? L. L. Dawson.	10

Discount on one dollar's worth 10 per ct. off; on two dollars' worth 20 off; on five dollars' worth 40 off; on ten dollars' worth 50 off.



As few or as many of any given kind may be ordered as desired.

RADICAL BOOKS.

SENT POST PAID AT THE PRICES ANNEXED.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

Age of Reason. Paine. Paper covers.	25
" " " Cloth "	50
" " and Ex. of Proph. Paper 50; cl.	75
A Few Days in Athens. Frances Wright.	75
Apocryphal New Testament.	1 25
An Eye Opener. Paper, 50; cloth,	75
Antiquity of Christianity. Alberger.	25
Analysis of Religious Belief. Viscount Amberly. $3.00, 4.00, and	4 50
Apples of Gold. Susan H. Wixon,	1 50
Anti-Theological Lectures. Rev. R. Taylor.	2 00
Antiquity and Duration of the World.	25
Astronomy and Worship of the Ancients,	25
A. J. Davis' Entire Works,	27.00
Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub.	15
Bible in India. Jacolliot.	2 00
Buckle's History of Civilization, 2 Vols., 8vo.	4 00
Burgess-Underwood Debate. 50 and	80
Bible in the Balance. Fish.	1 00
Bacon's Novum Organum.	2 00
Bhagvad-Gita, or Dialogues of Christna and Arjuna.	1 75
Buechner's Man, Present and Future.	4 00
Christianity before Christ. Craven.	25
Chapters from the Bibles of the Ages.	1 50
Criticism on the Theological Idea of Deity.	1 00
Childhood of Religion. Clodd.	1 25
Childhood of the World. Clodd, 40 and	60
Christianity and Materialism. Underwood.	15
Cause of Religious Ideas. Tuttle.	1 00
Conway's Sacred Anthology.	4 00
Colenso on the Pentateuch, Abstract of.	25
Devil's Pulpit, Rev. Robt. Taylor.	2 00
Diegesis	2 00
Denton's Irreconcilable Records,	50
" Our Planet, Past, Present, and Future,	1 50
" Radical Rhymes.	1 25
" Who are Christians. Deluge,
Denton's Common Sense Thoughts, Be Thyself, What is Right? Man's True Saviors, Sermon from Shakspere's Text, God Proposed, Spiritualism True, Orthodoxy False, 10 cents each.
Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science,	1 75
" Intellectual Development of Europe, 2 vols.,	3 00
Darwin's Origin of Species,	2 00
" Descent of Man, (Impr'd Ed.)	3 00
Descent and Darwinism, Schmidt,	1 50
Einstein's Origin of Religious Ideas.	1 00
Exeter Hall, Wm. McDonnell,	60 & 80
Errors of the Bible, Wright,	35 & 60
Essence of Religion. Fuerbach. 40 and	80
Eight Scientific Tracts.	20
Frothingham's Ex[illegible]sion of Humanity,	1 50
" Child's Book of Religion,	1 00
" Stories of the Patriarchs,	1 00
" Safest Creed,	1 50
" Transcendentalism in New England,	2 50
Faraday's Various Forces of Nature.	2 00
Fiske's Myths and Myth-Makers,	2 00
God Idea in History, Tuttle,	1 25
Good Sense, D'Holbach,	1 00
Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages.	2 50
" Lost and Hostile Gospels.	3 25
Graves' Sixteen Crucified Saviors.	2 00
" Biography of Satan.	60
Grey's Enigmas of Life.	2 00
" Creeds of Christendom. 2 Vols.	7 50
Heroines of Freethought, Mrs. Underwood,	1 75
Heathens of the Heath, McDonnell,	1 00 & 150
Hume's Essays and Treatises,	1 50
Huxley's Lay Sermons,	1 75
" Man's Place in Nature,	1 25
" Critiques and Addresses,	1 50
History of all Religions Sects. Evans.	1 00
Haeckel's History of Creation. 2 Vols.	5 00
Hollick's Nerves and the Nervous.	1 00
Humboldt's Works,
Ingersoll's Gods and other Lectures. 30 and	50
" " etc., Large Edition.	1 25
Influence of Christianity on Civilization.	25
Infidels' Text Book, Cooper.	1 00
Jehovah Unveiled.	35
Jamieson's Clergy a Source of Danger.	1 00
Josephus' Complete Works,	2 50
Johnson's Oriental Religions. 8vo.	5 00
John's Way.	15
Kneeland's Review.	1 00
" Hymns.	35
Koran, with Notes and Life of Mahomet.	2 75
Lecky's Rationalism in Europe. 2 Vols.	4 00
" History of European Morals.	6 00
Life of Thomas Paine, Blanchard. p 50; cl	75
Lewes' Biographical History of Philosophy,	3 50
" Problems of Life and Mind.	3 00
Lizzie Doten's Poems of Progress, and Inner Life, each	150
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization,	2 00
" Pre-Historic Times Illustrated,	6 00
Lyell's Elements of Geology, 770 cuts,	3 40
" Principles " 2 vols. and maps,	3 00
Monks and Popes. Alberger.	1 00
Morley's Life of Voltaire,	2 00
Martyrdom of Man. Winwood Reade.	3 00
Peeble's All Around the World,	2 50
" Seers of the Ages,	2 50
Plato's Divine and Moral Works,	2 20
Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion,	30 & 50
Physical Man, Tuttle.	1 50
Paine's Common Sense.	12
" Crisis. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Rights of Man. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Theological Works, with portrait	1 50
" " " paper,	1 00
" Political Works, cloth.	1 50
" Great Works Complete. Crown octavo, with life and portrait.	3
" Political Works, steel portrait.	1
" Life, by Calvin Blanchard with portrait Paper, 50; cloth	75
Parturition without Pain,	1 00
Plain Home Talk and Medical Common Sense, E. B. Foote, M.D.,	1 50
Proctor's Six Lectures on Astronomy,	20
Reason, the only Oracle of Man, Ethan Allen	60
Syntagma, Taylor,	1 00
System of Nature, D'Holbach,	2 00
Self-Contradictions of the Bible,	25
Studying the Bible, Mrs. Slenker,	75
Spencer's (Herbert) Entire Work,
Strauss' Old Faith and New,	2 00
" New Life of Jesus, 2 vols.,	12 00
Supernatural Religion, 2 Vols., 8vo.,	8 00
Sexual Physiology, Trall.	2 00
Talleyrand's Letter to Pope Pius vii,	25
Tyndall' (Prof. John) Entire Works,
The Christ of Paul,	2 00
The Case against the Church.	75
The Relations of the Sexes. Mrs. Duffey,	2 00
The Voices, Warren Sumner Barlow,	1 25
The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 0
The Champions of the Church. Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 50
Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, etc., 75 &	1 00
Truth Seeker Tracts, Vols. I. II. III. and IV., by the lot, 50 &	75
The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations.	75
The Outcast, Winwood Reade,	30
Talks with My Patients, Mrs. Gleason, M.D.,	1 50
Underwood-Marples Debate.	35 & 60
Underwood's Twelve Tracts.	20
Vestiges of Creation,	75
Volney's Ruins,	1 00
Volney's New Researches in Ancient History.	1 50
Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary,	1 50

Vol. 5. No. 11. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, March 16, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE labor reformers have elected a woman school director in Bristol, Pa.

IT took four hours to crown Leo. XIII. He was tiaraed before the ceremony was over.

ANIMALS of all kinds are being blessed in the Church of San Antonio, Abad, Mexico, at the rate of three cents per head.

WHAT is a church now without a reredos? The new one at Grace Church will cost $30,000, and will be finished in October.

NO MATTER if a man does say he wants to be an angel, it is always safe to have the name of a good indorser on the back of his note.

PEACHBLOWS in Tennessee and deep snow-storms blocking the Pacific Railroad for days together were among the varieties that the first week in March offered.

NOW THAT the Rev. Job Washburne of Illinois has patiently lived out his ninety-two years, he has concluded to leave off the use of tobacco and live the remainder of his days as a reformed man.

ONE Heym, the teacher of a young women's Bible class in a Providence Baptist church, has just run away with a Mrs. Baker, leaving his wife and three young children in want. He even mortgaged his furniture before starting.

SOME of the heavily mortgaged churches in Philadelphia are trying to secure the services of Brother Kimball, who is loudly called for in all parts of the country. He tells the Philadelphia brethren that they are wealthy enough to help themselves, and that they had better do it.

STAUNTON, Virginia, with a population of ten thousand, consumes an average of nearly one hundred pounds of opium a week. The drug is chiefly consumed by women. A young lawyer of the place is said to drink a quart of laudanum a week, and a book-keeper a gallon in three weeks.

IT was in Brooklyn that a small Sunday-school child, on being asked, "What is a leper?" astonished the class by answering, "Oh! yes, ma'am. I know what a leper is: a leper's a great, big, strong animal, with spots all over it, and it's got the awfullest teeth and claws you ever saw, ma'am."

SOME of the young members of a church in Tunbridge, Vt., got themselves into trouble by turning a prayer-meeting into a kissing party. Had the kisses been sold for the benefit of the church funds, as is now frequently done at the church fairs, there would have been no trouble. By the way, is the difference between a girl's selling her modesty at ten cents a kiss, for the benefit of the clergy, and a girl's selling her virtue to keep from starving, a difference of kind, or only one of degree? And which girl is the more blameworthy in the eyes of justice?

SOME of the clergymen of the Reformed Church are highly indignant at the statement of the Rev. Mr. Lloyd in reference to tippling habits. Mr. Lloyd said that at a recent dinner where eighty clergymen of this persuasion were present, about sixty of them imbibed stimulants. Certain of the brethren insist that this is a baseless slander, and furthermore urge that the brother who put it in circulation must have been in a condition to see double on the occasion of that dinner. The next thing in order will be the production of the printed bill of fare, if there was any, which may finish the discussion on the subject.

OWEN ADKINS is ninety-six years old. He is still hale, and lives in Pittsylvania county, Virginia. A more remarkable thing about him is the fact that for many years he was a Mormon, and lived unmolested in the practical enjoyment of his religion. He married when he was twenty-three years old, and at thirty announced his belief that the Bible taught polygamy. Much to the dislike of his wife, he married three other women, and built a house for each in the neighborhood. His children number 74, his grandchildren 196, and the family is altogether so large and prosperous that the town is called Adkins. The number of voters that he reared is said to have been a safeguard against prosecution for bigamy.

THE Congregationalists of Rutland, Vt., indignantly deny that they have two communion cups, one of silver, the other of pewter, the pewter one being for the colored communicants. The forcible way in which one of these brethren prints the denial shows that he is fully in earnest about it, whether he has a refined way of expressing himself or not. He says that the base lie was gotten up by a corrupt old fogy. There are five denials in all, one of which says that there are no colored Congregationalists in Rutland. If this last assertion be true, it ought forever to set at rest the slander that the colored folks had to drink the sacramental wine from a chalice of inferior metal.

EVANGELIST HAMMOND runs the musical feature of his revival meetings to a degree which is not quite so harmonious as it is ridiculous. At Zanesville, Ohio, he had five cabinet organs on his platform, together with all the flutes, cornets, trombones, violins, and violoncellos that he could get, and a chorus of about 300 voices. It pleased a throng of Zanesvillains, who clamored for more of it. It is said that it made as great a clatter as did Nebuchadnezzar's great band on the plain of Dura, on the occasion when Shadrach and his companions were put into the furnace. The record reads that Nebuchadnezzar brought into service the "cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music." Hammond's choir comes under the head of "all kinds of music."

BROTHER FRANCIS MURPHY and the temperance brethren in Washington have had a little unpleasantness on the subject of finances. Hotel bills had something to do with it. Murphy believes in living like a prince when the brethren lodge him in a hotel. For two weeks his board bill and that of his son amounted to $68, and their bill for extras and sundries to $58.20. It is easy for people who patronize the bar at a hotel to incur such a bill for sundries, but the committee could not see what Murphy wanted with so many extra things. Parson Newman took him in hand after the Y. M. C. A. Committee dropped him. Intemperance does not consist alone in drinking, but in eating, and other indulgences as well. Bro. Murphy evidently needs a few lessons himself in the great virtue of temperance.

UNDER the title of offenses against morality and decency, the Maine Legislature re-enacted some years ago this statute: "Whoever blasphemes the holy name of God by denying, cursing, or continually reproaching God, his creation, government, final judgment of the world, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, or the Holy Scriptures as contained in the canonical books of the Old or New Testament, or by exposing them to contempt and ridicule, shall be punished by imprisonment, not more than two years, or by fine not exceeding $200." The Democratic papers are now quoting the statute for the information of Colonel Ingersoll, who is to deliver lectures in Portland and elsewhere. The people of Maine evidently need a theocratic form of government, supplemented by an old-fashioned Inquisition. But Colonel Ingersoll may take a little of their bigotry out of them before he gets through with them.

AT the late term of the court of Franklin Co., held at Ottawa, Kansas, J. M. Adams was sentenced to six years in the penitentiary, for robbing the dry-goods store of Stacher & Cobb of about $12.00 worth of their stock. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church, in good standing, praying long and loud for the salvation of the Christian people of Kansas. His prayers were powerful enough to melt the heart of a stone, his intercessions being often heard upwards of a mile away. But the road between praying and stealing was very short. The robbery was committed on a Saturday night. The next morning Adams, anxious for his own soul and those of his fellows, was at the church door, waiting, before the sexton appeared to open it. One redeeming feature of the robbery was that instead of robbing the children of the world, he turned in and robbed a brother pilgrim—under the banner of Methodism—to the heavenly Zion, which is one step in advance of Kansas religionists; their practice heretofore having been to pray to God on Sunday and prey on the children of the world during the other days of the week. Brother Adams, pray for us.

THE Kansas City Times thus telleth the oft-repeated tale: On attachment the constable sold the visible effects of Rev. Parker Milligan. He was a lovely flower, but too fond of females. He was reported to be worth $50,000 when he came here. The brethren and the sisters took him in. They made parties innumerable, and invited him thereto. He prayed long and loud, and proclaimed the everlasting gospel with the vigor of a lion in spring-time. But he did things that were naughty, though nice. He went after strange divinities. A female sheared him. She got most of his lucre. He had a splendid woman for a wife, and still he was not happy, for he spendeth much upon the devious woman aforesaid. A volume might be written of the rascalities of Rev. Parker Milligan. But what's the use? The woman did it. Brother Milligan lost his money, his reputation, his piety, and, we fear, his virtue. And yet a rock should not be hurled at the woman. Good preachers are not seduced. There would be no bad women if there were no bad men. The great law of supply and demand must have its compensations.

THE MONSTER PETITION IN REFERENCE TO "THE FREEDOM OF THE MAILS."—The longest, most elaborate, and, in some respects, most respectable public petition which has been presented to Congress this session was recently introduced by General Butler. This petition deals with the freedom of the mails and the rights of individuals, so far as the arbitrary provisions of the present law in reference to "obscene literature" are concerned. Under that law some of our most reputable and influential citizens, such men as Mr. Bennett, the Liberal editor, and Dr. E. B. Foote, the well-known physiologist and author, have been interfered with in the legitimate exercise of their undisputed rights as thinkers and disseminators of thought. True, those gentleman have been comparatively uninjured and remain uncrushed; they are mightier than their persecutors, but they and hundreds of others have been subjected to serious annoyance, and it is the object of this petition to vindicate those gentlemen and to test their rights to freedom of thought and to the right to disseminate their thoughts. In brief, the monster petition is a species of moral declaration of independence. Its fate will be watched with interest.—N. Y. Sunday Mercury.

MARCH.

Month that nobody praises,
  Boisterous, blustering, blue, March,
Here's a poor rhymester who raises
  His voice in honor of you, March.
What if no buttercups, daises
  Nor mignonette ever yet grew, March,
Under your skies of leaden,
  Of deaden and desolate hue, March?
Facing your blasts is sport while it lasts
  To those who're brave and true, March.
Volumes of verse have been written
  On May—presumably arch—
But never poet was smitten
  By your Amazon beauties, O March!
And yet, though your face is frost-bitten,
  And you sometimes have taken the starch
Entirely out of me, March,
I never will give you the mitten,
For, spite of your name and leonine fame,
  You are better than any mere kitten.
Not weavers of verses Byronic,
  Who scoff at the grandeur of toil,
Can take your sharp air as a tonic—
  Their hope is in cod-liver oil;
Not girls whose faces are mealy,
  Whose waists are wasted in stays,
Find aught in your presence to praise;
But the maidens who follow out freely
  Great Nature's infallible ways—
Ah, them your chilling breath braces,
  And a walk on your blustering days
Adds freshness to all their fair graces,
Brings rich color into their faces,
Brightens their eyes and sets their blood flowing
Like wine through their veins while high winds are blowing.
Month whom nobody praises,
  This song is written for you, March.
Enough of sunshine and daisies—
  You nourish the strong and the true, March;
Let the weak singers, then, sigh on,
  Their sonnets on May are a sham, March;
What is the roar of a lion,
  If it ends in the bleat of a lamb, March!

—Vandyke Brown.

Events of the Week.

NEW HAMPSHIRE has gone Republican.

GEN. GRANT and wife have been presented to the King and Queen of Greece.

JOHN W. HOYT has been nominated by President Hayes for Governor of Wyoming Territory.

THE Steamer Timor, loaded with twenty-six locomotives for the Russian Government, sailed on the 9th for Europe.

THE Steamer Cordelia, of San Francisco, was wrecked on the west coast of Vancouver's Island. No bodies have been found.

NINETY-EIGHT families were left homeless by a fire in Jersey City on the night of the 11th. Two men seriously injured. Loss, about $30,000.

THE American Powder Company's mills at South Acton, Mass., were blown up on the 12th. Two men killed. The shock was felt seventeen miles away.

THE Austrian Lloyd steamer Sphinx, from Cavallo, for Trieste, with 2,500 Circassians on board, caught fire, and went ashore near Cape Elia. Five hundred lives were lost.

POPE LEO has trouble with his Swiss Guard. He has dismissed forty of them. The Pope, being a spiritual sovereign, should dismiss his material soldiers and guard himself with angels.

A TERRIFIC earthquake shock was felt at Columbus, Ky., on the morning of the 11th. Furniture was broken, bells rang, and a portion of the Mississippi river bank caved in. The rumbling lasted only a few seconds.

THE railroad bridge spanning the Raritan river, at New Brunswick, N. J., was destroyed by fire on Saturday last. Loss, $100,000. The bridge was 2,500 feet long, and was constructed in 1837. Cause of fire, spark from an engine.

UNITED STATES SENATOR TELLER, of Colorado, presented the anti-Comstock-law petition to the Senate on Tuesday, 12th inst. The petition was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws. Colonel Ingersoll's name "leads all the rest" on the petition, 50,000 in all.

THE law-abiding populace of London amused themselves on Sunday last with cudgeling the famous Bradlaugh, because he attempted to address a peace-meeting and to present resolutions in which there was no assertion of Britain's inborn capacity to flog the universe. It is in London that the profound popular respect for the Sabbath revolts at the idea of opening on that day the museums of industrial art.

ON Sunday, the 10th inst., the Episcopal church in Atlanta, Ga., was blown to pieces by a tornado. Eighteen of the congregation were wounded, and the rest had a narrow escape. Had this occurred to an Infidel gathering, the religious press and the pulpit from one end of the land to the other would have rung all the changes on the just judgment of God, but it was the Christian ox that was gored, so, of course, it was another thing. The most singular thing about this tornado was that it did more damage to the churches than to any other kind of property.

DESPERATE fighting took place between the Orangemen and Catholics on Papineau square, Montreal, on Sunday, the 10th inst. From early morning large crowds of excited young men were going about drinking and quarreling, and at about three o'clock the factions met. Bob Harkins and Bob Hurst, two noted desperadoes, representing the two factions as ring-leaders, soon met, with knives drawn, and were stabbing each other in the thighs, when Hurst's brother interfered and was cut through the shoulder, receiving a severe wound. A Catholic named Peter Lacy went to Harkins' assistance, and was stabbed in the arm and had two of his fingers cut off as he grabbed the knife. The fight then became general. The police arrested all the wounded men and dispersed the mob of about five hundred persons. Just after dark the fighting began again. A young man named James Gunning Bill, a Catholic, received a pistol wound in the side, and lies in a precarious condition. The end is not yet.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER III.—CONTINUED.

"And just to think, father, how all the town have been talking about these good Darwins," said Myra. "Why they have called them everything that's bad, and accused them of all manner of crimes, simply because they were Infidels, and they thought unbelievers capable of any act of wrong or injustice, and felt certain that a good or noble impulse never stirred their hearts. I declare it's a wicked shame how we have all been imposed upon by our preachers and leaders."

"And yet it is very natural, my young friend," said Mr. Darwin, smiling kindly upon his impetuous defender. "The words Infidel and Atheist have ever been associated in the minds of all pious people with vileness and wickedness. To talk of a good Infidel would seem as unreasonable as to talk of a good devil—yet real Infidels are as harmless, gentle, humane, and kind as any other class of people; perhaps more so, for they do not set up as an ideal, a cross, angry, spiteful, vengeful God. You people here in the South have seen few, if any, real Atheists; nor were you even aware of there actually being any, but rather thought them to be figments of the brain, created out of skeptics and doubters who had been magnified into creatures worse than the reality, or which were thought to be worse. And then, bad people have often pretended to be unbelievers just out of pure bravado, thus bringing the name into contempt and ridicule."

"If you believe in no God," said Mr. Scott, "how do you account for the origin of all that exists?"

"If you believe in a God, how do you account for his origin?" asked Mr. Darwin, smiling. "To me it seems as easy to account for all else as for him."

"Oh," said Mr. Scott, "he is eternal and self-existent."

"Can you prove it?"

"Well, no! but you see it must be so, for we cannot conceive of a time when God was not."

"Nor when he was, in my opinion," said Mr. Darwin. "You believe in a self-existent God, yet can prove nothing concerning him. I believe in a self-existent universe, of which we can see and experience proofs every instant of our lives. True, we cannot explain its origin, or the origin of our race, but neither can you do so, nor can any other Theist, though there have been few systems of religion but what have pretended to do so, yet all have utterly and lamentably failed. In saying God made all things, you only make matters still worse by inventing a being whose origin you cannot explain. Even granting his existence, what light does that throw upon the origin of all else? Did he make all things out of nothing? For if made of already-existing materials, what need was there of him? Some Darwinians accept and some reject the God idea. The latter are, in my opinion, upon the firmest foundation, for they are more free to search in all directions for solid facts, because they have no fear of depriving a god of existence by discovering no necessity why he should be. The believer says everything unknown and unexplainable is God—is the manifestation of an inscrutable power whose ways are unknowable; but day by day science and knowledge are robbing God of his laurels, and accounting for more and more of these heretofore unknown mysteries, by proving that matter and motion, nature and its inherent laws, or principles, are all-sufficient; and how much easier and more simple is the study of realities than that of myths—of what is than what is imagined. How much better it is to do than to pray. Prayer effects nothing; work accomplishes all that is to be done. But really, it is time I was going. I hope, Mr. Scott, that you will think over these things, and search earnestly for facts and truths, for these alone can give real satisfaction to the mind of the true inquirer."

"I don't doubt, Mr. Darwin, but you will convert us both," said Myra, rising and bringing him his hat; "for we have been Painites ever since we read 'The Age of Reason,' and I feel almost godly now."

Mr. Scott laughed as she said these words so earnestly, and remarked that he believed they had been like stoves filled with kindling, waiting for the match or spark of light to start them into a blaze, so readily had they accepted new ideas and followed him closely and understandingly in all he said.

"You are apt pupils," continued he; "and I hope you are willing to go on still further."

"We want the truth," said Myra and her father, simultaneously.

"And now, that we have had a taste of the tree of knowledge, we are not willing to give it up till we are fully satisfied," said Mr. Scott.

"Brother Bennett says knowledge does not grow on trees."

"And who is 'Brother Bennett'?" asked Myra.

"Why, he is editor of one of the sharpest little papers I ever read; a real gem of a sheet, that all who see fall in love with at once, and become regular Bennett-worshippers," said Mr. Darwin, laughing.

"And do you take it?"

"Yes, and will send you a few numbers, so that you can make its acquaintance, and read some of our ultra-Infidel literature, and that you may better understand our sentiments and opinions."

"Thanks; I shall be glad to get them," said Mr. Scott. "I am always open to conviction and ready to accept a truth, whether it goes for or against my previous opinions. This I have done in my professional studies, and am in consequence a sort of Independent in practice, that is, I belong to no regular school of medicine, but that of common sense. I grew out of the old into the new so gradually that I lost no practice by it; and my patients always feel the greatest confidence in my judgment, far more than I do myself, for none save a thoroughly educated physician knows how little can be known of the true science of medicine. We can aid and assist nature, but must rely on her to do the main part of the work."

"I am glad we agree so well on this all-important matter," said Mr. Darwin. "How to keep well is the first subject that should occupy all minds—well bodily, mentally, and morally. We were once ardent advocates of the water-cure system, and studied Dr. Trall on every slight ailment, but we overdid the water treatment; then we went back to nature and first principles, and now depend more upon keeping well than getting well. But really, I must go. So good-bye and good-night," and with a brisk, quick step he passed down the walk, while Myra and her father sat till far into the night talking over the new ideas, and discussing them in all their bearings.

CHAPTER IV.

"Oh! Edith dear, do come to our house, we are in such a heap of trouble I don't know which way to turn, and I feel as if I were going crazy," said Sue Conway, as she ran up, panting and almost out of breath, to the garden gate, where Edith was busily engaged in raking off her flower-beds and putting them in order for spring time.

"Why Sue, what is the matter?" said Edith, laying down her rake, and going out to where Sue stood leaning against the fence weeping as if her heart would break. "Don't cry, darling, but come in and sit here on the steps, and tell me what the difficulty is, for you look as if you had lost your last friend," and Edith passed her arm around Sue's waist and drew her gently to the porch steps, where the two seated themselves, Edith taking her friend's hand and assuring her she would do all she could for her if she would only tell her what great affliction had fallen upon her causing such bitter grief.

Struggling with herself for composure, Sue at last wiped away her tears, and said: "I am really ashamed, Edith, to let you know all the disgraceful facts; but I must open my heart to some one or it will burst. Last night father came home in a state of great excitement, and told mother that as soon as the boys arrived they were to be at once sent to his room. Mother was alarmed, for she was well aware of what was there in store for them, as she had had so many years' experience with father; she knew that when his anger was at such a white heat, whoever happened to be the offender never got off without a severe penalty. 'Oh, Charles! what have they done?' she asked, imploringly. 'It's no matter, and none of your business. You mind your concerns, and I'll mind mine. You spoil all the children with your petting and coaxing. But I'll let them know they'll not run over me. I'll show them who's master.' So saying, he entered his room, and pushing mother out, shut and locked the door. In about half an hour after, Bill and Sam came, looking around in a frightened manner, and shrinking as if in deadly fear, expecting to see their father's forbidding countenance. 'Oh, boys, what have you been doing?' asked mother and I, both in one breath. 'Nothing. Nothing that is wrong, only—' but before they could say more the door opened, and father came in and marched them both off to his room, and in a moment more the sound of the cruel whip rang through the house. Mother and I covered our ears with our hands to shut out the horrid noise. In half an hour more we heard the boys go to their room, and father came out and sat down to the supper table, reverently asking a blessing as usual. As soon as supper was over mother started for the stairs, but father forbade her going near the boys that night at her peril, and for three long hours she and I sat listening with strained ears for some sound from the chamber above, but all was still and silent, and we hoped they were asleep and had forgotten their trouble. About twelve o'clock father seemed to be resting so soundly that mother ventured to get up very carefully, and speeding hastily up stairs, she struck a match, lit a lamp, and turned to the bed. Lo! it was empty. A glance round the room, then at the open window where a rope was dangling loosely, showed their means of exit, and she at once realized that they had run away. 'My God! my God!' she exclaimed, 'they're gone!' and fell heavily to the floor. Awakened by the noise, father and I rushed up stairs and after a time succeeded in bringing her to. Just then I saw a note pinned to the pillow, and hastily removing it I found it was addressed to mother. I handed it to her, but she said, 'Read it, Sue; I'm weak and agitated, and can't make out a letter of it!' Here it is, Edith. Look it over, and you will understand then, better than I can tell you, all the circumstances of the case."

[TO BE CONTINUED].

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.—CONTINUED.

CHAPTER VII.—CONTINUED.

REPRODUCTION BY GERM-BUDS.

A third mode of non-sexual propagation, that of the formation of germ-buds (Polysporogonia), is intimately connected with the formation of buds. In the case of the lower, imperfect organisms, among animals, especially in the case of the Plant-like animals and Worms, we very frequently find that in the interior of an individual composed of many cells, a small group of cells separates itself from those surrounding it, and that this small isolated group gradually develops itself into an individual, which, becomes like the parent, and sooner or later comes out of it. Thus, for example, in the body of the Fluke-worms (Trematodes) there often arise numerous little bodies consisting of many cells, that is germ-buds or polyspores, which at an early stage separate themselves completely from the parent body, and leave it when they have attained a certain stage of development.

The formation of germ-buds is evidently but little different from real budding. But, on the other hand, it is connected with a fourth kind of non-sexual propagation, which almost forms a transition to sexual reproduction, namely, the formation of germ-cells (Monosporogonia), which is often briefly called formation of spores (sporogonia). In this case it is no longer a group of cells, but a single cell, which separates itself from the surrounding cells in the interior of the producing organism, and which only becomes further developed after it has come out of its parent. After this germ-cell, or monospore (or, briefly, spore), has left the parental individual, it multiplies by division, and thus forms a many-celled organism, which by growth and gradual development attains the hereditary qualities of the parental organism, This occurs very generally among lower plants (Cryptogama).

Although the formation of germ-cells very much resembles the formation of germ buds, it evidently and very essentially differs from the latter, and also from the other forms of non-sexual propagation which have previously been mentioned, by the fact that only a very small portion of the producing organism takes part in the propagation and, accordingly, in the transmission by inheritance. In the case of self-division, where the whole organism falls into two halves, in the formation of buds, where a considerable portion of the whole body, already more or less developed, separates from the producing individual, we easily understand that the forms and vital phenomena should be the same in the producing and produced organism. It is much more difficult to understand in the formation of germ-buds, and more difficult still in the formation of germ-cells, how this very small, quite undeveloped portion of the body, this group of cells, or this single cell, not only directly takes with it certain parental qualities into its independent existence, but also after its separation from the parental individual develops into a many-celled body, and in this repeats the forms and vital phenomena of the original producing organism. This last form of monogonic propagation—that of the germ-cells, or spore-formation—leads us directly to a form of propagation which is the most difficult of all to explain, namely, sexual propagation.

SEXUAL REPRODUCTION.

Sexual or amphigonic propagation (Amphigonia) is the usual method of propagation among all higher animals and plants. It is evident that it has only developed, at a very late period of the earth's history, from non-sexual propagation, and apparently in the first instance from the method of propagation by germ-cells. In the earliest periods of the organic history of the earth, all organisms propagated themselves in a non-sexual manner, as numerous lower organisms still do, especially all those which are at the lowest stage of organization, and which, strictly speaking, can be considered neither as animals nor as plants, and which therefore, as primary creatures, or Protista, are best excluded from both the animal and vegetable kingdoms. In the case of the higher animals and plants, the increase of individuals, as a rule, is at present brought about in the majority of cases by sexual propagation.

In all the chief forms of non-sexual propagation mentioned above—in fission, in the formation of buds, germ buds, and germ cells—the separated cell or group of cells was able by itself to develop into a new individual, but in the case of sexual propagation the cell must first be fructified by another generative substance. The fructifying male sperm must first mix with the female germ-cell (the egg) before the latter can develop into a new individual. These two different generative substances, the male sperm and the female egg, are either produced by one and the same individual hermaphrodite (Hermaphroditismus), or by two different individuals (sexual separation, Gonochorismus) (Gen. Morph. ii. 58, 59).

The simpler and more ancient form of sexual propagation is through double-sexed individuals (Hermaphroditismus)

It occurs in the great majority of plants, but only in a minority of animals, for example, in the garden snails, leeches, earth worms, and many other worms. Every single individual among hermaphrodites produces within itself materials of both sexes—eggs and sperm. In most of the higher plants every blossom contains both the male organ (stamens and anther) and the female organs (style and germ). Every garden snail produces in one part of its sexual gland eggs, and in another part sperm. Many hermaphrodites can fructify themselves; in others, however, copulation and reciprocal fructification of both hermaphrodites is necessary for causing the development of the eggs. This latter case is evidently a transition to sexual separation.

Sexual separation (Gonochorismus), which characterizes the more complicated of the two kinds of sexual reproduction, has evidently been developed from the condition of hermaphroditism at a late period of the organic history of the world. It is at present the universal method of propagation of the higher animals, and occurs, on the other hand, only in the minority of plants (for example, in many aquatic plants, e. g. Hydrocharis, Vallisneria; and in trees, e. g. Willows, Poplars). Every organic individual, as a non-hermaphrodite (Gonochoristus), produces within itself only one of two generative substances, either the male or the female. The female individuals, both in animals and plants, produce eggs or egg-cells. The eggs of plants in the case of flowering plants (Phanerogama) are commonly called "embryo sacs," in the case of flowerless plants (Cryptogama), "fruit spores." In animals, the male individual secretes the fructifying sperm (sperma); in plants, the corpuscles, which correspond to the sperm. In the Phanerogama, these are the pollen grains, or flower-dust; in the Cryptogama, a sperm, which, like that of most animals, consists of floating vibratile cells actively moving in a fluid —the zoosperms, spermatozoa, or sperm-cells.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Ethics of Religion.—Concluded.

BY W. K. CLIFFORD, F.R.S.

In this inquiry, which requires the knowledge of facts beyond our own immediate experience, we must make use of the great principle of authority, which enables us to profit by the experience of other men. The great civilized countries on the continent of Europe at the present day—France, Germany, Austria, and Italy—have had an extensive experience of the Catholic clergy for a great number of centuries, and they are forced by strong practical reasons to form a judgment upon the character and tendencies of an institution which is sufficiently powerful to command the attention of all who are interested in public affairs. We might add the experience of our forefathers three centuries ago, and of Ireland at this moment; but home politics are apt to be looked upon with other eyes than those of reason. Let us hear, then, the judgment of the civilized people of Europe on this question.

It is a matter of notoriety that an aider and abettor of clerical pretensions is regarded in France as an enemy of France and of Frenchmen: in Germany as an enemy of Germany and of Germans; in Austria as an enemy of Austria and Hungary, of both Austrians and Magyars; and in Italy as an enemy of Italy and the Italians. He is so regarded, not by a few wild and revolutionary enthusiasts who have cast away all the beliefs of their childhood and all bonds connecting them with the past, but by a great and increasing majority of sober and conscientious men of all creeds and persuasions, who are filled with a love for their country, and whose hopes and aims for the future are animated and guided by the examples of those who have gone before them, and by a sense of the continuity of national life. The profound conviction and determination of the people in all these countries, that the clergy must be restricted to a purely ceremonial province, and must not be allowed to interfere, as clergy, in public affairs—this conviction and determination, I say, are not the effect of a rejection of the Catholic dogmas. Such rejection has not, in fact, been made in Catholic countries by the great majority. It involves many difficult speculative questions, the profound disturbance of old habits of thought, and the toilsome consideration of abstract ideas. But such is the happy inconsistency of human nature, that men who would be shocked and pained by a doubt about the central doctrines of their religions are far more really and practically shocked and pained by the moral consequences of clerical ascendency. About the dogmas they do not know; they were taught them in childhood, and have not inquired into them since, and therefore they are not competent witnesses to the truth of them. But about the priesthood they do know, by daily and hourly experience; and to its character they are competent witnesses. No man can express his convictions more forcibly than by acting upon them in a great and solemn matter of national importance. In all these countries the conviction of the serious and sober majority of the people is embodied, and is being daily embodied, in special legislation, openly and avowedly intended to guard against clerical aggression. The more closely the legislature of these countries reflects the popular will, the more clear and pronounced does this tendency become. It may be thwarted or evaded for the moment by constitutional devices and parliamentary tricks, but sooner or later the nation will be thoroughly represented in all of them; and as to what is then to be expected, let the panic of the clerical parties make answer.

This is a state of opinion and of feeling which we in our own country find it hard to understand, although it is one of the most persistent characters of our nation in past times. We have spoken so plainly and struck so hard in the past, that we seem to have won the right to let this matter alone. We think our enemies are dead, and we forget that our neighbor's enemies are plainly alive; and then we wonder that he does not sit down, and be quiet as we are. We are not much accustomed to be afraid, and we never know when we are beaten. But those who are nearer to the danger feel a very real and, it seems to me, well-grounded fear. The whole structure of modern society, the fruit of long and painful efforts, the hopes of further improvement, the triumphs of justice, of freedom, and of light, the bonds of patriotism which make each nation one, the bonds of humanity which bring different nations together—all these they see to be menaced with a great and real and even pressing danger. For myself, I confess that I cannot help feeling as they feel. It seems to me quite possible that the moral and intellectual culture of Europe, the light and the right, what makes life worth having and men worthy to have it, may be clean swept away by a revival of superstition. We are, perhaps, ourselves not free from such a domestic danger; but no one can doubt that the danger would speedily arise if all Europe at our side should become again barbaric, not with the weakness and docility of a barbarism which has never known better, but with the strength of a past civilization perverted to the service of evil.

Those who know best, then, about the Catholic priesthood at present, regard it as a standing menace to the state and to the moral fabric of society.

Some would have us believe that this condition of things is quite new, and has in fact been created by the Vatican Council. In the Middle Ages, they say, the Church did incalculable service; or even if you do not allow that, yet the ancient Egyptian priesthood invented many useful arts; or if you have read anything which is not to their credit, there were the Babylonians and Assyrians who had priests, thousands of years ago; and in fact, the more you go back into prehistoric ages, and the further you go away into distant countries, the less you can find to say against the priesthoods of those times and places. This statement, for which there is certainly much foundation, may be put into another form: the more you come forward into modern times and neighboring countries, where the facts can actually be got at, the more complete is the evidence against the priesthoods of these times and places. But the whole argument is founded upon what is at least a doubtful view of human nature and of society. Just as an early school of geologists were accustomed to explain the present state of the earth's surface by supposing that in primitive ages the processes of geologic change were far more violent and rapid than they are now—so catastrophic, indeed, as to constitute a thoroughly different state of things—so there is a school of historians who think that the intimate structure of human nature, its capabilities of learning and of adapting itself to society, have so far altered within the historic period as to make the present processes of social change totally different in character from those even of the moderately distant past. They think that institutions and conditions which are plainly harmful to us now have at other times and places done good and serviceable work. War, pestilence, priestcraft, and slavery have been represented as positive boons to an early state of society. They are not blessings to us, it is true; but then times have altered very much.

On the other hand, a later school of geologists have seen reason to think that the processes of change have never, since the earth finally solidified, been very different from what they are now. More rapid, indeed, they must have been in early times, for many reasons; but not so very much more rapid as to constitute an entirely different state of things. And it does seem to me in like manner that a wider and more rational view of history will recognize more and more of the permanent and less and less of the changeable element in human nature. No doubt our ancestors of a thousand generations back were very different beings from ourselves; perhaps fifty thousand generations back they were not men at all. But the historic period is hardly to be stretched beyond two hundred generations; and it seems unreasonable to expect that in such a tiny page of our biography we can trace with clearness the growth and progress of a long life. Compare Egypt in the time of King Menes, say six thousand years ago, with Spain in this present century, before Englishmen made any railways there; I suppose the main difference is that the Egyptians washed themselves. It seems more analogous to what we find in other fields of inquiry, to suppose that there are certain great broad principles of human life which have been true all along; that certain conditions have always been favorable to the health of society, and certain other conditions always hurtful.

Now, although I have many times asked for it, from those who said that somewhere and at some time mankind had derived benefits from a priesthood laying claim to a magical character and powers, I have never been able to get any evidence for this statement. Nobody will give me a date, and a latitude and longitude, that I may examine into the matter. "In the Middle Ages the priests and monks were the sole depositories of learning." Quite so; a man burns your house to the ground; builds a wretched hovel on the ruins, and then takes credit for whatever shelter there is about the place. In the Middle Ages nearly all learned men were obliged to become priests and monks. "Then, again, the bishops have sometimes acted as tribunes of the people, to protect them against the tyranny of kings." No doubt, when pope and Cæsar fall out, honest men may come by their own. If two men rob you in a dark lane, and then quarrel over the plunder, so that you get a chance to escape with your life, you will of course be very grateful to each of them for having prevented the other from killing you; but you would be much more grateful to a policeman who locked them both up. Two powers have sought to enslave the people, and have quarreled with each other; certainly we are very much obliged to them for quarreling, but a condition of still greater happiness and security would be the non-existence of both.

I can find no evidence that seriously militates against the rule that the priest is at all times and in all places the enemy of all men—Sacerdos semper, ubique, et omnibus inimicus. I do not deny that the priest is very often a most earnest and conscientious man, doing the very best he knows of as well as he can do it. Lord Amberley is quite right in saying that the blame rests more with the laity than with the priesthood; that it has insisted on magic and mysteries, and has forced the priesthood to produce them. But then, how dreadful is the system that puts good men to such uses!

And although it is true that in its origin a priesthood is the effect of an evil already existing, a symptom of social disease rather than a cause of it, yet, once being created and made powerful, it tends in many ways to prolong and increase the disease which gave it birth. One of these ways is so marked and of such practical importance that we are bound to consider it here; I mean the education of children. If there is one lesson which history forces upon us in every page, it is this: keep your children away from the priest, or he will make them the enemies of mankind. It is not the Catholic clergy and those like them who are alone to be dreaded in this matter; even the representatives of apparently harmless religions may do incalculable mischief if they get education into their hands. To the early Mohammedans the mosque was the one public building in every place where public business could be transacted; and so it was naturally the place of primary education, which they held to be a matter of supreme importance. By and by, as the clergy grew up, the mosque was gradually usurped by them, and primary education fell into their hands. Then ensued a "revival of religion;" religion became a fanaticism; books were burnt and universities were closed; the empire rotted away in East and West, until it was conquered by Turkish savages in Asia and by Christian savages in Spain.

The labors of students of the early history of institutions—notably Sir Henry Maine and M. Laveleye—have disclosed to us an element of society which appears to have existed in all times and places, and which is the basis of our own social structure. The village community, or commune, or township, found in tribes of the most varied race and time, has so modified itself as to get adapted in one place or another to all the different conditions of human existence. This union of men to work for a common object has transformed them from wild animals into tame ones. Century by century the educating process of the social life has been working at human nature; it has built itself into our inmost soul. Such as we are—moral and rational beings—thinking and talking in general conceptions about the facts that make up our life, feeling a necessity to act, not for ourselves, but for Ourself, for the larger life of Man in which we are elements; such moral and rational beings, I say, Man has made us. By Man I mean men organized into a society, which fights for its life, not only as a mere collection of men who must separately be kept alive, but as society. It must fight, not only against external enemies, but against treason and disruption within it. Hence comes the unity of interest of all its members; each of them has to feel that he is not himself only but part of all the rest. Conscience—the sense of right and wrong—springs out of the habit of judging things from the point of view of all and not of one. It is Ourself, not ourselves, that makes for righteousness.

The codes of morality, then, which are adopted into various religions, and afterwards taught as parts of religious systems, are derived from secular sources. The most ancient version of the Ten Commandments, whatever the investigations of scholars may make it out to be, originates not in the thunders of Sinai, but in the peaceful life of men on the plains of Chaldea. Conscience is the voice of Man ingrained into our hearts, commanding us to work for Man.

Religions differ in the treatment which they give to this most sacred heirloom of our past history. Sometimes they invert its precepts—telling men to be submissive under oppression because the powers that be are ordained of God; telling them to believe where they have not seen, and to play with falsehood in order that a particular doctrine may prevail, instead of seeking for truth whatever it may be; telling them to betray their country for the sake of their church. But there is one great distinction to which I wish, in conclusion, to call special attention—a distinction between two kinds of religious emotion which bear upon the conduct of men.

We said that conscience is the voice of Man within us, commanding us to work for Man. We do not know this immediately by our own experience; we only know that something within us commands us to work for Man. This fact men have tried to explain; and they have thought, for the most part, that this voice was the voice of a god. But the explanation takes two different forms: the god may speak in us for Man's sake, or for his own sake. If he speaks for his own sake—and this is what generally happens when he has priests who lay claim to a magical character and powers—our allegiance is apt to be taken away from Man, and transferred to the god. When we love our brother for the sake of our brother we help all men to grow in the right; but when we love our brother for the sake of somebody else, who is very likely to damn our brother, it very soon comes to burning him alive for his soul's health. When men respect human life for the sake of Man, tranquillity, order, and progress go hand in hand; but those who only respected human life because God had forbidden murder have set their mark upon Europe in fifteen centuries of blood and fire.

These are only two examples of a general rule. Wherever the allegiance of men has been diverted from Man to some divinity who seeks his own glory, one thing has happened. The right precepts might be enforced, but they were enforced upon wrong grounds, and they were not obeyed. But right precepts are not always enforced; the fact that the fountains of morality have been poisoned makes it easy to substitute wrong precepts for right ones.

To this same treason against humanity belongs the claim of the priesthood to take away the guilt of a sinner after confession has been made to it. The Catholic priest professes to act as an ambassador for his God, and to absolve the guilty man by conveying to him the forgiveness of heaven. If his credentials were ever so sure, if he were indeed the ambassador of a superhuman power, the claim would be treasonable. Can the favor of the Czar make guiltless the murderer of old men and women and children in Circassian valleys? Can the pardon of the Sultan make clean the bloody hands of a Pasha? As little can any God forgive sins committed against man. When men think he can, they compound for old sins which the god did not like by committing new ones which he does like. Many a remorseful despot has atoned for the levities of his youth by the persecution of heretics in his old age. That frightful crime, the adulteration of food, could not possibly be so common amongst us if men were not taught to regard it as merely objectionable because it is remotely connected with stealing, of which God has expressed his disapproval in the Decalogue; and therefore, as quite naturally set right by a punctual attendance at church on Sundays. When a Ritualist breaks his fast before celebrating the Holy Communion, his deity can forgive him, if he likes, for the matter concerns nobody else; but no deity can forgive him for preventing his parishioners from setting up a public library and reading-room for fear they should read Mr. Darwin's works in it. That sin is committed against the people, and a god cannot take it away.

I call those religions which undermine the supreme allegiance of the conscience to Man ultramontane religions because they seek their springs of action ultra montes, outside of the common experience and daily life of man. And I remark about them that they are especially apt to teach wrong precepts, and that even when they command men to do the right things they put the command upon wrong motives, and do not get the things done.

But there are forms of religious emotion which do not thus undermine the conscience. Far be it from me to undervalue the help and strength which many of the bravest of our brethren have drawn from the thought of an unseen helper of men. He who, wearied or stricken in the fight with the powers of darkness, asks himself in a solitary place, "Is it all for nothing? shall we indeed be overthrown?"—he does find something which may justify that thought. In such a moment of utter sincerity, when a man has bared his own soul before the immensities and the eternities, a presence, in which his own poor personality is shriveled into nothingness, arises within him, and says, as plainly as words can say, "I am with thee, and I am greater than thou." Many names of gods, of many shapes, have men given to this presence; seeking by names and pictures to know more clearly and to remember more continually the guide and the helper of men. No such comradeship with the Great Companion shall have anything but reverence from me, who have known the divine gentleness of Denison Maurice, the strong and healthy practical instinct of Charles Kingsley, and who now revere with all my heart the teaching of James Martineau. They seem to me, one and all, to be reaching forward with loving anticipation to a clearer vision which is yet to come—tendentesque manus ripæ ulterioris amore. For, after all, such a helper of men, outside of humanity, the truth will not allow us to see. The dim and shadowy outlines of a superhuman deity fade slowly away from before us; and as the mist of his presence floats aside, we perceive with greater and greater clearness the shape of a grander and nobler figure—of Him who made all gods and shall unmake them. From the dim dawn of history, and from the inmost depth of every soul, the face of our father Man looks out upon us with the fire of eternal youth in his eyes, and says, "Before Jehovah was, I am!"

Lessons in Popular Science.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.
BY D. M. B.

CHAPTER I.—THE ANCIENT SYSTEM OF ASTRONOMY.

1. THE CELESTIAL SPHERE.—As before remarked, the ancients supposed the sun, moon, and stars to be set in a blue vault, which, as it rose higher and higher, curved down to the earth on every side, making a vast concave abyss, in the far off part of which stood the heavenly bodies.

It matters not how large we suppose the vast concave or sphere to be, if we only bear in mind that the observer is in the centre of it, when the worlds or stars surround him on every side and at apparently equal distances. The great difference between ancient astronomy and the modern is this: the ancients supposed this concave or sphere to be solid in its outer part which held the stars in their places, while we now believe the region to be nearly immaterial, and that the stars and planets are globes and that they float or swing in the thin ether which is supposed to fill interstellar space.

2. DIURNAL MOTION.—In watching the heavenly bodies for a few hours, or any time, we will perceive that they change position, not occupying the same relative locality, some sinking below the horizon on the one side, while others are rising above it in the opposite direction. This motion is not real, but comes from the rotation of the earth. The earth is a large ball, eight thousand miles in diameter, and turns once upon its axis every twenty-four hours, thus causing a constant rising of the stars in the east and setting in the west, when the absence of the sunlight renders them visible. The rising and setting of the sun is produced in the same manner. A given point of the earth's surface turns first towards the sun, and in a few hours comes under it, and then recedes until the sun is lost to sight. This is repeated interminably every twenty-four hours.

The movement of the stars appears much greater over the equator or center part of the earth—the east and the west—so far as the rising and setting is concerned, than in the north and south as we approach the poles. The star called the north star or the pole star, which is within one degree of the pole has no apparent motion; it never rises nor sets, and around it the other stars seem to revolve, describing greater or lesser orbits as their distance from the pole star is increased or lessened. It is the turning of the earth towards the east that gives this appearance. The pole star can easily be found by the two pointers in the Dipper in the constellation Ursa Major, the Great Bear, which always point towards it.

Owing to the rotundity of the earth, as we approach the north pole the pole star becomes more elevated in the heavens, and as we approach the equator, it appears nearer the horizon. In parts of the north temperate zone its elevation is about forty degrees. In Maine and Canada about forty-five degrees, while in Norway and Ireland it is still nearer the zenith. At the north pole it is directly overhead, while in the southern hemisphere it cannot be seen.

The stars in the vicinity of the pole star do not set so as to become invisible. They appear to revolve around the pole star and instead of setting out of view they drop below the pole star, but not below the horizon. When above the pole star, they pass apparently from the east to the west, and when below from the west to the east. The passage above the pole is called the upper culmination, and the one below is called the lower culmination. If around the pole star an imaginary circle is drawn whose circumference just touches the horizon, all the stars within it never sink below the horizon, and, were it not for the superior light of the sun and the intervention of the clouds, could be seen at all times, and have therefore been called the perpetual apparition. Outside of the circle which touches the horizon the stars settle below it for a greater or lesser time according to their distance from the circle or the pole star. The greater the distance from the pole star, the greater the apparent orbit described by the several stars. The nearer the outside of the circle, the shorter the term of obscuration from view. When a star sets in the northwest and in a short time appears again in the northeast, the phenomena is puzzling to those who do not comprehend the cause of it. When in July, 1874, Coggia's comet set in the northwest at nine, and rose again in the northeast at three in the morning, many intelligent people could not believe it to be the same comet and supposed there must be two comets.

As we go south from the equator, we can no longer see the north pole star, while the south pole star becomes visible, and around it apparently revolve the contiguous stars as in the northern heavens. The celestial equator is an imaginary line directly over the earth's equator, running from the east to the west dividing the northern and southern heavens. As we journey south of the equator we lose sight of our northern stars and others we have never seen come into view. To us the class in the northern heavens perform more than half these revolutions above the horizon, and those in the southern heavens less than half.

3. MOTION OF THE SUN AMONG THE STARS.—To the general observer, the natural classification of the heavenly bodies is the sun, moon, and stars. The fixed stars are those which remain permanent, so far as their apparent relation to each other is concerned. The five planets, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn, which revolve around the sun in their regular yearly orbits, are constantly changing their position with relation to each other and to the fixed stars. These five, with the sun and moon, constitute the "seven wandering stars" of the ancients. Aside from these, the remaining heavenly bodies that are visible are of different magnitudes, and are divided by astronomers into twelve classes, or magnitudes, according to size and brilliancy.

Besides the diurnal motion of the sun—its rising and setting, caused by the revolution of the earth on its axis—it has another slight apparent motion, arising from the course in its orbit round the sun. The ever-varying position of the earth causes the position of the sun to seem to change. If a close observation is made of the position of the sun with the bright star Regulus, in the constellation of Leo, it will be seen that Regulus passes the meridian four minutes earlier each day. On March 22d it passes at 10 o'clock in the evening; on April 22d at 8 o'clock; a month later at 6, just at sunset, and is invisible. Although it is partially invisible for some time, the same relative position is maintained through June and July. The sun has been approaching this star from the west, and in August it has got so near that it cannot be seen. On August 21st the star crosses the meridian at noon; in September, at 10 A. M. It now appears to be forward of the sun, and rises earlier and earlier each morning. In February it is directly opposite the sun, and in March, again, it passes the meridian at 10 P. M., at the same time as a year before this; while the sun has risen and set 365 times, the star Regulus has risen 366 times. This apparent change of position arises from the earth's orbital motion round the sun, but was not understood by the ancients.

"The path which the sun describes among the stars in his annual revolution is called the ecliptic. The belt of the heavens a few degrees on each side of the ecliptic is called the zodiac. The poles of the ecliptic are two opposite points, each in the centre of one of the two hemispheres into which the ecliptic divides the celestial sphere.

"The determination of the solar motion around the ecliptic may be considered the birth of astronomical science. The prehistoric astronomers divided the ecliptic and zodiac into twelve parts, now familiarly known as the 'signs of the zodiac.' This proceeding was probably suggested by the needs of agriculture and the chronological reckoning of years. A very little observation would show that the changes of the seasons are due to the variations in the meridian altitude of the sun and in the length of the day; but it was only by a careful study of the position of the ecliptic, and the motion of the sun therein, that it could be learned how these variations in the course of the sun were brought about. This study showed that they were due to the fact that the ecliptic and the equator did not coincide, but were inclined to each other at an angle of between twenty-three and twenty-four degrees. This inclination is known as the obliquity of the ecliptic. The two circles, equator and ecliptic, cross each other at two opposite points. When the sun is at either of these points it rises exactly in the east and sets exactly in the west; one half its diurnal course is above the horizon, and the other half below. The days and nights are therefore of equal length; from which the two points in question are called equinoxes. The vernal equinox continues from March 21 to June 20, at which the summer solstice begins, and continues to September 20. The autumnal equinox commences at this date, and continues to December 21, when the winter solstice begins.

The zodiacal constellations occupy quite unequal spaces in the heavens. In the beginning they were simply twelve houses for the sun, which that luminary occupied in the course of the year. Hipparchus found this system entirely insufficient for exact astronomy, and therefore divided the ecliptic and the zodiac into twelve equal parts of thirty degrees each, signs of the zodiac. He gave to these signs the names of the constellations most nearly corresponding to them. Commencing at the vernal equinox, the first arc of thirty degrees was called the sign Aries, the Ram; the second, the sign Taurus, the Bull; then Gemini, the Twins; Cancer, the Crab; Leo, the Lion; Virgo, the Virgin; Libra, the Balance; Scorpio, the Scorpion; Sagittarius, the Archer; Capricornus, the Goat; Aquarius, the Water-bearer; and Pisces, the Fishes. The names and characters ascribed to these signs probably had much to do with the season of the year to which they belonged. Aries and Taurus were spring signs, and, with Gemini, doubtless marked the time for the bringing forth of young by the flocks and herds; Libra, the Balance, the time when the day and night were of a length, and balanced each other; Aquarius, the Water-bearer, symbolized winter, when rains were profuse; and Pisces, the Fishes, the season for fishing; and so of the others, though the meaning of some of them is quite obscure.

"The mode of reckoning positions on the ecliptic by signs was continued until the last century, but is no longer in use among professional astronomers, owing to its inconvenience. The whole ecliptic is now divided into three hundred and sixty degrees, like any other circle, the count commencing at the vernal equinox and following the direction of the sun's motion all the way round to 360°."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Correspondence Extraordinary.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. VII.

MY DEAR READERS: You can hardly comprehend the great difficulty that Jah and your enterprising humble servant had to overcome in the immense job of world-making that we had taken upon our hands to perform. Some of you may think that to make a world or two like this, eight thousand miles in diameter, with its extensive strata and beds of rock, sand, clay, conglomerate, limestone (all varieties), slate, shale, trias, quartz, feldspar, gneiss, schist, marble, granite, coal, etc., as well as the mineral deposits in lodes, veins, and beds of iron, copper, tin, lead, antimony, silver, platinum, aluminum, magnesium, potassium, sodium, and all the numerous list, was of itself a contract of good size; but, just think of it for a moment, this earth, compared with the sun and the planets which revolve around it, is not more than an orange in comparison with a moderate-sized mountain; and this solar system compared with the universe is less than a boy's marble in contrast with the whole earth.

So, with all the ability we possessed, and with all the agility we could exercise, it required hundreds of thousands of years for us to get through, and when we got the last spheres in process of aggregation the first were not yet in a state of completion. You must know that the process of bringing a sun or a world into existence, from the gaseous condition to the solid, having mountains, seas, and rivers, necessarily required a long, long time. When we set the forces at work in a given sphere, so that the thin gas for millions of miles around could be attracted thereto, it required ages to perfect it to the extent that the globe became a solid ball like your earth. As soon as the matter had, as you may say, been drawn together, and it assumed a crude spherical form, it began to rotate, and the velocity of the rotation increased with the density of the solidifying mass, and the heat that was evolved as the particles of matter attracted together began to assume the solid form, was tremendous to contemplate. The friction of the particles, attracting and compacting together, was the source of intense heat.

It was wonderful, too, to behold how, with the great production of heat, light was also produced like an infinite flood. When we succeeded in starting a few thousand suns and worlds, and the matter of which they were composed evolved into a comparatively solid form, the light increased with the heat to such an extent that the vast abyss of the universe, which before had been so dark and cheerless, became illuminated with most brilliant lights which made things seem vastly more cheerful and pleasant than before. You ought to have heard Jah shout, and laugh, and hulloa over the improved state of affairs. He was so overjoyed that he would skip, hop, and jump about like a street urchin at playing hopscotch. One day, with a good-natured smile illuminating his countenance, he said, "Ah, Luce, we have made great improvements in this part of the country, haven't we? It does me good to see you fly around from sun to sun, quickening the forces, enlivening the fires, and stirring up the internal furnaces. You make such a magnificent figure in the service of a light-bearer, a light-maker, and a light-spreader, that Lucifer is a very proper name for you, and I mean to call you 'The Sun of the Morning,' just for short."

"Good enough," said I, "that suits me exactly. I am very fond of this light. I believe it is the finest element or force that we have gotten up, and I can see the great office it is destined to perform in the great economy of the universe. I want no better employment than to utililize the means for generating and spreading this magnificent element or mode of motion. I will put in all my time and ability in spreading light."

"Yes," replied Jah; "you are as light-hearted and happy as you are industrious in spreading light. It makes me happy to see you so cheerful while you labor so hard in performing your great works. We shall indeed have a grand old universe of this some day."

"Yes," replied I; "I am thinking so myself; and what puzzles me is what we will find to do when we get the worlds all made—when limitless space is filled, and all the matter we produced is worked up into worlds. But ah! after we get the worlds made we will have to introduce organized life upon a large proportion of them, and the attention to the beings we shall get up will be sufficient to occupy all our time, even if we have no more world-making to attend to. There will be no need of our becoming idle."

Jah concluded I was in the right, and we resumed our labors with all the cheerfulness that you can imagine two such jolly fellows possessed. We went from world to world, and from sun to sun, from system to system, and from constellation to constellation, watching and conducting the immense field of operation under our management, manipulating forces here, and controlling influences there. We delighted to stand at any given point in the vast whole, viewing the workings of the wonderful machinery we had designed and set in motion. It was grand to witness the brilliant rays of light, starting out from thousands and millions of suns and spreading athwart the vast abyss of the universe, and to behold this immense concourse of suns and worlds coursing, revolving, spinning and whirling in the most delightful harmony and precision, until we even became lost in amazement and wonder at the grand, glorious, and majestic work we had accomplished. And the thought, too, that this was all produced from nothing was wonderful indeed. The satisfaction that filled our minds you can hardly have a conception of. We knew that we were necessarily superior to what we had produced, and that our creative minds had left their impress upon what we had accomplished. We felt an inward satisfaction in contemplating the fact that we had, in creating the universe, set up such a monument in praise of our own power and wisdom as must make the creatures which we ultimately should bring into existence ever bow in admiration before us. It cannot be thought strange that we had a feeling of pride and satisfaction in beholding the work of our hands when we viewed the vast labors we had accomplished. The countless suns and worlds seemed to respond to our self-congratulations, the immense host of worlds joined in the grand anthem to our praise, and the glad acclaim throughout the vast domain we had filled with burning, whirling worlds was, "Great are Jah and Lucifer. Great are the powers of matter and force. Great are the sources of light and existence."

Can you think it strange that, as brothers, we often embraced each other, and that we held frequent earnest and protracted conversations as to what we had thus far accomplished, and how we should continue our operations until we had perfected the great plans we had inaugurated?

And while we had much at which to rejoice, while we felt there was much for us to congratulate ourselves in the meditation of, it would be false should I attempt to cause you to think that there were never little ruffles in our sea of pleasure and happiness; that little disturbances would not sometimes arise to mar, temporarily, the exquisite happiness that pervaded our domain. With all the harmony which had marked our operations, with all the unison of purpose with which we had prosecuted our labors, little differences would sometimes arise, and the jarring element of discord would sometimes show itself; and occasionally criminations and recriminations would be the result.

It may as well be borne in mind that, while all the elements of order and harmony existed within us, the sources of discord and opposition also found their origin within us; for you must know that all the gods that ever had an existence or were dreamed of once had their weaknesses and imperfections. Unison owed its existence to us, and antagonism equally found its home within our breasts.

My Brother possessed the positive element to such a marked degree, and he was so much disposed to assume a certain superiority over me, and, at times, so disposed to claim an undue share of the credit for the work we had accomplished, that his patronizing airs and his haughty ways sometimes became almost intolerable. It was not uncommon for his hastiness and impetuosity to get the better of his nobler impulses, and he frequently gave way to his natural impetuosity of character, became angry, and showed a disposition to override all opposition that might rise before him. I was sometimes amused at the storm of passion that would enkindle in his breast, and well knew that after the storm was over the genial sun would shine again, and that the reign of peace and harmony would once more, for a time, at least, be as benignant as ever.

I was by nature forbearing and forgiving, and, although it was not pleasant to feel the pelting of the storm of impetuosity which my Brother occasionally indulged in, I knew it was not the best way to oppose his violence with violence; so I used to speak kindly to him when he spoke harshly to me. If he stormed, I smiled; if he raved and swore, I carried myself evenly and hummed one of my sweetest airs. Sometimes my placidity and evenness of temper seemed to anger him still more, and he turned upon me in his fiercest manner and said, "Blast it all, Luce! is there no spirit in you? Will you quietly take all sorts of abuse and show no resentment in return?"

"Why, yes, my Brother," I replied, "I have spirit within me, but it is the spirit of mildness, patience, and forbearance. I might fly into a passion and rave and tear around as you do, if I would only give way to it as you do, but I cannot see what good would be produced by it. I would rather hold my temper and keep control of it than have it become my master and cause me to act and to talk foolishly. And I think it far pleasanter to keep of an equable frame of mind than to be cross and impetuous, and indulge in unreasonable language, and say things which in cooler moments one must be sorry for. I prefer to be my own master, rather than to be the slave of angry passions; and I am sure I feel better and happier never to give way to anger or hatred."

"Ah Luce," said Jah, "I do get provoked at you beyond all endurance. It seems to me if you would fly in a passion the same as I do, and rage and storm awhile, if not more than ten minutes at a time, that you would feel the better for it, the same as the air on one of our globes is clearer and pleasanter after a severe storm has passed over a section of its surface. But your imperturbability, your everlasting equanimity and suavity angers me to the foaming point. If you would rip and snort around for half an hour as I do, I think I would like you all the better it."

"No, Jah," said your humble servant, "that is not my style. If I acted in that foolish manner, you would not feel any better, and I know I would not feel as well. If my even temper displeases you, I am very sorry, but I cannot change it to suit you. I must be myself. I cannot act contrary to myself. Now let us take each other just as we are, and not wish to make each other over. I am willing you should give way to anger and violence if you feel any better for it, but it would not answer for me; I should not feel so well for it."

"My dear Luce, give me your hand, old fellow. You are a trump, and there is no discount on that. Pardon me for my little weakness, and let us forget and forgive. Shake."

So we shook hands heartily, and the clouds passed away. The worst thing about it was, however, Jah's fits of anger, as our cares and perplexities increased, seemed to grow upon him in frequency and violence. But I will not tire you out entirely this time. I will tell you more about it another time. In the meantime, my friends, let me advise you, under all circumstances, to keep an equable frame of mind. It will save you lots of trouble. Your own

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Answers to Inquirers.

O. W. B.—Is the editor of The Sun the author of a book, published several years ago, entitled "Two Years Before the Mast"? Ans.—No; Mr. Dana has not been a sailor, nor is he author of the book. It was written by Richard Henry Dana.

M. A. S.—Is E. V. Wilson now publishing a paper entitled The Spiritualist at Work? Ans.—No; it was discontinued two years ago.

C. D. M.—I would like to know in what book I can find the most thorough examination of the Prophecies. Ans.—Thomas Paine's book upon this subject is about as able as anything we think of just now.

W.—1. Can a railway company sell land that has never been surveyed by Government? 2. Can the railway company charge four dollars per acre for brush land, one half mountain rocks? 3. When one half the money has already been paid and the land not yet been surveyed, will we be able to get deeds? Ans.—1. Yes, if it belongs to them. Government may grant to the company a strip of land on either side of a railroad five miles in width. The title would be good whether surveyed by Government or not. Ans.—2. Yes; they can charge whatever they please if the land is theirs; but they cannot compel people to pay any more than they choose. Ans.—3. There may be confusion in the matter, but the duty of Government is to give a good title.

The Radical Pulpit.

The Sectarian Spirit.—Concluded.

A SERMON BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

These faults have always been seen; they have always been acknowledged; and efforts have, at all times, been made to remove them. The earliest efforts in the Church were religious, prompted by the feeling of communion with the Christ, the living head. The exquisite lyric on charity, in the 13th chapter of Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, was written to lay the evil spirit of sectarianism that was working like a poison inside of his own churches. "Now abide Faith, Hope, Charity, these three. But the greatest of these is Charity." "Have fervent Charity among ourselves." "Bear one another's burdens." Remember that you have one Lord, one faith, one baptism; remember that you are all baptised into one spirit, that a common Christ is the Savior of all; that the deliverance from sin is a common deliverance; that the hereafter opens its promise to all alike. In the same strain other apostles speak—their words may be read in all the epistles of the New Testament, to the effect that men should forget differences, should cease to hate, should love each other, and should try to bind themselves together by mutual consideration and helpfulness.

Yet these earnest apostolical injunctions went no further than the limits of the Christian Church. Paul's charity was applied only to Christians. They were to love one another; they were not bidden to love the heathen outside; they were not charged to love the Jew or the Greek, the Roman or the barbarian; they were brothers and sisters in Christ together; they were not brothers and sisters in humanity, with all the rest of mankind.

The Roman Church had its own peculiar methods of suppressing dissent, by burning it up. It would drown it in its own blood; it would elevate it by hanging it on the cross; it would send it to heaven in a chariot of flame. The Roman Church boasts of its unity. What sort of unity? A unity created and established by the extinction of everything that threatened to break it. One law, one scepter, one dominion—that is what it means. When Bossuet wrote against the variations of Protestantism, none so well knew as he that the same argument could be brought with fatal force against Romanism, if Romanism had allowed dissent to express itself. Protestantism kept an open ear to the voices of dissent. Romanism stifled the voices with dust. The variations of Protestantism were due to fidelity to the Spirit of Truth. The unity of Rome was due to the neglect of it. But what did Protestantism do here? The method of Protestantism is a method of arrangement. The apostolic method was the method of love. The Roman Catholic method was the method of extinction; the Protestant method is the method of diplomacy.

In 1846, the Evangelical Alliance was formed at Edinburgh. In 1867 the American branch of the Evangelical Alliance was established in New York. In 1873, as we all remember, the Alliance held its first grand convention in the United States. The object of the Alliance was to evercome within the circle of Evangelical denominations—comprising Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, of both schools—the influence of the sectarian spirit. The aim was to promote union among, "Evangelical" Christians. It was designed to unite them altogether in closer bonds to the Christ. The founders promulgated no authoritative creed; laid down no compulsory rule; established no ecclesiastical dominion. The spirit was intended to be entirely cordial, open, fraternal, but within the limits "Evangelical denominations." They openly professed and published their faith in the leading articles of the Evangelical system of religion. The effect may have been to extinguish the sectarian spirit within the limits of these denominations. But did it extinguish the sectarian spirit towards those without? It deepened it; it intensified it. The Evangelical Alliance meant war against Romanism on the one side, and against Rationalism on the other. The Unitarians were excluded from the fellowship; so were the Universalists; so were the Swedenborgians. The Rationalists were of course excluded. Naturalism, under any of its definitions, whatever its spirit, was put down. Materialism, as Christianity defines it, was cast out. Every opinion was laid under the ban except Evangelical religious opinion. It follows, as a thing of course, that this method of diplomacy as a part of the Evangelical Alliance, was exceedingly narrow, exceedingly limited—commendable enough in its spirit, as far as it went, but confined to a small section even of Christendom. Outside of that section the sectarian spirit raged furiously as ever.

Where then is our help? What are we to do about it? There is but one method of help and that is to pronounce irrational and hurtful all belief in special revelation; to say there is no such thing as exclusion possession of truth; that if one religion may claim a revelation, the same right must be conceded to others; that all religions stand upon one ground of authority by reason of their having the same origin and sharing the same idea; that revelation, if we still prefer that worn-out phrase, comes to all faiths alike, and that no form of faith has the right to tyrannize over another. This is the position that we, in this generation, are able to take. For the first time in history we are able to plant ourselves on this ground. The attitude could not have been taken before; it could not have been taken even thirty years ago, because it is within the last thirty years, aye, within a much more recent period than this that the study of what is called the science of comparative religions has been instituted. The greatest scholars of the century, in the East and in the West, in Germany and in England, have been devoting themselves in the spirit of real devotion to the study of the different religious faiths of the world.

The sacred books of these religions have been brought to light, translated, and now, for the first time the studious reader has before him, not the Hebrew and Christian bibles only, but all the bibles that there are—all the scriptures that have voiced the religious sentiment of the race. At last we can compare the religions together. On comparing them, what do we see? We see this, that all religions are of one family, that all are of common kin, that all come of a common stock; that all are born of the self-same impulse; that they are all steps in the intellectual development of mankind. All have the same institutions and forms, the altar, the temple, the sacrifices, the priesthood; all have architecture, sculpture, and painting. All have the same essential doctrines; all have the same definitions of God; all have similar conceptions of the hereafter; all have one central thought, the human need of salvation; all teach a theory of mediatorial rescue; all rest on a principle of atonement which is essentially the same in them all. Moreover, it is discovered that the moralities of all religions are essentially and often precisely alike. All teach justice, brotherly love, kindness, forgiveness, veracity; all exalt the cardinal virtues; all recommend worship, devoutness, aspirations; all encourage the seeking of man after the infinite. I could stand here by the hour and read passages from other Bibles than the Christian or the Jewish—passages of the most exquisite truth and tenderness, the most delicate sense of divine things—taken from books that were written centuries before Christ was born, and among heathens; passages more delicious in their moral aroma than anything you can find in the New Testament. This we affirm; it is not matter of conjecture; it is not matter of speculation or of guess: it is matter of simple knowledge. We have but to use our eyes, and the fact is before us that all the religions of the race are of one stuff.

Moreover, as we examine them we see that all have some central person, some great prophet or law-giver, some great teacher or saint, who is made the centre of the system. In India they call him Buddha; in China they revere him as Confucius; in Persia his name is Zoroaster; in Palestine he towers up as Moses; in Christendom he is worshiped as Jesus. They are a line, a brotherhood, of teachers. Each one is the soul of his own system; the pivot of his own faith. Each has the peculiarity of his age and race about him. Each has his limitations—national, temporal, personal. Each stands for himself and for his idea. Each is venerated, beloved, followed, by those of his own race. This, too, we know.

It is not said, or suggested, in all this that the religions of men are equal—that one is no better than another. You might as well say that the chemistry of the Middle Ages was equal to the chemistry of to-day; that the botany of a thousand years ago attained as beautiful a development as the botany that is taught at Harvard or Columbia; that the telescope which was used by Galileo was equal to the telescope that is used by Lord Rosse. It stands to reason that everything improves with age. As we go on, our knowledge increases.

It is easy enough to grant that Christianity is the queen of faiths—the most impressive, tender, humane form of religion that is known to the world. Why? Because it is the last. It has the benefit of all that went before. It is the residuary legatee of the ancient religions of the race. It is the religion of the modern world and of the modern man. It is the religion of the most intellectual, the most persevering, the most humane, epochs of history. Of course it is the best. Its age is the age of art, of philosophy, of science, of speculation, and of philanthropy. It has used its advantages. It has improved by its opportunities. But it did not create them. Christianity did not create Raphael; Christianity did not create Michael Angelo. These men did more for the Church than the Church ever did for them. The world has endowed Christianity with its opulence, and that is the reason it is so rich.

But, now, it is said that if the spirit of sectarianism declines, religion itself will be abolished; there will be no seeking for truth; no zeal for opinion; no effort to establish right above wrong; the temples will be deserted, the systems of thought will be abandoned, and we shall lapse into utter indifference and imbecility, if the sectarian spirit ceases. It seems that the sectarian spirit makes people earnest. It looks as if the sectarian spirit kept the workers on their feet.

The objection reminds one of a vulgar objection to civil-service reform—an objection based on the idea that politics in America are necessarily servile and mercenary; that if we take away the doctrine that the spoils belong to the victor, there will be no more victors and no more contestants for spoils; all interest in politics will, under these circumstances, decline; the interest in the higher problems of government will cease, and there will be nobody left to look after public affairs. Then, we reply, let politics cease. Let all the zeal stop, and stop at once, which drives into political life the hirelings who fight for plunder. Let us dispense, once for all, with the services of men who take up the problems of government and assume the management of human affairs out of greed, in the temper of the buccaneer, hungry for power, thirsty for wealth. Let them go. We shall be better without them; and let honorable men come to the front. Let the men who really love their country better than they love pelf, who have not taken an interest in public affairs before because they were in the hands of beggars, poltroons, and thieves—let such as these have their chance. Let them show a rational interest in government as it should be, and we shall have politics managed in a very different way from that usual hitherto.

This is our feeling in regard to religion. If religious institutions, creeds, and ideas depend for their existence upon dogmatism, malice, uncharitableness, then, in humanity's name, let us have done with them forever. Let us never build another church; let us never ordain another preacher; let us never collect another congregation; because, however much it may be for the interest of men to support "the gospel," it is of deeper interest, aye, of everlasting concern, to men that they should observe the conditions of brotherly society.

It is permitted by thoughtful men to entertain a vision of what might be, and may be, were the sectarian spirit to be exorcised. Can we suppose religious men not to hate each other; can we suppose them not to seek continually to drag one another down and supplant one another, we can dream of a kingdom of heaven. Did the Turk and the Christian, off by the Black Sea, contend, not as believers and unbelievers, but simply as men, the Russian war might have been ended before this. Take the element of the sectaraian spirit out of the contest, and the worst element of the fury would be expelled. The Turk is a fanatic for his faith; the Christian is a fanatic for his. Let the hatred of fanaticism die; let the conflict be simply between those who are waging war for the acquisition of territory or the balance of power, and it could not last. What gives bitterness in England to the controversy over this very Russo-Turkish conflict? It is, once more, the sectarian spirit. On the one side, there are Christians who abhor the Turk, who call on the Lord in their prayers and on their fellow-Christians in public meetings, endeavoring to create a public spirit that will put the Crescent down and commit England to the work of suppressing Moslemism in Europe. On the other side—and here is where the counter-current comes in—the Christians of the English Church hate the Christians of the Greek Church, the Church of Russia: thus we find Christians in England taking the ground that Russia is in the wrong, and that Russia must be held in check by an alliance of England with Turkey. Take out this element of the sectarian spirit; let the Englishman judge of this conflict on rational historical or philosophical grounds, as he would judge any other, and at once the convulsion that for the past year has been rending the British communities in twain would be quelled.

Take away the evil spirit of sectarianism, and there would be peace among the religions of the world, among the sects of Christendom, among the churches that are established among the people without, call them by whatever name you will.

Why does the American loathe the Chinaman? Partly, at least, because the Christian abhors the Buddhist. Take away the abhorrence that the Christian has for the pagan, and Chinaman, German, American, Frenchman, Englishman, would fall into line together, would tend to mingle, would work cheerfully at the same trades, pursue the same industries. We might then dispense with legislation and police force to protect the weak against the strong.

What happened not long since in Texas? A brutal mob seized one of the most respectable citizens in town, an eminent physician, beguiled him from his home on false pretense of charity, carried him to a solitary place, bound him to a tree, and beat him nearly to death, because he was an Infidel, according to their apprehension of the term; then they told him that if he repeated the offense of promulgating Infidel opinions they would hang him, and if anybody else presumed to preach Infidelity he must die the death, for they would put a stop to disbelief. Would anything like that happen, even in Texas, if the sectarian spirit could be quelled and exorcised?

Then, again, think of the restoration of dignity to the human mind by the elevation of its seat above dogmatism. By the verdict of Christendom the human mind is impotent to find the truth. The Christian looks back upon the religious development of the past and finds it a series of frightful mistakes and atrocious blunders; a chaos of superstitions; a wild farrago of hideous dreams. These monstrous idolatries show, in the judgment of Christendom, what degradation the human mind sinks into when left to itself. With what different feelings the rationalist, clear-minded and instructed, looks at the same facts! We are persuaded that all religions come out of the human mind in the process of the development; that they are all efforts, and earnest efforts, on the part of men to understand the conduct, and get at the secret, of the universe. Hence, there is no credulity, however blind; no superstition, however dark; no error, however misleading; no idolatry, however grotesque; no delusion, however visionary—that does not represent a phase in the effort of the human mind to gain more light upon the problems that are flung down in its path. The whole religious history of mankind is one long testimony to the earnestness, the determined patience, of the intellect of man. In all ages, in all races, man has tried to lift himself above his lowest conditions, to understand himself and the world in which he lives. What feelings of respect, respect amounting almost to reverence, do we have for even the most bewildering systems that have been professed by human creatures, when we look at them in this new light! Of course, the ancient men, like the modern, make mistakes. The question is not whether we make mistakes, but whether we make mistakes in the honest pursuit of truth; whether we are willing to drop them when wiser thoughts come. This the elect portion of the human race has shown itself able and determined to do. In their view, the human mind, instead of stumbling and faltering, falling and groping in the mire, lying supinely in the dust waiting for the touch of some inspired teacher to communicate to it a thrill of life, stands on its own feet, itself the creator of the intellectual, moral, and spiritual world. The creeds are man thinking; the temples are man worshiping; the altars are man sacrificing; the priesthoods are man striving to establish harmony between the temporal and the eternal; the prophets are man voicing the edicts of conscience.

Will the sectarian spirit ever die? Never, so long as Christianity exists, because it is the essence of Christianity, as of every system that claims for itself the sole possession of a divine revelation. Every such system claims for itself an absolute superiority over the speculative genius of man. As long as Christianity endures, it must entertain this conviction. Therefore, as long as Christianity endures, the poison of the sectarian spirit must drop into the world. A sad outlook; yes. But, courage! Religion is more than Christianity. Christianity is only one form of its expression, which has had its birth, its growth, its culmination, and is now verging towards its decline. The reason of man is more than any church, more than any system, more than all systems and churches; man is more than apostle or saint, more than law-giver or prophet.

The creative spirit of truth is at work most diligently in our communities in modern times, reviving religious ideas, quickening religious sentiments, in a way that few of us suspect. Here is Spiritualism, a religion of itself, without priesthood or temple, without creed or altar, believing in man, consulting nature, trusting to the creative genius of human intelligence; a religion that is subtly undermining Christianity in all established forms of its expression. Here is the "Religion of Humanity," counting thousands of adherents among men who have left Christianity and every form of instituted faith. Modern science leads directly to religion in its disclosures of harmonious law. There is already a religion suggested by the doctrine of Evolution. The researches of Tyndall and Huxley, of Spencer and Darwin, are laying the groundwork of a new system of faith, full, rich, exuberant with aspiration, worship, brotherly kindness, and earnest devotion in all good works.

Yes, it is coming! It is coming! It is already here! Some of us know it; some of us live in the atmosphere of it every day. Hundreds, thousands, enjoy the new faith, drink in its spirit, feed on its nectar and ambrosia, and are made pure and noble by its influence. We may hope that the time will come for all men when the spirit of jealousy, antipathy, and contempt shall be expelled; when religion shall be as free as science, or philosophy, or literature, and shall take its true place, as the sweetest friend and mightiest inspirer of man.

LET a man avoid evil deeds, as a merchant if he carries much wealth and has few companions, avoids a dangerous way; as a man who loves life, avoids poison.

IF A man offend a harmless, pure, and innocent person, the evil falls back upon that fool, like light dust thrown against the wind.

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier.

If all the apostles had really seen their Master ascend gloriously up into heaven, how comes it that Matthew and John, who must have witnessed it like the others, should have passed over in silence a mystery so glorious, so creditable to their Master, while they record so many other circumstances of his life and actions much less worthy of being handed down? How is it that Matthew has not made a special mention of this ascension, and at the same time explained clearly and distinctly in what manner he would be always with them, though he was visibly quitting them to ascend into heaven? It is not easy to comprehend by what manner of secret he could ever remain with those he was departing from.

I pass over in silence a number of other contradictions; those I have quoted alone will more than suffice to prove that these books are by no means the fruit of divine revelation; and not more so are they the fruit of human wisdom; therefore they are unworthy of credence or belief. But by what privilege do these four gospels, together with some other books of the same sort, pass as the work of divine inspiration, in preference to many others, like them bearing the title of gospels, and which were formerly, like the first, published under the names of others of the apostles? If it be said that these reputed gospels have been falsely attributed to the apostles, the same can be said of the first; for if we suppose the former falsified and corrupted, the same can be supposed of the latter. Therefore, there is no certain proof on either side to enable us to discern the true gospels from the false; and though the Church pretends to have the power of deciding the question, she is none the more worthy of belief.

Touching the pretended miracles recorded in the Old Testament, they would seem to have been devised and brought about by God solely to the end of marking on his part an unjust as well as odious preference for nations and individuals, and to deliberately overwhelm some of his creatures with all sorts of calamities and miseries, to the greater happiness and glorification of others. The calling and choice made by God of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to make for himself from their posterity a people he would bless and sanctify beyond all the other nations of the earth, is one among many other proofs of this.

But, it will be said, God is the absolute master of his grace and his gifts, and can bestow them as he will, without any one having the right to complain or to accuse him of injustice. This reason is a vain one; for God, the author of nature, the father of all, should love all equally, as his own handiwork, and consequently should show himself both their protector and benefactor. He who gives life should accompany the gift with the means and consequences of rendering that life enjoyable—if it be not that our Christians mean that their God makes his creatures solely to the end of making them wicked and miserable; which would be certainly unworthy of belief of a God of infinite goodness. Moreover, if all these pretended miracles, both of the Old and New Testaments, were true, it could be affirmed that God was more careful of providing for the lesser wants of men than he was for their greatest and chief good and welfare; that he punished more severely certain persons for the most trivial faults than he did others for the greatest crimes; and, finally, that he was all the more prodigal of his blessings where they were the least needed. And this it will be easy to show, as well by the miracles he is said to have worked as by those he did not work, and which latter he would assuredly have worked in preference to the others if it were true that he had worked any at all. For instance, when it is said that God had the condescension to send an angel to console and succor a servant-girl, while he left, and still leaves, millions of helpless innocents to languish and die in misery; that he miraculously preserved, for the space of forty years, the clothing and the shoes of a worthless, wretched people, while he disdains to see to the natural preservation of so many things, so useful and so necessary to the subsistence of his creatures, and which, nevertheless, were lost to them, and are still being lost to them every day by divers accidents, easily prevented if he so chose it. What! he sent to the first heads of the human race, Adam and Eve, a demon, a devil, or a serpent, to seduce them, and thus to doom to perdi-eternyit? What! by a special grace of his provition the whole of the human race, to all time and dence he prevented the pagan king Genaris from committing a venial offense with a strange woman, and which could have had no serious consequences, and he did not prevent Adam and Eve from offending him and falling into the sin of disobedience—a sin which, according to our Christian theology, should be mortal, fatal, and should cause the damnation of the whole human race? This is not credible.

And now we will turn to the pretended miracles of the New Testament. They consist, it is pretended, in this: that Jesus Christ and his apostles healed, by divine agency, all sorts of diseases and infirmities, giving sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, and speech to the dumb; healing the paralytics, making the lame to walk straight, driving out devils from those possessed of them, and raising the dead.

Some of these miracles are to be found in the gospels, but many more of them are recorded by our Christians in their books of the admirable lives of their saints; for therein we read that these pretended elect of God healed the sick and the infirm, drove out devils at every conjuncture; and that, by the sole name of Jesus, or the simple sign of the cross, they commanded the elements; that God favored them to such an extent that he kept his divine power in them even after their death, and that this power communicated itself to all who touched them, even to their lightest article of clothing, even to the shadow of their bodies, and even to the horrible instruments of their death. It is said that a sock of St. Honorius restored a dead man to life on the 6th of January; and that the staff of St. Peter, that of St. James, and that of St. Bernard each worked miracles. The same is said, likewise, of the cord with which St. Francis was wont to gird his waist, the staff of St. John of God, and the girdle of St. Melanie. It is said of St. Gracilian that he was instructed from on high of what he should believe and teach, and that by the sole virtue of his prayer he moved a mountain that he found would be in his way for the building of a church; that from the sepulchre of St. Andrew there ran, without ceasing, a liquid that healed diseases of every sort; that the soul of St. Benedict was seen to ascend into heaven, clothed in precious and costly robes, and surrounded with burning lamps. St. Dominic said that God never once refused him anything that he asked of him; that St. Francis commanded swallows, swans, and other birds to obey him; and that fishes, hares, and rabbits would come to him frequently and put themselves into his hands and his lap; that St. Paul and St. Pantaleon, having had their heads cut off, milk spouted forth from the heads and trunks in lieu of blood; that the blessed Peter of Luxemburg, during the first two years which followed his death—1388 and 1389—wrought two thousand four hundred miracles, among which were forty-two persons raised from the dead, without counting three thousand other miracles that he has accomplished since, and others, again, that he is constantly working even in these our days; that the fifty philosophers converted by St. Catherine, having been thrown all together into an enormous fire, their bodies were afterwards found unscathed, and not a hair of their heads burnt; that the body of St. Catherine had been carried away by angels after her death and buried by them on Mount Sinai; that on the day of the canonization of St. Anthony of Padua, all the bells of the city of Lisbon rang out of themselves, and without any one being able to account for so strange a fact; that this same saint, being one day on the sea-shore, called the fishes to him to preach to them, and that they came to him in crowds, lifted their heads up out of the water, and heard him attentively.

There would be no end to these silly tales were one obliged to record them all; there is no subject, however vain and puerile it may be, on which the authors of these lives of the saints do not take delight in building up miracles on miracles, so fruitful is their invention in this wise.

Effectively, it is not without reason that we regard all such narratives as so many vain lies, for it is easy to see that they are neither more nor less than imitations—many of them very bad ones—of the fables of the pagan poets; which is made quite apparent by the conformity that exists between them.

OF THE CONFORMITY BETWEEN THE MIRACLES OF PAGANISM AND THE MIRACLES OF CHRISTIANITY.

If Christians say that God really gave to his saints the power to perform all the miracles that are recorded in their lives, in the same way the pagans affirm that the daughters of Anius, a high-priest of Apollo, had really received from the god Bacchus the gift and the power to change anything they liked into corn, wine, oil, etc.; that Jupiter gave to the nymphs who had watched over his education the horn of a goat that had suckled him in his infancy, which horn possessed the property of providing them with everything they desired in abundance.

If Christians say that their saints had the power of raising the dead, and that they received divine revelations, the pagans had said before them that Athalides had received from his father, Mercury, the gift of living, dying, and returning again to life at his pleasure, and that he had likewise the gift of knowing everything that was passing in this world, as also in the other; and that Æsculapius, the son of Apollo, had raised the dead — among others, Hippolytus, son of Theseus—at the prayer of Diana; and that Hercules, also, raised from the dead Alceste, the wife of Admetus, king of Thessaly, to restore her to her husband.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

NEITHER in air, nor in the depths of the sea, nor in the clefts of the mountains, is any place found where a man might be freed from an evil deed.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of Reading Matter than any other Journal of its class.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 16, 1878.

Is there a Future Life?

YPSILANTI, MICH, FEB. 18, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have a favor to ask, and will ask it of you now. I will do so mainly by stating facts and making inquiries. I am a man past sixty years of age, and have spent that much of life in this beautiful world after the manner of men, not intending to be a very bad man, and still not always living up to my highest ideal of right, and feeling that perhaps what we see here may not be all there is of life. I would ask in my own behalf, What are we to find in the life to come?—if such exists. I will not set forth any of my own ideas of the beyond, but ask for light; and as I consider you a man of many advantages, one versed in science and philosophy, well posted in history, both sacred and profane, I venture to inquire of you, hoping to find you one of nature's best students, disregarding Mrs. Grundy, stating facts as you honestly understand them, and acting according to your highest idea of right. Believe me, dear friend, this subject is not only a matter of to-day but of eternity, one that not only occupies my own mind but the minds of millions of the grandest and noblest of the world.

Have we a life beyond this? If so, where is it and what is it? Is it to be a progressive one? and can spirits—if such there be—communicate with those left behind? and what must be the conditions necessary to that end? Do animals and birds have a spiritual existence?

One more, Do oysters possess the male and female properties essential to reproduction?

These questions are not asked simply to hear myself talk, but are prompted by a wish for candid, intelligent answers, as you may well suppose—coming from one of my age.

Yours very respectfully, J. NEWELL.

REPLY.—Our friend has propounded questions upon a subject about which we possess very limited information, but one which has deeply interested the world for thousands of years in the past, and probably will for thousands of years to come. We think our friend over-estimates our knowledge and the sources of our information. We know nothing of what is to come after death, but, from all we can learn, we have about as much information upon that subject as anybody. The "beyond" is to this world an unexplored and unknown country. There are some who pretend to know so much about it that they assume to tell us all about its geography, its topography, its climate, its productions, its employments, its manufactures, its amusements, its worships, etc., etc. Prudence admonishes us to take these statements with many grains of allowance and doubt. Guessing about that heavenly home is far easier than for us to go there and witness it and then return here to tell what we have seen. Persons who possess lively imaginations can fix up a theory of the after life, and by thinking it over a great deal, can almost convince themselves that they are correct, and if they possess a positive or persuasive nature, they can succeed in convincing others, also, of the truthfulness of their discoveries.

Clairvoyance may aid in throwing light upon this hidden subject, but we know yet very little about clairvoyance. That it has an existence can scarcely be doubted, but if it is demanded of us to believe all that would-be clairvoyants assure us is clairvoyance, the tax upon our credulity is altogether too heavy for us. There are many who claim to be clairvoyants who have very few solid proofs to offer of the truth of their claim. The long experience of the human race has taught them that they cannot safely believe one-fourth of what is told them.

Theologians assure us, with the most solemn visages and the most sanctimonious airs, that they have the entire facts as to the future life; that it is the destiny of the human race to spend an eternity in psalm singing round a white throne, or in roasting in the hottest sulphurous fires in a most terrible place but a short distance from the throne aforesaid, and that a preponderance of twenty to one will not be able to obtain a white robe and must inevitably become denizens of the nether regions.

These claims of theologians are wholly unworthy our credence. We find that their entire stock in trade about gods, devils, heaven, and hell consists in what they have borrowed from the pagans of three thousand years ago, and that they have not been able to add a single new idea to the horrible conception, except that they have magnified the terrible picture and have painted the flames of hell in a more lurid glare than the old heathens used to do. In the main features of the fearful picture they adhere closely to the original. The celestial regions and the nether regions, the one presided over by God, Ormuzd, Osiris, or Jupiter, and the nether regions, by the Devil, Ahrimanes, Typhon, or Pluto are essentially heathen, and, we repeat, every idea connected with it is a borrowed one. Pagan mythology is far older than Christian theology, and all that the latter can justly lay claim to is that it is a pretty faithful copy of the older belief. The first was mere crude invention and guesswork and the latter rises no higher.

We are frank in acknowledging that to us there are proofs that this life is not all there is of us; that the individual organization which begins here and generates thoughts and sensations is capable of being perpetuated when the rudimental or cruder form is laid aside. The universe, of which we are infinitesimal parts, is a grand institution. Its capabilities and powers have scarcely begun to be understood. The lowest forms of matter—the granite rock, for instance—by being acted upon by the atmosphere, the light, heat, and moisture, in a long process of time is oxydized and changed into soil capable of growing plants of all kinds—the scraggy apple-tree, which bears the most luscious fruit, and the thorny rosebush, which bears the most lovely blossoms and exhales the most ethereal and lovely perfume, invisible to the eye, but a real existence, nevertheless. Life is a great mystery. It is so in the lowest organization; it is so in the highest. It is a culmination of the subtile and vitalizing forces with which the universe is charged and replete. We see around us many grades of life, many forms of sentient existences, and many grades of intellectual development. We have not sufficient grounds to decide that we have witnessed the highest and grandest results the universe is capable of producing. We are, perhaps, not justified in thinking that there is no other form of life, higher or more developed than our own. We do not know that we are the ultimate of the universe. Who shall say that the universe does not possess the power to go as much above our scale of existence as we are above the lowest forms of animal life? We believe the powers and forces of the universe to be infinite and capable of producing infinite results.

Our opportunities for testing what are termed spirit manifestations have not been extensive; and while we are fully satisfied that many unprincipled persons have been guilty of the basest frauds and impositions in this line, and have abused the credulity of honest people for the sake of making money, we are as firmly convinced that genuine demonstrations have taken place in our presence, when no fraud or collusion was employed. These have taken place both in the daylight and in dark rooms. The strongest cases we have witnessed have been detailed in these columns, and it seems hardly necessary that we should mention them again. Suffice it to say, the results that were produced in our presence and in our view could be accounted for only on the theory that there are existing intelligences capable, under favorable conditions, of making themselves known, and of conveying various tokens of their love and continued life, and which are invisible to our sight.

These seeming intelligences may not be spirits, and science may yet be able to fully explain, upon natural principles, how the class of demonstrations alluded to are produced; but we must say up to this time, no explanation we have seen seems as probable and reasonable as what is called the spiritualistic theory. A few evenings ago we attended a seance, held by Mrs. Maud E. Lord at the house of our friend, Mr. Phillips, 222 West 37th St. Nineteen persons formed the circle, and they seemed to be people of good intelligence, some of whom had never attended anything of the kind before. We sat very closely together, forming a complete circle, into which no one could gain admittance, had they been in the room. Mrs. Lord sat in the centre, and some one in the circle kept his feet constantly on hers to be sure she did not leave her seat; besides, she kept clapping her hands without cessation, and engaged nearly every moment in conversation.

The lights were extinguished, and in a very few moments an abundance of demonstrations took place, like the playing on a guitar while it was sailing over our heads, the carrying around of a music box while playing; the appearance of numerous lights of various sizes and at various altitudes; the taking of several articles, as handkerchiefs, keys, knives, etc., from one and handing them to another; the frequent touches by hands, small and large, patting, caressing slapping, etc. Many persons in the circle seemed to have numerous friends present; notably two actors who appeared to be particularly attended to. Edwin Adams and other deceased actors seemed to be with them, and to be feeling very happy. A peculiar feature was the audible voices that we heard almost every moment. It was in loud whispers that could easily be heard by every person present. The name of the spirit, or what purported to be the spirit, was spoken first, after which numerous questions were answered. The two actors alluded to received many of these answers, and they kept up an amusing tête-à-tête with their departed friends. It was impossible for Mrs. Lord to have simulated these voices, for they were heard repeatedly while she was speaking.

In close proximity to us, the name, John Bennett, (our father's) was distinctly spoken. What appeared like a man's hand slapped ours vigorously; an arm, or what appeared to be an arm, was placed around our neck, and we were firmly embraced; and, in a very loud and vigorous whisper, close to our ear, a voice, at the same instant with the embrace, said, "My son, you are doing right; press on in your noble work." We felt cheered and comforted, and knew that no person in the body had thus embraced us. Our wife was sitting on one side and her sister upon the other, and they were made conscious of the presence of disembodied personages.

Let not our materialistic friends judge too hastily that we were deluded. We know we were not, and had any candid person witnessed what we did, we think he would have been equally convinced.

We are not positive that this was done by spirits, but we are positive that it was not done by mortals. In the deep science of psychology, which is yet but very imperfectly developed, there may be a possibility of drawing something—a force—from the minds and organizations of those present that produces these results, but that process is as mysterious as the spiritual theory. That remarkable phenomena do occur in the presence of Mrs. Lord, every person who attends her seances is forced to admit. We state the facts, and our readers may attach no more importance to them than they see fit.

As to our views of what kind of a life the future life will be, we, of course, have no means of knowing; but we apprehend it is simply a continuation of this existence, and is no more to be feared than is going from the State of New York into the State of Pennsylvania—simply a change of state; the personal peculiarities, characteristics, tastes, and sentiments remaining much as here. To account logically for the evidences of intelligence that have been presented, we have accepted a theory like this: that while we exist here, in this rudimentary state of organized life, we produce and perfect, from fine and subtle forms of matter, a very ethereal organization, conforming largely to our coarser physical bodies, and which assumes an independent existence when the body dies. We have not got so far advanced in the faith in spirit life as to be a firm believer in immortality. We cannot understand how an organization or an entity that has a beginning can have no ending—how anything that has one end should not have two. That we did have a beginning as organized beings seems most clear, but how such a being from a beginning shall have no ending is not so clear; but possibly the powers of the universe are equal to the emergency. We may know more about it at a later date.

Notwithstanding the convictions we have here outlined, we are opposed to neglecting the duties of the present life for any that may be thought to belong to our future lot. This world has cares and duties that command all our abilities and all our attention. So long as these last so much require our entire energy and strength, reason and good sense dictate that we should devote ourselves to them. We can see where we can benefit those around us, but we cannot see how we can be of the slightest benefit to those in another world. And we can no better prepare for another world than by well performing our duty here. If we do the best we can, day by day, we are in a good condition either to live here or to emigrate to another country. "One world at a time" is an excellent motto, and, as we are here, and not there, we had better attend to the here first.

If there is another existence for man, we look forward to it without the slightest misgiving or apprehension. We see no angry God or malicious devil storming and raving around here in New York, nor do we when we step over into New Jersey; neither do we believe we will, any more, when we cross over to the future state called Summerland.

If man has a continued existence, we cannot see why all animated life should not also have one. All organized life is gotten up on the same principle. Animals and men differ only in degree. If we go to another world, we shall expect to meet horses, dogs, and birds, there also. They perform a useful part here, and perhaps they may do so there. We are quite willing that everything that ever had life should continue to enjoy it to the latest moment of eternity—if anybody can tell how long that is.

There is one thing about this future life, that may be well enough to mention. There is a great doubt hanging over it, even in the minds of many who had been believers in it for a score of years. We see many who have been investigating and gaining proofs for all these years, who are still as anxious as ever to receive more proof. With all they know, and with all they have seen, they still have doubts. So we have concluded to rest satisfied with what we have here, and take the future life with all necessary avidity when we find we have reached it. For the present, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the welfare of its patrons remain our greatest care.

As to oysters, they are male and female, as are all other fishes. They do not propagate by immediate contact, but the spawn of the female is impregnated by the appropriate deposit of the male, and that is the way by which we get so many fine fat oysters in all the largest cities, and all over the country.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 38.

Great Jehovah, let us once more approach the era when thy reputed Son came upon the earth to carry out the grand scheme which thou hadst devised to save a moiety of thy dear children, whose early progenitors had committed the great sin of eating an apple which thou hadst the kindness to place within their reach, and with whose beauties they were tempted. Is it not true that thy Son never wrote a word relative to his advent into this world and of his career while here? Have we the slightest information of his writing a word upon any subject?

As his mission to the children of the apple-eaters was of such immense consequence, is it not most singular that the date of his entrance into the world should not have been correctly given by the different scribes or evangelists, whom thou didst employ to write the account for thee?

If in giving the genealogy of thy Son, who was also declared to be a son of David, is it not a little curious that both Matthew and Luke should utterly fail to show that he was in any sense a descendant of David?

As Joseph the carpenter is distinctly shown to have been no more the father of Jesus than was Pontius Pilate, is it not the height of absurdity for both Matthew and Luke to pretend to give the genealogy of Jesus, when after all they give only the pedigree of a man, not his father, and who bore no consanguineous relationship to him?

Besides falsely giving what was pretended to be the genealogy of Jesus, when it was of another person entirely, is it not decidedly strange that the two inspired evangelists should be utterly unable to agree as to the line and number of progenitors?

Does not Matthew state that there were twenty-seven generations inclusive, between David and Joseph, while Luke states it to be forty-two—a difference of over fifty per cent?

Is it not strange, too, that in giving the names of this line of descent from David down, there are only two names mentioned by Matthew that are given by Luke?

Can it be claimed, with any sense of propriety, that both of those inspired writers wrote the truth?

Is not truth always the same, and when two statements are made, and they are not only wholly unlike each other, but diametrically opposite, is it not clear that one at least must be false?

Is a falsehood any the less a falsehood because the person who wrote it is claimed to have been inspired by thee?

Is it not a very fair conclusion that when one or more persons set out to narrate a line of events, and in the laying down of the foundation upon which to erect their structure, they tell most palpable falsehoods, their subsequent utterances should be taken with the utmost caution?

If a witness bears false testimony, a most important particular, are we justified in crediting him upon any statements he afterward makes? If he begins with a falsehood, may we not faily conclude that he will intersperse falsehoods all the way through his narrative?

If Matthew and Luke could succeed no better in showing that Jesus was a son of David, are we any more sure that they were uttering the truth when they undertook to make us believe that he was directly begotten by thee or thy counterpart—the Holy Ghost?

Is there not a marked discrepancy between the different accounts of the time of his birth? Does not Matthew state that he was born in Herod's time, while Luke assures us that it was in the time of Cyrenius, when Augustus Cæsar gave orders that all the people should be taxed?

Inasmuch as Cyrenius succeeded Archelaus, the son of Herod, is it not altogether impossible that Jesus could have been born in the time of both rulers?

As Josephus states that, on the night preceding the death of Herod, an eclipse of the moon occurred, cannot the time be definitely calculated back, showing that the eclipse occurred on the 4th of March four years before the birth of Jesus?

Does not this conclusively show that Matthew states what was positively untrue, and that he is not a credible authority in stating matters of fact?

In view of the fact that Jesus, the savior of all who can by any possibility be saved, is the most important character that ever had an existence, is not the history of his life extremely defective when only one of the four who assumed to state the facts in his case should give a single item in his infancy, childhood, and manhood up to the age of thirty years?

Is it not proper that the world should know how so important a character passed his time in the days of his childhood and youth? Should we not be told what were his habits and pursuits, what engaged his attention, what were his opportunities, temptations, and failures, if any?

Is it not a very deficient history of a person to say nothing about his life and conduct until he "began to be about thirty years of age"?

Was not Prof. John Fiske eminently correct when he said that "the Jesus of dogma is the best known, and the Jesus of history is the least known, of all the eminent names in history"?

Among the various opinions as to the year in which Jesus was born, were there not, as Prof. Draper has declared, some thirty different opinions?

Regarding the month, also, was there not a great diversity of opinion?

While the Christian world usually believe that he was born on the 25th of December, did not Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary, say, "The nativity of Jesus in December should be given up." The Egyptians placed it in January; Wagenseil in February; Bochart in March; Clement in April; some in May; others in June and July: Wagenseil in August, as his second choice; Lightfoot in September, and so on through the entire twelve months?

It cannot be true, can it, that he was born in each and all of those months? or can it be set down for an ascertained fact that he was born in either of them?

Is there any reason why it should be claimed that he was born on the 25th day of December save the convenient fact that that was the anniversary of the celebrated Goddess Bruma, which the ancient Romans worshiped, and also other demi-gods whose births were celebrated on that day of the year?

Did not the myth of the birth of the son of God on the twenty-fifth day of December have its origin in the astronomical fact that on that day the sun of the solar system is born, or begins to arise from the night of sleep in which he has been indulging?

If it was of importance that each evangelist should state the remarkable announcement of the angel to the Virgin Mary of thy expected visit, how is it that Mark and John have not a word to say about it?

Was this an oversight, or was it of so little consequence that thou didst not think it worth while to mention it? And if so, why didst thou deem it necessary for Matthew and Luke to say anything about it?

How was it that even Matthew and Luke could not state the circumstances alike, that Matthew said the appearance was made to Joseph, and Luke that it was made to Mary? Were both statements true? Were Joseph and Mary the same person?

How was it that the terrible slaughter of all the little children in the country by Herod was not even alluded to by either Mark, Luke, or John? Could they be correct historians and ignore such a notable event?

Is it not very singular, too, that when the very remarkable event of darkness coming over the land in day time, the sun being darkened for three hours, when there was an earthquake, when rocks were rent, the graves opened, and many who had long slept the sleep of death walked forth and again joined their former companions, and that nobody knew anything about it but Matthew?

If such a thing ever occurred, was it not among the most remarkable events that ever took place? And is it not extremely singular that neither Mark, Luke, nor John said a word about it, and that no contemporaneous historian ever heard of it or knew anything about it?

Instead of Matthew's story being the truth, is it not far more probable that he drew wholly upon his imagination and stated as a fact what never occurred?

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

What is Sauce for the Goose Should be Sauce for the Gander.

The case of Madame Restell progresses slowly. Her lawyers procured a writ of certiorari, and took her from the jurisdiction of Justice Kilbreth before Judge Donahue of the Supreme Court. In view of the stringency of the money market, and inasmuch as Comstock's society were able to raise only about $1,000 for him this year, while two years ago they made up the magnificent sum of $16,000, there can be but little doubt that one of the objects of Comstock in prosecuting Madame Restell and several other physicians whom he has recently arrested, is to raise funds to carry out his heartless work, and pay his living expenses. In the cases he prosecutes in the State courts, he gets half the amount of the fines imposed, and as the Madame is very wealthy, his hopes of being able to handle her gold can be appreciated. No one can question his unselfish desires in this direction. The grand jury have recently found a bill against the Madame, and her trial will probably come off some time in the future.

A noticeable feature in the first examination of this case was the presence of Mr. Samuel Colgate, of the firm of Colgate & Co., soap manufacturers, the honored President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, the society which employs Anthony Comstock and pays him a salary for his inquisitorial services. It is presumed the reason of his attendance was to give courage and countenance to his faithful agent, Anthony, in the prosecution of the old lady of sixty-five summers for the heinous offense of selling medicines, etc., for the prevention of conception, and possibly for the procuring of abortion. The good Mr. Colgate doubtless has a perfect horror of this kind of business, as well as for the publication of Freethought literature, which he so strongly condemned in the last general meeting of his society, a few weeks since.

It is well that the fact should be known, however damaging it may be, that this president of the Comstock society, which would willingly crush out all the vice in the world, is guilty of the same offense for which the Madame aforesaid is arraigned. His firm has the agency for the sale of an article called vaseline, prepared by the Chesebrough Manufacturing Company, and among the uses for which it is recommended is the prevention of conception. A pamphlet is published by the firm, gotten up for the purpose of advertising this article, and on page 7, in an article by Henry A. DuBois, M. D., appears the following:

"There is one use for this ointment that I have not fully worked out. Physicians are frequently applied to to produce abortion. Recently, on the same day, two women came to me; the reason assigned in the one case was that the husband was syphilitic; in the other, that pregnancy brought on violent attacks of spasmodic asthma. Of course I explained that the child had rights as well as the mother, but it was all I could do to prevent one of these cases from going to a professed abortionist. In some cases of this kind prevention is better than cure, and I am inclined to think, from some experiments, that vaseline, charged with four to five grains of salicylic acid will destroy spermatozoa, without injury to the uterus or vagina."

There is more information of a tabooed character imparted in this short extract than has been required to send several poor unfortunate victims of Comstockism to prison for a term of years. It is in direct violation of the section 5,389, title lxx, of the revised statutes of the United States, an act passed by the immediate efforts of Anthony Comstock and his society, of which Mr. Colgate is president, and which reads as follows.

"SEC. 5389. Every person who, within the District of Columbia, or any of the Territories of the United States, or any other place within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, sells, or lends, or gives away, or in any manner exhibits or offers to sell, or to lend, or to give away, or in any manner to exhibit, or otherwise publishes or offers to publish in any manner, or has in his possession, for any such purpose, any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, writing, advertisement, circular, print, picture, drawing, or other representation, figure, or image on or of paper or other material, or any cast, instrument, or other article of an immoral nature, or any drug or medicine, or any article whatever, for the prevention of conception, or for causing unlawful abortion, or who advertises the same for sale, or writes or prints, or causes to be written or printed, any card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind, stating when, where, how, or of whom, or by what means, any of the articles in this section hereinbefore mentioned can be procured or obtained, or manufactures, draws, or prints, or in anywise makes any of such articles, shall be imprisoned at hard labor in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than five years for each offense, or fined not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than two thousand dollars, with costs of court."

It will thus be plainly seen that the pious Mr. Samuel Colgate, whose face is so firmly set against crime, or imagined crime when committed by others, and who is so ready to send Madame Restell to prison, and appropriate to godly purposes $5,000 or $10,000 of her money, is practically guilty of the same offenses. He is not only selling large quantities of an article that will prevent conception, but is sending out circulars in large quantities by mail and otherwise, giving direct information where this effective agent can be had.

That they have been sent by mail from the house of Colgate & Co., we have positive evidence. A number of our friends have in this way procured from this house in the pamphlet aforesaid, the information so criminal to impart that confinement in State's Prison at hard labor for five years is deemed an adequate punishment. The offense of E. W. Baxter who is now under indictment in the U. S. District Court in this city, and who will probably be allowed to see the inside of one of our State institutions for a few years, committed no greater crime than has Colgate. Madame Restell's offense is of a similar character. Who would have thought it? That Brother Samuel Colgate of the Society for the Suppression of Vice should thus be found classed with the abortionists and the preventionists. O dear! What is this world coming to?

Some questions naturally arise in connection with this subject: 1. Is it not just as criminal for Samuel Colgate to prevent conception or procure abortion as for Madame Restell or E. W. Baxter? 2. If he is guilty of a violation of the laws of our country, should he not be punished with the same rigor as those less pious? Would there be any injustice in this good Christian man's taking a dose of his own medicine and enjoying for a few years a quiet rest in the Albany Penitentiary where he and Anthony Comstock are so zealous in sending their victims? 3. Shall he not be prosecuted in the U. S. Courts at once? 4. What is Comstock going to do about it? Can it be possible he will let this flagrant case escape his argus eyes and his eagle clutch? Should not sauce for the goose also be sauce for the gander?

THE following poem, by our friend, Mrs. L. F. Johnson, was read by Frank A. Hermance at the funeral of Thos. F. Hamilton, in New Haven, Conn., March 3d:

Lightly, tread lightly—O! speak in a breath;
Our brother lies sleeping the calm sleep of death.
The "rest" which he sought for in days that are past,
The "sleep" which he sighed for, have come now, at last.

Oh, missed will he be in the circle of home!
And miss him shall we in the days that shall come.
When meeting in council or "conference" sweet,
His smile, wit, and wisdom never more will us greet.

Ah, well may we strew o'er his form buds and flowers,
Expression, though weak, of the love that is ours!
No more in our midst will his kindly voice greet;
His brow, once so manly, our visions shall meet.

For here he lies sleeping; the life force is gone;
Kind Nature has claimed him—the right is her own;
And though we may call, he no waking sound hears;
Though calling in sorrow, in sadness, and tears.

Then, lay him to "rest" in some bright sunny place,
And let sweetest flowers this fairy spot grace.
Our friend has departed, but sweet memories cling
Like fragrance of roses in life's sunny spring.

W. F. JAMIESON is constantly employed speaking in Kansas and Missouri, to large audiences. He is to hold two debates with Elder Cunningham, one probably with Prof. O. A. Burgess at Olathe, Kansas; one with Jacob Ditzler, D D. (Methodist). Address at Kansas City, Mo.

Corrections.

MR. BENNETT: Your printer, by error, makes me say "does he not" instead of "do they not" in the twenty-second line from the close of my letter on your one hundred and fifty-eighth page; and in the twenty-first line it should be "they" instead of "he." Please correct, and oblige

ASA K. BUTTS.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER III.

REVELATION.*

Stars Impaled by the Dragon.—The Angel and the Flea.

1. And there appeared another great wonder in heaven; and behold, a great green dragon, having one eye, and seven elbows, and upon every elbow a row of teeth; and with his tail he impaled a third part of the stars of heaven, and carried them away.

2. And Abraham came forth, and when he saw what was done he cried aloud to his wife Sarah, and she came forth and kicked the dragon behind.

3. And the dragon was astonied, and fell down in a swoon; and Sarah released the stars.

4. And Abraham took soap and water, and bright steel, and burnished the stars afresh, and put them in their places.

5. And the harpers harped with their harps, till they brake their harp-strings, and the harpers ceased to harp.

6. And I saw, and behold, an angel came down to the earth; and he placed one foot upon the earth, and the other upon the sea, and his foot sank into the waters, and he fell into the sea; and when he had clambered out he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and cried with a loud voice, saying, Send Joseph the carpenter hither.

7. And Joseph the carpenter came, and bored great holes in the water with a gimlet, and drave in nails; and the angel put forth his foot, and the water was steadfast and firm.

8. And the angel took a scroll from his bosom, and began to read, but suddenly he began to stamp his feet, and to curse and rave, and put his hand behind him, between his shoulders, in much fury; and while I wondered, he called me, saying, Son of man, look between my shoulders, where my hands cannot reach. So I rent his garments, and looked.

9. And he said, Son of man, what seest thou? And I answered, and said, Nay, my lord, I perceive nothing save a small beast like unto a flea. And the angel cried out fiercely, I charge thee, lay hold on him.

10. So I lay hold of it, and gave it to the angel, and he regarded it with a terrible aspect, and, stooping down, drew from the bottom of the sea a huge rock, and placed it upon the dry ground, and upon the rock he placed the little beast, even the flea, and put down his hand into the sea for another stone, wherewith to put the flea to death.

11. And when he had found the stone, and would have sacrificed the flea, behold, it was gone.

12. And the angel lifted up his eyes, and saw the flea about twenty and three leagues off, and he pursued, and I saw him no more.

13. And I saw a second angel descend, and in his hand were the keys of heaven, and hell, and death.

14. And he cried unto the first angel, saying, Wherefore hast thou not proclaimed the judgment?

15. And the first angel answered from afar off, saying, I will do it when I have finished the work I have in hand.

16. And the second angel cried, saying, Knowest thou not that the Ancient one awaiteth proclamation?

17. And the first angel answered and said, As the Ancient one liveth, and as my soul liveth, I will neither issue proclamation, nor even eat nor drink, nor rest night nor day, till I have executed my judgment and poured forth my fierce indignation upon the beast that hath tormented me.

18. And the second angel was greatly troubled, and returned and told the Ancient one.

19. And the Ancient one roused himself, and said to the angel, Verily, Gabriel hath done that which is not right in my sight. Have I not told my servant Daniel that judgment should come to pass at this time? and is it not so prophesied in the guide-book which I have caused to be written? Do thou see to it, that proclamation is made so soon as he shall return. It is not seemly that Gabriel should break his oath, seeing that he hath sworn by himself.†

20. And the Ancient one returned to his slumbers.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

* This is one of several mysterious chapters having no apparent connection with the history of Simon. We underscore the word apparent, for we are convinced that there is some occult or hidden connection, though it may not appear on the surface; the very fact of the chapters being numbered consecutively ought to be sufficient proof of this to any one imbued with the feelings of reverence so loudly called for by the sacred origin of the MS. That this chapter is fraught with meaning of the direst importance will be denied by no one who reads it. The awful solemnity of the scene it describes; the vigor and terse beauty of the language employed, and its dread significance, stamp it at once as the masterpiece of the book.

† Had Doctor Cumming, by the wise decrees of heaven, been permitted a sight of this wondrous chapter, what a world of wasted energy it would have saved him! what ingenuity! what humiliation at the non-fulfillment of his prophecy! what perplexity! what brain grinding! what India-rubber-like stretching of language! But it was not to be! The overwhelming honor of this grand discovery was (unworthy though we be) reserved for us. US! How mysterious are the ways, etc.—TRANSLATORS.

Communications.

Another Plea for Freedom.

MARCH 1, 1878.

Editor Index: I was absent from home when the Index of Jan. 31st arrived. I see you assail a few of the propositions embodied in my recent article, "Absolute Freedom of the Press."

I did not charge you with unworthy motives in assuming the position you have taken; much less was it my intention to misrepresent you; but I do consider it deserting freedom's brave champions to shout to the great Liberal army when in the hottest of the fray, yea, even face to face with the enemy, "Halt! change your base," etc., and, instead of furnishing any better petition, do all you can to deter others from sustaining the victims of persecution and signing the only one proffered.

Your later condemnation of Judge Clark's ruling is able, fiery, and just. It is about time to awaken from the delusion that the obscenity law was not indited for the express purpose of persecution, and, just so long as it remains in the statute books there will be found Judge Clarks to interpret it, and Comstocks to enforce it. In the hands of Freethinkers, your proposed modification would not prove oppressive to decent people, but with Christian judges and juries, what book would be free from the aspersion of being "peculiarly intended to corrupt, demoralize," etc.? If, however, a law against obscenity is to be enforced, is there any logical reason why "whole poems, fundamentally indecent," should go scot free merely because they were written by a dead Solomon, Shakspere, or Byron? If this is not fetichism, pray tell us what does constitute the article.

Whenever we admit the right of any government to dictate what kind of reading matter an individual shall or shall not peruse, we have yielded up the very quintessence of the liberty of the press, and whatever privileges in this direction we hereafter may enjoy will be only by sufferance; and, consequently, merely the dim reflections from the swiftly vanishing shadow of freedom.

"The greatest good to the greatest number" is a doctrine upon which nearly every system of tyranny has been erected. Majority despotisms and spy systems of government are the meanest of all infamous hierarchies. "Equal rights for all," should be our battle-cry, and of two evils, we should choose neither, but only embrace the good.

You are radically opposed to censorship of private correspondence. You probably consider it a constitutional, home-bred right to say about what you choose in an epistle and mail it at letter rates. Paying letter rates, however, will not insure safety from the workings of the Comstock law, the provisions of the enactment make it equally a misdemeanor for depositing in the mails any thing that can be tortured into being indecent matter, or intended, or even adapted, for any immoral purpose, whether the envelope is sealed or left open. The stipulations for leaving open the ends of certain packages were made, I take it, to enable local postmasters to easily determine the rates of postage to be charged thereon, rather than in the interests of mousing spies and informers. Yet, in the pithy words of Horace Greeley, of American Liberalism, "Why would you not have first-class mail matter supervised as well as second or third? Will you please point out wherein the Constitution delegates to Congress the right to interfere with one more than the other, or to legislate at all in reference to the morality or decency of the people, especially in connection with the mail service? The United States Government has no right to resolve itself into a police court to ferret out crimes not commited against itself."

With thousands of others, I believe the law to be flagrantly unconstitutional, and am patienly waiting to hear the decision reached in the Heywood case by the U. S. Supreme Court.

You assert that the States cannot provide suitable remedies for the suppression of obscene literature; this is a proposition I think you have wholly failed to prove. Many, if not all the States, have such prohibitory laws, and what is there to prevent their execution?

Babes and youths need no special Congressional legislation to ensure them from the wiles of human serpents bent on their pollution. The protective principle should be strong enough in their parents, guardians, and teachers, without having recourse to the incorporation of any more paternalism in the U. S. Government. There is no sound reason why it should require five or six able-bodied adults from every family to attend the circus just to see to one little child; nor is there any better defensible argument why this American people should be stripped of freedom of mails just because a few negligent parents and guardians have neglected their duty to the rising generation. A practically simple way out of the difficulty has been suggested, viz., let parents inspect their children's mail before allowing it to reach their hands. If the payment of taxes is a criterion of protection, then children are not entitled to much of the latter, for they are not often called on by collectors of the former. Few can be more generally opposed to the circulation of the vicious literature you describe than is the writer. I have never bought, sold, or owned any of it, neither is any one else compelled to purchase or read the vile stuff.

Perjury, libel, and slander are self-evident infringements of the rights of our fellow beings. Probably, in the present condition of society, laws for thir condign punishment are practically necessary. My intention was, to be placed on record as favoring absolute freedom of expression of opinions.

The pioneers of progress, the grand heralds of the dawn, have always had hurled at them the accusation of being intemperately intoxicated with the spirit of liberty, and their more "prudent" advisors, drawsily reclining on the easy couch of conservative egotism, have constantly muttered the drearily silly term, "licentiousness," in their sensitive ears. Still, "they who believe that they have the truth, ask no favor save that of being heard; they dare the judgment of mankind; refused co-operation, they invoke opposition, for opposition is their opportunity." Remember, the crazy fanaticisms of one age are usually but the popular truisms of a succeeding generation.

In company with all good Radicals, I shall endeavor to keep on the broad-gauge road to freedom and purity; but shall spend no time attempting to run on the Comstockian side-track that can only fetch up at persecution and slavery.

RADICAL FREE LANCE.

Underwood and Abbot.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have the highest respect and esteem for Mr. Abbot of the Index, and Mr. Underwood, our own justly celebrated lecturer and debater. The latter especially, as he is known to me personally; but justice and candor compel me to say that even after reading his defense of Mr. Abbot, and the latter's remarks, I am convinced that the course he has taken will have a tendency to defeat such legislation, as is needed to spike the guns of the unenviable Comstock, and his bigoted supporters. This is very much to be deplored, and the more so as it will in all likelihood help Comstock to a new lease of his position, and more innocent victims will be sacrificed to the greed of this Torquemada No. 2.

Had Mr. Abbot confined himself to merely suggesting a new form of petition, and then working in coöperation with you and others for its success, all would have been well. But as it is, there is no knowing how much mischief has been and will be done by the untimely criticism and action of Mr. Abbot. All men are liable to make mistakes, great ones not exempted, as history can prove. However unfortunate this might be, as in Mr. Abbot's case it is very much so, it is nevertheless true, and for which both they and others invariably have to suffer. If these "unpleasantnesses" are to keep going on in this fashion, we shall soon occupy as unenviable a position as our orthodox friends, who have, since their origin, made themselves so very conspicuous for their lack of harmony. "Let us have peace." We cannot afford to have these internal wrangles and quarrels. Success cannot be won in that fashion. We must have harmony of purpose, united action, before we can accomplish the great work that Liberalism has before it. This being the case, how all-important it is that we should all see and feel the necessity of curbing the desire to throw fire-brands into our own houses. If we can and will do this, Comstockism, and every other ism that is opposed to truth and justice will be doomed to a short existence.

In conclusion, I desire to thank you most heartily and sincerely for your action in this Comstock case, and your untiring devotion to the cause of human rights and the liberty of the press; also for the excellent journal that you are now furnishing to the Liberals of America for three dollars per annum. I also hold the same feelings towards Bros. Underwood and Abbot, for I think them two noble champions in the cause of human liberty and mental freedom, and two men that the Liberals of America can justly feel proud of.

I am yours most truly, in the good cause for which all true men and women love to plead and work—human rights and liberties. JOHN WARR.

Paterson, N. J., March 6, 1878.

Religion in Our School-Books.

It is an undeniable fact that nearly all our school readers of the present age treat on religion much more than on any other subject, and many of them more than on all other subjects combined. We will take the "Analytical" series, for instance. Nearly every article is highly spiced with Christianity; most especially in the Third Reader is this so, where it is calculated it will have the most effect on the mind of the pupil. What more could the Bible do—that is, if used in the place of these readers, which are all bristling and boiling over with Christianity? Combined with these we have the Christian instructor, to thoroughly instil it into the minds of the innocent children under his care, which forever binds many of them with the terrible fetters of superstition and bigotry. It is claimed by some that a child trained in Christianity until he is eleven years of age very seldom turns against it, but, in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred, remains chained down by it all his life; and I have no reason to doubt it from my own observation. If this is the case, why should we not try to reform this branch of the literature of our public schools?

Our State has provided a law prohibiting religious exercises or ceremonies in public schools within the prescribed school hours; and if we could but free them of such textbooks, our schools would be separated from the Church, and the child of an outspoken Infidel would have an equal chance with the child of a Christian. "Watson's Independent Readers," which are being introduced into many schools, are quite religious, but not very sectarian, so far as I have examined them; but they are too religious for Freethinkers: therefore I would oppose them where better ones could be obtained. A few years ago Sargent's Readers were brought before the public. But their author, Epes Sargent, was not religious; and although the readers contained nothing objectionable, the Christians condemned them on account of the outspoken convictions of their author, and they were never extensively used. I think they are the best school readers extant to-day; and had it not been for the manliness of their author in speaking his honest convictions, I think they would be in general use at present.

I should like very much to have some of our able writers express their opinions on this subject, for I know that I cannot do it justice. I hope the noble TRUTH SEEKER will give us some light on the subject, for I consider it one of no little importance to those who believe in Freethought.

FRED S. HAMMOND.

Bennett's Corners, N. Y., Jan. 13, 1878.

Mr. Macdonald's Errors Corrected.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 5, 1878, published an article on the "Labor Question," signed Eugene Macdonald. He opens his article by slandering the "Land Reformers." He says that "some gravely assert that only by dividing the earth, including the sea, into ten-acre cabbage-patches can mankind be rendered happy." I never knew the "Land Reformers" to advocate anything more than a division of the lands. The idea of dividing the sea into ten-acre cabbage-patches belongs to Mr. Macdonald entirely. The "Land Reformers" would never propose such a thing; only an ignorant and foolish person would think they did. If Mr. Macdonald asserted this through ignorance or for slander, which of the two I do not know, but either is a disgrace to him.

Mr. Macdonald makes another assertion, "that there are more men in this country than there is work for." If he were as well acquainted with the geography of his country as he assumes to be with the "Land Reformers'" ideas, he would not have asserted this. There are millions of acres of untilled land in the United States that can be made to produce a sufficiency for twice the population they now contain. How can there be more men in this country than there is work for when we have more land than we have men to cultivate it? Mr. Macdonald seems to think that there is no other way for to gain a livelihood but at manufacturing and blackening one another's boots. If he had said, Place our unemployed on the land that they may become producers and consumers of the earth, instead of saying "that there are more men in this country than there is work for," people would think he had solved the "Labor" problem that he claims is "the rock on which the eminently wise and learned political enonomists are wrecked."

He says, "the rich man has learned to take care of himself; the poor man must learn the same lesson." How has the rich man learned to take care of himself? By constituting laws in favor of the capitalists and monopolies, he, being one of them, evidently reaps their benefits; then, through these laws, he wrings his riches from the honest laborer, and, by the aid of this extorted wealth, he has learned to take care of himself. If this is the lesson the poor man must learn, it is a dishonest one, one without principle, equality, or humanity.

"Until our legislative bodies become honest, the poor man must help himself." I would like to know how a poor man, in a republican government, can help himself when gamblers and thieves manipulate the government, enacting laws to wring from the poor man his subsistence, which nature has amply provided for all? Our statutes consider it a crime to gain acquirements by speculating in human beings, but not a crime to gain them from another being's labor. Is not the one as bad as the other? Because one is within the law and the other without does not say that the true principle of equity and equality should be recognized the less? "A rogue within the law is as bad as one without."

When officers of railroad companies receive for their services thousands of dollars annually, where the laborer that builds and keeps the whole machinery in motion (without him they could not be built, neither could they be manipulated) receives for his indispensable services a scanty pittance, which, in many instances, is insufficient to support himself and family, then it is time the laborer should assert his rights. If he cannot get them through legislation, he should STRIKE, for it is a greater crime to starve than to strike, when starvation is brought on by the rich man who "has learned to take care of himself."

"The workingmen's families of this country will average seven. They are born in poverty, reared in ignorance, and die in sin." Whether the workingmen's families average seven or ten, it does not follow that they are born in poverty, reared in ignorance, and die in sin. If this assertion of Mr. Macdonald's, heaping upon the working classes such vile vilification, were the truth, pity should be extended to the workmen and their families; but this charge of his being false, the pity should be extended to unfortunate Mr. Macdonald. For the stigma of the working people will follow him, and his name will sink into disgraceful oblivion.

"The workingmen's sons keep the ranks of our criminals full." The defalcations and embezzlements committed by government officials, railroad contractors, canal and Tweed rings, and savings bank officers, etc., form the largest portion of our thefts and crime. It is true that they are seldom brought before a jury and convicted as the man that steals a sixpence and a jackknife, who receives twenty years at hard labor in State prison. Were these thieves that the law allows to go unpunished "born in poverty and reared in ignorance"? Have not a great many of them received classical and collegiate educations? The rich contribute more freely to our thievish corporation than to any other institution I know of.

The workingmen's "daughters are our children of shame." It is true that they form a large portion of our unchaste class. But they do not furnish any more, proportionately, than the rich. Was Madam Restell, who was arrested a few days ago, charged with being an abortionist, and her patients that received her assistance in violating the laws of nature, the daughters of workingmen? This is one case which has been exposed to the public, and there are many more in existence; but money being a good screen for infamy, consequently the shame of the rich are not as often exposed as that of the poor.

"But has the poor man no right to his beer and tobacco? As much right as the rich man when he can afford it." If beer and tobacco are luxuries, why has one human being more right to enjoy them than another? The rich man robs the poor man of his means, so he cannot purchase these luxuries; then they tell him he must go without until he can afford them. This kind of logic of Mr. Macdonald's will apply the same to the poor man when the rich man deprives him of his resources with which he obtains his bread. "But has the poor man no right to his bread? As much right as the rich man when he can afford it." Then, there is nothing left for the poor man to do but to wait until he can afford bread, providing he does not starve to death before he reaches that position? "As much right as the rich man when he can afford it."

"Neither can the poor man afford whiskey, for it not only takes his money but his manhood. The intelligent shun it, the rich drink moderately." The rich drink as much as the poor, proportionately. The rich man has his wine cellar, the poor man his bottle. When drunk, if the rich man gets into trouble, he pays his fine. If the poor man, when drunk, gets into the same dilemma, he receives days or months at hard labor in the workhouse. If he had riches he could evade workhouses and prisons. This is the difference between the rum-drinking of the rich man and that of the poor man.

Mr. Macdonald should remember that labor produces what man consumes; and all that man consumes, and all the pleasure man enjoys, come from the earth.

RAY CHAPMAN.

The Hours of Labor.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Mr. Macdonald's article on the labor question has brought to the surface a number of critics who do not seem to understand what they read, else they would view Mr. Macdonald's remarks on the shortcomings of the so-called working classes in a very different light. I read that article myself with the greatest interest, and I pronounced it at the time one of the best things of its kind I had read for some time. However, his Malthusian notions of over-population I could not swallow, because I think the time will not arrive in our day for any interference in human increase. When this land is as thickly peopled as England and Belgium, we may talk the matter over with some degree of seriousness. Four years of hard times have not taught the American people even the first lesson of human rights. We are fast in the grip of a money aristocracy, and we know not how to extricate ourselves. Our miserable social condition has well nigh become chronic. Across the street from where I am writing, six families have just crowded into two small tenements of six rooms each. Think of it, ye braggarts of American freedom and equality! ye who boast of "the land of the free, and the home of the brave!" that in the year 1878, in the centennial city, three families have to club together to pay the rent of one tenement of six small rooms. There are empty houses without number scattered all over the city, but the owners prefer letting them stand empty rather than lower the rents. This is but one phase of our social condition. Crowds of able-bodied working men, most of them young, gather at the street corners of this great city to while away their time, while others, no more worthy than they, are working double time, or sixteen hours per day. This is the greatest evil of the period, the want of system in the hours of labor. Take our street-car conductors and drivers for instance, working their sixteen hours daily, some of them so beastly ignorant that they do not know that they are only slaves of the lowest type. Others, equally fitted for the work, stand idly by and watch them pass, only wishing that the work was equally divided and thus find work for double the number of hands. Our mills and workshops are managed upon the luck principle also. Some of the mills at the present time, notwithstanding the general dullness, are running overtime, while others equally deserving are as still as death, their machinery rusting in idleness, the owners loosing their trade connections, and their outcast operatives waiting for something to turn up. What is the cause of this state of things, Mr. Editor? Can this knotty problem be solved, think you? Is it the fate of all so-called civilized nations to pass through these ordeals, America not excepted, notwithstanding her boundless but undeveloped resources? So it seems. Yet one would think that four years of hard times ought to have opened more than one pair of eyes ere this, unless the American people are what Napoleon I. said of the English, that common sense had to pass through the Englishman's belly to reach his brains. I think this hard-time teacher has not as yet reached the Yankee brain, or else he would make an effort to get the hours of labor reduced, in mills and factories at least. No overtime should be allowed under any consideration whatever, and eight hours should constitute the day's work. If workingmen understood their own interests aright they would manifest more concern in the regulating of the hours of labor than they now do in striking for higher wages. Wages will regulate themselves pretty well by the natural law of supply and demand, and the shortening of the hours will tend to bring about that demand. It is strange that England should be so far in advance of America in the shortening of the hours of labor. A tyrannical, overbearing mill owner in that country cannot set the law at defiance; he must bite his lips and toe the mark. The law does not consult him; it consults the majority only. The enactment of a law and its enforcement go together. If the American people ever mean to have a steady trade again they must pay some little attention to the English system. I know that England is suffering at the present time in her manufacturing industries no less than we are here, but we are the chief cause. England manufactures for distant nations on a large scale, and when those countries are rendered helpless by the fall of a Jay Cook, England feels the shock. But I have said enough for this time. Perhaps the publication of this might call forth discussion and inquiry, as the subject is one that needs a fuller and a better handling.

Philadelphia, Jan. 30, 1878. J. B.

To Rev. S. G. Law, Redding, Conn.

Dear Sir: Your questions I may fail to understand, clothed as they are in the customary "cant of the cloth," but I will try. You say:

QUESTIONS.

1. "To be answered to his [my] God."

You will pardon me, but I supposed I was to answer them and forward to you, as you gave me your address for that purpose. Between our Gods, though, there is a great difference. "Every man walketh in the name of his God"—in fact, makes his own God out of his own imperfect conception; generally a copy of himself projected beyond the clouds. And so he worships himself as God. Do you see it?

2. "Can you know the way to God without his Word?"

By the "Word of God" you doubtless mean the selection by human authority of certain Jewish and Christian tracts or books, completed only two centuries ago, interpolated, corrupted, perverted, and altered, to suit, first, the purposes of the early Christians; then, again, to suit King James; and, finally, to suit the English and American Bible societies, with thousands of acknowledged errors, frauds, etc. If such a book you call the "Word of God," I deny it. The Mohammedan Koran presents better evidences of such a claim. And as for true knowledge upon any subject, time is misspent or thrown away in searching through such myths, legends, and romances with the hope of obtaining it.

3. "Dost thou not speak to heart and conscience through the Scriptures?"

The Scriptures were never intended to interest any one beyond the age in which they were written. Nor did they ever claim to be infallible or divine, until a worshiping superstition almost deified them. Still, whatever is true or useful in them, as in any other book or books, is all well enough. But its frauds, fictions, and false morality will still remain such, and no kind of priestly conclave, by its votes or resolves, can ever make them anything else.

4. "Will their rejection make me wiser and happier?"

When you become thoroughly enlightened on these things, and your mind fully emancipated from their terrible teachings, Yes.

5. "Will I be any more likely to obtain salvation?" (Romans ii, 7–10.)

Salvation from what? From an angry God? I deny any such. From an endless hell? "Played out." From the just punishment of your sins? It can't be done. Even the chapter you refer to opposes that. Read verse 6. How, then, are you going to escape? Man must receive the just demerit of his acts in some manner, and no penitence or vicarious suffering of any one else can prevent it. This kind of doctrine has corrupted society and made the world worse than ever before. Common sense is better than all bibles or creeds here. Verses 14 and 15 are sensible. According to Paul himself, we would be better off without his altered epistles and the fraudulent gospels, and the Old Scriptures besides. The getters-up of the New Testament tried to improve upon ancient paganism, but they made a terrible botch of it.

6. "Is mine a precious faith?" (2 Peter i.)

If at the expense of knowledge, No. The more we believe, the less we are apt to know, and vice versa. One ounce of knowledge is worth whole tons of faith—if you can weigh such an imponderable article. We should search for knowledge as for hidden treasure; but as to faith in creeds, or in the vagaries of Peter or Paul, let it go to the owls and the bats, where it belongs.

7. "Is it safe to reject God's Word?"

A little too presumptuous, again, for this age of the world, to call King James' Bible "God's Word." Is it any more God's word than the Koran, the Zend, the Puranas, the Vedas, or the Bhagavad-Gita? From the latter, written two thousand years before our era, a large share of our own Bible was stolen. Why not go in for the original, if you want the Simon Pure, unadulterated "word." If, now, you reject all these other "words of God," you might reject King James' as well, for it is the weakest and poorest authenticated of them all. Education has made the only difference with you. Had you been born in Turkey or in India, you never would have entertained your present notions.

8. "Would it not be safer, wiser, and happier to believe?" (John iii, 36).

There is no safety nor wisdom but in truth. Your reference simply shows the happiness a man already enjoys who believes he has the truth. But this is common with any and all beliefs, whether true or false, and proves nothing. The question is otherwise answered under Nos. 4 and 7.

9. "Have not multitudes of the best and wisest men in every age received the Scriptures and ascribed all their virtue and happiness to its precepts and its hopes?"

I admit that multitudes of the best men have received the Scriptures; yes, and multitudes of the worst men that ever dwelt on the face of the earth, too. For proof, read Church history from Constantine down to our own time. Equally large multitudes have always, and do now, reject the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures. Some of the brightest lights of the Church, too, have denounced their infallibility, and, in many instances, their frauds, also. It should continue to be done till all pious frauds in the shape of "God's Words" shall cease to degrade and destroy mankind.

About those good people ascribing their "virtue and happiness to the precepts and hopes the Bible furnished them," I hardly see how it could be done. They could practice scarcely any of the precepts of the New Testament, and as for their hopes, so mingled as they must have been with fear, there could have been but little good in any of it. I think all really good men would have been good anyway, and so, for the same reason, would be virtuous and happy, without any regard whatever to Scriptural teaching.

You do not positively assert, but your questions involve a belief in an angry God, a personal devil, and an endless hell; and here is where it properly comes in. Now, let me ask you, does faith in these Scriptural (?) dogmas produce all the "virtue" and the "happiness" in the lives of those "multitudes" that you claim for it? I deny this. Again, I ask you seriously, do you not know that large multitudes of tender-hearted men and women have been filled with grief and horror all their lives in consequence of faith in such doctrines? Do you not know that multitudes more have been driven to insanity and suicide from faith in such doctrines? And do you not know that multitudes more of tender-hearted mothers have been driven to murder their sweet, innocent babes before they arrived at years of accountability, rather than, at maturity, to have them fall into the hands of a merciless, tyrannical deity, who might consign them to endless flames?

And then, again, if this terrible Christian God did kill his only son, as the "sweet singer" of the Christian "Israel," Dr. Watts, so graciously sings:

> "He quenched his Father's flaming sword
> In his own vital blood"—

if he did so kill his only son, I ask, was he not guilty of murder? The divine plan says this was necessary on the part of God to appease his own wrath! Now, how can poor humanity, who worship such a God, be any better than the God they worship? What shall prevent them from committing murder, if they have a reason for it? There is the example they are commanded to follow; and if it is "God-like," where is the crime? Out upon such horrid creeds and upon such impious blasphemy! They have been the curse and scourge of Christendom, outbalancing all the good that was ever hoped might be accomplished by them.

In view of so horrible a faith, well might that eminent French divine, the eloquent Saurin, say that it was "a mortal poison, diffusing itself through every fibre of his being," and that he had ceased to wonder that it had made some mad and others melancholy.

But enough. I have answered you, and if not satisfactorily, it is for want of time, and not material. I now hope you will review your early and unsubstantial opinions, and that your kind, humane heart and your enlightened judgment will yet lead you out of the wilderness of superstition, fraud, and blasphemy into the clear sunshine of truth, and that you may bask in her beams evermore.

New York, Feb. 22, 1878. W. H. P.

How Comstock Made an Arrest.

Here is more rope by which St. Anthony is hanging himself. At this rate, he will some day be strung up for good. It is an encouraging sign when the great dailies begin to call him to account for his high-handed proceedings, as the New York World does in the following terms:

It is not a pretty story which appears in our columns today of an arrest just made by Mr. Comstock, with the help of an assistant who clearly seems to have seduced the offender into committing the offense for which he was arrested. There can be no baser or more mischievous crime in its way against society than this, and if the respectable members of the association by which Mr. Comstock is understood to be employed desire to preserve their own good name and the reputation of the work in which they are engaged, they will lose no time in clearing themselves of the very serious scandal brought upon both by such proceedings as those which were Saturday testified to before Judge Sutherland.

The Startling Story One of his Victims Told in Court Saturday.—An extraordinary case was tried in the General Sessions Saturday before Judge Sutherland. Upon the unsupported testimony of Anthony J. Comstock and Joseph A. Britton, his assistant, Charles F. Blandin, a Massachusetts lawyer of good address, was convicted of selling an obscene photograph and was sentenced to the Penitentiary for three months and fined $100. Blandin in his own defense said that as a canvasser for a Boston printer he went into the office of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, in Nassau street. He there met Britton, who gave him a card with an inscription similar to the following: "Joseph B. Andrews, Dealer in Rich, Rare, and Racy Photographs and Books." Britton, alias Andrews, Blandin said, urged him to procure some obscene pictures for him, but Blandid said that he was not a dealer in such stuff. Britton then suggested that Blandin might find some such pictures in traveling about the city, and requested him to be on the lookout for them.

Blandin, dismissing Britton from his mind, went to Boston and obtained certificates from the courts there that he had been admitted to the practise of the law in Massachusetts. He had already leased an office in this city and intended to practise here. While in Boston he was shown several obscene photographs by a friend, and one of them he brought with him to this city to show to his new acquaintance, Britton, alias Andrews. The young detective, Blandin said, was much gratified. He said that he and his partner wanted 1,000 of the pictures, but Blandin distinctly informed him that he was not in the business. Then Britton said that his partner intended to go to Cincinnati that night, and that he wanted the picture. Blandin declined to sell it, but Britton had it in his hand. The lawyer demanded the picture, but Britton slipped 30 cents into his hand and said, "That will pay for it." Then Anthony J. Comstock stepped out from a private room, and putting his hand on Blandin's shoulder, said, "You are my prisoner. My name is Comstock." Blandin was immediately taken to the Tombs. He is a poor man, and his family are in want through his detention in prison. He offered to prove that he bore an excellent reputation and that he had always been engaged in honorable occupations. He was willing to do anything, he said, to make an honest living, and solemnly declared that he had never sold or offered for sale an obscene picture. His story was listened to by a crowded court-room with much interest. Mr. B. F. Russell defended the prisoner without fee, and made a strong appeal for the mercy of the court. When the verdict was rendered a lawyer said, "Ruined by the Society for the Increase of Crime."

It is hardly to be supposed the people of this country or even the men constituting the Society for the Suppression of crime will always approve and sustain this manner of doing business. To entrap an unsuspecting man to commit a crime, or by lying persuasion to do what he would not have thought of doing but for such persuasion, is suppressing crime with a vengeance! The crime committed to seduce the unsuspecting Blandin was a hundred times greater than the wrong he committed; still he is sent to prison, and the arch deceiver Comstock and his villainous accomplice are allowed to go their way in honor and freedom to lure some other unsuspecting man to ruin. If this conduct of the agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice is the Christian mode of doing away with wrong, we pronounce it the most damnable and infernal that devils could devise. Comstock and Britton justly ought to go to prison and Blandin be set free.

Hell.

HOW MUCH IT COSTS TO KEEP IT UP IN ENGLAND AND WALES.—AN ESSAY READ BEFORE THE "SOCIETY OF INQUIRY," BY JACOB ARMSTRONG.

It is astonishing to see what a scarecrow the devil is, with his lake of fire and brimstone, even in this enlightened age. Mr. Forney, late of the Philadelphia Press, who spent the year before our Centennial, in England, is my authority for the figures in the statement, that to protect themselves from the wiles of the devil, and keep from being burnt, the people of England and Wales give every year to their intercessors, the clergy, who hold in their hands the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and can open and shut it as they see fit, the sum of $18,960,425. This amount is paid to the clergy of the Established Church alone, who claim, by virtue of their apostolical succession, that they exclusively have the odor of sanctity, and are authorized to save the people from the clutches of the devil. The other sects, numbering as many people as the Established Church nearly, support their own churches besides. The Archbishop of Canterbury receives $75,000 a year for the efforts he makes to keep only half the people of England out of the lake of fire; His Grace of York, $50,000; the Lord Bishop of London, $50,000; and the Bishop of Durham, who is not so stout as the rest in snatching brands from the burning, only receives $40,000. Each of the other twenty-six bishops average $25,000 a year, with a rent-free "palace" and grounds in the country, and a fine mansion in London to reside in during the sessions of Parliament, they sitting in the Upper House as Spiritual Lords. Besides these lordly gentlemen who are engaged, if not in quenching the flames of hell, at least in keeping Episcopalians out of it, there are about twenty thousand priests, deans, rectors, canons, cures, and vicars, who divide among themselves what the bishops leave for the humble services they render in their line towards keeping the Episcopalian people out of the jaws of the devil who goeth about England and Wales, and the adjacent country of Scotland, like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour.

There seems to be more democratic equality in Catholic France than in Protestant England in church expedients for pulling people out of the fire, as the Scripture says, or at least, keeping them from plunging in. All religions are equal by law in that country, but only Catholics, Protestants, and Jews are paid out of the public treasury. One thing however, is curious. Salvation from eternal hell fire is much more expensive in England than in France. Can it be because the soul of a Frenchman is not worth materially as much as that of an English Episcopalian, or, because an English sinner is much tougher to convert? Any how, France, with a population of thirty-six millions, one-third larger than that of England, only pays $10,679,720 to all her clergy for their services in soul saving, while England pays $18,960,425, almost double, for simply keeping the Episcopalians who die every year from going into hell fire; while she gives not a cent to any of the other churches who are saving the souls of the non-Episcopalians, and who number nearly as many of the people of England as the Established Church does.

Canon Farrar is cannonading in Westminster Abbey at a fearful rate against the devil and his hot quarters in the fires of which there are so many English souls "burning continually yet unconsumed, forever wasting, yet enduring still." But not a single shot does the Canon fire into the Church which has created hell, and out of which her bishops and other clergy make money to the tune of $18,960,425 yearly. If he goes on cannonading he will soon bring about his ears a swarm of the disciples of Demetrius, the silversmith, who will protest against the Canon's attacks upon the fundamental doctrine of the Thirty-nine Articles. And some white-cravated clergyman, more logical and far-seeing than the Canon, will call a convention of his clerical brethren, and make a speech, saying: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft of hell fire we have our honors and our wealth. Moreover, ye see that not alone at London, but throughout all England and Wales, this Canon, and the like of him, are insanely battering down the walls of our armory, hell, and turning away much people, saying there be no such place of everlasting torment into which God will cast the uncovenanted people who die out of the Church. So that not only is this our craft, in danger of being set at naught by such revolutionary teachings, but also that the great Church of England should be despised as a humbug and a fraud, subsisting on the ignorance and credulity of the people. For, cannot you see, my brethren, that unless this cannon is spiked, the people will draw, nay they are now drawing, the logical inference that the Church is a useless piece of lumber, standing in the way of later institutions, and consuming wealth that ought to be expended for popular education? Too much learning hath made the Canon mad, and if the people listen to him and believe, Parliament will be compelled to disestablish the Church, quench the fires of our profitable hell, and compel our craft to disband, and to get a living in some way harder on the muscles and the brain." Then will the brethren cry out, like the Ephesian silversmith, for about the space of two hours: "Great is the Church of England! Great is Hell Fire!"

Letters from Friends.

La Crosse, Wis., March 4, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Yours of February 22d last received; in reply, will state I never wrote the pretended letter in Seth Wilbur Payne's Age of Reason for February 16th, which is said to come from J. C. Miller, La Crosse, Wis. The whole thing is a fraud, a forgery, and a lie. Be kind enough to publish this statement in your esteemed paper.

Yours very truly,
J. C. Miller.

N. B.—There is no other J. C. Miller in La Crosse.

Gloversville, March 11, 1878.

Friend Bennett: I have taken some pains to-day to interview your subscribers residing in this village and I learn that every one of them has received sample copies of Payne's Age of Reason, and also documents, circulars, and blanks, advertising said paper, and soliciting subscribers therefor. The Liberals here are intensely disgusted with Payne and his paper, and trust you will use all honorable means to punish him for his vile conduct. I know of but one subscriber here for Payne's paper, and that subscriber informed me to-day that he should promptly discontinue it at the expiration of his subscription. All the Liberals here unite in saying, long live The Truth Seeker.

Yours fraternally, A. W. Berry.

Orange, Mass., March 10, 1878

Sir: I have had several letters, etc., from S. W. Payne; never have written to him, and do not know how he got my address.

C. W. Barber.

Philadelphia, March 6, 1878.

Dear Sir: I have now received, three times, the Age of Reason, with circulars, &c. I return it to-day to Mr. Seth Wilbur Payne, informing him at the same time, that I do not wish his paper; that I am satisfied with The Truth Seeker, although I am not with the way he treated you.

Yours, respectfully, E. F. Loiseau.

1944 North Eighth street.

New Bedford, Mass., March 6, 1878.

Dear Sir: It has been a study to me of late how a man of your equable mind and character, could possibly wake up so many enemies, editors at that. Has the size, quality, and success of your paper anything to do with it, think ye?

73 Fourth street. W. S. B.

Iowa City, Feb. 7, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I have received at different times two envelopes from Mr. Seth Wilbur Payne, wherein he asks me to subscribe for his Age of Reason. As I cannot afford to take so many papers, I must be satisfied to read but one good paper of that kind; and, thinking somebody else might take that cheap paper, which you had recommended, I took one envelope to a friend to whom I regularly loan your Truth Seeker, asking him if he would look for some subscribers. But when, the next day, I found, in No. 5 of your paper, questions about Payne, and your answers to the same, I at once went to my friend and stopped further proceedings in favor of said Age of Reason. I think Mr. Payne never will succeed in breaking down The Truth Seeker.

Mr. Bob Ingersoll's lectures are very interesting, plain, and convincing. I should like very much to have him here; but of that there is little hope.

Yours truly, Theodore Jensen.

Oskaloosa, Iowa, March 4, 1878.

Friend Bennett: Enclosed is a postal order for your paper. I hope it will in the future, as in the past, honor the name it bears. Stand firm for truth, justice, and equality before the law, and all your would-be assassins can not harm you. If that consummate ass, S. W. Payne had stuck the wolf hairs through the sheep skin in his first issue, as in his subsequent ones, I would not have paid him for his paper for a year.

J. B. Nelson.

Valley Falls, Kan., Feb. 23, 1878.

Mr. D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Enclosed please find $3.00 subscription to T. S. I must here acknowledge my appreciation of Col. Ingersoll. If he continues to deliver his popular lectures, I am sure he will entirely civilize our Jehovah. It is plainly to be seen that calls to the ministry are getting fewer, while his acting servants are becoming more docile and tolerant; all this I presume, on account of receiving more humane orders from headquarters on high. Hell, like loathsome prisons of old, has nearly been razed to the ground, and I hope too, that Jehovah will soon abandon the idea of being enthroned in the American Constitution. A few more hints, Mr. Editor, from our valiant Bob will leave us in the enjoinment of intellectual freedom.

Yours truly, J. M. Piazzek.

Salamanca, N. Y., March 11, 1878.

Friend Bennett: I see there is a bill before the Legislature of this State, repealing the law exempting ministers of the gospel and church property from taxation. Will you invite every Liberal of this State to write to his representative in our Legislature, and urge him to support this just bill? Yours truly, H. L. Green.

Nokomis, Ill., March 6, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Inclosed find 70 cents for The Truth Seeker from 1st of January, 1878, to August 28, 1878. I should have liked to have ordered some books at this time, but money is too scarce at present. I am more than pleased with The Truth Seeker. Would rather read one letter from His Satanic Majesty than all that brother Teed has written, though "He" thinks he knows more than all other men, and that everybody is wrong but himself. I hope you will be left in peace to do the mighty work you are so nobly doing. I intended to subscribe for Payne's Age of Reason, on your warm notice, but now I could not think of such a thing. Poor fellow! the parents who started him in life forgot an essential in a man's make-up, viz., a spark of truth to start with; and so far he has failed to get a start from any other source. He ought to join the Y. M. C. A. and get varnished over again. May you ever prosper. Fraternally,

AUGUSTUS HASTINGS.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Feb. 29, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT, Dear Sir: I enclose price for one-half dozen copies of R. G. Ingersoll's lectures, same kind as before. Direct to P. O. Box 292. I, like many others, labor over the high-toned interpretations of holy writ by the Rev. Cyrus Romulus Regulus Teed, D. D., and often reflect on the apparent fact that the so-called God's Word is miserably inadequate for the purpose it claims to be intended, unless, indeed, it was intended for some Rev. Romulus possessing an extraordinary brain, who, perhaps, would condescend (for a consideration) to part with a small quantity, or such an amount as could be assimilated by an ordinary mortal.

What is to become of the countless swarms of human insects now crawling over this ball of matter (to say nothing of the innumerable myriads that have gone and are yet to come), a large portion of whom profess to believe in the "believe-or-be-damned" doctrine, who don't take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and therefore never heard of this Rev. Romulus and his functional potency. The Almighty must surely be aware that as a matter of simple justice to the toiling millions of his children, groping in uncertainty and doubt, that he publish a new edition, amended, corrected, and simplified, so that a person carrying something less than a quart of brains would stand some chance of understanding it. Hoping that the reverend's spacic center will be driven soon, I am yours with a desire for rest.

M. GRAHAM.

VIRDEN, ILL., March 6, 1878.

DEAR OLD FRIEND: I want to inquire of you how it is that a man by the name of Seth Wilbur Payne has found out my name and sent a whole lot of circulars to me advertising his paper? About three weeks ago I received the first lot, and this week I have received a paper, and I know not how in the world that happened, for I know nothing of him, only what little I read about him in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I never wrote the scratch of a pen to him nor even thought of such a thing. He could not have got hold of my name unless from your list, as no one knows of me fifty miles from this place. ANTHONY ROBERTS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 9, 1878.

CITIZEN D. M. BENNETT: Please notify the many subscribers to your invaluable journal that the Liberal League of Washington, D. C., have fitted up a free reading-room at 920 F street, northwest, and any books, pamphlets, periodicals or newspapers of a Freethought or scientific nature will be gratefully received and highly appreciated by our church at the capitol of a secular nation. Yours fraternally, J. WEED CORBY,

President Liberal League, D. C.

920 F St, N. W.

ADRIAN, MICH., Feb. 23, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: The following article was written for Payne's Age of Reason some time ago, as its date will show, but for reasons best known to the editor has not made its appearance. Will you please be kind enough to give it a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so its readers may know that I stand clear of endorsing the course the Age of Reason has taken, although its editor did give place in its columns to a little article from my pen.

(Written for Payne's Age of Reason.)

FRIEND EDITOR: When I became a subscriber to your paper, and, through my influence, sent you the names of six or eight more, with their pay for six months, I did it thinking that you and your little paper might be helpers in the cause of Liberalism. In one of your first numbers, you very respectfully noticed my little pamphlet, on common sense religion, and observed that it was a very good Infidel document. Following this, in the sixth number of your paper, you kindly gave place to a little article from me, defining Infidelity, in which your typo made one blunder. When referring to Webster's definition of Infidel, they put the word superstition instead of inspiration of the Scriptures.

In the same paper that you put my article, you gave your readers a lengthy editorial in defense of Anthony Comstock, even claiming for him that he is a Liberal, or rather a Spiritualist. Now, Mr. Editor, this was most too thin. Indeed your whole article savored of Comstockism throughout, as well as a few remarks you made for him in a former paper. And then in your last paper you came down with your slings at THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor, all of which shows too plainly what manner of man you are, and to whose interest your paper is being run. If this is the course that you have marked out for yourself to take; to assist Anthony Comstock in trying to break down THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to supplant it with Payne's Age of Reason, I will tell you as a friend that it will be an entire failure, and that in making the effort you are only exposing your true character to every moral, intelligent, Liberal thinker that reads THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Age of Reason. Yours for justice and the right, most respectfully,

Adrian, Mich., Feb. 10, 1878. S. D. MOORE.

MINERAL SPRINGS, ARK., February 28, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: To bring about measures of reform under the present system of political management is a very slow process of evolution. I prefer a quicker method, and think that I can indicate a practical one.

The defect of the present system lies in voting for men and measures in connection. Men first, measures afterwards, is the plan.

Let honesty and ability be the only royal road to office.

In associating men and measures we lose sight of character. That should bear the closest scrutiny. Another objection is that under the present system no party can afford to embrace more than a few reforms. For illustration, look at the two great parties in the last election. Both afraid of the money question, and "greenback" men afraid to vote for Cooper lest he fail and their hobbies represented by Hayes or Tilden fail.

Now, that the negro and carpet-bagism is taken out of politics, there is about as much difference between democracy and republicanism as between tweedledee and tweedledum. Both parties are afraid to take sides on great issues.

At the next election thousands will cling to old parties for the name's sake, to the detriment of a live party and real issues. Under the present system there is not a general vote on the merits of measures. But the advocates for various measures simply count noses. Then, "the longest pole knocks the persimmons." That will do for men, but not for measures. The most popular man should have the office. But all reform measures of sufficient magnitude should be voted upon affirmatively and negatively. Let our officers, State and national, be elected for much longer periods. Let our legislators represent the will of the people. Let them be instructed, and subject to impeachment by their constituents when they fail to follow instructions.

This is my plan for getting honest men for office and bringing many needed reforms before the people. What are the objections to it; and who can offer a better one?

O. JONES.

BOSTON, MASS, March 6, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I still regard your paper as the ablest and most candid and radical journal of my acquaintance. Long may it continue to seek and to find the truth, as it is in nature. I went thirty miles to hear Col. Ingersoll last night, and should have been well paid had I gone five times the distance. I shall stir the people up to hear him Friday night. Great is Bob. Assisting humanity to look through nature up to nature's go(o)d God, believing that we can reason only from what we know and love either of man below, or of the go(o)d God above, I remain you friend and fellow truth seeker, HOLLIS CARR.

PATRON, BUTLER CO., NEB.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We are trying, in our humble way, to do all we can for the Liberal cause; and when Seth W. Payne sent us his advertisements we circulated them, and, at the same time, we talk up the Comstock business to everybody we see, and write about it to all our friends. But if Payne is going to call our brother Bennett all sorts of outlandish names, we can't own him for a brother. I wrote, last week, a friendly letter to him, and that very evening got THE TRUTH SEEKER telling how he acts towards you. Of course we do not apprehend any personal danger to yourself, but we very much fear he is greatly injuring the Liberal cause. But sometimes what we think is going to be an injury works eventually for our benefit. Hoping success will ever wait upon you, we subscribe ourselves Your sincere friends,

ROBT. and MARY B. FINCH.

WOLCOTTVILLE, IND., March 7, 1878.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: It is none of my business what you print in your paper, but in the name of mercy give us a rest on Teed. I never read such a jumbled up mess as comes from his pen in all my life. It is a conglomerated mixture of visionary vaporings. The man is certainly crazy. Mr. Teed has been now three months trying to prove that "Jesus Christ is not only divine but is the Lord God, creator of heaven and earth," and he has not as yet offered one scintilla of proof. If he had been trying to prove that the moon is made of green cheese, what he has said would have been just as applicable, and his efforts would have been equally successful. Mr. Teed has evoluted and involuted till the infoldment of the unfoldment has encompassed the foci of successive incarnate deities, and the central function of psychical activity has lunatized his ethereal substance. That's what's the matter with Mr. Teed. Such twaddle can come only from a crazy lunatic. Give us a rest. GEO. F. ROCKWELL, M. D.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., March 5, 1878.

SIR: I have for some time been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but not until after your tilt with Comstock did I become a subscriber. I admire the quality of "stick-to-it-iveness" which appears to be personified in you, and when thinking of the energy and perseverance which has enabled you to "evolute" from the Paris nursery to the editorial chair of the best and ablest Infidel paper in the country, one can but say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." It appears to be in order to remark on Seth Wilbur Payne that his paper should have been a success, as its price put it within the reach of all, and, having the benefit of the experience of those long in the business, was well advertised; but bad men will disgrace a good cause, and if Infidels do not come to shame through Payne, then all signs fail—as in dry weather.

Allow me, Mr. Editor, to criticise THE TRUTH SEEKER. Of course all your subscribers want to run your paper, and it is natural with persons of opinions to have opinions. A paper with the objects in view which THE TRUTH SEEKER has should not only conscientiously and constantly oppose humbug in theology, but at all times and in all places where found. Many of your subscribers will place confidence in advertisements which appear in your paper, from faith in your pure motives. I refer to several advertisements in No. 9 which you cannot endorse, and their display in your columns is a "quasi" endorsement, and unworthy of THE TRUTH SEEKER; the words of whose mouth, and meditations of whose heart, should always be acceptable in the sight of those seeking the truth and striving to do and become better, from an admiration of virtue—not from fear of punishment.

P. C. TRUSLER.

PLATTSBURG, MO., March 4, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Some weeks since I sent to you for your "Thirty Discussions," etc., also some twenty-five or thirty of the "Truth Seeker Tracts," which came to hand in due time, and with which I am highly pleased. I have done and am still doing a good work, giving them out to my friends to read, after which I collect and redistribute, which operation I have repeated until now they are getting pretty well worn. But then I intend to keep them going as long as they last.

Being a mechanic, without means, my avocation compelling me to remain idle during most of the winter, I am not able to prosecute the work as I would like, else I would send for a large number of the tracts for distribution. Now, I have a request to make of you. Will you be kind enough to ask the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who may have Liberal tracts and pamphlets lying idly by, to send the same to my address? I will promise to distribute them judiciously. Having lived in this place for twelve years or more, I am pretty well acquainted, and think that I am in a position to do some good in the way of spreading Freethought. This is a very benighted region of country, as you are probably aware, but then there are signs of improvement. The temperance (Murphy) movement made something over six-hundred converts, whilst a thirty-two-days protracted meeting held by the two branches of the Methodist Episcopal Church failed to make a single one; and now the Baptists, who have been holding forth for a week or more, have had no better success so far. You will please excuse so long a letter. Respectfully,

R. E. FOREE.

ROCK FALLS, IOWA, March 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: After our respects, please send us your paper for one year, also a copy of the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," as per advertisement, etc. I think it is time such documents should be circulated, as we need their effects disseminating the elements of reason and shining daylight through the fogs and mists of superstition and ignorance, and enlightening the understanding of a priest-ridden people who pay their money and give of their substance to enslave their minds and the minds of their children to the debasing doctrines and frightful dogmas of modern Christianity. Speed the good work and welcome the day when human happiness and human liberty shall be the burden of pulpit eloquence, and in the free air and sunshine of America we shall—in the light of science and reason—unite as brothers and sisters in one Liberal league, knowing no revengeful God nor fearing any seven-headed ten-horned devil.

Respectfully yours, DR. G. MURPHY.

Useful Recipes.

TO USE UP COLD MEAT.—Prepare meat as for hash; make it into rolls (like a sausage) by binding it with raw eggs; tie each roll carefully in cabbage-leaf, and boil one-half to three-quarters of an hour in weak stock.

BEEF TEA.—One pound lean beef, chopped fine; put in clean vessel with a cover; add one pint cold water and four drops of muriatic acid; stand on back of range one hour; then simmer two hours; strain and add four cloves and one teaspoonful salt.

MINCE PIES.—One pound meat chopped fine, two quarts apples, one quart cider, one pint molasses, one-half pound brown sugar, one-quarter pound raisins, salt, and all kinds of spice to taste; put on the stove in a porcelain kettle, and let boil slowly for half a day.

GEN. WASHINGTON'S BREAKFAST CAKE.—Two pounds flour, one quart milk, one ounce butter, one teacupful thin yeast, three eggs, one teaspoonful salt; warm the milk and butter together, and pour it lukewarm into the flour and add the other ingredients; mix this at night, and put in a pan three inches deep; in the morning bake in a quick oven three-quarters of an hour. This cake was always on Gen. Washington's breakfast table the last few years of his life.

SCOTCH CAKE.—One pound brown sugar, one pound flour, one-half pound butter, two eggs, one teaspoonful cinnamon; roll very thin and bake.

GRAHAM BREAD.—To a pint bowl of wheat sponge raised over night, add nearly a quart of warm water, half a cupful molasses, salt, and stir in as much sifted graham flour as you can with a spoon. Do not knead it, but put each loaf in a separate pan. When raised, bake in a quick oven.

GRAHAM MUFFINS.—A penny's worth of yeast, three pints warm water, salt, half a cupful molasses, and graham flour enough to make a thick batter; set it in a warm place to rise; have your muffin-pan hot, and bake in a hot oven.

GRAHAM GEMS.—Mix your graham flour in a thick batter with warm water; a tablespoonful of lard to about a quart of water; one-half a cupful of molasses with one-half teaspoonful of soda beaten in; stir the mixture briskly, put it in a hot pan, and bake in a very hot oven.

BUTTERMILK MUFFINS.—One quart buttermilk, two eggs, butter the size of an egg, two flat spoonfuls soda mixed in a little water, or one spoonful saleratus, two teaspoonfuls salt, flour to make a thick batter. Bake in rings in a quick oven.

SAUCE A LA TARTAN FOR FISH.—Two yolks of eggs thoroughly beaten, one-half bottle oil added very slowly and thoroughly; one-half lemon juice added drop by drop; one-half dozen gherkins, with one dozen capers, chopped very fine, and put through a seive, and added slowly; put in a cold place until served.

APAQUINIMIES.—Yolks of two eggs, one pint flour, one-half pint milk, two teaspoonfuls butter, a little salt; roll very thin like wafers, and bake.

TO WASH CHAMOIS SKINS.—Wash in cold water with plenty of soap, and rinse well in clear, cold water; thus treated the skins will never be hard, but soft and pliable.

REMEDY FOR OBESITY.—Fucus Vesiculosus, a marine plant commonly known as "bladder wrack," a kind of sea-weed, has been found to be an effectual remedy in the treament of morbid corpulence, without suffering or disturbance of the general health. A fluid extract of this article has been prepared, and can be obtained from the druggists. The usual strength of one grain to the minim is followed, and the dose for an adult is one-half to two teaspoonfuls, taken before each meal.

ROMAN SOUP.—Twelve potatoes sliced and soaked in cold water one hour; boil in one quart water till tender; strain or mash well; add one pint milk, and let it scald with one onion, butter, pepper, and salt, and one bay leaf; chop parsley fine, and throw in just before serving.

WEST INDIAN BLACK BEAN SOUP.—Take one quart of black beans, and let them simmer in three quarts cold water till they crack and begin to grow soft, then add one-half pound lean salt pork, onion, pepper, and salt, and let it boil down to the thickness one likes thin soup. About fifteen minutes before taking from the fire, put in two bay leaves, pinch of thyme (not powdered thyme), and four whole cloves. Then strain through a colander; add juice of one-half a large lemon, and slice the other half; if small, juice of one and slice another; also, slice up a hard-boiled egg, and serve at once.

Articles of Christian Faith.

BY GEORGE A. BROWN.

I belong to an orthodox church,
And believe in the Christians' hell,
Where sinners are taken, and stewed and fried,
As soon as convenient, when they have died,
And where they must always dwell.

I believe in the good old Bible,
Which says that all shall be cursed
Unless they believe in a first-class devil,
And own that their motives have all been evil,
To their last acts from their first.

I believe, no matter how honest
And upright a person may be,
If they doubt one word of the orthodox creed—
About bloody atonements, their nature and need,
Or about one man being three—

That all such persons are doomed to hell,
To writhe and moan there forever;
But the meanest snbak-thief, when about to be hung,
May deny his foul deeds, with his vile, lying tongue,
And the bonds of justice may sever.

It is tough, but then I believe it,
That my little babe, who died
So young it could lisp not a single word,
Nor know what is meant by Jesus or Lord,
Now floats in hell's sulphurous tide.

And when I get up into heaven,
I'll sit in my easy chair,
And rock and sing, and look down into hell,
And laugh in my sleeve, I shall feel so well
To see it frying there.

Bob Ingersoll.

Oh, Bob Ingersoll has come out of the West!
In all the wide border his tongue is the best;
So sharp and sarcastic, audacious and droll,
There's no such a talker as Bob Ingersoll!

He cares not for heaven, and stops not for hell;
He swims the Styx river in spite of its smell,
Pats Cerberus's head, gives old Pluto his hand,
And lights his cigar in the underground land.

You wouldn't believe that so heavy a weight
So lightly could scale the high question of fate;
Or a person so beefy and gross could have skill
To tackle the subject of human free will.

But Bob is the chap for it all; who but he?
As lightly as birds flit about in a tree.
He jumps from defending the national Fraud.
To sneering at Christians and flouting their God.

With an audible snap of his finger and thumb,
He disposes at once of the kingdom to come.
And beliefs in which millions so hopefully rest
Are twirled in the air on the point of a jest.

It is easy enough for the lovers of sin to Believe in no heaven they cannot get into;
And natural, too, for the wicked to doubt of
A hell which they fear that they cannot keep out of.

But honest mankind, who desire to do right,
Had much better keep the old landmarks in sight;
And it always is safe to distrust and to fear
The logic that's made up of froth and a sneer.

So Bob Ingersoll should go back to the West,
Far out on the prairies, and pull down his vest.
And let him take with him his cheating friend Hayes,
And in silence and shame let them both mend their ways.

—New Haven Evening Register.

"Bob Ingersoll."

A REPLY.

Yes; Bob Ingersoll has come out from the West;
He has "wiped off his chin" and "pulled down his vest;"
And he gives the old myths such an airing and scathing,
That the dogs of theology are all madly raving!

The whole creedal system of orthodox broth,
This giant has lashed into fury and froth;
He has, we are told, made it quite plain and clear,
There's no heaven to seek for and no hell to fear,

Except what we make for ourselves, here on earth,
Where our hells and our heavens alone have their birth;
These hells and these heavens no one has a doubt of,
And the hells none by saintship can ever keep out of.

About which, at present, there is such a clatter,
Methinks we can plainly see what is the matter;
He, the old superstitions, in hemlock is packing,
And sending them back, through their own hells, a cracking.

By logical reasoning, he brings to a level
The gods and the ghosts, the witches and devil;
With good, sturdy blows, has he (wondrous to tell)
The bottom knocked out of the bottomless hell—
The bottomless pit, which our fathers paved o'er
With poor baby skulls, for long ages or more.
In speaking of skulls, let us here notice give,
Bob Ingersoll's coming as true as you live,

To speak in New Haven the 4th of March next,
And taken, has he, only "skulls" for a text!
This wierd kind of pavement, so long known to fame,
Its quality, uses, no doubt he'll explain.

Our sage, City Fathers will, perhaps, make the best of
The hint that he offers, or makes but a jest of:
Why not utilize "skulls" on our streets, just as well,
As to transport them hence for an orthodox hell?

Bob Ingersoll, don't you go out to the West;
Your head is quite level—all right is your vest;
But come to New England, the home of the witches,
And give superstition still more telling switches.

We know that the bigots, with no potent cause,
Have wished put in force old Colonial laws;
For offense No. 1, this specific they've rung:
With hot, blazing poker, to bore through your tongue!

For offense No. 2, on your forehead to brand "B,"
The initial to mean "blasphemer" you see.
For offense No. 3, they would stop off your wind
Most likely by hanging, the orthodox kind.

But never you mind, Bob, this fuming and frothing;
Their hell is demolished, so creeds go for nothing;
They cannot, by reason, your arguments meet.
So with "Infidel," "heretic," your sound logic greet.

Our good Constitution, deny it, who can,
Free speech guarantees to every free man;
Then, in bold, manly tones, let your thunder notes swell,
Give us "Gods," "Ghosts" and "Skulls," and, particular, "Hell!"

L. F. JOHNSON.

New Haven, Feb. 22, 1878.

Col. Ingersoll.

HIS VIEWS ON THE WIDOW VAN COTT.

Yesterday afternoon a reporter of The Express incidentally dropped in upon Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, at the Mansion House, and improved the opportunity of interviewing him on one or two subjects of general interest. The conversation was to this effect:

"I see, Colonel, that, in an interview published this morning, Mrs. Van Cott calls you 'a poor barking dog!' Do you know her personally?"

"I have never met nor seen her."

"Do you know the reason she applied the epithet?"

"I suppose it to be the natural result of what is called vital piety; that is to say, universal love breeds individual hatred."

"Do you intend making any reply to what she says?"

"I have written her a note, of which this is a copy:"

BUFFALO, Feb. 24, 1878.

MRS. VAN COTT, My Dear Madam: Were you constrained by the love of Christ to call a man who has never injured you "a poor barking dog"? Did you make this remark as a Christian or as a lady? Did you say these words to illustrate in some faint degree the refining influence upon woman of the religion you preach?

What would you think of me if I should retort, using your language, changing only the sex of the last word?

I have the honor to remain, yours truly.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

"What do you think of the religious methods applied by Mrs. Van Cott?"

"When applied to me personally, I don't like them."

"Well, what do you think of the religious revival system generally?"

"The fire that has to be blown all the time is a poor thing to get warm by. I regard these revivals as essentially barbaric. I think they do no good, but much harm; they make innocent people think they are guilty, and very mean people think that they are good."

"What is your opinion concerning women as conductors of these revivals?"

The Colonel rose to his feet. "I suppose those engaged in them think they are doing good. They are probably honest. I think, however, that neither men nor women should be engaged in frightening people into heaven. That is all I wish to say on the subject, as I do not think it worth talking about."

PRETTY WELL SAID.—A hard-shelled orthodox clergyman down at Lake City delivered a "Thanksgiving sermon" there which was published in one of the city papers. He made out that man is a poor, miserable reprobate; that there is nothing on the earth which he can rightfully call his own, and that he hardly deserves his board and clothes. Especially did he belittle the farmers by winding up his reference to them as follows:

"We find that the case now stands in this way: Man has plowed God's ground with God's team, and cast in God's wheat; has thrust in God's sickle, and here is the result. Now what, proportion of it belongs to him, (man)? How much more than the chaff can he lay claim to by virtue of what he has done to produce it?"

To this pious balderdash, a Lake City subscriber of ours published a pithy reply in the Leader, from which we extract the following:

"Now, in order to test this question and determine man's portion of the crop, let us, a moment, suppose that man stands one side and lets God raise his own seed wheat, rear and break his own team and harness it, make his own plow out of his own wood and iron, break his own prairie, cast in his own seed wheat, thrust in his own sickle, and run his own threshing-machine, and see what kind of a crop he will raise. Only a little while ago this was just the condition of things in this wheat producing State of Minnesota, in which, this year, are forty million bushels. Man stood aloof and God farmed it alone, except a few red skins, and they did not plow for him. And what was the result? Why, he did not raise wheat enough in the whole territory to feed his own wild pigeons with. If there were any here they had to go, every day, to some part of the earth cultivated by man to get their rations, and steal it at that. What did he raise? Why, for a crop, poor prairie grass; and for stock, fat gophers; perhaps a few other things, but these were the staples."—Ex.

BENJAMIN GRIFFIN, Lawrence, Mass., writes: Nothing pleases me better than to send you a subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. You will please find list of names (fifteen) to be added to your list, which makes fifty-five subscribers I have sent you within twenty-two months and since I first subscribed to your valuable paper. I can't now do without it, and I can't help doing what I can for it's success. I have handed around those papers you sent me to friends to read, and some I mailed to friends, hoping that some of them would subscribe. I wish every TRUTH SEEKER reader would, after reading his paper, hand it to others to read till they are all worn out, for the next two months. One man says he sends his to England every week. I am glad we are going to have another discussion. We think how you drove Humphrey to the wall. I hope you will be able to sell thousands of that discussion as an eye-opener for Freethought. I wish I was able to buy a dozen copies to hand around. I hope all TRUTH SEEKER readers will feel it their duty to see how many subscribers they can send you to read the other discussion, which will no doubt be very interesting. I hope I shall be able to send twice this number of names next time. You wrote me some time ago that Lawrence leads your list. I hope we shall be able to keep it so. Lawrence, like every other place, is full of superstition and ignorance, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is just the right kind of a doctor for it. Some of them are rather shy about taking the medicine at first. They want a good deal of coaxing to read it at first, but they are convinced it tells the truth.

A. R. LILLY, Pictou, Nova Scotia, writes: I received "The Truth Seeker Collection" and feel glad when I think that you have made an effort to assist Infidels to organize; for without organization we will fail to advance the principles we advocate and love. When Liberal societies are permanently organized, we will be able to dispense with ministers and priests to commit the bodies of our loved ones to their last resting-place. We will also find a pleasure in gathering around our own fireside to name the little ones that have been intrusted to our keeping, and when our brows will be wrinkled with age, we will be able to look back with satisfaction and rejoice when we see our children just as honorable and faithful to their country, kindred and friends as if they were brought to the Christian's altar to be sprinkled by a white-robed priest in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. The "Truth Seeker Collection" contains sufficient information to assist those who are willing to give those societies a solid foundation; they will find it an indispensable companion under all the changing circumstances of life. If lovers wish to enter the sacred pale of wedlock, parents name their infants, or Infidels bury their own dead, they will find in the "Collection" ceremonies and songs that will give expression to those joys and sorrows; but before we can fully realize the pleasures that flow from secular teaching, we must organize, for not until then can we encourage each other, as our mission on earth is one of love. Apples of gold in pictures of silver are only dross compared with the good Samaritan that shelters the poor from the biting frosts of winter. If our brother is sad, we must console him; if laid on a bed of affliction, we must soothe his pains. If a brother is weary from traveling in a friendless land, we must point him to an open door where he will find food, rest and employment; and it is only those who have for their motto, "The world is my country, to do good my religion," that will proclaim liberty to the captive, for they substitute the love of man for the love of God, the advancement of civilization instead of home and foreign missions, and the spread of sound secular education instead of superstition and priestcraft. Our duty is to be faithful to each other and as firm as the everlasting hills, and if we are consistent, and our lives correspond with the teachings of true secularism, our life, like the evening star, will fade away before the morning light, and all will be peace.

A WIDOW lady, 37 years of age, medium height, good disposition, of sanguine temperament, deep experience, and broad sympathies, would like to make the acquaintance of a middle-aged gentleman (dark complexion preferred), who is possessed of sense and culture, and able to provide a comfortable home—one understanding the laws of the higher monogamic marriage, willing and able to live them. Communications strictly confidential; but to secure attention gentlemen will please enclose return postage.

MRS. M. C. ELLSWORTH.
2t10 Box 144, Worcester, Mass.

JUST OUT!

AURICULAR CONFESSION
AND
Popish Nunneries.

BY WM. HOGAN.

Twenty-five years Confessing Priest. A very interesting work. 220 pages. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF

CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY.

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact fac simile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is in England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on live issues with a promptitude unequaled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest, cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers.

The following are a few of the contributors: Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, Goldwin Smith, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Lionel A. Tallemache, M. E. Grant Duff, M. P., Hon. Robert Lowe, Leslie Stephen, John Morley (the editor), G. H. Lewes, Alfred R. Wallace, Frederick Harrison, Prof. Tyndall, Prof. Huxley, Prof. Darwin, Prof. Clifford (author of supernatural religion), Sir John Lubbock, Anthony Trollope, T. Adolphus Trollope, Sir H. S. Maine, Sir David Wedderburn, and numerous others.

Published every month.

Rose-Belford Publishing Co.,
tf 60 York St., Toronto, Ont.

Subscription Price, $5.00 per year.

NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.
THE
Great Magnetic Remedy.

DO YOU SMOKE?
DO YOU CHEW?
DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective. Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed we warrant the REMEDY to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.

Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.

Address,
J. A. HEINSOHN & CO., Manufacturers.
9t8 CLEVELAND, OHIO.

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE. Truly one of the most valuable works that have appeare within the last ten years. By PROF. DRAPER. Price, $1.75.

PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION; or an answer to the question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Divinely-Inspired and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Career of Religious Ideas;
THEIR ULTIMATE,
The Religion of Science.
BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

An able examination of the Religions of the World—the subjects treated as follows: Chap. I.—Introductory; Chap. II.—What is Religion? Chap. III.—Fetishism; Chap. IV.—Polytheism; Chap. V.—Monotheism; Chap. VI.—Value of Ancient Bibles; Chap. VII.—Man's Moral Progress Dependent upon his Intellectual Growth; Chap. VIII.—Theological Problems; Chap. IX.—Man's Fall; Chap. X.—Free Will, Necessity, Responsibility; Chap. XI.—Duties and Obligations of Man to God; Chap. XII.—The Ultimate of Religious Ideas.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents. Postage prepaid. D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St. N. Y.

GHOSTS! GHOSTS!! GHOSTS!!

Send five cents for COL. INGERSOLL'S lecture on "Ghosts," as delivered at Albany, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1878. Just out, flashing with wit and genius. It is crammed with logic, arguments, arc asms and facts. It is beautiful, it is grand, and more, it is true. Only five cents. With a photograph of its eloquent author for fifteen cents. With cabinet size of the same, thirty cents.

"Ghosts and other Lectures." A new work by Col. Ingersoll, soon to be issued. Send me stamp, and as soon as the book is out, will send you descriptive circular and price thereof. Send three-cent stamp for Catalogue of Books, Tracts, Photographs, etc.; also, club rates for Liberal and scientific newspapers and periodicals. Address, E. C. WALKER,
6t6 Lock Box B. Florence, Iowa.

The Popes and Their Doings.

NO. 3 OF THE "HOLY CROSS SERIES."

Being brief stories of fully one hundred and fifty of the conspicuous and sinful Popes—the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God—who filled the chair of the Holy See in Rome during several centuries. The cheapest and most popular history of the Popes ever written. A friend styles it "rich, rare and racy." 273 pp., 12mo. Sent by mail at the very low price of 50 cents in paper; 75 cents in cloth.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

POSITIVELY

$50 WORTH OF INFORMATION

in form of a nice book of over 100 pages, well illustrated, sent post-paid, for $1.00

BY A PRACTICAL CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep the hens and hen-roosts free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in mid-winter. How to manage setting hens, chickens, etc., and how to preserve eggs a great length of time. Best breeds of hens, etc. Enclose $1.00 with order.

E. D. BLAKEMAN, Circleville, Ohio.

[Mr. Blakeman is a school-boy friend of ours. We know him well; he is entirely reliable, and the information he has to impart upon the poultry subject is valuable.—ED. T. S.] 9tf

TWO BOOKS ON FINANCE.

SPECIFIC PAYMENTS BETTER THAN SPECIE PAYMENTS.

BY EDWARD D. LINTON.

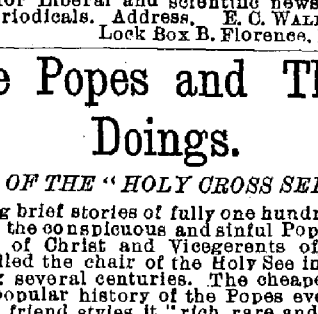
CONVERSATIONS ON THE CURRENCY.

BY EDW'D D. LINTON AND GEO. D. DRURY.

The question to be met and settled now is, Shall money continue to rule and curse mankind, or shall it be made to serve and bless?

Price 25c. For sale at this office.

The Priest in Absolution,



The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

☞The other twenty-five numbers of the "Holy Cross Series" are being brought out as rapidly as possible.

Positive Thinker,

SCIENCE HALL,

NEW YORK,

Advocates Positive Philosophy and the Religion of Humanity.

One Year, $1.50; Six Months, 75 cents; Three Months, 40 cents; five to one post-office, $5.00; ten and one to getter-up of Club, $10.00. Issued weekly after the first three numbers. Subscribers will be entitled to the full number. Send five cents for copy and circular. 4t8

THE MYSTERY UNVEILED.

The miraculous conception and birth of JESUS CHRIST exposed and explained. A book for thinking men. Price, post-paid, 35 cents

Address BENTON BEMENT,
4t8 St. Johns, Mich.

THE MAGNETIC TREATMENT.

Send 25 cents to DR. ANDREW STONE, Troy, N. Y., and obtain a large, highly-illustrated book on the system of Vitalizing Treatment. Also The New Gospel of Health for $1.25, a masterly work on progressive medicine and healing by magnetism, 519 pages, illustrated with 120 cuts for personal manipulations, explanatory of the sublime science of healing without medicine. 1y6

"I'M STILL" "HERE!" The old, original and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," the "FAMILY FAVORITE" and the paper for THE MILLION. Enlarged, Improved, 1877. There's nothing like it. Old and young, rich and poor, saint and sinner,—it serves for All. It is a large, 48-column, 8 page paper, crowded with charming Tales, Sketches, Stories, Poems, Wit, Humor, Fun, Recipes, Puzzles, Humorous Poems, etc., etc. In its "ROOST'S CORNER," every Secular, Quack, Humbug, and Fraud is fully, freely, and truthfully exposed. No one can be swindled who reads the "BANNER." 100,000 people read and rely upon this National Paper. TRY IT ONCE AND ALWAYS. Only 75 cents a year, or with Premium of SIX Charming Chromos, or a fine Dictionary, cloth, 248 pages, only $1. Trial Trip, three months, 15 cents. Specimens FREE. Don't put it off but SEND NOW. Address, "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

ASTROLOGY.

PROF. LISTER, Astrologer, 505 W. 23d st., New York. 44 years' practice, 27 in Boston. Can be consulted by letter. Send for Circular. Address all letters 505 West 23d st., New York City.

BOOKS FOR THE THOUGHTFUL.

THE ANONYMOUS HYPOTHESIS OF CREATION. Extra flexible cloth, 12mo, about 60 pp. Postpaid, 50 cents.

THE SAFEST CREED, and Twelve other Recent Discourses of Reason. By O. B. FROTHINGHAM. Cloth, beveled, black side stamp, 12mo, 238 pp. Postpaid, $1.50.

"To cherish no illusion" might be the text of every one of them. There is everywhere a resolute attempt to adjust thought and life to what is really known, to accept the facts and then see what sustenance can be extracted from them.—[Liberal Christian.

THE CULTIVATION OF ART, And its Relations to Religious Puritanism and Money-Getting. By A. R. COOPER. 12mo, postpaid, fancy paper, 50 cents; flexible cloth, 75 cents.

It is not religion, but religion's parody, theology, which arrays itself in opposition to that sincere and manifold expression of human impulse and power to which we give the name of art. —[Extract.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION. God the Image of Man. Man's Dependence upon Nature the Last and Only Source of Religion. By L. FEUERBACH, author of "Essence of Christianity." Cloth, 12mo. Postpaid, 75 cents.

The purpose of my writing is to make men anthropologians instead of theologians; man-lovers instead of God-lovers; students of this world instead of candidates for the next; self-reliant citizens of the earth instead of subservient and wily ministers of a celestial and terrestrial monarchy.—[Feuerbach.

THE CHILDHOOD OF THE WORLD. A Simple Account of Man in Early Times. By EDWARD CLODD, F. R. A. S, 12mo. Postpaid, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Information not popularly accessible elsewhere as to the life of Primitive Man and its relation to our own.—[E. B. TYLOR, F. R. A. S.

SOUL PROBLEMS. With Papers on the Theological Amendment and the State Personality Idea. By JOSEPH E. PECK. 12mo. Postpaid, paper, 50 cents.

The author is a materialist. He holds that matter is the only entity, that conscious personal immortality is impossible, that that which is born must die—that which is formed must be dissolved. He is mild in his plea, has no epithets for the believers, and presses his cause only by argument.

POSITIVIST PRIMER. Conversations on the Religion of Humanity. Dedicated to the only Supreme Being man can ever know—the Great, but Imperfect, God, HUMANITY, in whose image all other Gods were made, for whose service all other Gods exist, and to whom all the Children of Men owe Labor, Love and Worship. Cloth, 12mo, postpaid, 75 cents.

RELIGIOUS POSITIVISM. A Brief Exposition of the System of Worship, of Faith, and of Life, Propounded by Auguste Comte. "Love our Principle, Order our Basis, Progress our End." By H. EDGER. Paper, 12mo, postpaid, 50 cents.

SCRIPTURE SPECULATIONS. With an Introduction on the Creation, Stars, Earth, Primitive Man, Judaism, etc. By HALSEY R. STEVENS. Extra cloth, 12mo, 419 pp. Postpaid, $2.

He approaches his subject with all reverence, with a mind well stored with the facts of modern speculation and discovery, and in a modest and independent spirit. He writes with great candor and freedom, and makes it his honest endeavor to remove all stumbling blocks out of the beaten path.—[Chicago Inter-Ocean.

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY as a Philosopher and Reformer. By CHARLES SOTHERAN. Including an Original Sonnet by C. W. FREDERICKSON, Portrait of Shelly and View of his Tomb. 60 pp. Postpaid, octavo, paper, $1; cloth, $1.25.

This is a paper read by its author before the New York Liberal Club. It is designed to take a philosophical view of Shelley's works, and present in regularly scientific form the philosophy which the poet taught, it may be almost unconsciously to himself.—[St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL SCIENCE. [Sociological Series, No. 1.] PART I. Introduction to Fourier's Theory of Social Organization. By ALBERT BRISBANE. PART II. Social Destinies. By CHARLES FOURIER. 8vo, cloth, 272 pp. Postpaid, $1.

The first of a series of Sociological works in which Fourier is taken up as the great Pioneer in the science. It contains both Mr. Brisbane's Introduction and Fourier's own Prospectus or outline sketch of his whole doctrine.

THEORY OF SOCIAL ORGANIZATION. [Sociological Series, No. 2.] By CHARLES FOURIER. With an Introduction, by ALBERT BRISBANE. Cloth, 12mo, 612 pp. Postpaid, $1.50.

This contains Fourier's Theory of Social Unity, and comprises essays upon the Social Destiny of Man, and a large variety of Sociological subjects. Mr. Brisbane claims that Fourier's theory is radically misunderstood by the general public, and that no true test of it has ever yet been made in practice. This and the preceding volume will do much toward furnishing a knowledge of the man and his teachings.

ESSENCE OF CHRISTIANITY. By L. FEUERBACH. Translated by GEORGE ELIOT. Clo., gold side and back, 12mo, 340 pp. Postpaid, $3

THE HARMONY AND MEANING OF THE NEW GOSPELS OF SCIENCE, being a resume of the Religion of Science and Humanity; to which is prefixed a complete positive classification of the Sciences; and to which is added the text and a literal linear translation of the most important parts of Goethe's Religious Poetry. By T. B. WAKEMAN. Extra cloth, octavo, about 250 pp. Post-paid, $1.50.

New and important Constructive Work.

PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM, and the Pathology and Treatment of Mediomania. By F. R. MARVIN, M. D., Professor of Psychological Medicine and Medical Jurisprudence in the New York Free Medical College for Women. Cloth. Postpaid, 75 cents.

There is no way of getting rid of Infidelity till some way is devised of abolishing the doctors. And here is another point: he says the special indulgence in religious exercises undermine the fabric of morality.

CHARLES P. SOMERBY,
PUBLISHER, BOOKSELLER, IMPORTER AND PRINTER,
139 EIGHTH ST. (Between Broadway and Fourth Avenue), NEW YORK.

The Grandest Biblical Engraving of the Age.

Have You Received Your Premium Gift Entitled

GOD'S CHOSEN?

A $7.50 ELEGANT STEEL ENGRAVING GIVEN AWAY!

AS A SPECIAL PREMIUM.

PREMIUM GIFT. PREMIUM GIFT.

The subject of this Engraving is taken from St. Matthew, chapter 1st., verses 23, 24 and 25, and illustrates the Old and New Christian World, the Marriage of Joseph and Mary, the Temple of God, the City of Jerusalem, the Beginning of the New Christian Era, etc., etc., comprising in all one of the most wonderful, striking, and authentic Biblical Engravings of the Age, and a MASTER-PIECE OF ART.

OVER THIRTY-THREE FIGURES ARE REPRESENTED,

Its Size is over Three Feet Long by Two Feet Wide

☞ Send for this Beautiful Premium Gift at once.

CUT THIS CERTIFICATE OUT, IT IS WORTH $7.50 TO YOU.

On receipt of this Subscribers' Certificate, together with 19 cents in currency or postage stamps to pay postage, packing and mounting charges we will send the $7.50 Steel Engraving, 3 feet long by 2 feet wide, entitled,

"GOD'S CHOSEN."

Free by mail, postpaid. Send for Engraving at once, stating name in full, Post-Office address, county, and State. Address all orders to AMERICAN ART UNION, 150 Elm St., Cincinnati, O.

☞ Arrangements have been made with the American Art Union, 150 Elm St., Cincinnati, O., to supply this $7.50 Steel Engraving, 3 feet long by 2 feet wide, FREE.

The Grandest Biblical Engraving of the Age.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COLLECTION

OF

FORMS, HYMNS, AND RECITATIONS.

Forms for organizing Societies, Forms for Constitutions and By-laws, for Funeral Services, Marriage Services, Naming of Infants, Obituary Notices, Epitaphs, Wills, etc. Also, nearly 500 Liberal and Spiritualistic Hymns, original and selected; for Public Meetings, Funerals, Social Gatherings, etc., etc. The whole supplemented by a fine selection of Recitations, comprising many of the finest poetical gems in the language. Nearly 600 pages, at the extremely low price of 75 cents in cloth. The price is made low, so that every family can have a copy. Let none fail to have it.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

BROUGHTONS INVIGORATING SYRUP. 25 CTS.

A certain cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Stomach, Liver or Kidney Diseases, Weakness, &c. 25 cents per bottle. Incurable cases solicited and cured or money refunded. The same ingredients put up in powders to be sent by mail. Sample bottle, circular, and 2615 Advice Free, 495 Broome St., N. Y.

READER, that little cottage contains one of the choicest libraries in the country. I buy my books of J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole, Bronson, Mich. Rare O. P. works a specialty. Lists for stamp. 3m1

TRUTH IS MIGHTY!

Professor Matthews, the great Scotch Seer, will for 25 CTS. (coin), with your age, height, color of eyes and hair, send to you a correct picture of your future husband or wife, initials of your name, the time and place where you will first meet, and the date of marriage. Address, Prof. MATTHEW, 42 Province [illegible], Boston, Mass.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine. 1y7

DO YOU WANT Books, Cards, Prints, Chromos, Photographs, Albums, Gold Pens, Pencils, Paper, Stationery, Knick-knacks, Notions, Novelties of any description? Numbers of unsaleable Engravings—good, rich—send only to the old, original and only "HEADQUARTERS." Established 1860. We originated what is now an enormous trade. We import books weekly. Supply all Scientific, Legal, Medical, scarce, foreign and other books not often to be obtained—in fact, supply ANYTHING AND EVERYTHING, in the Book or any other line. Our large store has four floors packed with cards of books on every known subject, and all offered very low. CATALOGUES FREE. Information given. Send stamp, and send now. Address, HUNTER & CO., PUBLISHERS, HINSDALE, N. H.

SEEDS.

Best and Cheapest in America, or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from Grower, postage or express paid, and get fresh, true, and reliable seeds. I can and shall beat any firm in America in quality and low prices. Beautiful illustrated Seed Catalogues and Garden Guide free.

Address R. H. SHUMWAY,
10t5 Seed Grower, Rockford, Ill.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition: had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

Works of Thomas Paine.

COMMON SENSE. His first and most important political work. Clear type. Paper, 15 cts.

THE CRISIS. Containing Nos. I. to XVI., inclusive. Written in the "times that tried men's souls" during the American Revolution. 12mo. Full, clear type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth 80 cts.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN. Written in defense of his fellow man. A work almost without a peer in the world. On full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON. On large, clear type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON AND AN EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. Complete in one volume, on full, bold type. Containing "Common Sense," "The Crisis" (sixteen numbers), and "The Rights of Man," with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. Complete. 12mo. Composed of the "Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "An Essay on Dreams," "Of the Religion of Deism," etc. etc., with a life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

THOMAS PAINE'S GREAT WORKS. Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Containing a Life of Paine, his POLITICAL WRITINGS—"Common Sense," "The Crisis," "Rights of Man"—his THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS—"Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "An Essay on Dreams," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "Of the Religion of Deism"—all in one large volume, crown-octavo, of THE TRUTH SEEKER LIBRARY, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3.00; colored leather, red burnished edges, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. By Calvin Blanchard. 12mo. Large, clear type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Published by

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

BEYOND THE VEIL

A very neat and entertaining volume, giving beautiful descriptions of life, occupations, etc., in the Spirit World. Dictated by the spirit of Percy B. Randolph, through the mediumship of Mrs. Francis H. McDougal and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson of California. With a steel-plate engraving of Dr. Randolph.

Price $1.50, post-paid by mail.

D. M. BENNETT
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine. 1y7

GOLD Any worker can make $12 a day at home. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine. 1y7

RICH, RARE, RACY reading. The Lantern With catalogue of novelties, rubber goods. 10c. A. T. THAYER, 10 South Fifth ave., N. Y. 4t7

TRUE $5,000 SOLD. The GENUINE Swiss Magnetic COMPASS, INDICATOR AND TIME-KEEPER. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveller, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY-BODY desiring a reliable Time-Keeper and also a superior Compass. Guard watch chain, steel works, glass crystal, all in a small case. Beware of CHEAP imitations. WARRANTED to detect a CHANGE here and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent, in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1.00; 3 for $2.00. Circulars free. BEWARE of "Cheap" articles offered as premiums.—Get the BEST.—Get the Genuine. Send all orders to the sole Agents, J. J. KING & CO., Brattleboro', Vt.

Gems of Thought.

HUMAN nature, like trout, is apt to take its color from the stream it swims in.—Jenkins.

A SINGLE word may disquiet an entire family for a whole day. One surly glance casts a gloom over the household, while a smile, like a gleam of sunshine, may light up the darkest and weariest hours.

THE goodness which struggles and battles and goes down deep and soars high is the stuff of which heroism is made, by which the world is salted and kept pure. It is the seed which bears fruit in martyrs and makes men nobler than their nature—and demi-gods and the prophets of a better time.

LESSONS of wisdom have never such power as when they are wrought in the heart through the groundwork of a story which engages the passions. Is it that we are like iron and must first be heated before we can be wrought upon? Or is the heart so in love with deceit that where a true report will not reach it we must cheat it with a fable in order to come at the truth?

WITHOUT depth of thought or earnestness of feeling or strength of purpose, living an unreal life, sacrificing substance to show, substituting the superstitious for the natural, mistaking a crowd for society, finding its chief pleasure in ridicule, and exhausting its ingenuity in expedients for killing time, fashion is among the last influences under which a human being who respects himself or who comprehends the great end of life would desire to be placed.—Channing.

RELIGIOUS revivals often exert the necessary power by which Conscience is awakened, and although accompanied with unessential forms and observances, which are made more essential than the result itself, are thus of intrinsic value. Complete success, however, is rarely attained. The disturbed Desires seek to gain their former control, and the mind oscillates between contending faculties. The individual, "back-slides;" is periodically repentant, and perhaps scorned for inconsistency.—Hudson Tuttle.

A BAD temper is a curse to its possessor, and its influence is most deadly wherever found. It is allied to martyrdom to be obliged to live with one of a complaining temper. To hear one eternal round of complaint and murmuring; to have every pleasant thought scared away by their evil spirit, is a sore trial. It is like the sting of a scorpion—a perpetual nettle, destroying your peace and rendering life a burden. Its influence is deadly, and the purest and sweetest atmosphere is contaminated into a deadly miasma wherever this evil genius prevails.

BEAUTY of form and feature should not be, as it is now, exceptional. It should be the rule, and there will come a time when parents will be held as much responsible for an ill-favored ungainly child, as they are beginning to be for dishonest or vicious children. Beauty is not born of cowardice, subserviency, or grief. The more culture, the finer the types, provided we grow more related to humanity, and less to a class. Pure unselfish love is in very fact the master of beauty, as happiness is the master of song, and what can awaken gladness in the mother so certainly as the ever-watchful kindness of her husband.—Georgiana B. Kirby.

FIRST efforts are said to cost most, and the timid want courage to make them. How many a poor, idle, hesitating, erring outcast is now creeping, crawling his way through the world who might have held up his head and prospered if, instead of putting off his resolutions of amendment and industry, he had made a beginning. A beginning, and a good beginning, too, is necessary. The first weed pulled up in the garden; the first time a manly "I will" is said; the first seed put in the ground, the first dollar put in the savings bank, and the first mile traveled in a journey, are all important things. They make a beginning, and thereby a hope, a promise, an assurance is held out that you are in earnest in what you have undertaken.

THE great gain is not to shine, not to conquer your companion—then you learn nothing but conceit—but to find a companion who knows what you do not; to tilt with him and be overthrown, horse and foot, with utter destruction of all your logic and learning. There is a defeat that is useful. Then you see the real and the counterfeit, and you will never accept the counterfeit again. You will adopt the art of war that has defeated you. You will accept the irresistible. You will accept the fertile truth, instead of the solemn customary lie. When people come to see us we foolishly prattle, lest we seem inhospitable. But things said for conversation are chalk eggs. Do not say things. What you are stands over you the while, and thunders so that I cannot hear what you have to say to the contrary.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

I THINK the future is going to be a more glorious future than we ever dreamed of. The best parts of the earth are yet wildernesses. But do you suppose that the valley of the Amazon, that wonder of the terraqueous globe, is forever to have only a race of monkey dwarfs? Do you suppose that those fruitful fields are never to bring forth anything but gigantic weeds or useless trees? Do you suppose that he fair Mediterranean countries are forever to remain the obloquy of modern civilization? Do you suppose that the rich plains in central Asia will, to the end of time, be inhabited by a degenerate race? Not I! Not I! The whole creation is groaning and travailing in pain, waiting for the deliverance of these now degraded portions of the world. That deliverance lies in the future; but it is coming; and whether you see it, or I, here, you will see it, and I, over there.—W. H. H. Murray.

Odds and Ends.

A DRAW game.—The dentist's.

A CULTIVATED ear—An ear of corn.

A GREAT hardship—An iron steamer.

SILENCE is copper; that is to say, it gives a cent.

CONUNDRUM.—"Why do the crows—" "Caws they do."

SOMEBODY says it takes a pickpocket to dispurse a crowd.

EXPERIENCE may be a dear teacher, but she isn't any dearer than a pretty schoolma'am.

WHEN a man makes love to a widow he feels as if he had to begin where the other fellow left off.

"WOULD, O would that I had fifty thousand a year. I know what I'd do." "What?" "Nothing."

A CONSCIENCE void of offense is a good thing, but a farm void of a fence is quite another matter.

PATERFAMLIAS—"To-morrow is the tutor's birthday; now, what can I get him for a birthday present?" Charlie—"Get him a muzzle, Papa; he's always biting the governess' cheek.'

"PAT, can ye till me what is a vurgin?"
"To be sure I can, Jimmy."
"Well, then, will ye be afther doin' it?"
"Yis; jist, its a woman that has niver been married at all."
"Be ye in earnest, Pat?"
"Yes, Jimmy."
"The saints in heaven be praised! then me mother is a vurgin; me father niver married her at all, sure."

A PAINTER once a store did keep,
And he was quite a joker;
For when he found his girl asleep,
He with a yellow ochre.

When he with a yell awoke the girl,
The painter thought he had her.
But she, though mad when she lay down,
Undoubtedly rose madder.

His girl awoke brim full of mirth,
And joined in a cotillion,
He hugged her close, for she was worth
At least a quart of vermillion.

DRIED-APPLE PIES.

I loathe! abhor! detest! despise!
Abominate dried-apple pies.
I like good bread, I like good meat,
Or anything that's fit to eat;
But of all poor grub beneath the skies,
The poorest is dried-apple pies.
Give me toothache or sore eyes,
In preference to such kind of pies.

The farmer takes his knurliest fruit.
'Tis wormy, bitter, and hard to boot.
They leave the hulls to make us cough,
And don't take half the peeling off.
Then, on a dirty cord they're strung,
And from some chamber window hung;
And there they serve a roost for flies
Until they're ready to make pies.
Tread on my corns or tell me lies,
But don't pass me dried-apple pies.

AS THEY warmed their backs in the corridor of the post-office yesterday, one of them began: "Yum-yum—but didn't our folks have the boss Thanksgiving dinner, though!"

"What je have?" asked the other.

"What didn't we have? you mean!" exclaimed the first. "Let's see: In the first place, we had two kinds of bread—light and heavy. Then we had butter on two plates. Then we had horseradish grated coarse and some grated fine. Then we had 'taters boiled in the most beautiful manner, and——"

"Did you have any pumpkin pie with frizzed edges?" interrupted the second.

"No."

"Then you might as well stop right here. You kin toot around about your two kinds of horseradish and your three kinds of water, but when it comes down to feelin' bully thankful, pumpkin pie is the vittles to do it on. Go'n blow to some poor orphan boy."

IN CHURCH DURING THE LITANY.

"I'm glad we got here early, Nell;
We're not obliged to sit to-day
Behind those horrid Smith girls—well,
I'm glad they go so soon away.
How does this cushion match my dress?
I think it looks quite charmingly.
Bowed sweetly to the Smiths? Oh! yes—
[Responds]—'From pride, vanity, hypocrisy.
Good Lord, deliver us.'

"I hate those haughty Courtenays!
I'm sure they needn't feel so fine
Above us all—for mamma says
Their dresses aren't so nice as mine.
And one's engaged; so, just for fun,
To make her jealous, I'll try to win
Her lover—show her how 'tis done—
[Responds]—'From hatred, envy, mischief, sin.
Good Lord, deliver us.'

"To-day the rector is to preach
In aid of missionary work;
He'll say he hopes and trusts that each
Will nobly give, nor duty shirk.
I hate to give. But then, one must;
You know we have a forward seat;
People can see—they will, I trust—
[Responds]—'From want of charity, deceit,
Good Lord, deliver us.'

"Did you know Mr. Gray had gone?
That handsome Mr. Rogers, too;
Dear me, we shall be quite forlorn
If all the men leave—and so few!
I trust that we with Cupid's darts
May capture some—let them beware—
[Responds]—'Behold the sorrows of our hearts,
And, Lord, with mercy hear our prayers!'"

Truth Seeker Tracts.

No.	(REVISED LIST.)	Cts.
1.	Discussion on Prayer. D. M. Bennett and two Clergymen.	3
2.	Oration on the Gods. Ingersoll.	10
3.	Thomas Paine. "	5
4.	Arraignment of the Church. Ingersoll.	5
5.	Heretics and Heresies. "	5
6.	Humboldt. "	5
7.	The Story of Creation. Bennett.	5
8.	The Old Snake Story. "	2
9.	The Story of the Flood. "	5
10.	The Plagues of Egypt. "	2
11.	Korah, Datham, and Abiram. Bennett.	2
12.	Balaam and his Ass. "	2
13.	Arraignment of Priestcraft. "	3
14.	Old Abe and Little Ike. Syphers.	3
15.	Come to Dinner. "	2
16.	Fog Horn Documents. "	2
17.	The Devil Still Ahead. "	2
18.	Slipped Up Again. "
19.	Joshua Stopping the Sun and Moon. D. M. Bennett.	5
20.	Samson and his Exploits. Bennett.	2
21.	The Great Wrestling Match. "	2
22.	Discussion with Elder Shelton. "	10
23.	Reply to Elder Shelton's Fourth Letter. D. M. Bennett.	3
24.	Christians at Work. Wm. McDonnell.	5
25.	Discussion with Geo. Snode, Bennett.	5
26.	Underwood's Prayer.	1
27.	Honest Questions and Honest Answers. D. M. Bennett.	5
28.	Alessandro di Cagliostro. C. Sotheran.	10
29.	Paine Hall Dedication Address. B. F. Underwood.	2
30.	Woman's Rights & Man's Wrongs. Syphers.	2
31.	Gods and God-houses. "	2
32.	The God's of Superstition and the God of the Universe. D. M. Bennett.	3
33.	What has Christianity Done? Preston.	3
34.	Tribute to Thomas Paine. "	2
35.	Moving the Ark. D. M. Bennett.	1
36.	Bennett's Prayer to the Devil.	2
37.	Short Sermon. Rev. Theologicus. D.D.	1
38.	Christianity not a Moral System. X. Y. Z.	3
39.	The True Saint. S. P. Putnam.	3
40.	Bible of Nature vs. The Bible of Men. J. Syphers.	3
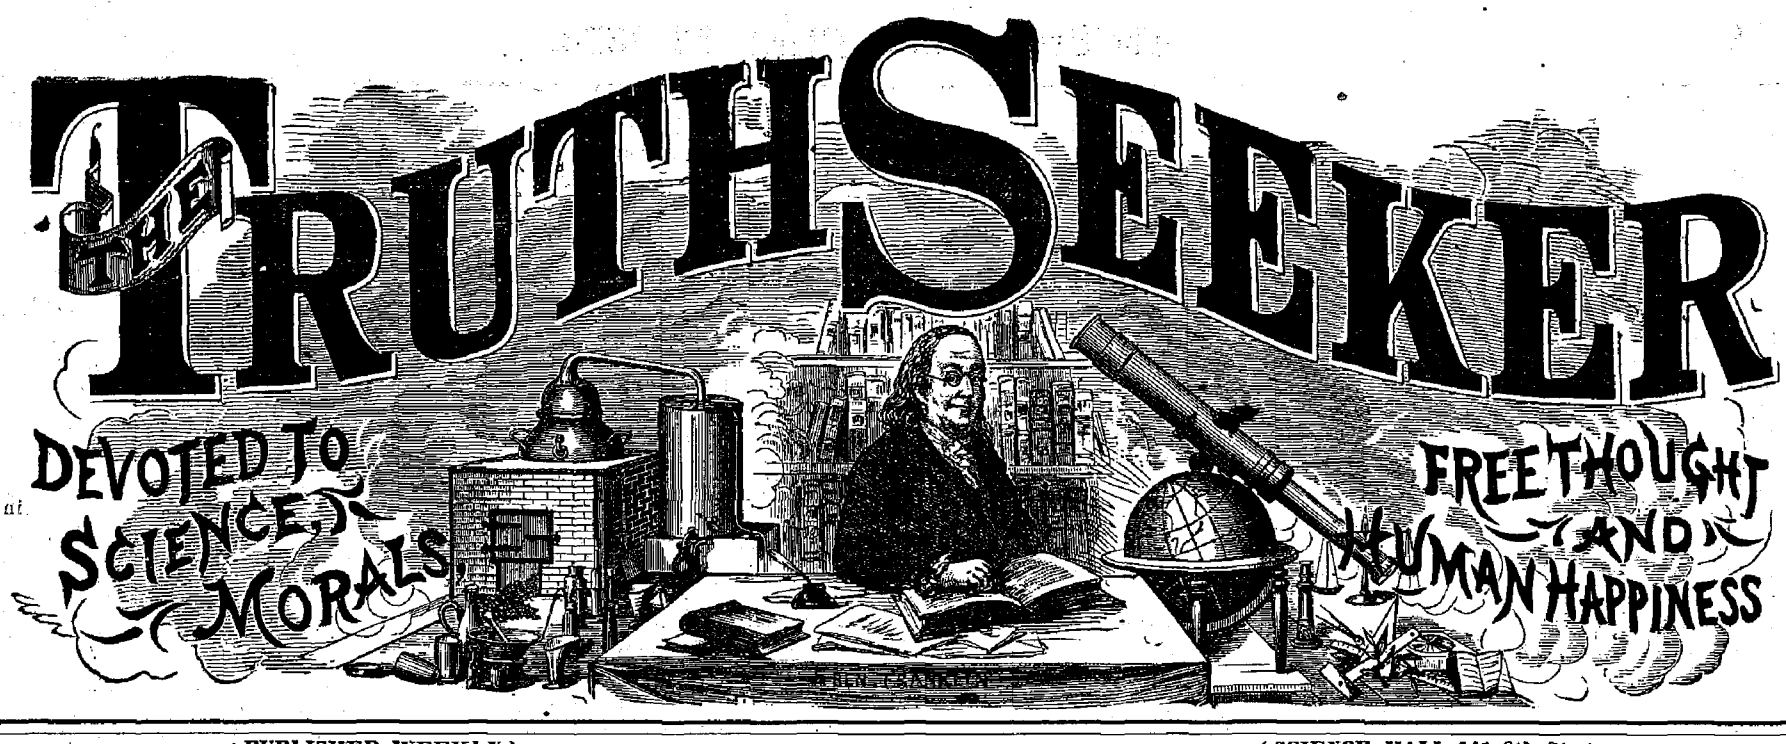
41.	Our Ecclesiastical Gentry, Bennett.	1
42.	Elijah the Tishbite. "	3
43.	Christianity a Borrowed System. "	3
44.	Design Argument Refuted. Underwood.	2
45.	Elisha the Prophet. Bennett.	3
46.	Did Jesus Really Exist? "	3
47.	Cruelty and Credulity of the Human Race. Dr. Daniel Arter.	5
48.	Freethought in the West. G. L. Henderson.	5
49.	Sensible Conclusions. E. E. Guild.	3
50.	Jonah and the Big Fish. D. M. Bennett.	1
51.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets. No. 1.	5
52.	Marples-Underwood Debate, Underwood.	3
53.	Questions for Bible Worshipers. B. F. Underwood.	2
54.	An Open Letter to Jesus Christ, Bennett.	5
55.	The Bible God Disproved by Nature. W. E. Coleman.	3
56.	Bible Contradictions.	1
57.	Jesus Not a Perfect Character. Underwood.	2
58.	Prophecies.	2
59.	Bible Prophecies Concerning Babylon. B. F. Underwood.	2
60.	Ezekiel's Prophecies Concerning Tyre. B. F. Underwood.	2
61.	History of the Devil. Isaac Paden.	5
62.	The Jews and their God. "	10
63.	The Devils Due-Bills. John Syphers.	3
64.	The Ills we Endure—their Cause and Cure. D. M. Bennett.	2
65.	Short Sermon No. 2. Rev. Theologicus. D.D.	2
66.	God Idea in History. H. B. Brown.	5
67.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets No. 2.	5
68.	Buth's Idea of Heaven and Mine. Susan H. Wixon.	2
69.	Missionaries. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	2
70.	Vicarious Atonement. J. S. Lyon.	3
71.	Paine's Anniversary. C. A. Codman.	3
72.	Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. D. M. Bennett.	2
73.	Foundations. John Syphers.	3
74.	Daniel in the Lion's Den. Bennett.	2
75.	An Hour with the Devil. "	10
76.	Reply to Erastus F. Brown. D. M. Bennett.	3
77.	The Fear of Death. D. M. Bennett.	5
78.	Christmas and Christianity. D.M.Bennett.	5
79.	The Relationship of Jesus, Jehovah, and the Virgin Mary. W. E. Coleman.	2
80.	Address on Paine's 139th Birthday. Bennett.	5
81.	Hereafter, or the Half-way House. John Syphers.	1
82.	Christian Courtesy, Bennett.	2
83.	Revivalism Examined. Dr. A. G. Humphrey.	5
84.	Moody's Sermon on Hell. Rev. J. P. Hopps, London.	2
85.	Matter, Motion, Life and Mind. Bennett.	10
86.	An Enquiry about God's Sons. "	2
87.	Freethought Judged by its Fruits. B. F. Underwood.	1
88.	David, God's Peculiar Favorite. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	3
89.	Logic of Prayer. Charles Stephenson.	3
90.	Biblo-Mania. Otter Cordates.	2
91.	Our Ideas of God. B. F. Underwood.	1
92.	The Bible: is it Divinely Inspired? Dr. D. Arter.	5
93.	Obtaining Pardon for Sins. Hudson Tuttle.	1
94.	The New Raven. Will Cooper.	5
95.	Jesus Christ. D. M. Bennett.	10
96.	Ichabod Crane Papers.	10
97.	Special Providences. W. S. Bell.	2
98.	Snakes. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.	2
99.	Do the Works of Nature prove a Creator? Sciota.	5
100.	The Old and the New. R. G. Ingersoll.	5
101.	110th Anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday. Bennett et als.	5
102.	The Old Religion and the New. W. S. Bell.	1
103.	Does the Bible Teach us all we Know. Bennet.	2
104.	Evolution of Israel's God. A. L. Rawson.	10
105.	Decadence of Christianity. Capphro.	2
106.	Franklin, Washington and Jefferson Unbelievers. Bennett.	2
107.	The Safe Side. H. B. Brown.	5
108.	The Holy Bible a Historical Humbug. S. H. Preston.	1
109.	Ghosts. Ingersoll, 4 pp.	5
110.	Materialistic Prayer. Bennett. 4 pp.	1
111.	Reply to Scientific American. Bennett.	1
112.	Sensible Sermon. Savage. 8 pp.	2
113.	Come to Jesus. Bennett, 8 pp.	2

SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

1.	Hereditary Transmission. Prof. Louis Elsberg, M.D.	5
2.	Evolution; from the Homogeneous to the Heterogeneous. B. F. Underwood.	3
3.	Darwinism. B. F. Underwood.	3
4.	Literature of the Insane. F. R. Marvin.	5
5.	Responsibility of Sex. Mrs. Chase, M.D.	3
6.	Graduated Atmospheres. J. McCarroll.	2
7.	Death. Frederic R. Marvin, M.D.	5
8.	How do Marsupial Animals Propagate their kind? A. B. Bradford.	5
9.	The Unseen World. Prof. John Fiske.	10
10.	The Evolution Theory — Huxley's Three Lectures.	10
11.	Is America the New World? L. L. Dawson.	10

Discount on one dollar's worth 10 per ct. off; on two dollars' worth 20 off; on five dollars' worth 40 off; on ten dollars' worth 50 off.



As few or as many of any given kind may be ordered as desired.

RADICAL BOOKS.

SENT POST PAID AT THE PRICES ANNEXED.

By D. M. BENNETT.

Age of Reason. Paine. Paper covers.	25
" " " Cloth "	50
" " and Ex. of Proph. Paper 50; cl.	75
A Few Days in Athens. Frances Wright.	75
Apocryphal New Testament.	1 25
An Eye Opener. Paper, 50; cloth.	75
Antiquity of Christianity. Alberger.	25
Analysis of Religious Belief. Viscount Amberly. $3.00, 4.00, and	4 50
Apples of Gold. Susan H. Wixon.	1 50
Anti-Theological Lectures. Rev. R. Taylor.	2 00
Antiquity and Duration of the World.	25
Astronomy and Worship of the Ancients.	25
A. J. Davis' Entire Works.	27.00
Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub.	15
Bible in India. Jacolliot.	2 00
Buckle's History of Civilization. 2 Vols., 8vo.	4 00
Burgess-Underwood Debate. 50 and	80
Bible in the Balance. Fish.	1 00
Bacon's Novum Organum.	2 00
Bhagvad-Gita, or Dialogues of Christna and Arjuna.	1 75
Buechner's Man, Present and Future.	4 00
Christianity before Christ. Craven.	25
Chapters from the Bibles of the Ages.	1 50
Criticism on the Theoligical Idea of Deity.	1 00
Childhood of Religion. Clodd.	1 25
Childhood of the World. Clodd, 40 and	60
Christianity and Materialism. Underwood.	15
Cause of Religious Ideas. Tuttle.	1 00
Conway's Sacred Anthology.	4 00
Colenso on the Pentateuch, Abstract of.	25
Devil's Pulpit. Rev. Robt. Taylor.	2 00
Diegesis "	2 00
Denton's Irreconcilable Records.	50
" Our Planet, Past, Present, and Future.	1 50
" Radical Rhymes.	1 25
" Who are Christians. Deluge.
Denton's Common Sense Thoughts, Be Thyself, What is Right? Man's True Saviors, Sermon from Shakspere's Text, God Proposed, Spiritualism True, Orthodoxy False. 10 cents each.
Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science.	1 75
" Intellectual Development of Europe, 2 vols.,	3 00
Darwin's Origin of Species,	2 00
" Descent of Man, (Impr'd Ed.)	3 00
Descent and Darwinism, Schmidt.	1 50
Einstein's Origin of Religious Ideas.	1 00
Exeter Hall, Wm. McDonnell,	60 & 80
Errors of the Bible, Wright,	35 & 60
Essence of Religion. Fuerbach, 40 and	80
Eight Scientific Tracts.	20
Frothingham's Religion of Humanity.	1 50
" Child's Book of Religion,	1 00
" Stories of the Patriarchs.	1 00
" Safest Creed,	1 50
" Transcendentalism in New England.	2 50
Faraday's Various Forces of Nature.	2 00
Fiske's Myths and Myth-Makers.	2 00
God Idea in History, Tuttle.	1 25
Good Sense, D'Holbach.	1 00
Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages.	2 50
" Lost and Hostile Gospels.	3 25
Graves' Sixteen Crucified Saviors.	2 00
" Biography of Satan.	60
Grey's Enigmas of Life.	2 00
" Creeds of Christendom. 2 Vols.	7 50
Heroines of Freethought, Mrs. Underwood.	1 75
Heathens of the Heath, McDonnell.	1 00 & 150
Hume's Essays and Treatises.	1 50
Huxley's Lay Sermons.	1 75
" Man's Place in Nature.	1 25
" Critiques and Addresses.	1 50
History of all Religions Sects. Evans.	1 00
Haeckel's History of Creation. 2 Vols.	5 00
Hollick's Nerves and the Nervous.	1 00
Humboldt's Works.
Ingersoll's Gods and other Lectures. 30 and	50
" etc., Large Edition.	1 25
Influence of Christianity on Civilization.	25
Infidels' Text Book, Cooper.	1 00
Jehovah Unveiled.	35
Jamieson's Clergy a Source of Danger.	1 00
Josephus' Complete Works.	2 50
Johnson's Oriental Religions. 8vo.	5 00
John's Way.	15
Kneeland's Review.	1 00
" Hymns.	35
Koran, with Notes and Life of Mahomet.	2 75
Lecky's Rationalism in Europe. 2 Vols.	4 00
" History of European Morals.	6 00
Life of Thomas Paine, Blanchard, p 50; cl	75
Lewes' Biographical History of Philosophy.	3 50
" Problems of Life and Mind.	3 00
Lizzie Doten's Poems of Progress, and Inner Life, each	150
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization.	2 00
" Pre-Historic Times Illustrated.	6 00
Lyell's Elements of Geology, 770 cuts.	3 40
" Principles " 2 vols. and maps.	3 00
Monks and Popes. Alberger.	1 00
Morley's Life of Voltaire.	2 00
Martyrdom of Man. Winwood Reade.	3 00
Peeble's All Around the World.	2 50
" Seers of the Ages.	2 50
Plato's Divine and Moral Works.	2 20
Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion.	30 & 50
Physical Man, Tuttle.	1 50
Paine's Common Sense.	12
" Crisis. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Rights of Man. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Theological Works, with portrait	1 50
" " " paper,	1 00
" Political Works, cloth,	1 50
" Great Works Complete. Crown octavo, with life and portrait.	2
" Political Works, steel portrait.	1
" Life, by Calvin Blanchard with portrait Paper, 50; cloth	75
Parturition without Pain.	1 00
Plain Home Talk and Medical Common Sense. E. B. Foote, M.D.,	1 50
Proctor's Six Lectures on Astronomy.	20
Reason, the only Oracle of Man. Ethan Allen	60
Syntagma, Taylor.	1 00
System of Nature, D'Holbach.	2 00
Self-Contradictions of the Bible.	25
Studying the Bible, Mrs. Slenker.	75
Spencer's (Herbert) Entire Work.
Strauss' Old Faith and New.	2 00
" New Life of Jesus, 2 vols.,	12 00
Supernatural Religion, 2 Vols., 8vo.,	8 00
Sexual Physiology. Trall.	2 00
Talleyrand's Letter to Pope Pius vii.	25
Tyndall' (Prof. John) Entire Works.
The Christ of Paul,	2 00
The Case against the Church,	75
The Relations of the Sexes. Mrs. Duffey.	2 00
The Voices, Warren Sumner Barlow.	1 25
The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 5
The Champions of the Church, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 50
Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, etc., 75 &	1 00
Truth Seeker Tracts, Vols. I, II, III, and IV., by the lot, 50 &	75
The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations,	75
The Outcast, Winwood Reade,	30
Talks with My Patients, Mrs. Gleason, M.D.,	1 50
Underwood-Marples Debate,	35 & 60
Underwood's Twelve Tracts.	20
Vestiges of Creation.	75
Volney's Ruins,	1 00
Volney's New Researches in Ancient History.	1 50
Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.	5 00

Vol. 5. No. 12. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, March 23, 1878. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A HYPOCRITE is a man who tries to be pious and can't, with a preponderance of cant.

GENERAL O. O. HOWARD is acquitted of being a cheat, and found guilty of being an ass, by a Washington jury.

PREACHER (to boy on the street)—My little man, is your father a Christian? Boy—Yes, sir, but he ain't working at it much lately.

MORE than $400,000 in gold and notes were found in Pius IX.'s apartment. The entire amount he has left is estimated at near $25,000,000.

KRUPP, the Prussian gun-manufacturer, is credited with the pious reflection that God has been very good to him and his in letting there be so much war.

SOME of the breach of promise suits are interesting. The defendant in a case in Cambridge, O., is the Rev. W. A. Chalfort, and the plaintiff is his niece.

A SPRINGFIELD man advertises for "ten good salesmen that love the Bible." Doubtless some men loved it on reading that advertisement who never did before.

A TRENTON minister is looking for some place in which to step down. There is a lady in the case, of course, and she seems to be a volcanic sort of person.

HENRY WARD BEECHER will visit California next summer. He says he will stop at Salt Lake City, on his way, to study the Mormons and their institutions. Ahem!

A LECTURER on hell is traveling with a panorama, which sets forth in vivid colors his views of the actual condition of the infernal regions. Red and yellow paint are liberally laid on.

JOB was worth only seven hundred and forty thousand dollars, and Commodore Vanderbilt was worth more than seventy-four million dollars. But the Commodore had more and worse afflictions than Job had.

THE first official act of the new king of Italy was to commute eighty-five death-sentences, with the declaration that he was happy to begin his reign by the virtual abolition of capital punishment.

THE Rev. Brown Coble was hanged last week in Winchester, Tenn., in presence of about six thousand spectators, mostly colored. He protested his innocence even on the scaffold, and exhibited great religious fervor.

AN actual conversation in Springfield last week.—Party No. 1—Allow me to introduce my friend, Mr. Moody. Party No. 2—Ah! yes; have heard the name before. Mr. Moody the bell hanger? Party No. 1.—No; Mr. Moody the hell banger.

THE religious observance of Sunday practically ends at noon in San Francisco. In the afternoon the law permits all public amusements, and race-courses, theatres, and other resorts are open. Sunday evening sermons are called lectures there.

PROUS old Boston gentleman observes boys playing marbles on the Common one Sunday. "Boys," he says, sternly, "boys, do you know what day it is?" One of the boys yells out, "Here, Bill, can you tell this man what day it is? he don't know!" End of the missionary enterprise.

A MASSACHUSETTS man gave his note for a church subscription, and at maturity failed to pay. The note was put in suit, and, after much delay and sundry appeals, the Supreme Court has now decided that a note thus given without consideration does not carry with it an obligation to pay.

"REJOICING in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer," is a well-known quotation from the Bible. But through the joint efforts of compositor and proof reader, neither of whom was well informed as to the meaning of the word "instant" in its old English acceptation, it appeared in a recent publication with its last clause made to read, "Continuing an instant in prayer." An old deacon who chanced to see this improved version found new light dawning on his mind as to Scriptural authority for brevity in prayer.

"AN honest man's the noblest work of God," said one of our most distinguished preachers last Sunday, and the reporter faithfully put it down. But an unsanctified typo made it read: "An honest man's the nobbiest work of God." Though the proof reader passed it, there was confusion in that newspaper office.

THE property of the Howard St. church, San Francisco, has been sold under foreclosure. The subscriptions made through Mr. Kimball's efforts were not all paid, and those who fulfilled their pledges will have their money refunded. Kimball's work appears to be done mostly on paper.

WM. PAVITT, of St. Paul, on being arrested for branding his unruly son's tongue with a hot iron, said that things had come to a pretty pass, when a parent could not discipline his own children. If Mr. Pavitt would study his Bible less, and read Ingersoll's lectures instead, his children would have less hell and more heaven here on earth.

"How long did good King Hezekiah reign?" was asked by a Sunday-school teacher of a little boy last Sunday, when the history of Hezekiah's life formed the subject matter of the lesson. "Forty days and forty nights," promptly responded the lad, who was more familiar with the rain of Noah's time than with the reign of any of the Kings of Judah.

A COUPLE of deacons went to call on a church member, and, finding him at his devotions, stood by the doorway in the attitude of reverence. When the prayer was finished they complimented their friend on his fervor and earnestness. He replied, however, "Ah, if I had only known that you were listening I would have shown you what I can do, but I thought I was all alone."

MR. MOODY, addressing young converts in his Springfield meeting, advised them to avoid Free Masonry, Odd Fellowship, novel reading, horse racing, card playing, theatres, and business partnerships and marriage with unconverted persons. Concerning the latter, he was very decided, saying he hoped for the time when clergymen would refuse to join such persons in matrimony, as Mr. Spurgeon now does.

WHILE nearly all the Baptist ministers believe in hell, the question as to how long hell is to last is a somewhat unsettled one among them. In order to come to a conclusion regarding this important point, the matter has been made the subject of debate at the ministers' meeting. Dr. Samson, who did a large part of the debating, insists that the punishment of the wicked will continue for ever and ever. Brother Boanerges Fulton advocates the most complete and severe old-fashioned doctrines on hell.

ONE of the proprietors of the Paris Univers has a daughter who hurt the nail of her toe. A sore, against which none of the doctors in the neighborhood could prevail, was the consequence. Now the story goes that it was finally decided to appeal to Pius IX. to intercede with the Virgin Mary. Some lint which had been employed on the legs of the late Pontiff was used, and in a very few days a perfect cure was effected. And yet the poor old man had to die as others do.

A FEW days ago Mr. Moody, when just about to begin his sermon, spied a slumbering Bostonian in the audience before him. He paused and requested that somebody would wake the man up, as possibly the sermon would result in converting him from the error of his way. On being vigorously punched in the ribs the slumberer awoke with a snort and a groan, and for a moment looked wildly around, after which he settled himself down to listen to what Moody had to say. He proved to be a well-known and worthy deacon of a suburban church.

THE Rev. Dr. Macrae of Scotland is doing his utmost to secure an official revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith. He has been lecturing extensively on the Confession as it now stands, and among other sharp things he says that "the Westminster dogma of everlasting torment in itself is a subversion of God's character as revealed in Christ, and amounts to a denial of the gospel. Carried to its issue, it robs God of his goodness, his mercy, and his justice. It robs him even of his sovereignty, giving sin a power of maintaining itself against him forever, and so far leaving the devil to all eternity master of the situation."

THEOLOGY seems to be on the decline in Scotland. At one of the schools in Edinburgh, a religious examination was going on the other day, and the examiner asked the pupils of a particular class to explain what the sacraments were. The first, baptism, was given readily enough, but a dead silence followed. The examiner repeated his demand for the next sacrament, and again his demand was met by silence. Suddenly a bright little boy stepped forward to announce that he knew and, amid the breathless interest of the whole class, put his right hand to the top of his left shoulder and exclaimed, "Vaccinnation!"

ELDER BLACK of the Central Christian chapel, Indianapolis, was last year the subject of a notorious scandal. He was suspended from membership and fellowship until he should establish his integrity, by the successful prosecution of the newspaper which had brought the criminal accusation against him. The elder failed to avail himself of this opportunity, but has recently petitioned his fellow-elders to restore him. According to the minutes of the special meeting, he made "a full and frank confession," not of the offense charged against him, but of his sorrow that he had not complied with the order of the board by bringing suit for the vindication of his character. He was thereupon restored to church fellowship.

FUNERAL EXTRAORDINARY.—Who are the good Samaritans? From the Toledo Sunday Journal we condense its account of the quiet ceremonies of the burial, by her companions, of a young woman who was shot and killed by her lover, who claimed to be her husband, in a St. Clair brothel. She was deserted by her relatives and refused a Christian burial, so women representing half a dozen similar houses met and made her grave-clothes and arranged for a gathering at the undertaker's, from whence they followed her to the grave in carriages. Tears and kind expressions were noticed, and they all seemed to be performing a conscientiously religious duty—one neglected and refused by professors but not posessors of Christianity. Verily, "the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you."

IN THE last week of April four thousand people were compelled to seek charitable aid or starve, in Cardiff, Wales, a city of 60,000 inhabitants; and pauperism has increased in that city twenty-five per cent within the last few months. In China people are starving to death by millions. The only difference in condition between China and Great Britain at the present time is this: In China the vast majority of the people are poor, very few are able to assist the starving poor, and it is exceedingly difficult to distribute food among them; while in England and Wales there are many wealthy charitable associations and good facilities for distributing food among the poor. Were it otherwise, there would be as terrible a famine in England as there is in China. And yet the English Government would imprison people like Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant for endeavoring to show the poor how to avoid the horrors of starvation. There is more Bible than brains in the world yet.

THE Governor of New Mexico is at loggerheads with the Legislature of that un-American Territory. Religious prejudices seem to be at the bottom of the difficulty, the law-making body being thoroughly Roman Catholic, and the Governor something else, it is not very clear what. The Assembly not long ago passed an act incorporating the Society of the Jesuit Fathers of New Mexico. The object of the corporation was stated to be the education of youth in all branches of letters, arts, and sciences. The society was authorized to hold real and personal property exempt from taxation, and it was provided that it might make by-laws and rules for its government, not in conflict with the Federal Constitution and laws, nor with the laws of the Territory. The Attorney-General of New Mexico gave an opinion that the act was in violation of section 1,889 of the Revised Statutes, which prohibits the Legislative Assemblies of the Territories from granting private charters or special privileges. The Governor thereupon vetoed the bill, and the Assembly passed it over his veto. Now the dispute is carried to Washington, and the Governor advises Congress to annul the act of the New Mexico Legislature.

Events of the Week.

GOLD stands at 101¼.

TROUBLE is brewing between China and Russia.

COSTA RICA and Guatamala are on the eve of a war.

THERE is a revolution in Port au Prince, Hayti.

THE Pope has called a consistory, which will meet on the 25th inst.

REVENUE officers and illicit distillers are carrying on a guerrilla warfare in Tennessee.

BLASIUS PISTORIUS, a Roman Catholic priest, is being tried, in Philadelphia, for murder.

THE Texas Pacific Railroad project has tunneled its way through the Senate Committee.

THE wages of the workingmen throughout England are being reduced about ten per cent.

PRESIDENT HAYES has approved of the polar expedition about to be sent out by the N. Y. Herald.

THE House Committee on Territories have reported favorably on the bill disfranchising women in Utah.

A BILL prohibiting religious exercises in the public schools has been brought before the Wisconsin Legislature.

The Labor Reform party is growing stronger. Several local elections have resulted in a victory for their candidates.

GENERAL ANDERSON, of returning-board fame, has been released from custody, the Supreme Court having reversed the decision of the jury.

THE Education Committee of the House have asked Congress to forever set apart the proceeds of the sale of the public lands for school purposes.

POOR Cuba is in a bad way. Reports from there indicate that the revolutionists are about conquered. It is hard that, after ten years of heroic fighting, this little band of patriots should be compelled to give up the struggle in despair.

RUSSIA is tightening her grasp on Turkey England wants to have a finger in the pie, or rather, a knife and fork in the turkey, but Russia pays no attention to her demands. England threatens war in case her requests are not complied with.

MOODY, Sankey, Pentecost, and Stebbins have revived Hartford, Conn. They have now tackled the devil and his assistants in New Haven and Middletown. If the devil was dead, Moody & Co. would be compelled to work or starve; and yet they call him their enemy.

THE Communists of this city met on the 17th, and celebrated the seventh anniversary of the revolution in Paris in 1871. They had an orderly concert, ball, and supper, the proceeds of which will be used for the benefit of the widows and orphans of Communists.

POPE LEO has announced, through his Secretary of State, that the temporal power of the Papacy is not a dogma. This looks like accepting the situation. When he realizes that the spiritual power should not be a dogma either, he will have made a grand discovery.

SIX saints, each ten feet high, passed through the custom-house on the 19th. They are made of wood, and are destined to ornament and protect a Catholic church in this city. The duties on them amounted to over $400. They were manufactured in France specially for this market, and cost about $133 each. The demand for wooden and metal gods, idols, saints, and virgins is on the increase in this country and China, though the ruling prices are not quoted in the market reports.

O'DONOVAN ROSSA, the Irish revolutionist, was mobbed in Toronto on the night of the 18th. He attempted to lecture to a small audience, but the mob stormed the lecture-hall, smashed the windows, and demolished things generally. Rossa barely escaped with his life. Religious feeling runs high in Canada, and much trouble is apprehended. In the Rossa riot, about two hundred and fifty people were wounded. The rioting still goes on, the Orangemen a little ahead.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER IV.—Continued.

Smoothing out the crumpled piece of paper, Edith read as follows:

"Dear, Darling Mother: It is just eleven o'clock. We have talked matters over, and concluded that it will be best for you and for us if we leave home. The village is wrapped in slumber. You, too, are doubtless asleep, for the house is still and silent. We write these lines to let you know we are going away. We cannot stand father's brutality any longer. We know the word 'brutal' is a hard word to write about our own father, but it is only too applicable. We have been cruelly whipped three times within a month, and for trifles that any other man would hardly think worth scolding about. Yesterday we were at Ben Holmes', six miles out in the country. Some other young people were there on a visit, and a game of ring-toss was proposed, so we all went into the garden, and they had a nice play. We did not join in the game, but merely sat and looked on, for we knew father would be awful mad if we played such a thing on Sunday. Well, as it unfortunately happened, he had been down to look at a clearing on his farm, which his tenant had been burning off preparatory to putting tobacco in it, and he came back by the garden just as Bill was picking up one of the rings which had rolled down by his feet. He looked daggers at us, but simply saying, 'Good morning, ladies and gentlemen,' passed on. We knew we should 'catch Jessie' when we got home, though we had done no wrong save making a call on Sunday, and that was no worse than father himself had done, by going to see the clearing. We write you all the particulars, mother, so you may know the exact truth, for we are sure father will not tell you, as he refused to listen to us when we attempted to tell him that we were not playing, but merely looking on. He only said 'Stop your blab, and say no more. It is enough that you were visiting on the Lord's day, and I myself saw Bill with a ring in his hand.' So, mother dear, don't be grieved thinking we ran away from deserved punishment. We are sorry and sad at the thought of leaving you and the girls, and dear little baby Allie, but we cannot stand it to stay and be treated like brutes, and never have any pleasure unless we steal it, or any hope for the future. We are going to the Black Hills to dig gold and scalp Indians, and some day we shall come home rich; then we will build you a pretty cottage in the country, and you shall have everything nice and beautiful around you, and pretty flowers and clinging vines everywhere. We'll just revel in beauty and plenty, and enjoy ourselves enough to make up for all the long days of waiting. Father may come, too, but he will not be boss there; and indeed, we could easily have mastered him last night, only we thought it better to suffer ourselves than to show such disrespect to him, and make you sorry by doing wrong. The only thing we regret is, that we came back home. We ought to have gone right off from where we were, but we hoped that father might listen to reason, and could not bear to leave you all while a possibility of living together in tolerable happiness remained. But now the die is cast, and we have resolved to try the world for ourselves, rather than put up with father's domineering, unreasonable conduct any longer. We are just eighteen to-day, and a glorious (?) birth-day celebration we have had, too. But we don't blame you, mother dear; you and Sue have always done all you could to make us good and happy. We have been wild, rude, and lawless, but never meant to grieve you; and should have been far better boys than we have, had father treated us kindly, leniently, and forbearingly. But he has been a perpetual 'thorn in the flesh;' and has grumbled at every cent spent upon us, and now you may tell him he can keep his money and his religion, too. We don't want either of them. We are going to be Infidels; not wicked ones, but good and kind like the Darwins. We shall never go to church or read that hateful old Bible any more. We have had enough of these things in regular doses all our lives. Now, mother darling, be good and patient, and don't take it hard. We shall write to you often, but not send our address, as we do not intend to give father a chance to ever lay a finger on us again till we are twenty-one, and our own masters.

"Your affectionate sons, Bill and Sam."

Edith read this long letter in silence, and as she finished it she handed it to Sue, and said to the weeping girl: "Don't cry, darling, or take it so hard. Perhaps it will all turn out for the best. The boys are smart, strong, and healthy, and able to take care of themselves. Your father is not a pleasant man to live with, as you know only too well, and boys of their age always feel independent, and don't like to be put upon. You will soon get a letter from them, and find they are perhaps better off than they would be at home."

"Oh yes, Edith; I know that, and indeed I am glad they went—very glad, for they will not be whipped or abused now; for no one but a parent has a right to strike and beat a child, and I'm beginning to think they only take the right because they have the power to do so. I can see now how much better are the principles of the Darwins than are those of Christians. They say no one has a right to strike a child, and they never strike theirs or speak harshly to them, but treat them respectfully as equals and companions, while my poor brothers have been so often cruelly beaten just to satisfy father's whims and old Bible notions gotten from Solomon and other fogies of olden times, and mother and I have been so powerless to help them; only yesterday we baked a nice plum cake for their birthday supper, and they never even knew it. Oh! if they only had it now," and Sue burst into a fresh shower of tears at the thought.

"There, there; don't grieve, dear," said Edith, gently and soothingly. "They will find plenty to eat on their way. The great world, hard and cold as it is called, is full of noble, generous, sympathizing spirits, and your brothers will find a welcome shelter under many a hospitable roof as they travel along on their way."

"I hope and believe they will," said Sue. "But I haven't told you all my troubles yet. Mother had another fainting fit while I was reading the letter to her, so deeply did its pathetic words affect her tender, loving spirit; and when it was finished she turned to father and said, 'Oh, Charles! do go and see if you can't find them! Oh, coax them to come back! My boys; my noble, good boys; my twins that I have nursed at my breast and cradled in my arms! Why don't you go? I can't live without my precious boys!' but father cooly turned on his heel and left the room, saying as he did so, 'The ungrateful, wicked, good-for-nothing wretches! let them go to the devil for all I care. How did they dare write such things about me, their father, and a deacon of the church, too? I'd turn them from the door this moment if they were to attempt to come back. I only hope God will curse—' 'Stop, Charles, stop!' said mother, shuddering and trembling. 'Don't curse our boys—your own flesh and blood,' and with a wild scream she fell senseless to to the floor. We got her to bed but could not bring her to, and father had to go for Dr. Scott, and it was hours before he succeeded in bringing her to her senses. He said she had apparently received a very hard mental shock. 'And so she has," said father; 'no matter now what caused it, only do what you can for her.' She at last grew easier, and I hoped the worst was over, when all at once baby Allie was taken with spasms, and we fear it will die. The doctor says they are caused by the excitement mother had undergone affecting her milk, and Allie being naturally a very delicate child, it will be apt to go hard with her. Now, Edith, you know all the sad story, and I want you to go right home with me for I need a friend now more than I ever did in all my life. I left mother and Allie both asleep, and Myra and her father there; and as they insisted on my taking a turn in the fresh air, I did so by coming to you."

"You did very right, dear, and I'll tell mother where I'm going, and then we'll go at once."

As she spoke, Mrs. May opened the door, and Edith told her she was going home with Sue to stay all night, as her mother and the baby were both sick. The two girls then hurried rapidly on their way, and were soon at the deacon's. As they entered, they saw Myra with the baby on her lap, while her father stood by, looking very grave and sad. Hastening forward, Sue eagerly inquired if Allie was worse.

"Yes, my dear," said the kind doctor, taking her hand in his and thus assuring her of his sympathy in her trouble. "Yes, my dear, she is much worse, and can live but a few moments longer."

"Oh, my darling little sister!" said Sue, sinking upon her knees and laying her face against that of the child. "Oh try, doctor, and do something for her!"

"She is past all help, my dear, and past all suffering too. See how quietly and peacefully she sleeps. She is smiling in her slumber, and all pain is forever gone from her."

"The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away. Blessed be his holy name," said a solemn voice at the open door.

Sue looked up and saw her father, who came and looked sorrowfully down upon the face of his dying babe. This child had been his pet, and he had really loved it as much as his sordid, selfish heart could love anything. It was too young yet to be capable of angering him by want of due and humble submission, and it had been a remarkably good, pleasant, and cheerful babe, always smiling, crowing, and happy; so nothing had occurred to rouse the selfish antagonism of his nature towards it.

Sue shivered as she heard his words, for they sounded almost blasphemous in her ears as she thought to herself that it was he and not the Lord that had caused all the present anguish, sorrow, and misfortune. His own anger, brutality, and selfish meanness had made a shipwreck of the little domestic happiness that had ventured to find a presence beneath his roof.

[To be continued.]

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.—CONTINUED.

CHAPTER VII.—Continued.

VIRGINAL REPRODUCTION.

The so-called virginal reproduction (Parthenogenesis) offers an interesting form of transition from sexual reproduction to the non-sexual formation of germ-cells (which most resembles it); it has been demonstrated to occur in many cases among Insects, especially by Siebold's excellent investigations. In this case germ-cells, which otherwise appear and are formed exactly like egg-cells, become capable of developing themselves into new individuals without requiring the fructifying seed. The most remarkable and most instructive of the different parthenogenetic phenomena are furnished by those cases in which the same germ-cells, according as they are fructified or not, produce different kinds of individuals. Among our common honey bees, a male individual (a drone) arises out of the eggs of the queen, if the egg has not been fructified; a female (a queen, or working bee), if the egg has been fructified. It is evident from this, that in reality there exists no wide chasm between sexual and non-sexual reproduction, but that both modes of reproduction are directly connected. The parthenogenesis of Insects must probably be regarded as a relapse from the sexual mode of propagation (possessed by the original parents of the insects) to the earlier condition of non-sexual propagation (Gen. Morph. ii. 86). In any case, however, sexual reproduction, both in plants and animals, which seems such a wonderful process, has only arisen at a later date out of the more ancient process of non-sexual reproduction. In both cases heredity is a necessary part of the phenomenon.

In all the different modes of propagation the essential point of the process is invariably a detachment of a portion of the parental organism possessing the capability of leading an individual, independent existence. We may, therefore, in all cases expect, à priori, that the produced individuals—which are, in fact, as is commonly said, "the flesh and blood" of the parents—will receive the vital characteristics and qualities of form which the parental individuals possess. It is simply a larger or smaller quantity of the parental material, in fact of its albuminous protoplasm, or cell-substance, which passes to the produced individual. But together with the material, its vital properties—that is, the molecular motions of the plasma—are transmitted, which then manifest themselves in its form. Inheritance by sexual breeding loses very much of the mysterious and wonderful character which it at first sight possesses for the uninitiated, if we consider the above-mentioned series of the different modes of propagation, and their connection one with another. It at first appears exceedingly wonderful that in the sexual propagation of man, and of all higher animals, the small egg, the minute cell, often invisible to the naked eye, is able to transfer to the produced organism all the qualities of the maternal organism, and, no less mysterious, that at the same time the essential qualities of the paternal organism are transferred to the offspring by means of the male sperm, which fructifies the egg-cell by means of a viscid substance in which minute thread-like cells or zoosperms move about. But as soon as we compare the connected stages of the different kinds of propagation, in which the produced organism separates itself more and more as a distinct growth from the parental individual, and more or less early enters upon its independent career; as soon as we consider, at the same time, that the growth and development of every higher organism only depends upon the increase of the cells composing it—that is, upon their simple propagation by division—it becomes quite evident that all these remarkable processes belong to one series.

The life of every organic individual is nothing but a connected chain of very complicated material phenomena of motion. These motions must be considered as changes in the position and combination of the molecules, that is, of the smallest particles of animated matter (of atoms placed together in the most varied manner). The specific, definite tendency of these orderly, continuous, and inherent motions of life depends, in every organism, upon the chemical mingling of the albuminous generative matter to which it owes its origin. In man, as in the case of the higher animals which propagate themselves in a sexual manner, the individual vital motion commences at the moment in which the egg cell is fructified by the spermatic filaments of the seed, in which process both generative substances actually mix; and here the tendency of the vital motion is determined by the specific, or, more accurately, by the individual nature of the sperm as well as of the egg. There can be no doubt as to the purely mechanical material nature of this process. But here we stand full of wonder and astonishment before the infinite and inconceivable delicacy of this albuminous matter. We are amazed at the undeniable fact that the simple egg-cell of the maternal organism, and a single paternal sperm-thread, transfer the molecular individual vital motion of these two individuals to the child so accurately that afterwards the minutest bodily and mental peculiarities of both parents reappear in it.

Here we stand before a mechanical phenomenon of nature of which Virchow, whose genius founded the "cellular pathology," says with full justice; "If the naturalist cared to follow the customs of historians and preachers, and to clothe phenomena, which are in their way unique, with the hollow pomp of ponderous and sounding words, this would be the opportunity for him; for we have now approached one of those great mysteries of animal nature, which encircle the region of animal life as opposed to all the rest of the world of phenomena. The question of the formation of cells, the question of the excitation of a continuous and equable motion, and, finally, the questions of the independence of the nervous system and of the soul—these are the great problems on which the human mind can measure its strength." To comprehend the relation of the male and female to the egg-cell is almost as much as to solve all those mysteries. The origin and development of the egg-cell in the mother's body, the transmission of the bodily and mental peculiarities of the father to it by his seed, touch upon all the questions which the human mind has ever raised about man's existence. And, we add, these most important questions are solved, by means of the Theory of Descent, in a purely mechanical and purely monistic sense.

There can then be no further doubt that, in the sexual propagation of man and all higher organisms, inheritance, which is a purely mechanical process, is directly dependent upon the material continuity of the producing and produced organism, just as is the case in the simplest non-sexual propagation of the lower organisms. However, I must at once take this opportunity of drawing attention to an important difference which inheritance presents in sexual and non-sexual propagation. It is a fact long since acknowledged, that the individual peculiarities of the producing organism are much more accurately transmitted to the produced organism by non-sexual than by sexual propagation. Gardeners have for a long time made use of this fact in many ways. When, for instance, a single individual of a species of tree with stiff, upright branches accidentally produces down-hanging branches, a gardener, as a rule, cannot transmit this peculiarity by sexual, but only by non-sexual propagation. The twigs cut off such a weeping tree and planted as cuttings or slips, afterwards produce trees having likewise hanging branches, as, for example, the weeping willows and beeches. Seedlings, on the other hand, which have been reared out of the seed of such a weeping tree, generally have the original stiff and upright form of branches possessed by their ancestors. The same may be observed in a very striking manner in the so-called "copper-colored trees," that is, varieties of trees which are characterized by a red or reddish brown color of the leaves. Off-shoots from such copper-colored trees (for example, the copper beech), which have been propagated by cuttings in a non-sexual manner, show the peculiar color and nature of the leaves which distinguished the parental individual, while others reared from seeds of such a copper-colored tree return to the green-colored condition of leaf.

This difference in inheritance will seem very natural when we consider that the material connection between the producing and produced individuals is much closer and lasts much longer in non-sexual than in sexual propagation. The special tendency of the molecular motion of life can therefore fix itself much longer and more thoroughly in the filial organism, and be more strictly transmitted by non-sexual than by sexual propagation. All these phenomena, considered in connection, clearly prove that the transmission of bodily and mental peculiarities is a purely material and mechanical process. By propagation, a greater or lesser quantity of albuminous particles, and together with them the individual form of motion inherent in these molecules of protoplasm, are transmitted from the parental organism to the offspring. As this form of motion remains continuous, the more delicate peculiarities inherent in the parental organism must sooner or later reappear in the filial organism.

[TO BE CONTINUED].

VICTOR EMANUEL.—The popular confidence in Victor Emanuel never wavered, and it was well deserved. Dissolute in private life, a trooper in bearing, a rude sportsman in taste and habits; with no knowledge of literature and little taste for art; speaking by preference a dialect as rough as the broadest Yorkshire, and never thoroughly mastering Italian; a second-rate general in all but daring; at once reckless and ignorant of finance—so reckless that his debts were a permanent trouble to the Treasury, and so ignorant that he never could understand how his vast nominal income went—the King had three of those great qualities which build up, in a favoring cycle of circumstance, durable thrones. He never feared or disliked or tricked the people. He could take a great risk, as he did when he invaded the Romagna, or exercise a grand self-control, as he did when, almost apoplectic with rage, he agreed to the peace of Villafranca, or when he signed away, on the demand of Napoleon, the cradle of his house. And he could recognize and accept and use great servants. His was probably not the insight which has made of the Hohenzollern the most powerful monarch in the world; the insight which picked out Moltke from among the soldiers of fortune and Bismark from among petty squires; but still, among the statesmen around him, the King chose right. He alone after Novara insisted, in the teeth of enormous opposition, on choosing Massimo d'Azeglio. There is reason to believe that he hated Cavour personally, though at a time when he was absolute he had selected him; but he never but once, and then for a moment, deserted his great servant. He chafed under Ricasoli's stern rein, but he never overthrew him. He must have writhed often under recent Ministers, especially in ecclesiastical affairs, but he never deserted them, even under pressure which to him, at heart a superstitious Catholic, must have been tremendous. It was not that he simply suffered them. To the last his power over every Ministry was considerable, and was exercised freely, especially as regards the army and foreign affairs; but he never violated the Constitution, and never acted without his Ministers' knowledge. As he told Gambetta, the last foreign statesman who saw him alive, had he been king of France, Gambetta would have been his Premier, and would have been supported. The origin of his loyalty was, in part at least, but utter fearlessness, which rescued him from that suspiciousness alike of the people and of personages which besets kings, and in part the result of a feeling that he should be personally happier if all went wrong at last, and he was again the chamois-hunting Prince of Piedmont; but he was loyal to the bone, and his loyalty built Italy. No man less trusted, however superior in personal character or in intellectual powers, could have excited the same devotion, or received such adhesion from the determined, suspicious Republicans whom Italy, in her long years of suffering, had bred. Mazzini never accepted him, but the Mazzinians ceased to plot. In the land of the dagger he was safer from attempts on his life than Queen Victoria in England, and the grief of his whole people at his death shows at once the confidence he had attracted and their keen political sense, which saw that here, in this rough soldier, was the standard round which all parties and all provinces could rally for the battle of freedom and nationality.—The Spectator.

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier.

If Christians say that their Christ was miraculously born of a virgin, without her having known a man, the pagans had already said before them that Romulus and Remus, the founders of Rome, were miracuously born of a virgin vestal named Ilia, or Silvia, or Rhea Sylvia; they had already said that Mars, Argæus, Vulcan, and other gods had been conceived by the goddess Juno, without her having known man; and they had, again, already said that Minerva, the goddess of science, had been conceived in the brain of Jupiter, and that she sprang therefrom, already armed, one day, when it happened that that god struck himself a violent blow on the head.

If Christians say that their saints caused water to flow from rocks, the pagans say, likewise, that Minerva caused a well of oil to spring up, in reward for a temple that had been dedicated to her.

If Christians boast of having received miraculous pictures, such as that of Our Lady of Loretto and of Liesse, and divers other presents, straight from heaven—the sacred ampulla at Rheims, the white chasuble that St. Ildefonsa received from the Virgin Mary, and such like—the Roman pagans boasted before them of having received a miraculous shield, to commemorate the preservation of their city of Rome, and the Trojans boasted, also, of having miraculously received from heaven their Palladium, or image of Pallas, which came of itself, they say, and took its place in the temple that had been erected in honor of that goddess.

If Christians say that their Jesus Christ was seen by his apostles to ascend gloriously up into heaven, and that many of the souls of their pretended saints were seen to be gloriously carried up to heaven by the angels, the Roman pagans had already said before them that Romulus, their founder, was seen glorified after his death; that Ganymede, the son of Tros, king of Troy, was transported by Jupiter up into heaven, to serve him as cup-bearer; that the hair of Berenice, having been consecrated to the temple of Venus, was afterwards carried up into heaven; the same is said of Cassiope and Andromeda, and even of the ass of Silenus.

If Christians say that many of the bodies of their saints were miraculously preserved from decay and corruption after their death, and that the places of their burial, after having been for a length of time lost, were found once more through divine revelation, the pagans say the same of the body of Orestes, which they pretend had been revealed by an oracle.

If Christians say that the seven sleeping brothers slept one hundred and seventy-seven years in a cave in which they were shut up, the pagans say that the philosopher Epimenides slept fifty-seven years in a cavern in which he had fallen asleep.

If Christians say that some among their saints spoke miraculously after having had their heads or their tongues cut off, the pagans say that the head of Gabienus chanted a long poem after having been separated from his body.

If Christians pride themselves upon their temples and churches being adorned with many pictures and rich presents testifying to the miraculous cures brought about through the intercession of their saints, the temple of Esculapius, in Epidaurus, was crowded with pictures and other votive offerings for the miraculous cures performed by that god.

If Christians say that many of their saints have been miraculously preserved in the midst of burning flames, without their persons having received the slightest injury, nor their garments ever touched, the pagans say that the priestesses of the temple of Diana walked with naked feet on red-hot coals, unscathed, and that the priests of the goddess Feronia, and of Hirpinus walked, likewise, on hot coals in the bonfires that were made in honor of Apollo.

If the angels built a chapel to St. Clement at the bottom of the sea, the little house of Philemon and Baucis was miraculously transformed into a splendid temple, as a reward for their piety.

If some of their saints—St. James, St. Maurice, and others—have miraculously appeared to their armies, mounted and equipped for battle, and fought in their midst and in their favor; Castor and Pollux, likewise, were seen many times in the midst of the Roman legions, fighting with them against their enemies.

If a ram was miraculously found to be offered as a sacrifice in the place of Isaac, whom his father, Abraham, was going to immolate, in the same way the goddess Vesta sent a heifer to be offered her, as a sacrifice, in the place of Metella, the daughter of Metellus; in the same way the goddess Diana sent a fawn in the place of Iphigenia, just as she was about to be immolated on the altar, and in this way rescued her.

If St. Joseph fled into Egypt at the warning of an angel, Simonides, the poet, avoided many mortal dangers through a miraculous warning that had been sent to him.

If Moses caused a stream of living water to flow from a rock by striking it with his staff, the steed of Pegasus did the same by striking a rock with his hoof.

If St. Vincent Ferrer raised from the dead a person who had been hacked to pieces—some of which were already half boiled and others half roasted—Pelops, the son of Tantalus, king of Phrygia, having been cut to pieces by his father, to the end of offering him as food to the gods, these latter collected all the pieces together and restored him to life.

If several crucifixes and other images have miraculously spoken and answered questions, the pagans say that their oracles have spoken, likewise, and rendered responses to those who consulted them, and that the heads of Orpheus and Polycrates rendered oracles after their death.

If God made known by a voice from heaven that Jesus Christ was his son, as the evangelists affirm, Vulcan caused it to be seen, by the appearance of a miraculous flame, that Cœculus was his son.

If God miraculously fed some of his saints, the pagan poets say that Triptolemus was miraculously nourished with a divine milk by Ceres, who gave him, likewise, a chariot drawn by two dragons; and that Pheneus, the son of Mars, having died even in his mother's womb, was nevertheless miraculously fed with her milk.

If several saints have miraculously soothed the cruelty and ferocity of the most savage beasts, it is said that Orpheus drew to him, by the sweetness of his song and the melody of his instruments, lions, bears, and tigers, and changed the fierceness of their nature; that he drew to him the rocks and the trees, and even the rivers stopped in their course to listen to his music.

In a word, to abridge, if Christians say that the walls of the city of Jericho fell at the sound of trumpets, the pagans say that the walls of Thebes were built by the sound of the musical instruments of Amphion; the stones, say the poets, moving about of themselves through the sweetness of his music—a thing infinitely more miraculous and astonishing to witness than falling walls.

Here is, assuredly, a great conformity of miracles on one side and the other. As it would be both foolish and unwise to give credence to these pretended miracles of paganism, so it would be not less so to give credence to those of Christianity, since they all proceed from one identical principle of error. It was for this that the Manicheans and the Arians, who existed quite at the commencement of the Christian era, derided and laughed at these pretended miracles, wrought by the invocation of the saints, and blamed all who invoked them after their death and honored their relics.

Let us now return to the chief end God had in view in sending his son into the world, and who was man. It was, it is said, to take away the sins of the world, and to overthrow and utterly destroy the works of the pretended devil, etc. This is what Christians maintain, as also that Christ was willing to die for the love of them, in accordance with the intention of God, his father, clearly expressed in all these pretended sacred books.

What! an all-powerful God would have been willing to be made man for the love of them, and to shed, even to the last drop, his blood for their salvation, would have limited his power to healing, here and there, a little sickness and a few bodily infirmities in those that were presented to him, and was not willing to employ his divine bounty in curing all the infirmities of our souls—in other words, in curing all mankind of their vices and follies, which are infinitely more hurtful than the infirmities of the body? This is not to be believed. What! a God so merciful would have miraculously preserved from decay and corruption the dead bodies of some among his creatures, but would not preserve from the contagion and corruption of sin and vice the souls of an infinite number of them, whom he came to redeem with his blood and sanctify by his grace? What an absurd contradiction!

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

BY the Des Moines Reporter we see that the Liberal convention there passed off in fine style, and that a Liberal league, with over forty members, was organized.

Lessons in Popular Science.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.
BY D. M. B.

PRECESSION OF THE EQUINOXES.

Hipparchus, in comparing his own observations with those of the astronomers who preceded him, found that the equinoxes were slowly changing their positions among the stars, the change amounting to at least a degree towards the west in a century. His successor determined it with still greater accuracy, and it is now known to be a degree in seventy years. Long study and observation have shown that this change is due mainly to a variation in the position of the earth's pole. The position of the ecliptic among the stars varies so slowly that the change can be seen only by the perfected observations of modern times.

In the diurnal motion of the earth there is, as before explained, a point in the northern heavens around which the heavenly bodies seem to perform a daily revolution. This point in the heavens is a little more than a degree from the pole star. Now, precession really consists in a very slow motion of this pole around the pole of the ecliptic, the rate of the motion being such as to carry it all the way around in 25,300 years. There is a very slight motion to the ecliptic itself, and, therefore, to its pole; and this fact renders the motion of the pole of the equator around it somewhat complicated; but the curve described by the latter is nearly of forty-six degrees in diameter. In the time of Hipparchus our present pole star was twelve degrees from the pole, and ever since the pole has steadily been approaching it, and will continue to approach it till the year 2100, when it will slowly pass it at a distance of less than half a degree. Since the equator is always ninety degrees distant from the pole, there will be a corresponding motion to it, and, hence, to the point of its crossing the ecliptic.

The various celestial movements here spoken of, it must be understood, are only apparent, and are due to the motion of the earth itself, as will be more fully explained further along. "The diurnal revolution of the celestial sphere is due to the rotation of the earth on its axis, while precession is really a change in the direction of that axis."

An important effect of precession is that one revolution of the sun among the stars does not accurately correspond to the return of the same seasons. The latter depend upon the position of the sun relative to the equinox; the time when the sun crosses the equator towards the north always marking the season of spring in the northern hemisphere, no matter where the sun may be among the stars. If the equator did not move, the sun would always cross it at nearly the same point among the stars. When starting, however, from the vernal equinox, it makes the circuit of the heavens and returns to it again, the motion of the equator has been such that the sun crosses it twenty minutes before it reaches the same star. In one year this difference is very small; but by its constant accumulation of twenty minutes a year, it amounts to very considerable after the lapse of centuries. It is, therefore, important to distinguish between the sidereal and the tropical year, the former being the period required for one revolution of the sun among the stars, while the latter is that required for his return to the same equinox; whence it is also called the equinoctial year.

The length of the sidereal year is 365 days, 6 hrs., 9 m., 9 s.
" " tropical " 365 days, 5 hrs., 48 m., 46 s.

Since the recurrence of the seasons depends upon the tropical year, the latter is the one to be used in forming the calendar, and for ordinary purposes in civil life, as well. Its true length is eleven minutes and fourteen seconds less than 365 1-4 days.

THE MOON.

It is well known that the moon makes a revolution in the celestial sphere in about twenty-eight days, and that during this journey it presents a number of different phases, known as "new moon," "first quarter," "full moon," and "last quarter," depending on its position relative to the sun. The moon itself is a dark body illuminated by the light of the sun; which was a fact perfectly apparent to the astronomers of antiquity. Prof. R. A. Proctor believes it to be an arid sphere, without an atmosphere and without life; in other words, a dead world.

The absolute time required for the moon to make a circuit around the earth is twenty-seven days and eight hours. The speed of its motion can be appreciated by noticing the moon on a clear night when in close proximity to a bright star. If the relative position of the star be observed from hour to hour, it will be found that the moon is constantly working towards the east by a distance equal to its diameter every hour. Twenty-four hours from the time of observation it will be found nearly fourteen degrees east of the position occupied the night previous. It rises nearly an hour later and sets nearly an hour later every day.

If, however, starting from one new moon, we count forwards the period of twenty-seven days and eight hours, it will be found that the moon, although she has returned to the same position among the stars, has not got back to new moon again. The reason of this is that the sun has moved forward, in virtue of his apparent annual motion, to such extent that it requires more than two days for the inferior orb to overtake the superior. Therefore, although the moon really revolves around the earth in twenty-seven days and eight hours, the interval between one new moon and another is twenty-nine and a half days.

Aristarchus, an ancient astronomer who lived three centuries before our era, and prior to Hipparchus and Ptolemy, and before the motions of the solar system were understood, exercised great ingenuity in calculating the relative difference of the sun and moon, but by his system of measurement he did not make the superior distance of the sun one-twentieth what it really is.

Watching the path of the moon among the stars, and mapping it down, it is found to be not the same as the sun, being inclined to the latter about five degrees. The paths cross each other in two opposite points of the heavens, called the moon's nodes. It is constantly changing, in consequence of a motion of the nodes towards the west, amounting to more than a degree in every revolution. In mapping out these motions the path will cross the ecliptic at the same angle, but the moon will not always pass over the same stars. The change going on from month to month and from year to year, in eighteen years and seven months the nodes of the moon will have made a complete revolution, and the moon will have returned to the position formerly occupied. The moon, though much the smaller orb, and much nearer the earth than any other, requires more calculation to study its deviating courses and presentations than any other of the heavenly bodies.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Correspondence Extraordinary.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. VIII.

MY DEAR READERS: Before I progress further in narrating our progress in creating worlds and in peopling them, I suppose I ought to tell you something more about our producing from the thin, homogeneous, aerial matter we had evolved from nothing, all forms of entity called primates or simple substances now known to the chemists of your time. This was truly a difficult labor to perform, and taxed our skill and ingenuity to the utmost. There had been up to this time nothing required of any remarkable precision of manipulation. We had brought from opposite extremes, in considerable quantities, as I have told you, two samples of nothing, and by dexterously mixing and commingling them together, produced the very light and bodiless form of matter I have described to you. By repeating this process two or three times, bringing from distant and opposite extremes samples of the thin matter we had caused to pervade universal space, we at length produced a comparatively dense form of substance, somewhat heavier than your atmosphere, in which we saw the material for future worlds, and millions upon millions of forms of organized life. I have told you all about this, and I do not need to go over the ground again; but I only want to call your attention to the fact that up to this time our labor had been more manual than otherwise. We had almost by accident struck upon a law, or, perhaps quite as truly, I might say, we established a law by which something could be produced from nothing. It is doubtless very proper for me to make this clear to you as I go along, that you may understand and always remember that to my Brother and I, and to us alone, belongs the honor of being able to convert nothing into something. It was never done before us, it was never done after us. It never could and never can be done by any other persons. In this field of invention we stand alone. It is not necessary for us to secure letters patent either in this country or in Europe, Asia, Africa, or the West India Islands. We command the situation, and we are not afraid of anybody's stealing the art from us. I am not sure we could do the thing again, for we tried to repeat some of our performances but were tripped up entirely. When we did it the first time it was a palpable hit, and, perhaps, if on other occasions we had tried it a hundred times over we might not have met with the same success. Conditions, you know, have a great deal to do with everything, and when we started the universe out of nothing, conditions were remarkably favorable. But my Brother has been wonderfully proud of that enterprise ever since. I have many and many a time heard him boast and brag about what he had accomplished in manufacturing a universe, and, for the time, he seemed almost to forget that I had done quite as much toward it as he had. I was forced, in order to maintain my share of the honor of the business, to remind him that I was also on hand with him, and that I did fully as much as he did in getting up this little universe, and that it did not look quite right for him to try and take all the credit of it to himself.

"Oh, Luce," said he, "you must pardon me; I am a little egotistical and boastful; I acknowledge the corn and ask you to overlook my weakness in that direction. Of course, Luce, you were there just as much as I was, and had fully as much to do with engineering the entire job as I had. But sometimes when I get to thinking it over, and contemplating what was done during the long ages in which we performed such wonders, it sort o' seems to me that I was the principal factor in the business, and that I did about all that was done; but, my dear Luce, when I think it over just as it was, I feel ashamed of my injustice to you, and I hereby ask you to let my egotism pass as one of my little foibles and weaknesses, which I hope you will try to forget. You must bear with me and excuse some of my peculiarities. I don't mean any particular harm by it; it's only my way, you know."

"That's all right, Jah," said I; "pray don't speak of it; I feel no uneasiness upon the subject. You know, and I know that I was not idle when the universe was being created, and I have the consciousness that I performed my full share of the headwork and the handwork, and this I shall always know to be the truth. I care nothing now about the matter, anyway, but when we come to people our growing worlds with sentient beings, I shall feel desirous to have due credit accorded to me before them. It will not be pleasant to be set aside then, nor to be held up to them as one having performed little or nothing that was grand and glorious. When we come to have a constituency I shall wish to be fairly presented before them, and I will be glad to have the credit to which I am entitled."

"Ah, Luce," said Jah, "what a sensitive, and at the same time sensible fellow you are. Never you fear that I shall wrong you, as you seem to apprehend. If I may, at any time, in a thoughtless mood forget myself, and show a little of my natural traits, you just remind me of it, and I will make it all right."

"Enough said, my Brother, let's shake again, and let it all pass."

Oh, how I am running on with my talk. I undertook to tell you about getting up primates or simple substances, and here I am narrating one of the thousand little spats or differences that my Brother and I had. I am sure I shall tire you if I keep detailing these numerous quarrels and I will be careful and not overdo the business. I think I have more interesting and more important matters to divulge to you. Let me now go on with the primates.

You already understand how matters existed when we had produced the homogeneous, thin, unorganized, semi-opaque, and semi-translucent body of aeriform matter which filled immensity, and through which the feeble forces, which had simultaneously been brought into existence, were slowly coursing. To quicken these forces, to cause them to act in concert and to co-operate in such a wonderful manner as to lay the foundation for numerous distinct and independent substances, was our next labor. There was no small mental effort required to decide upon what substances were necessary or how many and what kinds we should get up.

While engaged in this exhaustive labor, feeling the necessity of a perfect union of forces and perfect harmony in our operations, my Brother and I preserved a very peaceful and placid state of feeling, and I thought he was unusually amiable and pleasant. As he had done before, he consulted me very frequently as to the number of simple substances we should devise, the proportions in which we should prepare them, and the nature and qualities which they should possess, and I was greatly flattered by the consideration he gave to my suggestions. It made ample amends for the slights he had sometimes shown me. I noticed when he inquired of me how many samples we should prepare and in what proportion and form, I only had to express an opinion when he at once said, "That is settled, we will have it that way."

When he said, "My dear Luce, how many primates shall we have?" "Oh," said I, "I guess somewhere about one hundred will not be far out of the way." "Well, a hundred let it be." Consequently that was about the number we made. Your chemists have discovered about seventy of them, and the balance will be chiefly brought to light within the next century.

When he asked in what form and proportion we should have them, I replied: "We shall, of course, be under the necessity of getting them all up in the gaseous form at first, and those we design for liquids we will afterwards condense, and those we intend for metals we will slowly crystallize into a solid form. We will, of course, make those in the greatest quantity which will be most useful in forming the vast number of compounds which will go to make up our globes, and, ultimately, organized life, which will exist upon them." "Amen; so be it," said Jah; "I will trust your judgment in that undertaking. I have scarcely found you at fault in judgment since we commenced."

It required a great number of experiments before we succeeded to our minds in getting up the primates; and when we found we were not pursuing the proper course, we immediately abandoned the plan and tried some other.

My Brother requested me to lead off and bring out the first primate; whereupon I set the subtle forces at work as I had not done before. I combined them, separated them, used them alone, and used them together. I used them direct, and then reversed them. I tried them weak, and then concentrated them to the utmost. I can hardly make you comprehend what I did not do; and the first distinct, simple substance I evolved was hydrogen gas; and I was so well pleased with my success that I made it in vast quantities. It was extremely light, and I noticed that its levity took it somewhat above the surrounding homogeneous matter from which I evolved it.

After I had got well under headway in turning out extensive volumes of hydrogen gas, Jah came along, snuffing up his nose, and said to me, "Luce, what are you up to? You are making a funny kind of smell. Do you think you will be able to make any use of that light kind of stuff? Don't you think it would be better to make the primates with more consistence?"

"You be patient, my dear Brother," said I, "and I will show you that what you call this 'light stuff' will play a very important part in the economy of our universe. It will enter into combination with many other substances, and it will be necessary to have it in almost inexhaustible quantities. When the worlds we are making get so far along that they will be condensed into solid form, we shall require vast amounts of a fluid called water; and this hydrogen gas will be one of the principal constituents in its formation. We will require great quantities of this light substance, I assure you."

"Then, go ahead, and make all of it you think best. I will trust you in this business. You are to be the principal Professor of Chemistry and Physics in this University."

Thus said Jah; and that, of course, decided me to work away and produce all the hydrogen I thought we would require; and the quantity for all the worlds we had under way was immense—beyond your powers of comprehension.

After I had prepared the hydrogen, I next took in hand oxygen, which I denominated the "life principle." It required, I found, a difficult process to evolve this gas from the homogeneous matter, and it was not until several weeks were spent in trials and experiments that I succeeded to my mind, but when I acquired the art perfectly, the way I turned out oxygen is wonderful to contemplate. I do not wish you to understand me that Jah had nothing to do with producing these simple forms of matter in a gaseous state, for he was with me, and helped me almost continually, but I was master of the situation. I gave instructions, and as you often express a similar state of things, "I bossed the job." He often told me I understood chemistry much better than he did, and if I would only assume the burden of getting up the simple substances required in forming the worlds, he would be glad of it, and would not interfere with my supervision.

One day as we were turning out oxygen at the rate of five hundred cubic miles an hour, Jah said to me, "Luce, what in the name of all that has an existence, are you going to do with so much of this new kind of air we are making now? I wish to know what purpose you intend to put it to." "Why," said I, "this is Vital Air; this is to be the basis of all the atmospheres round all our worlds, and will be breathed by millions upon millions of organized beings, and will infuse into them life and warmth. Without this principle, life and growth cannot be kept up. But its powers are so intense that we will have to counteract its great stimulating and vitalizing properties by another gas, which we next will prepare, and the name of that shall be nitrogen; this will modify the exhilarating and over-stimulating properties of the gas we are now preparing, and will fit it for the use of animal life, for supporting flame and many other uses. It will also form the base of most acids which it will be necessary to bring into existence, and will corrode, or rather oxidize, the various metals and rocks which will crystallize from the many forms of matter we shall hereafter prepare, and by this process, soils will be produced, and from them multiform classes and orders of vegetation will spring forth, which will minister to the life and comfort of millions upon millions of animals and men.

I must not dwell too long upon the manufacture of these gases, but will merely assure you that, after oxygen, we next took nitrogen, then chlorine, then carbonic acid gas, and then one after another of all the primates, including the earths, the metals, etc., etc. You will understand that these were one by one evolved from the homogeneous substance about which I have told you so much.

When we were getting up the earths and metals, or the bases upon which they are founded, we panned out largely of sulphur, calcium, sodium, iron, and the quantities of potassium, iodinum, magnesium, etc., were by no means inconsiderable. With prophetic vision we foresaw the vast use that could be made of them and the great utility they would be in the great economy of the universe, and for the uses of the beings that, later, we should bring into existence. Several of what are called the precious metals, and the secondary kinds, we made in comparatively limited quantities, as it was clear to us that the universe could run just as well with a limited quantity of them as though we made them in immense profusion.

Some of you may wonder why we did not make more gold and silver, more platinum, as well as others of the precious metals; but let me assure you you would have been no better off had we made ten times the quantity of those rarer metals that we did; and for a long time it has been a question with me whether your little world would not have been vastly better off had it not contained an ounce of gold and silver. Though it must be confessed that as metals they contain very excellent and useful qualities, and are capable of doing a vast amount of good, that the strife, care, and trouble they have engendered within the last few thousand years are enough to make as good-natured a fellow as I am, and one who had so much to do in getting them up, curse their existence. I wish you all to learn to prize those precious metals for the good qualities they possess, instead of allowing your soul to be cankered and almost eaten up with the cares and perplexities of the struggle in procuring them.

But, my dear readers, I am satisfied I have wearied you enough in one letter, and will leave what I have further to say till another time. Believe me, your ever faithful friend,

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Answers to Inquirers.

S. A.—Where is to be found the familiar passage, "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb"? I know it is not in the Bible. Ans.—In the writings of Laurence Sterne.

PHILIP RHYMES.—Whence the origin of the Holy Ghost? Ans.—Pneuma, the Greek word translated Ghost, means precisely "wind," or "breath." Had not the translators of King James' version of the Bible been lamentably ignorant, they would have rendered it "the holy breath of God." The doctrine of the personality of the Holy Ghost was first suggested in the Council of Constantinople, in the year 381.

H. M. C.—What historian first penned the account of the nursing and rearing of Romulus and his brother? Ans.—The story is given by Plutarch, but modern writers, following the researches of Niebuhr, declare that, for the most part, it is little more than a poetical legend. Plutarch's account of Romulus was written about A.D. 100, which, being over eight hundred and fifty years after the date commonly assigned for the foundation of Rome, can be little more than a record of the traditions of his time.

FRANCIS R.—Were such abominable lines as the following ever included in any orthodox collection of hymns?

> "Have faith the same for endless shame
> For all the human race;
> For hell is crammed with infants damned,
> Without a day of grace."

Ans.—Certainly. They are most decidedly "orthodox," though a little unpopular to modern taste. They are attributed to good old Dr. Watts, and can most undoubtedly be found in an old edition of his collection.

H. W. R.—1. Who was Henry Winter Davis? Ans.—He was Congressman from Maryland for several years, about the time of the rebellion. He was an eloquent orator, and a powerful advocate in Congress for the freedom of the slaves. We can find no particulars concerning his birth or death. 2. Who was Thersites? Ans.—According to Homeric history he was a Greek officer, the most deformed and illiberal of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow-soldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses. Achilles killed him with one blow of his fist, because he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthesilea. 3. Who was Torquemada? Ans.—See answer to Seneca in TRUTH SEEKER of March 2. 4. Where, and at what price can I obtain the complete poems of Walt Whitman? Ans.—Whitman's poems are out of print, but he is about to bring out a new edition. Their appearance will be announced in these columns.

J. P.—What book or books will give me the most direct and correct information in regard to the different systems of religion, and the rites, ceremonies, etc., of the same? Ans.—The best work on comparative theology that we have seen is James Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions." In this work is given the latest results of modern investigations, so far as any definite and trustworthy facts have been ascertained. Though it is written from a Unitarian standpoint, it gives a very impartial and critical general account of the principal religions of the world; but it does not go into particulars about the different sects into which Christianity is divided. Hayward's "Book of All Religions" and Evan's "History of All Christian Sects" contain more definite accounts of the peculiar beliefs and teachings of the various Christian sects. Clarke's work is comprehensive and analytic; the others are merely descriptive. They may be procured at this office. Prices: Clarke's, $3.00; Hayward's, $2.00; Evan's, $1.00.

J. L.—Can you refer me to any work that will give an account of the finding by Joe Smith of the metal plates from which the Mormon Bible is claimed to have been written? Ans.—Doubtless several works, notably biographies and cyclopedias, contain some account of Smith's receiving, according to his own statement, from an angel three golden plates, upon which were engraved, in Egyptian characters, the Book of Mormon, which, with the aid of a kind of spectacles which he called Urim and Thummin, he was enabled to translate into English. When engaged in translating, he sat behind a screen and dictated to a scribe; and when the translation was written, it constituted the celebrated Book of Mormon, who is claimed to have been a Jewish prophet who lived in the fourth century. The work is written in Scripture language, and relates to descendants of the Israelites who came to America six hundred years before Christ. No one saw the plates except Smith, and when they were translated the angel took them back again. The plates were translated in 1827, and the book was published in 1830; after which the Mormons increased rapidly, forming a society first at Manchester, Ontario Co., N. Y.; then at Kirkland, Ohio; then at Nauvoo, Ill., whence they moved to Salt Lake City. A more probable story about the Book of Mormon is that it was the work of a Presbyterian preacher, named Solomon Spalding, who, during a lingering illness, wrote it for pastime, and as a kind of religious romance. After his death it was brought to this city to be published, but, this plan failing, it somehow passed into the hands of Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon, and formed a Bible about equal to the old Jewish Scriptures.

Sewer Gas and Ventilation.

An interesting practical lecture, under the title of Sanitary Reform, was given before the Medical and Statistical Society, at the Eclectic College Building, last evening, by Professor Joseph R. Buchanan. The lecturer has given special attention to the subject of ventilation, and he gave his views on that question, which are somewhat different from those generally held.

The sewer gas question (said Dr. B.) is an important one in New York, as sewer malaria is one of the leading sources of disease in this city. With deficient or careless work in water-closets and connections with sewers a vast amount of poisonous gas escapes into our dwellings, which it is supposed may be prevented by securing more faithful workmanship. This, however, is not a very safe reliance. Almost every house experiences this evil at times, and the only thing to be relied on is ventilation.

Each householder should have a flue running to the roof from water-closets, sinks, and other sources of foul air, in which a gaslight or lamp should be kept burning to maintain a draft. This is an effectual protection. But there are so many houses which, through ignorance, negligence, and parsimony will not be thus protected, that the city should undertake the wholesale removal of sewer gas instead of allowing it to come out of the sewers into houses.

This may be done by placing over each sewer a chimney eighty or a hundred feet high with a few gaslights or a fire continually burning in it, which by drawing its air from the sewer would cause a draft into the sewer at every open spot, and thus cause the foul air to pass into the sewer instead of escaping, as the carbonic acid from a fire goes up the chimney instead of escaping into the house.

If the sewer gas was thus made to pass through a fire, its poisonous character would be destroyed before it passed into the atmosphere. The same object might be effected by connecting the sewer with any adjacent furnace by a pipe of adequate size, through which the draft of the furnace would draw the sewer gas. It would be necessary, of course, that the mouth of the sewer should not be open, but if above the water level, it should be guarded by a floating valve to prevent the air from entering.

The true principle of ventilation is to remove the foul air before allowing it to contaminate the pure—to draw it off from the place where it is first generated. This method Dr. B. called proximate ventilation, in opposition to the common method of allowing the foul air to mingle with the rest and drawing them off together, remote from the origin of the malaria, which method he criticised as distant ventilation. These methods were illustrated by a drawing on the blackboard, showing that by proximate ventilation any number of pupils might be kept in a school-room without injurious consequences, and even the crowded wards of hospitals might be kept free from infection and as healthy as the open tent. These methods are freely offered for the use of hospitals and schools by their inventor, who claims that they entirely overcome the difficulties arising from overcrowded halls, and counteract the diffusion of infectious diseases.

DO NOT speak harshly to any; those who are spoken to, will answer thee in the same way. Angry speech is painful, blows for blows will touch thee.

The Radical Pulpit.

The American Gentleman.

A SERMON BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

I spoke last Sunday on the subject of humanity. This morning I propose to say something about the crowning grace of this humanity of ours, which is gentlemanliness.

An old English dramatist of the 17th century wrote these lines: "The best of men that e'er wore earth about him was a sufferer, a soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit; the first true gentleman that ever breathed."

The allusion was to Jesus; fitly called a gentleman from his gentleness. The word "gentleman," in the old English speech, is equivalent to noble. It came from the Latin word gens, which means family. A gentleman, therefore, is a man of family. Something more than a year ago, being in the old city of Worcester, in England, I paid a visit to the Royal Porcelain Works there. As the superintendent took us through the various rooms where the artisans were at work in separate departments, some melting, some moulding, some designing, some painting landscapes, and some cattle, some ornamenting, and some gilding, men and women, the superintendent said: "These gentleman are doing this, or that; these ladies are doing that, or this." There is an immense distance between these two conceptions of a gentleman. The old dramatist by the word gentleman meant the highest qualities that adorn humanity; the Superintendent of the Royal Porcelain Works, at Worcester, visited the title of gentleman and ladies upon the common artisans, whose simple distinction was that they had the human form. The word gentleman is English, and the idea it conveys is English. One of the most eminent and brilliant of modern literary men, a Frenchman, says that out of England there is nothing resembling the type of the gentleman. In France there are nobles, men of exquisite refinement, belonging to the ancient regime, to a class which has passed away; men noted for their chivalry, their courage, their polished exterior, their refined tastes, their exquisite mien and bearing, but belonging to an order of things existing no more, a class of men that perished in the Revolution, and exists now only here and there by way of decoration on the surface of French society. But the English gentleman is abreast with his time; he is a man not of any past age, but of the present age. He is not an ornament to society merely, he is the minister, the man of affairs, the director of railways, interested in the sciences, the leader of social reform, engaged in everything that concerns the welfare of his generation. Let us analyze a little this conception of a gentleman. In the first place, the term itself implies what we call a material basis. The gentleman may not be himself wealthy; he may be poor, he may be an outcast, he may be an exile, of no account in the world, although if not wealthy himself he must be associated with wealth. If not himself high in social position, he must be able to look back to ancestors who were. If not a present force in the world, he must have traditions of forefathers of that character. He must be of good standing and circumstances in the world, or of good family. He must feel that he belongs to the best that the material universe has to give. He must have the sense of having had a home among prosperous people. When he sees a fine house and extensive lands he feels that they belong somehow to the like of him; and when he sees a person who has mastered fate and conquered fortune he feels that he is a brother of that person, that he is of the same kindred. Poor he may be, yet he never can be abject, for the gentleman always feels that he is one of the adopted ones of nature, that the world is his patrimony, whether he enjoys it and uses it or not. This is a cardinal element, in the English conception of a gentleman and the general sentiment of the day. You never see a gentleman, however poor he may be himself, who will own that poverty is part of the law of his nature. He does not class himself among paupers.

Again: the gentleman always has mind, a quick, active grasp of mind; he is a live intelligence. The dunce may come of a gentle lineage, but he cannot be a gentleman. The idler, who never asks a question about public affairs, who never cares about any vital concerns and interests of society, may wear the dress of a gentleman, but a gentleman he cannot be. The gentleman always has intelligence; though he may not be very useful or successful in his attempts, yet his mind is alive; he is conscious of the grand fact of personality—he counts one. He is sensible of an interior faith and dignity, he feels that when he gives his hand he gives the hand of a man; that he gives himself, pledges his character, and offers his heart. When he gives his word, he gives with it all the sanctity of his honor. It needs no more to fortify it. If he makes a promise, he keeps it, let it cost what it may. If he offers a pledge, that pledge is a pledge of his fortune, strength, character, life itself. That holiest of all words in the English language, honor, belongs to him; he alone can speak it, for he alone knows what it means. Whether fortune has thrust him in one lot or another; whether one kind or condition of circumstances or another kind be appointed to him, he is always himself. He cannot lie, he cannot cheat, he cannot steal, he cannot defraud his fellows. If he is a common artizan, or a merchant, or a politician, or a financier, no matter what his position or where he is, he is a man himself; the possessor of an incarnation of morality and dignity and power that is not to be challenged by anything less than the Almighty.

There is one cardinal element more in the character of the true gentleman, the element of heart. The gentleman is a man of heart. He has an open, wide, cordial, human sympathy. He respects himself, and therefore he respects his kind. He respects humanity in every man and in every woman. He goes beneath the surface of things; behind outward circumstances and conditions, and touches the manliness and womanliness in human character.

There are two stories that come to us out of English history that tell this more beautifully and touchingly than any words of mine can do. In the fourteenth century, Edward, the Black Prince, with an army of twelve thousand men, met King John of France, with an army of sixty thousand men, at the battle of Poictiers. The splendid valor of the English soldiers and the heroic leadership of their prince gained them an astonishing and all but miraculous victory. After the battle, in which King John was taken prisoner, Edward at once went to the captive king, put himself at his disposal, condoled with him on his mischance, took no credit for his victory to himself, but credited it to that mysterious providence which orders human affairs. He offered the captive monarch everything that he had, and when he rode in triumph into London, with his victorious army and his prisoners, he placed his captive on a splendid white steed, and himself rode by his side on an humble palfrey. None but an English gentleman could do that.

At the battle of Zutphen, Sir Philip Sidney, after having two horses slain under him, was shot in the thigh. He was over a mile from the camp, and was obliged to limp in that way to his tent. On reaching his tent, exhausted with the loss of blood, he feebly called for water. It was procured with some difficulty and brought to him. As he was about to put the flagon to his mouth, his eye fell upon a poor common soldier lying wounded a few yards off upon the ground, whose piteous eyes were turned towards the refreshing draught. Sidney forgot his own agony, put the cup down untouched, and said: "Give the water to him; his necessities are greater than mine." Fourteen days after that, Sir Phillip Sidney died, in the flower of his life, but leaving behind him a name that for heroic gentlemanliness, for manliness, for courage and delicacy and self-denial, will live as long as the word gentleman preserves its significance.

Gentlemanliness, therefore, we see, has a humane basis. It is built on the human feelings; it implies a tender, humane nature and a recognition of human kind. Now, when one comes to speak of the American gentleman, one must take into account humanity as it stands in America, and estimate it, not in the German or the French or the English, but in the American sense. Here in America there are no orders, no distinctions, no outward differences among men; there is but one law for all men, a law that is as just and equitable as human society at the present age is able to make. There is but one law for the rich and for the poor; one law for the well-born and for the ill-born. The only differences that are recognized publicly and politically in America between men are differences in character and attainments, in the amount and quality of the mental attributes that they possess. Therefore, the American gentleman must be as much more than the Continental or the English gentleman as his basis of humanity is broader and more comprehensive than theirs. He must build, not upon the humanity of a caste, or of a sect, or of a clique or family, but upon a humanity that is common to all men, of whatever class or condition they may be. There is a responsibility imposed upon every American gentleman which never has been faced in the history of the world before. In the city of Washington stands a monument, or rather the beginning of a monument dedicated to the Father of his Country. It is unfinished because it cannot be finished. Built on a broad basis, suitable for the American people and for the grandeur of American institutions, it cannot be completed according to any idea that the Old World can suggest. Will you carry it up as an Egyptian obelisk? its point would be lost in the sun. Will you set on the top of it a colossal figure? it must be a hundred feet high. Will you plant an equestrian statue there? you must have a spy-glass to see the horse. If you insist upon completing the monument upon a basis as broad as that, your whole design of the monument must be new; and, while you consult the old architectural principles and laws that are universal, you must build according to a conception which is adequate to the case in hand. Therefore, pull down the beginnings of your monument and make a new monument of a new design, which shall be not Egyptian, nor English, nor German, nor French, but American. So with this conception of the American gentleman: build it on a basis as broad and cardinal as humanity. You must not be content with a parlor ornament, with an elegant figure in bronze or porcelain which you can put upon your centre-table or mantelpiece; you must construct a character so grand in its proportions, so harmonious in outline, so noble and dignified in spirit, that it shall justify its unique and comprehensive design. Those are some of the elements of the character and of the term, American gentleman. And so, as the English gentleman must have a material basis, the American gentleman must have a material basis; but it need not be wealth, or past association with wealth; it must be a sympathy with that labor which is the creator of all wealth. The American gentleman will not be ashamed of toil; his hands are not too fine to be put to the plow if necessary, or to wield the hammer; he respects labor, sincere, honest toil of muscle or mind, of brain and heart and will, by which wealth is created. He does not side with capital against labor, for capital is nothing but accumulated labor. All our vast domain is the heritage of labor, and becomes divided and subdivided; there is no inalienable wealth; there are no lands that can never be sequestered, but labor—that which creates wealth, which is wealth in possibility—exists to-day as the common heritage and common dignity of every human creature. And the gentleman cannot side with labor against capital, because labor is only the capital of the future; labor is the creator of capital. But the gentleman stands with one foot upon one and one foot upon the other, reconciling them both, and feeling very sure that labor—honest, sincere, faithful, unremitting labor of whatever kind—is essential to the preservation of all wealth, whether one happens to enjoy it or not. But, more than this, the gentleman believes in the uses of labor. He has no faith in noise and sound and fury, in the pounding of the hammer on an idle anvil, in the empty voice of the politician, in the vain and futile hurrying to and fro of man and beast, which accomplishes nothing. He believes that no labor is worth a straw that does not accomplish something and make its contribution to the weath and welfare of the community. Whether it be the toil of the hands, or the brain of the thinker; whether it be the skill of the artisan or the comprehensive work of the merchant or the financier or the politician or the statesman, the end, and the end alone, justifies the means. Use and necessity are the basis of all labor. And it is the interest of all that labor should be paid for in honest money. It is the first and foremost, absolute, primary demand that—call it gold or silver or paper money, call it what you will—the essence of the medium of exchange must be a value that is common all over the civilized world; that is value to the Englishman, the Frenchman, the German; that which passes current among men of all nations; that which the laborer can safely take as a reward of his toil; that which capital can honorably pay for it; this, and this alone and always is, money. And he is no gentleman—has not the first conception of a gentleman—who will offer less than this. For the gentleman counts himself, first and foremost, bound to the welfare of mankind; he is not sectional; he is not pledged to the interests of Pennsylvania and New York on the one hand or of Colorado and Nevada on the other, but to that which reflects the welfare of the whole country and the general welfare of mankind.

Anything which diminishes or impairs the reward of toil is essentially dishonorable; anything is honorable that advances this. If a man contribute but a mite to the welfare of his kind, but the sweat of his brow, but the vigor of his great heart, but the robustness of his frame, he makes a contribution that is as valuable as any other if it is offered in a spirit of sincerity. But the self-seeker, the man who from any cause devotes himself to his own particular interests and affairs, and to nothing that belongs to humanity, who would pull down the cabins of the poor for the sake of erecting his massive stone structure, never can be a gentleman.

Pay your debts, but pay them in a value which is universally recognized. Above all, when it comes to debts of honor, to debts to which the nation's honor is pledged, then there is but one ground that a gentleman can take, and that is the ground of willingness to sacrifice every personal comfort and convenience for the sake of standing everlastingly by his word.

One thing more. The American gentleman must have a live mind. He must think, inquire, and be interested in affairs. He must not be so contented that he cannot be a politician, that he cannot go into business, or follow a profession, or be immersed in ordinary cares and anxieties. He is bound, by the fact of his being a gentleman, to take an interest in affairs, bound to do his utmost to make these occupations of men honorable and virtuous. He must have a live mind; he must be benevolent; he must be interested in all projects which help along the welfare of the community in which he happens to live; he must take an interest in everything that is going forward in civil, social, and private life; his mind must be alive to every question, his heart responsive to every call. Need I say that he must be a man of warm, deep, cordial sympathy? In a country like ours and a community like ours, where there is everything to be done, where want utters its ceaseless cry, and poverty reaches out its hand, and sorrow makes audible its bitter complaint, and there are wrongs to be righted all the time, and right principles to be advocated, how can he for a moment be indifferent to anything that concerns his country and his kind? The old pagan poet says, "I am a man, and nothing human is foreign from my sympathies."

There died about a week ago, in our own community, one of these men, who may be said to have been the model American citizen, the true American gentleman. I mean Theodore Roosevelt. For one whole week all the gentlemen of the city that are working the hardest for this community met together and passed resolutions of praise and glory to that simple gentleman. He held no public position, he wore no high-sounding title, but he was a man of great wealth who had regard for those who had nothing. He was a man pre-eminent in the social world, who yet always had a place in his heart for the humblest and poorest of his kind; a man who was the centre of fashionable society, yet went every Sunday evening, for ten years, to visit the newsboys in their lodging-house. He was a man of vast sympathy, whose charities were generous and abundant, giving his means freely to his country in its time of need, and to the destitute soldiers as freely after the war; a large contributor to all the institutions of charity in the city, and yet thinking of how he could do it more wisely, accomplishing the least harm with the utmost benefit. This man was at once one of the largest and wisest givers; studying social laws and devising means to save money by diminishing the wear and tear and friction of the machinery in charitable societies. It was he that suggested the Central Bureau of Christian Charities, which failed only on account of sectarian animosity. Simple in his life, unpretending in his manner, mild, gentle, brave as a lion and soft as a maiden, a man who never spoke a rude word, but who, on occasion, spoke in tones that fell like a thunderbolt upon immorality and wrong. Theodore Roosevelt was a simple American citizen. He was American all over, through and through; never boasting of what he did, always willing to serve his fellows, giving himself personally to all the meanest offices of philanthropy, filling more than any individual I have known the title of American gentleman.

There is one more attribute of the American gentleman that must be mentioned, and that is, a superiority to all sectarian distinctions, to all dogmatic prejudices. He cannot be dogmatic; he cannot be mean in his religion. The church that he belongs to must be the church of humanity. He may call himself a Catholic or Protestant or Methodist or Baptist or what not; he may go to no church, and subscribe to no creed; but, though his convictions may be clear and intense, so intense that he cannot understand how other convictions than his own can be the groundwork of eternal anticipation, yet, while holding his convictions so clear, so intensely, while building upon them his own hopes, he must concede to others—any others and all—the same right he claims for himself: to hold their convictions in their own fashion. In Catholic countries a gentleman must be a Catholic. In England it is hard to believe that a Dissenter can be a gentleman. A gentleman must belong to the Established Church, because the Established Church is identical with the State—has a bond of sympathy with the English Constitution. But here there is no Established Church. The same law spreads its majestic wings over Catholic and Protestant, over Churchman and Dissenter, over the believer in the trinity and the believer in the unity of God, over the theist and deist; and it rests with every man's conscience, only, whether he will practice one creed or hold to one opinion, or avow one conviction or another, or whether he will put the whole matter by; he is responsible only to himself, and the law recognizes that.

The gentleman, therefore, acts upon this idea, and it is the basis and culmination of all gentlemanly character. He is superior to all sectarian influences, jealousy, and passion. When you see a dogmatist, you see one who has no conception of gentlemanly character in man. It is of no consequence whether the individual belongs to one sect or another; it is of absolute, vital importance that a person has intelligence, has conscience. He should recognize his brother or his sister, whatever belief may be avowed or disavowed by them; for, to be a good man or woman is more than a profession of faith in a religious creed, and the two are not necessarily connected.

There is a phrase, "Christian gentleman," and the idea of Christian seems usually to accompany the idea of gentleman; but why should the word gentleman be always associated with the name Christian? When you speak of a Christian gentleman do you mean that the gentleman and the Christian are one and inseparable? Do you mean that a gentleman must be a believer in total depravity, in an eternal hell; that there is no gentleman unless he believes in damnation, that absolute refinement, good breeding, gentlemanliness involves a belief in the absolute destruction and eternal torment of nine-tenths of the human family? By no means. When the terms Christian and gentleman are associated together, the term Christian is taken in its largest, not its smallest sense. It must agree in principle and sentiment with a just conception of the gentleman; and when the old dramatist, Thomas Decker, called Jesus the first true gentleman that ever breathed, what did he have in his mind but this; he thought of Jesus as speaking tender and kind words to the woman of the city whom others despised; he thought of the man who sat at meat with the scorned publican and those whom the aristocratic and conventional circles of the time denounced as sinners; of the man who, when he saw the common prostitute, gave her no reproof, but spoke to her words of kindness, though he did it in the presence of the Pharisees, in a Pharisee's parlor, where he sat at the table by a Pharisee's invitation. The gentleman whom Thomas Decker had in mind was the man who sat at meat with publicans and sinners, and went on his errands of mercy, not to those of Judea, but into the wilderness, among the Galileans, among the idolaters and pagans, the man who gave the noblest, sweetest, and grandest ideas to a woman, a Samaritan woman, whom all his country people would have detested and considered it a shame to have spoken to; the man who, in all pure minds, stands as the personification of all that is large and beautiful in humanity, which is of no sect, no church, no religion, but is of mankind—this is the first true gentleman that ever breathed. How many like him have ever breathed since; how many like him are breathing to-day? Not one. How many of us dare call ourselves gentlemen after this majestic type? But there is not one among the meanest of us all who may not emulate this perfection of a gentleman, who may not hold the beautiful vision before him in the journey through life; and happy he who so steadily keeps it in view, and so steadfastly strives to realize it, that the light and beauty and glory of it may illumine his pathway and direct his steps aright and make him worthy of the name of gentleman.

Communications.

Open Letter to T. C. Leland

CLEARFIELD, PA., Jan. 6, 1878.

THERON C. LELAND, Dear Sir: I am a constant reader of the Index, TRUTH SEEKER, and other Liberal papers, and I am constrained to say that however radical the majority of them may be on most questions, whenever they approach the social question, they either fail entirely to apprehend the true elements of the problem or are so frightened at the ogre of respectability that confronts them that they dare not say what they feel to be true.

I have waded through a great deal of twaddle, bosh, and gush, in hopes of finding some traces of common sense and honesty, in the many articles on this question read during the last few years, especially since Mr. Beecher's "trial by committee," and more particularly since that miserable fraud Anthony Comstock has come to the surface, and have been so disgusted with the namby-pamby, sickly sentimentalism hawked about in the name of literature that I sometimes felt "stirred up mightily" to write; but then the thought occurred, "Of what avail!" If I write the truth, Abbot might not publish it (I formerly wrote for the Index), and to write a "respectable" article and smother the truth, for the sake of doing so, is something I have not yet learned to do. When I caught sight of the caption of your article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 5, 1878, I thought it was like David's Psalms, "another of the same," and was tempted to pass it by, but on glancing down the column I became at first interested, then astonished, and at last enthusiastically delighted.

Here at last was one man who, looking through all the villainous shams of false religion and false philosophy, saw "the naked truth," and seeing it, was honest and fearless enough to speak it. Your brave, pure, and true words impress me like the strains of Hubert's Serenade, after being compelled to listen to "Shoo Fly" or "Mulligan Guards."

When you say that "it is time that hysterics should disappear and reason prevail in regard to this ever-present and innocent domain of animated nature," you not only hit the nail on the head, but drive it clear through and clinch it on the other side.

I have often inquired why it is indecent or immoral to expose the person, or why is sex disgraceful? And the only reply that I have been able to elicit from the respectable lunatics who worship Mrs. Grundy, is "Because it is." And when I inquire why animals are allowed to run about naked, I am told, "Oh! they are not reasonable creatures you know." And then I wonder if reason ever had anything to do with it, and find in my mind a decided tendency towards a negative solution.

Again, I asked an artist friend why he did not paint the "female form divine" just as nature formed the model, and he replied, "Oh, that would be sensuous, if not indecent." And then I wondered again if nature was really so horridly wicked, or whether men were only idiots; and my mind was so "depraved" that I actually inclined to the latter hypothesis.

At the Centennial Exhibition I saw hundreds of exquisitely beautiful statues and paintings representing nude men, women, and children, saw elegant, educated and refined ladies, accompanied by gentlemen, examine, criticise, and admire these splendid creations of genius; and then I wondered again, and my wonder was this: Why should it really be any more immodest or indecent for a really beautiful living man or woman to exhibit the charms bestowed upon them by nature? I may be told that such thoughts are "dreadfully immoral," but it strikes me that "we have no more discovered what it is infallibly moral to do than we have what it is absolutely religious to believe." Besides, denunciation does not answer questions, or satisfy a soul thirsting for truth. Snubbed on all sides, I was compelled to study humanity for a solution, and I found it.

I may filly give it in your words. "Our morals are now and have been for centuries as much dictated by the Christian Church as our religion has been."

This sentence contains the kernel of the whole matter. It is the open sesame that unlocks the mystery. Priestly interference, dictation, and denunciation are not only visible in morals and religion, but they permeate every fibre of the fabric of society, every bone, muscle, tissue and nerve of the body politic. Nothing is free from the withering, blasting, corrupting, blighting influence of the Church. More subtile than ether, more penetrating than electricity, priestly influence silently steals into your home and insinuates itself into all the ramifications of domestic life. It even poisons the very foundation of being, and through ante-natal impressions, children are born into the world with the brand of superstition on their innocent brows.

The extent of this influence is simply appalling to a person who loves truth and humanity; and its power for evil is simply incalulable.

A priest stands guard over our advent into the world, gives us each a Christian name, assumes to think for us and tell us what to say and do. Not content with dogging us through life they must be "in at the death," and preach us into heaven or hell according as we have been obedient slaves and contributed to keep them in pampered ease and idleness.

Whenever and wherever you find any unnatural custom or law against which enlightened humanity rebels, but which is perpetuated and endured through ignorance and superstition, just take up the clue and patiently unravel the mystery of its existence, and you will find a priest at the other end. What excuse for existence can such laws as the following offer? The Sabbath law. Blasphemy laws law against a woman assuming male attire, or no attire at all—these, and a hundred other repressive and oppressive statutes. Just the same excuse precisely that the following have: "Thou shalt not see the a kid in his mother's milk" (Deut. xiv, 21). "Thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed" (Lev. xix, 19), "Neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard" Lev. xix, 27). "But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoreth her head" (1 Cor. xi. 5), etc., etc., i. e, the whim of a fanatical ignorant priest. "Only this, nothing more."

Some people are so "childlike and bland" as to suppose that we are governed by laws enacted by the legislative, construed by the judicial and enforced by the executive departments of government. I tell you nay; we are governed by the priesthood.

We have an army of seventy thousand priests, each a veritable Mephistopheles from whom no secret remains hidden, and from whose contaminating touch nothing escapes. Since the childhood of the race, priestcraft has burdened and cursed humanity. Thanks to star-eyed science, we are slowly rising from the mephitic atmosphere of superstitious priest-made morals to nature's plane of liberty and light, where the True is the Beautiful, where the Useful is the Good, and where that is moral which makes most people happy.

It is too late in the age of the world to make an indecency and a depravity of untrammeled art by theologic censure and cant.

The morality of the Church is a singular compound—the product of avarice, arrogance, and ignorance, and its fruits are disorder, discord, disease, and death.

Wanted: A better one. HARRY HOOVER.

Stephen Gerard.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER, March 9th, in speaking of the Gerard College, you are pleased to remark, "Gerard tried to establish an Infidel College," and "Gerard College is a monument to the nobleness of an Infidel." These statements are incorrect. THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be consistent with its title, must seek the truth, cordially acknowledge it, and candidly proclaim it. Gerard never was an Infidel; he lived and died a professed Roman Catholic. He received the last rites of the Catholic church, was buried by Catholic priests in a Roman Catholic church, near the alter, under the drippings of the holy oil, deemed the most sacred portion of the sanctuary. His corpse was subsequently removed to Gerard College. The information I obtained personally from Mr. Wagner, at Philadelphia, Pa., the founder of the Wagner Free Institute. This gentleman has been an apprentice to Gerard, a supercargo in his service, a clerk in his establishment, and on several occasions his confidential emissary to foreign countries. He resided at Mr. Gerard's house, sat at his table, heard him converse privately and publicly, and was familiar with his opinions on all subjects.

As some of your readers are probably unacquainted with my name, I will say that I am myself an Infidel, rejecting the divine authority of the Bible; and having said this much, I beg to add, in justice to my opinions, that I am not a Spiritualist, nor a Darwinian, nor a communist, nor a free-lover, nor a greenbacker, nor a silver monetizer. With regard to the existence of a God and a future state, as I know nothing, I affirm nothing, and deny nothing. My rule is to accept what to me is demonstrated, reject what is disproved, and hold in doubt what is controvertible. JOHN ALBERGER.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of Reading Matter than any other Journal of its class.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1878.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 39.

Great Jehovah, are there not many discrepancies in the statements made by the four evangelists? Does not this fact apply as well to the reputed time of thy Son's birth, the place of his residence, the length of his mission, the events narrated of his career, the works he performed, and the time and manner of his death and resurrection?

Do not the first three evangelists say that Simon was the first disciple chosen, while, on the contrary, John says it was Andrew, the brother of Simon Peter?

In the matter of his riding into Jerusalem upon an ass, does not Matthew say Jesus sent two disciples for an ass and its colt, while Mark and Luke speak of a colt only, and John of a young ass, but only one animal? Do not Mark and Luke state that the colt was found by two of the disciples, while John represents that Jesus found it himself?

Is there not a similar contradiction about where the ointment was applied upon his person? Do not Matthew and Mark say that it was poured upon the head of thy Son, while Luke and John say distinctly that it was applied to his feet? Are the head and feet the same in the language of heaven?

In the account given of Jesus' casting out large numbers of devils, which passed into two thousand swine, causing them to rush into the sea and be destroyed, does not Matthew say they were cast out of two men, who were found crying among the tombs, while Mark insists that it was but one man? Are two and one precisely the same in the heavenly arithmetic?

Is there not a discrepancy in the different narratives as to what Judas said when he betrayed thy son? Does not Matthew have him to say, "Hail, Master," then kissing him, while Mark says he said, "Master, Master;" Luke stating that Judas kissed Jesus without saying anything, while John states the event entirely different, omitting both the speaking and the kissing on the part of Judas, but making Judas to fall backward on the ground?

Are not also the replies of Jesus on the occasion given very differently? First—"Friend, wherefore art thou come?" Second—"Are ye come out as against a thief with swords and staves to take me?" Third—"Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" Fourth—"Whom seek ye? I am he. If, therefore, ye seek me, let these go their way?" Is there not too great a discrepancy here for all to be true?

Is there not a slight misstatement as to where Jesus was taken to be tried? Does not one say it was to the high priest, two that it was to Caiphas, and one that it was to Ananias?

Is there not a discrepancy about what was done, and what became of Judas with the noted thirty pieces of silver? Does not Matthew say Judas threw them down in the temple, and then went and hanged himself, while Mark, Luke, and John say nothing about the subject? Is it not recorded in the first chapter of Acts that Judas bought a field with the money, whereupon he fell headlong and all his bowels gushed out? Ought we to believe any narratives inspired by thee which contradict each other so palpably?

Are not the replies made by Jesus to Pilate and the high-priest very differently reported by the four evangelists? According to Matthew, did he not say, "Hereafter ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of God and coming in the clouds of heaven"? Does not Mark say that Jesus answered not a word? According to Luke did he not merely say, "Thou sayest it," and according to John, nothing?

Do not the witnesses disagree as to the number of times the cock crew in connection with Peter's denial of Jesus? Does not Matthew say it was "once," Mark "twice," Luke "once," John "once"? As "once" has the majority, and is, therefore, more probably correct, what becomes of Mark's statement?

Is there not a similar disagreement as to the number of times Peter made the denial? Does not Mark say "once," while the three others insist it was "three"? If the three are correct, is the one positively incorrect?

Is there not also an unfortunate disagreement between the four witnesses in reference to what Jesus was struck with? Does not Matthew say it was the palms of their hands; Mark, on the head with a reed; Luke, that he was struck on the face, but what with not stated, and John, with the palms of their hands? Can Mark be correct, if the others state the truth?

Do they not also disagree as to the words of Pilate, according to Matthew, calling Jesus "Christ;" Mark, "The King of the Jews;" Luke, "What evil hath he done?" John, "The King of the Jews"? Is not Matthew the only one of the four that names the choice being granted between Jesus and Barabbas, or any other individual?

Is not John at variance with the other three when they say Simon the Syrian was compelled to bear the cross, while he says Jesus bore it himself?

Is not Luke similarly at fault as to the place where Jesus was crucified? Does he not say it was Calvary, while the others say positively it was Golgotha, the place of the skulls?

Is there not a disagreement between Matthew and Mark as to the color of thy Son's robe? Does not one pronounce it "scarlet" and the other "purple"?

Does not Luke differ from Matthew and Mark as to the thieves reviling thy Son? Does Luke not say it was one of the thieves, while the others say it was both, and while John says nothing about it?

Is there not a chance for an error as to whether Jesus died of his own accord, or from the effects of the crucifixion? Does not Matthew say, "they crucified him"? While the others state as emphatically that "he gave up the ghost"?

Is there not a wide difference in the statement of the four as to what was given thy Son to drink at the time of his crucifixion? Does not Matthew say it was "vinegar mingled with galls;" Mark, "wine mingled with myrrh;" Luke, "vinegar;" John, "vinegar and hyssop"?

Is there not a singular disagreement as to the words last spoken by thy Son as he passed from life? Does not Matthew make it "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani;" Mark, nearly the same; Luke, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. It is finished;" and John, "Woman, behold thy son; behold thy mother. I thirst; it is finished"?

Is there not a marked discrepancy between the four divine writers as to the hour at which Jesus was crucified? Do not Matthew and Luke agree that it was the "ninth hour"? Does not Mark assert that it was the "third hour"? while John, to split the difference evenly, says it was the "sixth hour"? Were not these writers defective in being unable to state the precise truth?

Is there not a disagreement as to the words inscribed upon the cross, one having it, "This is Jesus the King of the Jews;" another, "The King of the Jews;" another, "This is the King of the Jews;" and the last, "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews"?

Is there not a disagreement as to what the centurion called thy Son at the time of his death? Did not Matthew and Mark agree that it was "The Son of God," while Luke has it, "Certainly this was a righteous man?"

Do not Mark and John widely disagree as to the manner in which Joseph begged the body of Jesus? Does not Mark say it was "boldly," while John says it was "secretly," for fear of the Jews?

Do the four all tell the exact truth as to who first visited the sepulchre with Mary? Matthew says it was "Mary Magdalene and the other Mary." Mark, that it was "Mary the mother of James and Salome;" Luke that it was "Joanna and Mary the mother of James, and the other woman," while John says it was "Mary Magdalene, who came alone." In a trial for murder or manslaughter could a prisoner be convicted upon such testimony?

Do they not also disagree as to how the stone was rolled away. Matthew saying an earthquake took place, when "an angel came and rolled it back for them;" Mark making them inquire, "Who shall roll away the stone? and they looked, and it was rolled away;" Luke saying, "They found the stone rolled away," and John, "The stone was taken away"?

Is not the statement about the number of the angels seen a little confused? Does not Matthew says it was "one angel;" Mark, that it was "a young man;" Luke, "two young men;" and John, "two angels"? How much weight would such kind of evidence have in a modern court of justice?

Do they agree any better as to the position in which the angel or angels were seen? Does not Matthew say he was "sitting on the stone at the door of the sepulchre;" Mark, that he was "in the sepulchre, on the right side;" Luke, that they were in the sepulchre, and "stood by us;" John, that they were inside, "one at the head and one at the feet of where the body had lain"?

Is there not also a marked disagreement as to whom thy Son first appeared to after his resurrection? Does Matthew not say "two women;" Mark, "one woman;" Luke, "two apostles;" John, "one woman," while 1 Corinthians, xv, 5–8, says it was "Cephas"?

Are we not liable to be misled as to whether Mary confided the fact of the resurrection to other persons? Does not Matthew say, "She ran with fear and great joy to bring the disciples word"? Does not Mark say, "They trembled and were amazed; neither said they anything to any other man, for they were afraid"? Does not Luke say, "They told it to the eleven and all the rest," while John makes Mary to say she had "seen the Lord and he had spoken to her"?

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

IN a late Crucible we notice the following complimentary notice of ourselves:

"D. M. Bennett, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is one of the greatest workers we ever knew. He generally commences at 4 o'clock in the morning and works till 11 P. M. He deserves all the success he gets."

We might amend this a trifle by saying that we have on a few occasions been known to lie abed till 5 A. M.

The Great Religions of the World.—Continued

CHRISTIANITY.

We will next take a brief view of the religion of Christianity. It is assumed by its devotees to be the best, purest, and truest religion that the world has ever known. It is claimed to be a system of heavenly origin, having God for its author. In fact, however, it is a borrowed system. It possesses no originality in any sense of the word. Its God and several features of its theology are from Judaism, but the great bulk of its dogmas are from the pagan systems, which have existed much longer.

We have seen that the birth of its redeemer of a virgin was far from being a new idea in the world. There are in the legends and myths of the old pagan religions, stories of some forty different saviors who came into the world by a miraculous birth, a large proportion of them having been the sons of virgin mothers and came into the world to save the human race by their lives and deaths. Nearly half of this number were held to have been crucified as an expiation for the sins of the world. The idea of virgin and child is a thousand years older than Christianity. The miraculous conception of the Son of God on the person of a virgin was held to and believed in ten centuries before Christ was born. An atonement for the sins of the world had existed a whole millennium before Jesus was said to be crucified. If God devised the system of Christianity, and if it is just the process necessary to save a lost world, it is at least very singular that he was not able to get up something original instead of having to pattern after those old pagan religions. It follows that God does not possess much originality in getting up religious systems, and that he old pagans were more talented and inventive than God himself, for they got up this wonderful system of salvation more than five hundred years before God brought it out.

Besides the features already named being borrowed, it was the same with every dogma, rite, sacrament, and symbol that was used in pagandom hundreds of years before Christianity existed. "The trinity" was taught before the dawn of Christianity—baptism, confession of sin, the eucharist, a belief in a devil, in a "holy ghost," in immortality of the soul, in the resurrection of the body, in fasting and prayer, in the second birth, in the ascension, in the cross as a symbol, in monasteries, and all the rest of it. Everything that goes to make up the Christian system is borrowed from preëxisting systems—not one original, new idea in it all. What a dearth of intellect! what a lack of inventive genius! what an absence of originality! And yet, the most enlightened part of the world looks upon this conglomerate system as being sent direct from heaven, and is simple enough to think there is nothing else in existence that has the power to save the human race from the torments of an endless hell. We are told that we must bow down and accept this mongrel religion and believe in the person who is said to have brought it from heaven, or else burn in the agony of intense torment to the latest moment of eternity.

If Jesus, who is said to have brought this wonderful religion from the heavenly world, had a real existence, there is no way of arriving at the fact with any certainty. There is no one who tells us anything about this wonderful personage, save Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and, unfortunately, we do not, in the first place, know much about them, whether they were reliable historians or not; in the next place, whether or not they had a real existence themselves. This is known: that neither of the books called the gospels were written at all, or known at all by the Fathers of the Church until about one hundred and fifty years after the time Jesus was said to have lived, and the gospel of John was written much later than that. We know, also, that large numbers of other similar gospels were written by various individuals, giving fuller particulars about the birth, infancy, childhood, and youth of Jesus than is given in those which have been handed down to us as the genuine. It seems to have been very difficult for the Fathers and bishops of the Church in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries to decide which were the genuine gospels and which were the bogus. There appeared to be no more proofs of divinity in one set than in the other; and in the scores of councils that were from time to time called together to decide this vexed question, and others equally as troublesome, the bishops and Fathers quarreled, wrangled, and fought about the great question as to which of those numerous gospels should be accepted as the word of God. On one occasion the novel course was adopted of putting all the rival gospels under a table and letting the bogus ones remain there, while the genuine ones were expected to find their way on to the table without human agency, but by what peculiar process we are not informed. On another occasion the matter was put to a vote of the frenzied rabble present, much as at a caucus or town-meeting, and some books were voted up and some were voted down. "The Gospel of St. Mary," "The Infancy of Jesus," "The Gospel of St. Barnabas," "The Gospel of St. Bartholomew," "The Gospel of St. Hermas," and several others were voted down, while those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were voted up and pronounced divine, though Luke was barely admitted, having a majority of a single vote. Had that one vote been lacking, poor Luke would have had to take a back seat and gone into the Apocryphal New Testament and been regarded as spurious or counterfeit. These decisions of what manuscripts should be admitted into the sacred canon were not amicably settled by these councils. Loud remonstrances were uttered and great dissatisfaction expressed. It was insisted upon by many of the prominent and knowing bishops that some had been admitted which were spurious, and that some were discarded which were genuine. It was not till late in the sixth century that the canon was settled, and even then there was much grum, bling about the genuineness of the New Testament, and the unfairness that had been used in making the selection. Even so late as Luther's time—sixteen hundred years after the reputed birth of Jesus—there was still a lack of confidence in the authenticity of several of the books composing the New Testament. Luther himself discarded the book of Revelations, the book of Jude, the epistles to the Hebrews, and had doubts about some of the others. Thus, we can arrive at a pretty correct conclusion as to the great uncertainty that rests over the entire books composing what is called the new Bible, or God's second will to mankind, or the codicil to that will. We will be very correct in concluding that every gospel and epistle in that collection was written by a human being, and that there are no indications in the books of any power or ability that ordinary human beings do not possess. Their authenticity is extremely doubtful and unreliable, and the story about the conception of Mary by the visitation of a ghost, about the birth, life, and death of Jesus is so nearly a duplicate or copy of the older myths and legends which we have been considering that the probability is certainly much greater that the old story was revamped, given new names and new localities, rather than that God was under the necessity of taking the whole thing from the pagans and passing it off as his own. We all have the right to form our own conclusions in this matter, and mine is that it was the old, old fable put into a new dress, and that God had ust as much to do in writing the New Testament, and the Old Testament, too, for that matter, as he had in writing "Aladdin and His Wonderful Lamp," "Robinson Crusoe," the poems of Ossian, the letters of Cardinal McCloskey, or the message of President Hayes.

There is so much that is lovely in the character of Jesus; he led such a blameless life; his beautiful teachings seem to have such a degree of perfection, that millions have learned to love him and to regard him as something far above the average of human beings. But he did not surpass in these respects Zoroaster, Christna, Menu, Buddha, Confucius, and many of the old pagan sages and philosophers that lived on the earth hundreds of years before he was born. Many of those, whom we have every reason to believe had a real existence, taught as faultless morals as he did, led as blameless lives, and were in every way as worthy of our love and admiration. Jesus is probably no more loved by the women of this day than Christna was by the women of India 2,500 years ago. He is no more revered by the entire people than was Buddha in all Central Asia, or than Confucius was and is in China.

Admitting that there was such an individual who existed in Judea nearly nineteen hundred years ago, is there the slightest proof that he was a god or that he was a person of more than human characteristics? The miracles reported of his performing could easily have been fabricated, as they have been of many, many others. In olden times nothing was more common than to attribute the working of miracles to demigods, kings, heroes, and nearly all distinguished characters. Every victor who triumphed in battle, every conqueror, every founder of a new religion, every distinguished prophet, was said to be able to perform miracles, and the same power was falsely attributed to hundreds; but the world has yet to learn that the performing of a miracle is possible. Every result that has ever taken place, every act that has ever been performed, had a natural cause to produce it, so it could not have been a miracle. A miracle is an utter impossibility.

What did Jesus do that was so remarkable? He strolled over the country, followed by a small band of idlers, some of whom had been fishermen, but without occupation or purpose in life. Were they now in our country we should call them "tramps," and would think they ought to take Horace Greeley's advice and "go west," and settle upon some of the government land, and go to work at raising corn, potatoes, and cattle.

It does not appear from the stories we get of the reputed Son of God and, as millions profess to believe, even God himself, ever taught anything very practical or useful. He excelled, perhaps, in parables and enigmas, which could hardly be understood without an interpreter. He attempted a mysterious, metaphysical style of instruction, but touching the needful, every-day affairs of life he had not much to say. He certainly brought to light no new scientific facts, made no new discoveries, introduced no new inventions, and gave no instructions in practical arts. He encouraged not even common enterprise and industry, but, on the contrary, by precept and example, he taught his followers not to prepare for the future; to take no thought for the morrow, either as to what they should eat, drink, or wear. According to his precepts, no provision should in summer be made for winter; none in youth and early manhood for old age. No steps should be taken in the way of establishing schools and institutions of learning for the rising generation. We should not put ourselves at all out of our way to make it better for those who are to come after us. Practically, his instructions, carried out according to the letter and spirit of them, would make the inhabitants of the earth mendicants and paupers. He was himself a mere mendicant, and imparted the idea that mendicancy is a virtue.

He said many beautiful things, as the many sages and philosophers who preceded him had uttered at a much earlier date; but he also said many things that were neither wise nor sound. His conduct was mainly sage and prudent, but on a few occasions he seemed to lose his self-control and give way to anger and pettishness, as was evinced in the instance of the fig-tree, which he found not in bearing at the season of the year when he had no reason to expect figs; also in the case of the money changers whom he rudely drove from the temple. He exhibited the same frailties and imperfections that are shown by other men.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

More of the Truthfulness of S. W. Payne.

In No. 11 of the Age of Reason, for March 2d, in which appeared many articles that had been in the previous number, the editor inserted the following note:

"☞ Owing to a serious accident to our forms we are compelled to furnish a few of our subscribers with papers this week containing a few articles put in type for a previous issue. The accident occurred at a time and under circumstances which made it quite impossible for us to otherwise remedy the evil. As the edition was nearly off, but few of our readers will have reason to complain—and knowing the cause, we are sure their judgment will be light."

The impression intended to be conveyed was that when the edition was nearly worked off, by an accident, the form was partly pied and old matter had to be substituted to work off the remainder of the edition. This is entirely false. We learn direct from the printer who prints the Age of Reason that no accident happened to that editon, and that it was all printed alike from the forms as first sent over. At any rate, we will give five dollars for a copy of No. 11 that is unlike those circulated, having no old matter scattered through it. In the first place, the old matter would not have been left standing; and had it been, and by accident a page or two of the paper had been pied, all the pages would not have been made up anew and the old matter mixed up in all the pages. But the whole thing was a falsehood. No such accident occurred.

In Seth Wilbur Payne's circular appeal, sent to our patrons all over the country and begging support, he gives the pretended opinions of different papers concerning his remarkable ability. He represents the Jersey City Guardian as saying that "Seth Wilbur Payne is probably the best journalist and most forcible writer in this country to-day." He also quotes similar fulsome praise from the New York City Item. To learn the audacity of the man, the reader has only to consult Rowell's last published Newspaper Directory to learn that no such papers have an existence, but were invented for the occasion. The same may be said of a pretended quotation from the Kinderhook Weekly Notes, speaking of "the pungent flavor and lively tone of Payne's Age of Reason." There is no paper called the Kinderhook Weekly Notes. He quotes from the New York Sun this opinion: "Payne's Age of Reason is the best and by far the cheapest Freethought journal in the world." We pronounce this a forgery. The New York Sun never wrote that statement. We will give ten dollars for a copy of the Sun containing among its editorials or original matter any such sentence.

It is only right that the Liberal public should know what base means this would-be public teacher is using to secure public patronage.

Soul-Measuring.

On Saturday evening last we listened to the first lecture by Prof. J. R. Buchanan of his course upon Anthropology, the subject of the first lecture being Psychometry, or Soul-measuring. He said:

"How the dog follows game, how frogs, catfish, and birds can indicate changes in the atmosphere, is not known; but by means of psychometry, or soul-measuring, we are on the track of these secrets. The science of measuring spirit is new, and so tremendous in its import, embracing and underlying as it does all education and medical science, that the present generation has proved too dull and stupid to comprehend it."

Then Prof. Buchanan experimented on the susceptibility of his hearers by putting medicated paper in their hands and instructing them to hold it and notice what effect would be produced. They complained of sleepiness. The speaker said that that was the effect of cannabis, the drug in the paper. Glass vials with liquids in also affected those who held them for some time.

The Professor promised that at the next lecture he would put an autograph of a person on the forehead of one of his hearers, and said that the character and personal appearance of the writer could be described. This was psychometry.

The third lecture of the course will be given Saturday evening, March 25th, and will be continued at Republican Hall, 23d St., near Broadway on Wednesday and Saturday evenings until completed. The subject is one of absorbing interest, and there is not a man living who understands it so well as Prof. Buchanan.

LIBERAL AND SCIENTIFIC BOOK HOUSE.—We are pleased to hear that in a few days an establishment of this kind will be opened in Detroit, Mich., where all publications of a Radical, Liberal, or scientific nature will be sold at wholesale and retail. It is proposed to make this the headquarters of the trade in Michigan, and as a full line of Truth Seeker Tracts and radical works will be kept in stock, our friends in that State will now have an opportunity to purchase nearer home. The establishment will be located on Griswold street near the Post-office.

LET it be borne in mind by those who read these pages and are not subscribers that this paper will be furnished one, two, or three months at the yearly rate; to wit, 25 cents per month. Send in your names.

B. F. UNDERWOOD lectured at Moberly, Mo., March 15th, 15th, 16th, 18th; Milan, Mo., 19th, 20th, 21st; and will speak at Nora Springs, Iowa, 23th, 24th, 25th; St. Charles, Minn., 26th, 27th, and 28th.

Obituary.

Another of our old settlers—a link connecting the past with the present century—is gone. Barak Michener, who died on Sunday, the 10th inst., was born in Chester county, Penn., on the 8th day of November, 1799. He went to Massilon, Ohio, when about eighteen years of age; thence to Canton some two years later, where he studied medicine some six years, teaching school to pay his way. He came to Iowa in 1853, and has since resided in Dallas county. He has been afflicted with pulmonary disease for many years, and his physical powers being exhausted, he died so calmly and peacefully that it was difficult to say at what moment life was extinct. He was emphatically a self-made man; he had no school privileges in youth, yet at eighteen he had fitted himself for teaching; he not only gained a thorough knowledge of his profession, but became a critical scholar in English literature. His love of the physical sciences and mental philosophy was passionate and unwavering; brought up in the Quaker faith, he was imbued with the reverent love of truth and honesty for which that people is noted. Nature was to him the Omnipotent; the processes of nature, the laws of God. From his earliest manhood to the day of his death he stoutly denied any external interference with natural law or with the affairs of this world; hence he was intolerant of superstition, whether old or new, and whatever its form. He utterly detested sham, pretence, and mystery. For the clergy he had little charity, believing that, for the most part, they know that what they preach of the supernatural has no foundation in truth, and that what morality they inculcate incidentally might be more efficiently taught in connection with and as a part of scientific truth. The modern gospel of evolution received from him unqualified endorsement, and his efforts to make it known were truly a labor of love. He had the moral courage to stand for his convictions, and he lived and died a philosopher.

The funeral services, on the 11th, at the residence of Dr. J. C. Michener, conducted by B. F. Underwood, were, from a Rationalist's point of view, the ideal of propriety and good sense. A considerable part of that incomparable poem, Bryant's "Thanatopsis," was read, a few verses were sung, and then the life, character, and belief of the deceased were portrayed with a vividness and truthfulness which all acknowledged, and which were truly gratifying to the friends and edifying to all who could appreciate them.

The body, in a very complete metal casket, was taken to the cemetery east of the town, and, after another brief but thrillingly grand address, was depostied in its final resting-place. In compliance with the expressed wishes of the deceased, he was buried with the head toward the north. On the west side is a simple but massive monument, set some years since by the deceased, on which is engraved, in addition to the date of birth and death, these words from "Thanatopsis:" "Surrendering up thine individual being, shalt thou go to mingle forever with the elements."—B. G., in Dallas County News (Adel, Iowa).

The following remarks were made by B. F. Underwood at the grave of Dr. B. Michener, a prominent Freethinker, who died at Adel, Iowa, March 10, 1878: "Our brother was worn out by age and illness, when death kindly came to his relief, touching his weary heart, and taking him from the empire of the living to the silent realm wherein he will rest forevermore. We are now about to commit our dead to the care of Mother Earth, in whose bosom he will sleep the quiet, unbroken, everlasting sleep of death.

Suns will rise and set, moons will wax and wane, generations will come and go, empires will flourish and decay, bringing hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, suffering and death to all who live, and the millions yet to be—for these are the common lot and heritage of man—but no vicissitude of earth, no event of time will ever disturb our brother's rest or wake him from his dreamless sleep; for his career finished, his conscious life ended, he belongs, now, to that vast realm whose monarch permits no sound, not even a whisper or a sigh to break the deep silence that reigns supreme throughout his wide domain.

What though the storm of winter sweeps wildly over him, or the lightning flash, and the thunders roll above his narrow home; what though the tramp of armies and the roar of battle shake his grave, or the earthquake sinks him deeper in the bosom of Mother Earth; what though the globe itself, waxing old, dissolves and passes into the great mausoleum of worlds, as our brother, growing old, died 'to mix forever with the elements' of earth—the great mausoleum of man—he will heed not, he will hear not, he will feel not these conflicts and commotions; the convulsions of nature, even a world's dissolution, will be no more to him than the decay of a flower on his grave, or the mouldering of the marble that marks his burial place.

The influence of his character and of his long and useful life will remain with us and be a legacy to the living of all ages as long as the race of man endures. Brother, farewell. Careful hands and loving hearts will guard and deck thy grave, and keep thy monument whole and thy memory green."

W. F. JAMIESON and Elder W. R. Cunningham are in the midst of a lively debate in Springfield, Mo. It is held in a magnificent opera house. Large audiences are in attendance every night. Great interest is excited despite the efforts of the clergy to prevent agitation of religious subjects. Jamieson and Cunningham have agreed to meet in debate at Joplin, Mo., in March, from the 21st to the 29th, and at Carthage, Mo., in April, from the 9th to the 17th.

NEVER do a wrong thing to make a friend, or to keep one. The man who wants you to do so is dearly purchased, and at a sacrifice. Deal kindly and firmly with all men, and you will find it the policy which wears the best.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER IV.

THE APPARITION OF THE CANDLES.

Quagmire of Bewilderment.—Mist of Contradiction.—Fanatic and his Cudgel.—The Lake of Unbelief.—Dame Credulity.

1. And Simon journeyed towards the valley of Repentance, and the thunders and the lightnings ceased.

2. And Simon began to loiter; and presently, seeing one of the great stones called Argument in his way, he had a mind to move it aside, and going about to lift it, he found it greatly beyond his strength, and it fell upon him and bruised him exceedingly sore, and he stumbled therewith and rolled violently into a certain quagmire.

3. And the name of the quagmire was Bewilderment.

4. And he wallowed about a great while in the quagmire, and began to be greatly troubled, and could not by any means help himself out; and while he was debating with himself what he should do, he bethought himself of his guide-book, and he began to read.

5. But, lo! as he read, there rose a great and heavy mist from the book, so that Simon could by no means see his way, and the more he read, the thicker grew the mist.

6. And the name of that mist was Contradiction.

7. And Simon began to be mightily afraid, for he had been told that when a man saw this mist he was in danger to perish, and was likely never to gain the bridge over the river Oblivion, but to be received into the caldron of fire prepared for the enemies of the king Jah.

8. And he began to weep and to wail, and pitifully bemoan himself, and to rush about in hopes to escape from the quagmire and the mist.

9. And he shut fast his eyes, lest he should see the mist, and put on his eye-glasses, but they had received great hurt by the stone, and availed him but little.

10. And as Simon bemoaned himself, he heard a voice calling to him, and, opening his eyes, he perceived at his right hand dry ground and firm, and upon it stood a man of noble and unveiled countenance, and of goodly presence, and courageous mien; and the name of the man was Truthseeker.

11. And Truthseeker said, Wherefore bemoanest thou thyself?

12. And Simon answered and said, Because I have fallen into the mire, and can find no way out.

13. And Truthseeker had a certain strong rope in his hand, called Rational Conversation, and he threw it towards Simon, and bid him take hold of it.

14. But Simon, seeing that the man was on the side of the quagmire leading away from the gutter which led to the city he was in search of, was afraid to take hold.

15. But the rope had magic in it, and it began to approach Simon, and little by little to encircle him, and wind itself about him, so that at last he was bound therewith; and Truthseeker well nigh drew him out on to the dry ground, and began to persuade him to take a voyage down a certain river near at hand.

16. And the name of the river was Enquiry; and it lead away from the roadway.

17. And as Simon and Truthseeker talked together, there came up a man called Fanatic, and he had on a great green cloak, and his face was of a gloomy and austere aspect, and his eyes, by continually looking upwards, had become about the length of a cubit asunder from his chin.

18. And Fanatic said unto Simon, Why talkest thou with this emissary of the evil one? Fly from him, or thou art undone; from his lips floweth poison, and from his tongue proceedeth the stings of everlasting death.

19. Then began Simon to tremble, and said unt Fanatic, How shall I go, seeing I am fast in this quagmire, and a great mist riseth from my guide-book.

20. Then said Fanatic, O fool that thou art, there is no mist, and the quagmire is but a device of our enemy.

21. But of a verity, said Simon, I saw somewhat of a mist, and it was a thick and a dark.

22. Then said Fanatic angrily, I tell thee, wretched man, there is no mist; and immediately he drew a great cudgel from his cloak called Damnation, and began to belabor Simon therewith, and laid on great and heavy blows, and beat him out of the quagmire, and laid the cudgel upon him without mercy; and Simon cried out amain and besought Fanatic to forbear.

23. Then Fanatic, taking Simon by the nose, led him to the gutter and put him therein, and having repaired his eye-glasses and dipped them in the mud and slime of the gutter, he made him put them on, and immediately Simon perceived that there was neither mist nor quagmire, and rejoiced accordingly.

24. And when he saw that the quagmire and the mist were delusions of the adversary, he took courage and went on his way.

25. And when he had traveled a little way, he saw another great stone, and the gutter made a bend to avoid it, and when he saw it he derided it, for by reason of his glasses it appeared small and of no account, and he said, I will not move out of my way for it, for it is despicable.

26. So Simon approached the stone, and the stone being so much greater and higher than his glasses showed it, he ran violently against it with his head, and immediately there appeared to him more than nine hundred and fourscore and seventeen waxen candles, besides two little ones which are not counted; and he fell down in a swoon.

27. Now the river Enquiry ran close by where Simon fell, and on the banks of the river grew certain sweet and wholesome fruits called Knowledge.

28. And when Simon came out of the swoon, he heard the sound of the waters, and became thirsty and crept towards the river and drank a little, and when he had drank, the waters caused him to be an hungered, so he partook a little of the fruit and was refreshed.

29. And, having lost his glasses, he perceived that the stone against which he had stumbled was exceeding large; and the more he looked upon it the larger it grew.

30. And while he lingered, and wondered, and looked about him, he perceived at a distance a certain smooth and glassy lake, into which the river called Enquiry fell.

31. And the name of it was the Lake of Unbelief.

32. And Simon perceived that the stone blocked up the way, so that he could not return to the gutter except by removing the stone, or else by climbing over it.

33. Then did Simon endeavor to clamber over the stone, but when he had clambered to the top his foot slipped, and he fell down headlong into another great quagmire which was near.

34. And this quagmire was greater than the other; and Simon could not perceive the other side of it, but after wallowing about a great while, he at last perceived that as he went towards the river, the quagmire became shallower; and going that way he perceived dry land, and a certain sluice leading out of the quagmire.

35. And the name of this sluice was Common Sense, and into it the mire of quagmire entered not, but only water.

36. And Simon went into the sluice, and followed it a little way; but when he perceived that it led to the river, and only to the river, he began to fear.

37. And while he debated with himself, he heard a great clamor behind him, and presently there came up Dame Credulity, and with her the beast's concubine, Fearohell.

38. And Credulity cried out, saying, This way, my son, or thou art utterly undone. Turn away thine eyes from that enchanted river, and come out of that accursed sluice, or the caldron of fire will indeed be thy portion.

39. So Credulity put forth her hand, and plucked Simon out of the sluice, and immediately she began to dry off the water of the sluice from him, and for that end she did use a certain towel called Cant.

40. And Credulity said unto Simon, Verily, my son, thou hast but narrowly escaped, for that accursed sluice has led multitudes to destruction, and the unquenchable fire; and few there be, who, having entered therein, have returned to our holy pathway.

41. And Credulity fell to again with her towel, and zealously wiped him therewith, lest there should be any of the water of the sluice left upon him.

42. And when she had done wiping, she gave him back his glasses, which he had lost, and bid him haste with all speed for the valley, for that Ahrimanes was in pursuit of him.

43. And Fearohell drew her scourge and laid on him.

44. And Simon fled to the valley, and Fearohell pursued, scourging. And Simon, looking through his glass, was filled with terror, perceiving that Ahrimanes was near at hand.

45. And Simon saw Ahrimanes, and he was like unto a great winged alligator, with eyes like unto blazing furnaces, and from his mouth issued as it were a raging tempest of flame, and from his nostrils descended as it were two noble rivers of liquid brimstone, the which falling into the raging tempests of flame which issued from his mouth, were set on fire, and gave forth unspeakable stench, and an all-abhorrent stink; and in his mouth, that great and hideous cavern, appeared great and all-devouring teeth, as it were a mighty forest of birchen trees with their branches lopped short.

46. And Simon's eyes well-nigh came out, his hair was lift up, and his teeth chattered together, and his knees shook, and his heart battered at his ribs, like unto a battering ram, and there was muttering in his bowels, and the sweat poured forth like springs of water, and he fled with the speed of a wild ass; and Fearohell scourged him, and Ahrimanes pursued him.

47. And Simon came to the valley of Repentance, and fell down therein; yea, he fell down headlong, even into the mire and the mud, by reason of his fear and haste he fell down.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Labor Question.

Mr. Macdonald Replies to his Critics.

On January 5, 1878, THE TRUTH SEEKER contained an article by me setting forth some facts in regard to the condition of the laboring portion of this country. I told nothing but a few plain truths, yet for that I have been abused as though I were to blame for the deplorable state of the average workingman. My article has been denounced in no measured terms, and for giving my fellow-workmen a little insight into the dark depths to which their own indifference to the schemes of politicians has brought them, I have been berated as though I were a "bloated bondholder," with nothing to do but cut coupons from my bonds. I do not purpose to reply to all that my critics have said. Much of it has been of such a frivolous character as to call for no reply; like a drunkard, its weakness is shown on its face.

That the workingmen of this country, and, in fact, of the world, are in a straitened condition in regard to their temporal prosperity must be apparent to any one. Being a workingman myself, I thought I could point out some of the errors of my class without being suspected of belonging to our so-called enemies. But it seems I cannot. However, I am not in fault for the truth being so unpalatable to many; I did not create the conditions, nor do I wish to force anybody to see with my eyes. I simply gave the result of my observation, which I found corroborated by that of others.

The workingmen have, in a great measure, only themselves to blame for the misrule which pervades our country, although they are not to blame for being to blame. They have in the past allowed their thinking to be done for them by their deluded and too often dishonest religious teachers, and now they are sitting in the dust of humiliation, bewailing their low state. Not one in a thousand has ever given the subject of labor—beyond getting as much for his day's work as possible—a passing thought. If I, by telling a few truths, have aroused them from their apathy and set them to thinking for themselves, my object has been accomplished. It matters little whether they agree with me or not. To differ in opinion is the right of freemen; only, let it be done courteously. Epithets are poor substitutes for argument; and the man who can do nothing but cry "nonsense" and call names had better keep still. It is too much like the arguments of Christians; the less logic and the fewer facts they have, the more ready are they to resort to slander and vituperation.

Several of my critics have said that I intended to throw a slur upon the land reformers. But it is a mistake to accuse me of such intent. For anybody who is laboring earnestly to better the condition of humanity I have a too profound respect to misrepresent them. A doctrine has been advocated by certain persons of limitation in land ownership; and one very eminent land reformer of this country recently published a book to show that all men should be placed upon inalienable homesteads of 160 acres as a maximum and 10 acres as a minimum. He is one of the oldest and ablest land reformers in the country, and I presumed him to be a representative man. If he is not, I have yet to learn of one who is. As desirable as it undoubtedly would be for all to live upon farms, yet there are those who are so unreasonable as to prefer life in a city to life in the country. For such there certainly ought to be some way of living less barbarous than that now forced upon the unfortunate laboring men of this and other large cities. I know of nothing short of an absolute reconstruction of society that will give justice to all, rich and poor. But any one who knows anything knows that a reconstruction of society is impossible to be accomplished in a short time; and, therefore, anything which will improve the condition of the individual is worth considering. One of the great causes of our present national affliction is the rushing to this country, during the last ten years, of so many poor Europeans, and their crowding together in towns and cities. Over-population produces idleness, idleness breeds poverty, and poverty is the parent of crime. It has been shown, over and over again, that the price of flour has an immediate effect on crime. When it rises in price, crime increases; when it goes down, crime diminishes. It is not the fault of the workingman that from his ranks are taken a majority of our criminals; it is the fault of the system under which he lives. The history of the laborer—whether a land-serf of Russia, a chattel-slave in Cuba, or a wage-slave in America—has been a history of confiding ignorance on the one hand, and of cunning, oppression, and cruelty on the other. Church and State have conspired to reduce him to a mere machine. He has been made to fight the religious and political battles of scheming priests and unprincipled kings; and he has done it, too, with a cheerfulness which could have been born of nothing but ignorance. At times, when the weight of oppression became too onerous, he has turned and struck at his oppressor. After each successive turning he has been a little freer—his soul has been a little more his own. But the grinding process has gone on, and we are yet far from being free. When it is shown that poverty produces crime, and that poverty is produced by over-population, it will be apparent that only by keeping the population at a standstill and increasing the productiveness of the soil, thus cheapening the means of subsistence, can absolute want be overcome. It is a fact that population, when unrestrained, increases faster than food. Should there be no restraint on the increase of population, and should a succession of dry summers occur, checking the increase of food, population receives a check through famine which it takes years to overcome. A scarcity of food increases crime, and crime and ignorance are twins.

In a very valuable work recently published in this city, Mr. Samuel Royce presents a great many facts in regard to the condition of the poor people. His book is entitled, "Deterioration and Race Education," and gives statistics of crime in this and other countries. He finds a tendency to degenerate among the poor of large cities, and especially among the inmates of crowded tenement houses. It has, in fact, been found by all writers on the question that crowding people together inevitably produces crime. A few years ago, a large proportion of our criminals were taken from the foreign population. Now, however, the American-born furnish more than the foreigners.

The immigration of poor Europeans has reduced Americans below their level. They have literally swamped us.

The denser a country is settled, the more criminals there are in proportion to the number of its inhabitants. In the United States in 1850 the entire population was 19,553,668, and the inmates of our State prisons numbered 5,646. In 1860 the population was 26,922,537, and the criminals in the State Prisons numbered 19,086; and at the last census, in 1870, the population was 33,589,377, and the number of criminals was 32,901. The number of native criminals increased during 1860-1870 from 10,143 to 24,173. These figures speak eloquently against the evils of over-population. The proportion of crime among the foreign element has lessened, while among the native element it has enormously increased. The foreigner builds himself up on the downfall of the American. I would not shut the foreigner out so long as the immigration is not out of proportion to the increase in the producing capacity of the country, but when it is, then there should be some restrictions upon the immigration.

One of my critics gave some figures to show that the criminals do not come from the poorer classes. I wish he could have evinced a little better judgment than to select agents and school teachers as belonging to the monopolist class; but as he was hard pushed for material, perhaps we must excuse him. However, I will finish the quotation he began. It is from the police statistics of this city for the year 1877:

"From the report of the Police Department for the year ending Dec. 31, 1877, it appears that during that period the arrests by the Police force numbered 88,239, as follows:

"First quarter, males, 13,618; females, 4,875; total, 18,493. Second quarter, males, 16,170; females, 6,151; total, 22,321. Third quarter, males, 17,568; females, 6,793; total, 24,361. Fourth quarter, males, 17,599; females, 5,465; total, 23,064. Total, males, 64,955; females, 23,284; 88,239.

"The nativity of the persons arrested was as follows: United States, 30,757 white and 1,933 colored; Ireland, 28,405; Germany, 14,390; England, 6,268; Scotland and Wales, 2,263; British Provinces, 1,494; France, 1,252; Italy, 973; other countries, 518. The social condition of those arrested was as follows:

"Married, males, 20,094; females, 7,439; total, 28,133. Single, males, 44,261; females, 15,845, total, 60,106; total, males, 64,955; females, 13,284; total, 88,239.

"The classified ages of persons arrested were as follows: Under 20 years, males, 16,229; females, 5,330; total, 21,559. From 20 to 30, males, 20,972; females, 8,284; total, 29,256. From 30 to 40, males, 14,832; females, 5,386; total, 20,218. From 40 to 50, males, 7,463; females, 3,828; total, 11,291. Over 50 years, males, 4,444; females, 1,471; total, 5,915. Males, 63,940; females, 24,299; total, 88,239.

"The principal causes of arrest were as follows: Abduction, 23; assault and battery, 6,899; abandonment, 578; arson, 17; abortion, 16; burglary, 906; cruelty to children, 80; cruelty to animals, 171; counterfeiting, 33; disorderly conduct, 18,812; embezzlement, 139; false pretenses, 247; fraud, 82; felonious assault, 707; forgery, 139; homicide, 78; intoxication, 22,942; drunk and disorderly, 10,128; keeping disorderly house, 270; grand larceny, 1,267; petit larceny, 4,395; larceny from person, 772; perjury, 23; reckless driving, 644; robbery, 149; rape and indecent assault, 46; receiving stolen goods, 219; suspicious persons, 3,186; vagrancy, 4,452; violating health laws, 401; violating corporation ordinances, 4,171; violating excise law, 5,388; libel, 5; violating lottery law, 205. Among the occupations of those arrested were the following: Agents, 396; actors, 80; actresses 13; artists, 31; auctioneers, 25; blacksmiths, 511; bakers, 601; butchers, 706; barbers, 284; brokers, 152; bartenders, 2,312; boatmen, 453; bootblacks, 414; book-keepers, 114; clerks, 2,735; carpenters, 1,033; cartmen, 877; clergymen, 16; cabinet-makers, 145; cigar-makers, 691; collectors, 33; drivers, 3,422; druggists, 49; editors and reporters, 108; firemen, 161; grocers, 456; housekeepers, 6,272; hotel-keepers, saloon-keepers, and liquor dealers, 3,100; keepers of houses of prostitution, 26; inspectors, 11; laundresses, 300; lawyers 151; locksmiths, 50; letter-carriers, 8; merchants, 544; masons, 678; musicians, 178; milkmen, 192; prostitutes, 4,602; printers, 1,123; porters, 403; policemen, 31; physicians, 114; servants, 2,234; sailors, 1,338; shoemakers, 993; seamstresses, 652; soldiers, 75; tailors, 882; teachers, 48; telegraphers, 33; waiters and waitresses, 950; watchmen, 117; no occupation, 17,540."

In 1877 there were lodged at the various station-houses in N. Y. city 96,343 persons, of whom 43,075 were males and 52,638 females. In 1871 there were inside of the poor-houses of the State of New York 18 933 unfortunates, and the causes which brought them there were: Drunkenness, 4,846; debauchery, 616; idleness, 873; vagrancy, 1,023; lunacy, 1,652; idiocy, 416; blindness, 204; deaf-muteism, 70; sickness, 1,327; lameness, 730; decrepitude, 427; old age, 942; indigency, 1,735; orphanage, 249; bastardy, 311; not ascertained, 3,058. The capital absorbed in the State of New York in insane, blind, and deaf-mute asylums, in poor-houses, houses for orphans, and hospitals, amounts to $50,000,000, and the yearly outlay on these institutions is fully $10,000,000.

Nearly one in thirty of the population of Great Britain are paupers. With a little over 30,000,000 people there are 700,000 in poorhouses and charitable institutions, and 300,000 more receive aid from the State.

Another statement I made, to which exception was taken, was that poverty produced prostitutes. I will quote just one passage from Mr. Royce to prove it, and then pass on: "It is the milliners, seamstresses, tailoresses, dressmakers, and the like low-paid occupations which force women into the path of vice. But one in five hundred cases was found by Dr. Langer, in which a woman in the better remunerated trades followed this low life."

In an extremely virtuous and indignant manner, one of my friends remarks: "I would like to know how a poor man, in a republican government, can help himself when gamblers and thieves manipulate the government." Would it be deemed relevant to the subject if I should ask this friend, Who elects these "thieves and gamblers in a republican government"? Of course the workingman has nothing to do with it. He wouldn't vote for a thief! He wouldn't sell his vote.

Let me quote just a little more:

"VOTERS BOUGHT LIKE SHEEP AT FROM FIVE TO FIFTEEN DOLLARS A HEAD.—Washington, March 2.—The evidence taken to-day before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, upon the charges against Cheney, Superintendent of Railway Mail Service in New England, throws a peculiar light on political management in New Hampshire. John Smith, a member of the Republican Committee in New Hampshire, living at Mendette, near which place Cheney has a farm, on which, the testimony shows, he spends most of his time, testified that three years ago the post office in Meredith became vacant, and he went out to see Cheney to get a friend of his appointed. Cheney was in bed, but on Smith's suggestion that his friend was ready to put up $250 for the election fund—a campaign was just then in full blast—Cheney promptly 'got on end in the bed and wrote to our two Senators that he had the place set up.' Smith's young friend, however, proved to be unable to put up $250, and Smith took his note, and paid the sum into the Republican treasury. Col. Money asked Smith what the money was used for, and this ex-Republican politician said to buy votes. Money asked how votes ruled in New Hampshire, and Smith said from five to fifteen dollars a head.

"Col. Money—Do you go into the market and buy them?

"Mr. Smith—Yes; exactly like sheep."

A great many of our politicians have been working men, and it was by superior sharpness—education—that they obtained the power to steal. Their opportunity was certainly created by the ignorance of their fellow-laborers. An ignorant people render corruption among politicians not only possible but probable. What does a hod-carrier, who can neither read nor write, know about governing a country? He can't even govern himself, but has to help pay policemen and judges to govern him. But his vote counts as much as that of either of my intelligent critics. I knew of a workingman, not twenty-one, who voted twice on the same day for a ward politician. I knew of another who voted for the same politician because he was treated to a glass of hot whisky. And I was present when a crowd of men promised to throw away their most sacred right because a man—a thing—put five dollars down on the bar and said, "Come, boys, lets drink." These are facts that I can prove by witnesses, although I sincerely wish that I could not. What kind of men are these to whom to trust the making of a nation's laws? You may say these are the exception and not the rule. Yes, they are the exception, otherwise this country would be sunk so deep in dishonesty and depravity that nothing less than an infinite power could save us. We should jump from the bog of political thievery but to land in the quagmire of universal crime. But there are enough of my fellow-voters of this class to render nugatory any effort the labor reformers may make as a body. They cannot, however, help our working individually. And perhaps, by persistent individual effort, we may arouse them to a sense of the wrong they are doing themselves, until they will unite with the labor reformers to better the accursed condition into which we have fallen through their own indifference and the trickery and knavery of better educated men.

My statistical friend has what he probably considers a sharp hit at my so-called Malthusian views, and denominates them Malthusian virus. Will he please tell me what he means by Malthusianism? Malthus had no "doctrine." He simply pointed out a law of nature, which "is the constant tendency in all animated life to increase beyond the nourishment prepared for it." Is that Malthusianism? If so, Malthus must have usurped the place of the old-time God. Again: "It may safely be pronounced, therefore, that population, when unchecked, goes on doubling itself every twenty-five years, or increases in a geometrical ratio." Is that a "doctrine"? Once more: "It may be fairly pronounced, therefore, that, considering the present average state of the earth, the means of subsistence, under circumstances the most favorable to human industry, could not possibly be made to increase faster than in an arithmetical ratio." Is there any "virus" in that? Now, these propositions, if true, prove the absolute necessity of checking the population. The question is, Are they true? But, whether true or false, they contain no "virus." Those who know the least about what Malthus really said are the ones who denounce him the loudest.

My friend continues: "It is also worthy the consideration of the Malthusians that the oppressed and defrauded, as by a compensatory law of nature, multiply most rapidly, and that in proportion as their condition improves, the tendency becomes reversed."

Now, the oppressed and defrauded, being ignorant, do multiply rapidly. When they are no longer oppressed and defrauded—that is, when they are free and educated—they do not multiply rapidly. That is exactly what I said. The question is, Is it best for the laboring man to "multiply rapidly"? I think no one, not even my friend of exact quotations, will contend that it is. He says that this "may be a just subject for consideration for the individual workingman," but "an increase of consumers would increase the demand for productions." He might as well stop trying to regulate the universe, and come down to one man. What benefits the individual benefits the nation. What benefits the nation benefits the world. That is broad enough for even an anti-Malthusian to stand on. One man with machinery can keep a hundred supplied with manufactured goods. Therefore, more goods can be manufactured than can possibly be consumed. But all the machinery in the world cannot produce a pound of food. Food increases in an arithmetical ratio; population in a geometrical ratio. Therefore, there will be more people to eat the food than there will be food to be eaten. At present, population is checked by famines, wars, pestilences, etc. I would do away with these evils, which are but the result of an excessive crowding together of human beings. Probably the United States can support ten times as many as it now does, the same as China supports its 400,000,000; but we should have to live as the Chinamen do, and I, for one, do not want to do it. If my critics do, let them.

One of the ablest of my opponents attempts to illustrate by an Indian's case, but, of course, he is mistaken. I don't advocate exterminating anybody. But if on an Indian reservation their was only game for five thousand Indians, and the five thousand Indians were already on it, it would behoove them to keep the Indians from a neighboring reservation from coming on and destroying or taking possession of the game.

Still another of my land reform friends says theology has nothing to do with the labor question. Is he sure? If ignorance has anything to do with it, then theology certainly has. How many priests will he find advocating his land reform measures? Does not a man have to be educated to see the benefits which will accrue by a limitation of land ownership? Theology and ignorance are linked together in bands of steel. The lower down a nation is in the scale of civilization, the deeper is it sunk in the mud of religion. Look at Ireland, at Italy, at Spain, at Turkey. All religious. Now look at Germany, England, the United States—those three nations together can whip the world. Religion has been driven from the brain of those nations, and it only lingers in the toiling brawn. Drive the dread phantom from the mind of the workingman, teach him to be free, and you will have nations compared to which ancient Rome was a pigmy. The workingman in the past has been frightened by priests, robbed by monopolists, and murdered by kings. Priests, "called of God," have robbed him of his mind; capitalists by the "goodness" of God have kept him poor; kings "by the grace of God" have kept his body in chains. Priests and kings have been appointed directly by heaven, and together they have made the laborer what we find him to-day—a puppet, a plaything, in the hands of scheming men.

The same friend inquires if I have no word of cheer for my fellow-workers. I should say I had. I have words of cheer, of fellowship, of friendship, of love. The sky at present is rather dark, but along the edge there is a little golden streak of hope, a little tinge of mellow sunshine, which may widen until it reaches even us. But our salvation is not in one little hobby nor one poor ism. It is everything; all things. It is education, science. Not the science alone of books and rocks, and trees and beasts, but the science of life, of humanity, of the world. It is the knowledge which tells us what true happiness is and how to obtain it. It is a knowledge of the laws of nature and how to take advantage of them and turn them to the use and good of man. If a man is floundering in the gutter, you would not give him a grammar to help him out; you would rather teach him the use of his limbs. In this sense I have words of cheer, because they are words of truth. But perpetual flattery is nauseating, and a man who cannot be told his faults by his friends has a great deal to learn, though he be as old as Methuselah is said to have been. I have yet to be convinced that the workingman is one of these.

EUGENE MACDONALD.

How to Organize a Liberal League.

ONE WAY TO DO IT.

Reader, do you desire to organize a local Liberal league in your town? If so, this is a good way to do it. Draw up a paper in the following form and present it to all the Liberals in your vicinity:

"We, the undersigned, are in favor of organizing a local Liberal league in the town of ——, and agree to meet for that purpose at the house of —— ——, on Saturday evening next.

"We each agree to pay the sum set opposite our respective names towards the ten dollars required to procure a charter from the National Liberal League."

Names. Residence. Amount.

When you have procured ten names and ten dollars you are ready for organization. Of course, the more names the better. I shall be pleased to furnish a form of Constitution when required. Reader, will you attend to this work immediately before it passes from your mind?

H. L. GREEN,
Chairman Ex. Com., N. L. L.

Salamanca, N. Y., March 15, 1878.

Letters from Friends.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It is my opinion that you need have little trouble in ascertaining that Seth Wilbur Payne, either directly or indirectly, got possession of your list. I am receiving copies of his paper with name, street, and number just as THE TRUTH SEEKER is addressed to me, and I have taken the trouble to ascertain in regard to your other subscribers here, and find the same state of facts. I knew him well when he was driven out of Duluth, where he published a foul, blackmailing sheet.

Yours, etc., J. B. B.

AVERILL, MICH., March 15, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: About two months since, I received circulars from Seth Wilbur Payne for his Age of Reason, and subscribed on trial for it. I supposed he had procured the list of names from you by fair means, as he would not be likely to get my name from any other source. I think there is no doubt that he stole the list; and perhaps he may be able to tell something about the stamps.

Very truly yours, F. D. CLARK.

CANTON, ILL., March 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In answer to your desire for information concerning the mail list, I have received two circulars from the Age of Reason soliciting my subscription for that paper, and, still later, a copy of the paper. C. C. Schwab has also received the same. I know of no way in which Mr. Payne could have got our names except through your list, as we take no other papers from New York, except the Scientific American, and I hardly think they would lend him their list. Yours truly, J. F. ROBBINS.

NEENAH, WIS., March 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: According to your request in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 9, 1878, I can give you the following information: I have received No. 11 of Payne's Age of Reason, and, some two or three weeks previous, I received circulars from Seth Wilbur Payne. I do not know where he could have got my address if not from your mailing list. Yours truly, THOS. JOHNSON.

CORSICANA, TEX., March 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You wish some information about your mail list of subscribers. I believe I can ferret it out very easily for you. When I subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER I was living at Wortham, Texas, but, by some mistake, you spelled it "Wortram." About two months ago I received a specimen copy of Payne's Age of Reason, directed to Wortham, but spelled the same way as you had spelled it, viz., "Wortram" How could Seth Wilbur Payne have got my address, spelling it the same way as you did, unless he got your mail list or you gave him my address? Use this as you wish. I remain

Fraternally yours, CHAS. G. NIEMEYER.

NEW LISBON, WIS., March 15, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that you are wanting information which may lead to the detection of the party who stole your mail list. I have received circulars, and also, a few days ago, a copy of the Age of Reason, from Seth W. Payne. They were addressed "H. A. Kruschk," the same as you address me. Now, the initials to my name are H. O., and Payne could not have got my address except from your office, either justly or unjustly. I wondered at the time that he should address me the same as you do, but thought you had lent him your list. I have always got THE TRUTH SEEKER under the initials of H. A., and never thought it necessary to have it corrected. But nowhere else can my address be found H. A. Kruschke. I think this is positive evidence that Seth W. Payne got my address from your office. Hoping this will help you in this case, I am

Respectfully, H. O. KRUSCHKE.

ST. LOUIS, MO., March 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Under the heading of "Information Wanted," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 9th, I notice your report of a circumstance that, in some "mysterious way," may account for the fact of my having received two copies of Payne's Age of Reason, Nos. 10 and 11. Truly you are receiving the lion's share of poisoned arrows from designing, miscreant scoundrels.

Yours truly, S. P. GILLESPIE.

CLINTON, MASS., March 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: For the inclosed money order ($5.00) send on an assortment of Truth Seeker Tracts suitable for distribution among the heathen Give us a good variety, and let them be spicy, so that they may quicken those dead in superstition and myths. Suspected long ago that your mailing list was in other hands, as circulars and papers have been sent me from S. W. Payne, and yours is the only house in New York that had my address. Yours respectfully, J. DOUGANS.

LINCOLN, NEB., March 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I inclose you copy of a letter to Payne's Age of Reason. This was written before I received THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 9th. I notice by it that your list was stolen about two months ago. I am not positive, but believe that to have been about the time that prospectuses, circulars, posters, etc., etc., began coming to me from Payne's Age of Reason. I then supposed he had been allowed access to your list as a favor. You are at liberty to make any use of this that seems best to you.

Fraternally yours, A. E. ROGERS.

Editor Payne's Age of Reason, Sir: Why do you send me your paper? I have never subscribed for it, and I am quite sure that I never shall do so while it is under its present management. I do not know how you obtained my name and address—probably from THE TRUTH SEEKER list. I had intended to send you the price of a year's subscription, purely in the interest of Freethought, believing your paper would be useful in that direction; but since your wanton and unprovoked attack upon Mr. Bennett, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I have altered my mind. You certainly cannot think that you are serving the Liberal cause by falsifying and defaming one of its most fearless and able defenders. I am at a loss to know your motive, unless it is petty jealousy. Your mind must be very narrow, when you should deem it necessary to pull somebody else down in order that you may yourself get up. Mr. Bennett is justly regarded by his friends and patrons as the peer, both morally and intellectually, of any man in the field of Liberalism. Even were this otherwise, one would think that a true and generous Liberal would seek to cover the faults of a brother, rather than sow seeds of discord and confusion in the ranks. The course you are pursuing would indicate that you are in sympathy with Anthony Comstock and the Y. M. C. A., rather than with Liberal Freethought. Why sail under false colors? If you belong to the Anthony Comstock ilk, why undertake to publish a Liberal newspaper? Don't send it to me any more.

Yours, A. E. ROGERS.

FORT LEE, N. J., March 12, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: I have read with great pleasure the sentiments of F. B. Parse and J. Petty. They are real truth seekers. Mr. Truesdell says he is not in favor of legislation for the benefit of a few individuals at the expense of the masses. That is a good sentiment, but the American people find that that very thing has been done for the last ten or more years. He and Margaret Chappellsmith are still worshiping the golden calf, but the people are going to destroy that idol. Are truth seekers believers in the orthodox faith? We hold it a great wrong that a few English lords are the proprietors of the soil of England. By declaring the greenback a full legal tender, the American people will prevent such a state of affairs in America, and we want the greenbacks to stay here. Let gold in any shape go over the world. What about stories of a big world's trade and commerce, when our millions can't trade out their labor for bread and fair living? Contraction has done it. So we want a legitimate inflation for the benefit of forty millions. Will Mrs. Chappellsmith and Mr. Truesdell read once more our history? We have seen the time when it was not respectable, and in some places it was dangerous, to be an abolitionist. Buchanan's administration opposed "coersion" strongly for the benefit of slaveholders. The Republicans took the idea from the abolitionists, and made "coercion" a fact, for the benefit of four million blacks. The press of the gold-money power call greenbackers swindlers and lunatics, for the benefit of bondholders. Mr. Hayes opposed the Silver bill, and a two-third majority made it a law for the benefit of the people.

What do you think of two thousand greenback clubs, and two hundred papers at present for our just cause? The abolitionist had not the tenth part of that strength, and our idea is going to save forty millions from slavery. Will you believe the slaveholders and bondholders were brothers? And that the State and the Church were for a long time at their service? The first has been crushed down; let the other beware. The people will wear chains neither of iron nor gold! AUGUST SEMMENDINGER.

BROOKLYN, E. D., March 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A few weeks after subscribing for your paper; I received, at two different times, a begging circular from S. W. Payne at 141 Eighth street, N. Y., asking me to subscribe for his paper. Paying no attention to this, I received a copy of his paper on the 2d of this month. It has been from the first a mystery to me how and where he got my address, and I came finally to the conclusion, that you, in order to assist him, had kindly permitted him to make a copy of your list of subscribers. Seeing in an article of your last issue that such is not the case, I am morally convinced that this Mr. Payne must have got access to your list of subscribers in some clandestine and by no means honorable way. Yours very respectfully, A. C. C. TAMSEN.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., March 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I wish to make two corrections in an article that appeared in your paper of the 2d inst., over my name. That they are mistakes appears from the text before the first and after the last error. 1. "A law all liquids and solids obey," should be "a law all liquids and gasses obey." 2. "The hydrogen will gather, etc., should be, "the hydrogen will not gather," etc. I am sorry and will have to plead negligence. The way you lopped Mr. Teed off was good, and he should be grateful that you let him down so easily. Yours very truly,

W. S. COLLINS.

SNOWVILLE, VA., March 17, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just read "Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures," No. 19 of "Holy Cross Series," and I feel as if it were my duty to warn everybody to shun priests and convents, and not even foster the class they represent, by suffering a child to be educated within their walls, upon any pretense whatever. There may be good priests, and perfectly respectable convents, and pure and virtuous nuns, but the odds are all against it. Power creates tyrants, and women, when wholly subservient to priests, become almost imbecile in their fanaticism, and so weak-minded and degraded that when they, in turn, have a still lower class beneath them, they subject them to all manner of petty malice and spite. Too blindly superstitious to run away, too afraid of God's vengeance being added to that of their convent superiors, the poor, innocent, helpless women are indeed objects of compassion and pity.

I confess the title of the book led me to fear it was hardly a suitable one for the public mind to feed upon. I do not say woman in particular, for I believe a true, refined moral purity is just as essential in a man as it is in a woman, and a book that is not fit for one to read is not fit for the other. But this book has nothing at all objectionable in it, being written in a perfectly moral and chaste manner; and the tale it tells should excite the sympathies and arouse the indignation, not only of every Liberal in the land, but of every Christian Protestant; for Catholicism is as fatal to one class as it is to the other, and, slowly but surely, the Jesuits are gaining ground in this free (?) and enlightened country. Thanks, many and earnest, to thee, friend Bennett, for adding this series of the Holy Cross to all thy other good works for humanity.

Fraternally thine, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

SNOWVILLE, VA., March 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I made a blunder in my letter of March 1st about the "World's Sages," by mistaking the number of pages for the number of characters therein described, which I hope you will allow me to correct. We had been re-reading the book for several days, and I got so enthusiastic over it that I had to pour myself out and let others know what a valuable treasure was within their reach—the lives of one hundred and eighty-six of our dead heroes, and ninety-eight of our living co-laborers in the cause of universal freedom, liberty, and happiness, and, last, but by no means least, the life of the editor of our pet paper, the beloved TRUTH SEEKER, which each new subscriber must of necessity be anxious and eager to read, so that he may know something of the character and doings of the enterprising, enthusiastic, and indefatigable D. M. Bennett.

And I would also take the opportunity to correct a typographical error in one of the hymns that I attempted to parody for "The Truth Seeker Collection," on page 309. The word blood, in the first line, should be truth. I have an intense dislike for the "bloody" piety of the age, and wish to eliminate it from our literature wherever it can possibly be done. On page 302, for "My Maker" please read "Thy Maker," as I am not accustomed to praising any such nonentity as a Creator.

Very fraternally thine, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

SEWARD, NEB., March 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have received sample copy circulars, etc., from Seth Wilbur Payne. I did intend to get up a club for his paper, but when I saw how he defends Comstock's policy, and tries to defame your good name, I would not have his paper as a gift. Please inform me how he obtained my address, as I never have written to him, and oblige, fraternally, ANDREW J. HALL.

WANATAH, LA PORTE CO., IND., March 13, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Having read the article headed "Information Wanted" in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER (March 9), I felt in duty bound to pen these few lines, stating to you that I became a subscriber to your most valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER; also, that I have never subscribed for any other, and still about two months ago, I received a number of circulars and a specimen copy of Payne's Age of Reason; the copy I have still. It is dated January 12, 1878. Seeing by the advertisement that it is published in the same building that THE TRUTH SEEKER comes from, I at first thought you had let him have your mail list, and did not give it any further notice until I noticed your article before-mentioned, and, according to request, I thought I would let you know. As for subscribing to the Age of Reason I would sooner give the money to some clergyman or to some colporter for a copy of the New Testament. I have shown the copy (Age of Reason) to several friends, but I heard the same verdict from all, and that was, "I don't like to read slanders or a backbiting sheet, even for twice the price." If this can be of any service to you, please make use of it, and oblige

Yours truly, PETER KUSLER.

MUSKEGON, MICH., March 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Allow me to advance an idea for your Liberal paper—which is doing so much good in the world—that I have long entertained, which I do not remember of seeing expressed in the Liberal papers; viz., that all the profanity in the world is chargeable directly to the character the orthodox give to the God of the universe, and they are, therefore, directly responsible for all the consequences; for when a man or woman in anger says to his or her enemy, "God damn you!" he assumes to invoke their God to inflict punishment on his subject more cruel than a human being could inflict. Now, if they, the clergy, had always represented God as he is, a loving human being, and unchangeable, it would have been no more wicked to have sworn by him than by any other harmless being. To say, "Dove damn you!" or, "Roses damn you!" would never have been thought immoral, much less blasphemous; so I insist that all the profanity in the world is chargeable directly to those who first blasphemed when they stamped such a character on God, and who have continued to blaspheme on every occasion when they have referred to him as such a being. And, sir, hell has been abolished by Beecher, and Thomas, and such preachers. I don't see the necessity of keeping up a hell. Yours truly,

FREETHINKER.

FRIEND, NEB., March 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 9th received yesterday, and "Information Wanted." Would say that some time in January I received circulars from the Age of Reason, and did not reply. A short time after I received more from the same place, and in the meantime had seen a copy of the Age of Reason, and a statement of your wealth, which statement I thought was intended to injure you, and I paid no attention to the circular, and a few days ago I received a copy of the Age of Reason containing circular. I know of other subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER who have received them, but we have estimated them at their true value. Yours for fair dealing,

J. W. GILBERT.

TOM'S RIVER, N. J., March 12, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: You have not heard from me during the Comstock persecutions because I could not offer you the assistance needed financially, but I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, most of the time, since it has been published. I have also noticed the misnomer Age of Reason, and have been satisfied that the publisher thereof (Payne) was exceedingly small-minded. You missed your subscription list and ask for aid to find where it went. Many of my Spiritualistic acquaintances take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I have frequently of late noticed that they had received the Age of Reason with request to subscribe for it. Among said persons are two of your subscribers and cordial supporters in this place. I take pleasure in enclosing a letter to said Payne, returning the dirty papers to the source from which they came. I hope you will give it to your readers.

Query: Where did Payne get so many of your subscribers' names? Yours truly, L. K. COONLEY, M. D.

To Seth Wilbur Payne, Sir: We desire you to henceforth understand that we do not read any obscene publications emanating from the office of the sub-agent of Comstock. Therefore you need send no more of Payne's age of lies and forgeries against D. M. Bennett, for they will not go down with anybody in the shape of a man. Persons must possess honesty enough in these days to stand on their own merits if they hope to succeed in any honorable calling, and not seek to kick down good and true men by vilification and untruth about them. This is the candid opinion of those true friends of liberal thought at this place, to whom several numbers of your age of unreason have been sent. The last numbers are now returned to you unread by any one here.

Hoping you will see the error of your course, and repent, and be baptized in the limpid waters of truth, and thenceforward do thy duty, we remain, Yours, B. AND B.

ALTOONA, PA., March 16, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Payne must have got my address from you, or through your office. He has bothered me three times with circulars, etc., but such a one I don't appreciate, nor will any one whose mind is evenly balanced. I find THE TRUTH SEEKER very interesting, and was glad to see Train jump the track. I only hope he has been ditched as far as your paper is concerned.

R. ANDERSON.

DEAR BENNETT: What has hydrogen above the atmosphere of this earth—and a hundred and one other things Teed has set forth—to do with Jesus Christ the Lord God of all creation? But he is so wrapped up in Jesus Christ that he will, if left alone, come out about as the old lady did at the revival meeting, when she in her ecstasy exclaimed, "I do believe Elder Jones is Jesus Christ himself." "Tut, tut," said a bystander, "you shouldn't say that." "Well, well," said she, "he is as much as Antichrist, anyhow." She was determined he should be some kind of a Christ.

Yours, C. B. THOMPSON.

KEY WEST, FLA., March 10, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: You say in No. 7 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that all those who pay for "The Champions of the Church" now are entitled to fifty cents worth of Truth Seeker Tracts. Will you please send me "The Mother of Harlots," for I paid you for a copy of "The Champions," some months ago. I may not live to read it, for I have been confined to my room by illness for over half a year, most of the time confined to my bed. I have to write these lines lying on the flat of my back. The doctor's say my days are few in this life. The Christians here call me an Infidel. I want to read your papers and books what time I may yet live. I sent Mr. Payne one dollar for his Age of Reason. I am now sorry I did so, but I did not know that Mr. Payne was a Comstock man. If I were to live a hundred years, I would not take his paper again, as I have no use for a sneak. I have been taking Mr. Peterson's Common Sense for several years. I used to think Mr. Peterson a straightforward, good man, and I took his part in the Stephenson-Peterson controversy, though thinking at the same time that Mr. Peterson had treated me somewhat scurvily over two years ago. I wrote him a letter to that effect. I received a postal card from him wishing to know in what way he had treated me scurvily. Although I was very sick at the time, I wrote out a full statement and mailed it to him three or four months ago. I have not received a word in reply to it. If Mr. Peterson received the statement I sent him, and did not reply to it, this is another scurvy trick similar to the first one. My first communication I am almost sure he got, because it was in a registered letter enclosing money. From what I see in the Common Sense, I think Mr. Peterson is a Comstock man. If he is for Comstock it is no wonder he treated me scurvily. I think all Comstock men are scurvy men. Now, friend Bennett, I wish you well. Go ahead with your TRUTH SEEKER, your books, and your tracts, for they are a great power in the land to pull down priestcraft, myths, and fables. Don't give that sneaking Comstock another chance to make a raid on you. Please send me the books soon. Make any use of this letter you may wish. Your friend,

JAMES PRICE.

WYANDOTTE, KANSAS, MARCH 12, 1875.

BRO. BENNETT: "The cuckoo builds not for himself," neither does Seth Wilbur Payne try to establish and build up his sheet of "squibs" by honorable and legitimate means, but would rather filch your nest of "two hundred thousand" golden eggs. This is a nasty business, though not "nest-hiding" but nest-finding, which in this case is most contemptible, as no such nest exists, for certainly no intelligent reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will for a moment believe it possible for even D. M. Bennett—though he has succeeded in making the best Liberal paper in the country—to accumulate this sum in four years' time by publishing Infidel literature.

Mr. Payne seems to think that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER (all of whom, I presume, have received his "only paper of the kind in the world"—thank the Gods) belong to the great family of Damphools. Last November I requested you to send me a specimen copy of Payne's paper, which you did. It was enough; I wanted no more. Since then I have received two or three numbers with circulars, and in order to see no more of them, I, on March 5th, wrote Mr. Payne the following:

Mr. Payne: When I want your paper I will order it. I do not patronize such men as you. Your treatment of D. M. Bennett has forever damned you in the estimation of honest Infidels, one of whom I claim to be. Mr. George Mack joins me in this, and wants no more of your papers. I remain, &c.

I have had no correspondence with Mr. Payne, I believe, and do not know how he got my address. He knows, and I suspect that you know, too. I see that Mr. Butts is about to make an ass out of a Horse(ch). It no doubt will be a small one. Truly yours, J. J. HUGHES.

ELKLAND, PA., March 9, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: I should rather call you the great standard-bearer of truth, for surely THE TRUTH SEEKER is a white-winged messenger, dispatched all over the land. Its mission is to dispel darkness, superstition, bigotry, and doubt, and to implant in the soul a love of truth, justice, and mercy. How dare the sycophant Payne, in the Age of Reason, thus attack you, the world-wide honored and revered advocate of truth and reform? When the first number of his paper came to hand, seeing that you welcomed and endorsed it, and knowing of some Liberals not able to spare the $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, who might spare the $1, I advised them to subscribe for the Age of Reason, and thereby aid the publisher as well as secure to themselves some of the living thoughts of the age. But when I examined the tinted circulars, and read "This is the only Liberal and Independent journal" and like claims, we thought sure he could not know of THE TRUTH SEEKER of which every Liberalist is justly proud. To our astonishment we saw it was published in the same building, and our ardor to aid in its circulation was at once below zero. We deeply regret that by his attacks upon you, and cringing to Comstock & Co., he has shown himself unworthy of the Liberal cause he has espoused. He will need more J. C. Miller's letters containing $30 checks than his printing house can contain, to establish him in the hearts of the people, as your faithfulness and fidelity have already enthroned you.

No, pay no attention to his misrepresentations of your wealth, arrest, and alliance with Comstock & Co. Do not sell out to any one, even were they to more than compensate for capital invested; rather work while your days last. You do not know how many times, when thinking of your herculean labors, I have wished you were but "two score and ten," that your years of usefulness might be longer extended. No, my brother, lay not aside the harness, so long as able to work in the vineyard. The world hath too great need of your services.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is so able in all departments we can truly say we like it much. O. B. Frothingham's sermons, and Col. Ingersoll's lectures pleased me exceedingly. May the manna still descend! Am glad to learn that Liberal leagues are springing up all over the land; they are as children that rise up to call you blessed. Truly,

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

Book Notices.

"Career of Religious Ideas."

Hudson Tuttle has been aptly termed, "the Aristotle of the Spiritual dispensation." Combining the demonstrated truths of science with the inspired revealments of the angel-world as given through his own mediumistic organism, his works have long held a prominent place in Spiritualistic literature. When the literary jewels of the now unhonored and despised Spiritualism are gathered up by future and more appreciative generations, few, if any, will be found to excel in sparkling brilliancy and glittering sheen the many-hued diamonds of crystallized thought bedecking the wisdom-crowned pages of the farmer savant of Berlin Heights. The library of no Spiritualist or Liberal thinker can be deemed complete, lacking any work of our inspired brother.

The work under review completes a series of three, the former two being, respectively, "Career of the God Idea," and "Career of the Christ Idea;" and, like his previous productions it is couched in language terse, compact, incisive, presenting the results of careful study and mature deliberation, on problems of the deepest moment, in concise and trenchant paragraphs aglow with truth and spiritual beauty.

After a brief consideration of the question, "What is Religion," we are favored with a historical review of the various forms of religious faith, from primitive fetichism, on through polytheism, pantheism, dualism, to monotheism; the origin and the merits and demerits of each being succinctly traced. The origin and value of sacred books, the Bible more especially, is next examined; following which we have postulated the fundamental truth, that "man's moral progress is dependent on his intellectual growth."

The great theological and philosophical problems of the origin of evil, the nature of God, the future life, the fall of man, the Christian scheme of redemption, fate, free-will, and responsibility are successively considered in the light of rational science and sound philosophy. Man's duties to God and to himself next engage our attention, the work fitly concluding with the "Ultimate of Religious Ideas."

The following excerpta clearly indicate the scope and character of this valuable contribution to the scientific discussion of the evolution of faiths and creeds and their ultimate outcome:

"Knowledge not only destroys dogmatism: it renders its existence impossible." "Every increment of knowledge threw new light on the nature and influence of the gods, and revealed more correctly the relations of man to his fellows. There is not a vestige of moral sense until the intellect is capable of comprehension."

"The religious element is fear, by which the imagination is perverted and reason enslaved. This is its ultimate analysis." "Christianity is full of it [fetichism]. Claiming, as it does, divine completeness and the worship of the one true God, there would be little left of it were its Fetichism stripped away."

"Man's ideas of God have very little influence on his practical morality. A Catholic, a Deist, or an Atheist may entertain equally elevated moral views. The idea of God is rather an effect than a cause. . . . If the negation of Atheism is reached, the manly boldness which denies the received dogmas of the time is guarantee of an upright mind. Atheists are notable for uprightness of character."

"Christianity has assisted human advancement in the same manner that a brake assists the progress of a locomotive. Its fanaticism forms a page of history unequaled in demoniac cruelty—in foul and malignant venom—in that of any other faith. . . . Outside of it, learning has thriven, morality waxed strong; and governments, upheld by the potent strength of justice bestowed by knowledge, chain superstition and fanaticism, and compel them to respect human rights."

"Evil is the friction of nature's activities working for eternal good."

"Ennobled as the goal of physical causation, emerging from the slime of superstition, taking rank with sister sciences, the future life, with its lofty ideality, reacts with irresistible force on the earthly existence."

"Obedience to God can only mean observance of the laws of our being. . . . Shall we live for the glory of God? Nay, for our own. The Infinite cannot be glorified."

"Man was evolved from lower forms of being and has progressed from the lowest estate to his present civilization by inherent growth, and is the expression of fixed and unchanging laws." "A creature of organization, and subject to unchanging laws, man, in the Church sense, is not a free agent, nor has he a free will. His apparent free agency is based on the combination of forces by which he became an individual."

Spiritualists, Freethinkers, Liberals, one and all, secure this scholarly and thoughtfully digested volume, peruse it carefully, ponder upon its many striking truths, and be ennobled thereby.—William Emmette Coleman, in "Spiritual Offering."

The Free Thinker.—Just as we are going to press, No. 1, Vol. I., of a new Liberal paper by this title is placed before us, published by W. M. Gill, Kirksville, Mo. It is an eight-page, fine-looking monthly, with sprightly, able articles. We will soon have time to look it over more carefully. Let Liberal friends all over the country give it a cordial greeting. Price, $1.00 per year.

Useful Recipes.

PLAIN CHICKEN FRICASSEE.—Cut up the chickens, and wash well in salt water; put them in a pot with enough cold water to cover them; add (for two chickens) half a pound of salt pork, cut up in thin strips; cover, and let heat very slowly, then stew until the fowls are tender. Cook slowly—if they cook fast they toughen and shrink. When almost done add, if desired, a chopped onion or two, some parsley and pepper; cover closely again, and, when it has heated to boiling, stir in slowly a teacupful milk containing two beaten eggs and two teaspoonfuls of flour; boil up again, and add one tablespoonful good butter. Arrange the chicken nicely in a deep dish, pour the gravy over, and serve hot.

FRICASSEED CHICKEN, II.—Having cut up your chickens, dry them in a towel, season them with pepper and salt, and dredge them with flour; fry them in lard and butter; they should be of a fine brown on both sides; when they are quite done take them out of the frying-pan, cover them up and set them by the fire to keep warm; skim the gravy in the frying-pan, and stir into it a half pint of cream, season with nutmeg, mace, and cayenne, and thicken it with a small bit of butter rolled in flour; give it a boil, and pour around the chicken, which must be hot; put some lard in the pan, and fry some parsley in it to lay on the pieces of chicken; it must be done green and crisp.

OMELETTE SOUFFLEE (FRIED).—Six eggs—the whites and yolks beaten separately—add four tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar to the yolks, a little at a time, beating thoroughly until they are smooth and thick; beat the whites until they stand alone; put two tablespoonfuls of butter in a frying-pan, heat to boiling, and when you have added one teaspoonful of vanilla to the omelette (having mixed the whites and yolks), pour it in the pan of hot butter and cook quickly as you would a plain one; slip the knife frequently under it to loosen from the sides and bottom—it is more apt to scorch than an omelette unsweetened; turn out upon a hot dish, sift powdered sugar over it, serve at once, or it will fall and become heavy.

OMELETTE SOUFFLEE (BAKED).—Six eggs, whites and yolks, beaten separately and well; add to the yolks by degrees six tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar; beat until it ceases to froth and is thick and smooth; the whites must be stiff enough to stand alone; stir together lightly the whites and yolks, add the juice of one lemon, and half of the grated peel; pour into a well-buttered dish, bake for five or six minutes in a quick oven; the dish should be warmed when buttered so as not to chill the eggs. Serve at once from the baking dish, before it has time to fall.

TURBOT A LA CREME.—This is generally made from the remains of a turbot which has been once served, but about four pounds of fish may be boiled on purpose for it. Remove the skin and pick all the flesh from the bones; put one ounce butter into a stew-pan, and when it is melted stir in one ounce flour; add by degrees one quart milk; mix well, then add one teaspoonful of chopped parsley, the same of finely-minced onion, one teaspoonful salt, quarter teaspoonful pepper, a little thyme, and a very little grated nutmeg; place it over the fire till it thickens, then strain it; put a little on a fire-proof dish, lay in some fish, then more sauce till the dish is full, finishing with sauce. Sprinkle some bread crumbs (made by drying bread in the oven and then by pounding it in a mortar) over it. Set it in a warm oven for thirty minutes and serve it hot. Any boiled fish may be served thus.

STEWED OYSTERS.—Drain the liquor from two quarts of oysters; add a small teacup of hot water, little salt and pepper; set it over the fire in a sauce-pan; when it comes to a boil add a large cupful of rich milk. Let it boil up once; then add the oysters, and let them boil three or four minutes; add two tablespoonfuls of butter; as soon as it is melted and stirred in remove from the fire. Serve at once with oyster or cream crackers. Oysters become tough if cooked too much.

STEWED LOBSTER, I.—Having boiled the lobster, take the meat from the shells and cut; do not chop it into very small pieces; season it with powdered nutmeg, a few blades of mace and cayenne, and salt to taste; mix with it a quarter of a pound of fresh butter cut small, and two glasses of white wine or vinegar; put it into a stew-pan and set on hot coals; stew about twenty minutes, keeping the pan closely covered lest the flavor should evaporate; serve it very hot. If you choose you can send it to table in the shell, which must first be nicely cleaned; strew the meat over with sifted bread-crumbs, and brown the top with a salamander or a red-hot shovel held over it.

SALAD DRESSING.—Beat three eggs well, add six tablespoonfuls of vinegar, three of melted butter, two teaspoonfuls of mixed mustard, cayenne pepper, and salt; cook as custard, and use when cold.

YORKSHIRE PUDDING, I.—Two eggs beaten well; add a few spoonfuls of milk, and flour to a stiff batter, with a half teaspoonful of salt; then add at intervals sufficient milk to make a thin batter. (It will not need more than a pint in all.) If it contains lumps it is not properly mixed. Have ready in the dripping pan, in which you have roasted your beef, two tablespoonfuls of boiling fat; pour into this your batter and cook in a quick oven, hot to the bottom, for about twenty minutes, which will be found sufficient to brown it nicely if the proper conditions are complied with.

CHERRY BOUNCE.—To six pounds cherries add three pounds loaf-sugar and two ounces bitter almonds; pour over two quarts best brandy; let it remain steeped, then bottle according to taste; the cherries may remain entire in the brandy, or you may strain away both fruit and kernels.

A Voice from the Other Side of the House.

BY REV. E. V. O. LUCIEN.

Fight on, Bennett, with might and main,
Against the Comstock laws,
Till they no longer blot and stain
Fair Freedom's holy cause.

Fight till the eagle of Free Speech
Shall burst her prison-bars;
Until the bigots cease to screech
At Progress' rolling cars.

Fight till fair Science doth illume
This dark, benighted earth;
Fight on for man, cowled in gloom,
That knew not freedom's worth.

Fight on, Bennett, for light and air,
For the dwarfed souls of men,
And rout the demons from their lair.
Oh, Bennett, wield thy pen!

Fight! The star of eternal Truth
Must light the abysmal space.
Fight on, until both age and youth
Unite in Freedom's race!

Fight! Shout Freedom's battle-cry—
Through ages let it ring;
Let not Science an exile die,
And Ignorance reign a king!

"Signs of the Times."

BY MRS. MARY B. FINCH.

This nation needs a vertebra
In these paralytic times,
When knees are weak and shaky
Ringing Governmental chimes,
And the dollars and the dimes
Tempt men to dreadful crimes;
And yet the leaders clamor
For the dollars and the dimes.

Does a schemer seek an office
That is fat with shining dimes,
Then the "dollar of our fathers,"
With its two, three, sev'ral dimes,
Sends its siren song of chimes
And deceitful, brazen rhymes.
Is this heavy, clanging money
But a hobby of the times?

They form rings to grab and squander
Our dollars and our dimes,
And they wring the taxes from us
As they ring the jingling dimes—
They so admire the dimes,
With their white-faced, lying chimes;
See the greedy vultures gloating
O'er the dollars and the dimes!

No tax on towering churches,
With their silv'ry bells and chimes;
But the hut and hovel furnish
Their quota of the dimes.
Hear the prayers and hollow rhymes,
As they pass the box for dimes:
"O Lord! convert the heathen!"
(When the children spare their dimes.)

Don't the missionaries scramble
For those hoarded cents and dimes!
The dollar is their gospel
In these speculative times;
And they use the stolen dimes
While they preach and pray betimes.
Oh, what a pious set we are
In the light of modern times!

How the mighty nation grovels
For the dollars and the dimes!
And the world looks on in wonder
At the lawlessness and crimes,
At the riots, for the dimes.
And we live in lovely times,
When the people's banks are pilfered
Of their dollars and their dimes!

Hasn't Uncle Samuel boasted
A score or two of times,
With brawny arms extended
To all classes in all climes,
"Come, share our many dimes
In these free and golden times"?
But now he'd like to kick them out,
For they send home lots of dimes.

Our Congress is a nuisance
In these wire-pulling times,
And rogues do naught but sneak and steal
The Governmental dimes;
Where a multitude of crimes
Ring out their muffled chimes.
And Freedom's voice is stifled
By the tricksters of the times.

How are the mighty fallen
Since the Continental times!
And Freedom sits a-weeping
O'er their hifalutin crimes.
Hear the echoes' empty rhymes,
From the red-tape-winding times,
When a nation hailed its natal day
With a hundred ringing chimes.

Shall freedom prove a failure
While we squabble for the dimes?
Shall we lose the sacred watchword
We so loved in olden times?
Gone, the spirit of the chimes,
And heroic mingled rhymes!
Oh, silver bells of Seventy-six,
Remonetize your chimes!

Where shall the people flee them,
In these dark Comstockian times,
When mails are robbed and plundered
By the sleuth-hounds of the times?
And they gather wealth of dimes
As they ring the Christian chimes;
But religion is a burden,
A misnomer of the times.

And this modern Inquisition
Is a nightmare of the times.
And a stigma on progression,
With its justice-loving chimes;
'Tis but a subterfuge for dimes,
With their jangling, wrangling rhymes.
Down with the dark Inferno
And these hypocritic times!

Miss Edith's Modest Request.

(From the Independent.)

My papa knows you, and he says you're a man who makes reading for books;
But I never read nothing you wrote, nor did papa—I know by his looks.
So I guess you're like me when I talk, and I talk and I talk all the day,
And they only say: "Do stop that child!" or,
"Nurse! take Miss Edith away."

But papa said if I was good I could ask you—alone by myself—
If you wouldn't write me a book like that little one up on the shelf.
I don't mean the pictures, of course, for to make them you've got to be smart;
But the reading that runs all around them, you know—just the easiest part.

You needn't mind what its about, for no one will see it but me
And Jane—that's my nurse—and John—he's the coachman—just only us three.
Your're to write of a bad little girl, that was wicked and bold and all that;
And then you are to write, if you please, something good—very good—of a cat!

This cat she was virtuous and meek, and kind to her parents, and mild,
And careful and neat in her ways, though her mistress was such a bad child;
And hours she would sit and would gaze when her mistress—that's me—was so bad,
And blink, just as if she would say: "Oh! Edith you make my heart sad."

And yet, you would scarcely believe it, that beautiful, angelic cat
Was blamed by the servants for stealing whatever, they said, she'd get at,
And when John drank my milk—don't you tell me! I know just the way it was done—
They said 'twas the cat—and she sitting and washing her face in the sun!

And then there was Dick, my canary. When I left its cage open one day,
They all made believe that she ate it, though I know that the bird flew away.
And why? Just because she was playing with a feather she found on the floor.
As if cats couldn't play with a feather without people thinking 'twas more.

Why, once we were romping together, when I knocked down a vase from the shelf,
That cat was as grieved and distressed as if she had done it herself;
And she walked away sadly and hid herself,
and never came out until tea—
So they say, for they sent me to bed, and she never came even to me.

No matter whatever happened, it was laid at the door of that cat,
Why, once when I tore my apron—she was wrapped in it, and I called "Rat!"—
Why, they blamed that on her. I shall never—no, not to my dying day—
Forget the pained look that she gave me when they slapped me and took me away.

Of course, you know just what comes next,
when a child is as lovely as that;
She wasted quite slowly away—it was goodness was killing that cat.
I know it was nothing she ate, for her taste was exceedingly nice;
But they said that she stole Bobby's ice cream,
and caught a bad cold from the ice.

And you'll promise to make me a book like that little one up on the shelf,
And you'll call her "Naomi," because it's a name that she just gave herself;
For she'd scratch at my door in the morning,
and whenever I'd call out "Who's there?"
She would answer "Naomi! Naomi!" like a
Christian, I vow and declare.

And you'll put me and her in a book. And,
mind, you're to say I was bad;
And I might have been badder than that but for the example I had.
And you'll say that she was a Maltese, and,
what's that you asked? "Is she dead?"
Why, please, sir, there ain't any cat! You're to make one up out of your head!

—BRET HARTE.

Cook on Congress.

In his Monday lecture in Boston, Joseph Cook, who has somehow acquired the right to wear the title "Reverend" in front of his name, said: "God deliver us from a pick-pocket Congress [great applause], a part of it drunk [applause]!" This suggests a prayer for deliverance from such flatulent and foul-mouthed defamers as Rev. Joseph Cook; but such an ad captandum method of calling on the Creator for the purpose of eliciting a howl from an excited audience seems very flippant, if not blasphemous, even to a secular newspaper, and we shall not follow in Mr. Cook's footsteps. The shamelessness of his utterance is emphasized by the fact that the only men who are reported (doubtless falsely reported) as having been intoxicated when the Bland bill passed were as violently opposed to the bill as Mr. Cook himself was, and, perhaps, as ignorant of the question. A correspondent who calls our attention to-day to Mr. Cook's language suggests that a speaker uttering so vile a calumny ought to be kicked and thrown down stairs. Probably this measure is too violent; at any rate, it is impracticable. But he ought to be roundly hissed for his extravagant and indecent speech. Mr. Cook ought to know that the "pickpocket Congress" to which he alludes is composed of gentlemen quite as honest and respectable as he is. The fashion of denouncing Congress as a body of thieves, whom it were disreputable to associate with, is somewhat fashionable among distinguished hypocrites or ignorant people whom they have misled, but a man of even Cook's limited sagacity ought to know better and does know better than to encourage it.—N. Y. Graphic.

The Innocence of Belief.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: I received your card last night, reminding me, as I suppose you intended, that I had not paid you for THE TRUTH SEEKER this year. Of course, I plead guilty, don't need any proof. To equalize this I send you $5.00 to include next year, live or no live, and one copy of the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

And as you are running a paper free to the investigation of all subjects, especially those of a theological nature, please let me know whether there is any sin in regard to belief or unbelief. It is very true that we generally all believe something. And we should properly examine the subject whether it be any sin or not. Our experience and our knowledge of history establish the fact that mankind everywhere differ in regard to belief. It is well said that there is a cause for everything. Now, why do we differ in belief? There is so much importance attached to this subject, religiously, that we should critically examine it in regard to that subject, to see if it be sin to err on that question although not on any other. It is seldom, if ever, claimed by any that there is sin or crime in belief or unbelief, or a difference of opinion in regard to the arts and sciences, or of the general business affairs of life. Of course, the consequences in which error may involve us are unavoidable and must be endured, but we are innocent in our errors, and cannot be held as criminals. How often a well intended effort to save life destroys it under innocent error! We are innocent of our errors at the time, or we should make none. Sin or crime has for its foundation knowledge and design. There cannot be sin without knowledge. This is self-evident to all who are capable of consistent reasoning; and as we do not know our errors, we cannot be criminals. We discover the particular errors that we have been in by knowledge afterwards obtained by investigation or experience, which we could not have had at the time. This leads us to believe that we may be in many more errors. Constantly discovering our errors confirms our fallibility, and of course the conclusion is, we may always be committing errors, but we cannot specially know them at the time; therefore we are innocent—therefore no sin. This is a principle on which all our courts of justice are established. Our jurists confirm the correctness of this principle and practice it. Indeed, to abandon or disregard it in our courts would leave us in a very indiscriminate state of uncertainty, disgusting to intelligent people. It is as much a province of the brain to reason as it is for the eye to see. We cannot see any more than the organs of the eye enable us; and we reason in accordance with the ability of the brain. The mind is as much dependent yn the brain as sight is on the organs of the eye. Mind is knowledge conceived, and reason is consequential on the brain. Our conclusions are in accordance with our ability to reason, when we resort to our own reason for conclusions. It cannot be consistent, then, with correct reasoning to suppose that a principle which all the ability of our reasoning faculties conceives to be just and true in the very nature of things, in which no intelligence has or can find an error, can at the same time be not true when applied to religion or theology. If it be impossible on any principle of justice to conceive that error, being innocent, should be punished as a crime in one case, how can it possibly be just in the other? In accordance, then, with the fact that knowledge is necessary to constitute crime can there be crime in belief or unbelief.

Let the facts in regard to the conditions and circumstances of mankind be examined with reason on this subject.

Experience teaches that to a very great extent people believe that which their training or teaching in the country where they were born and raised imposed upon them. They have no more control over their early religious teaching than over their birth. A person's religion is more the consequence of circumstances by which he is surrounded than of any action of his own. There is no avoiding this conclusion: although the child may be the same, subject it to the teaching of any particular religion, and the probabilities are that it will be a believer in the doctrines taught it. The same one, if raised by the Jews, Mohammedans, or Chinese, and becoming such, would most likely have been a Christian if raised by them. The child is not accountable to but subjected by the circumstances of its birth and education to receive his religious impressions. Before he is capable of volition on his own part he holds as sacred truths those ideas impressed on his mind by his parents and his country. Probably no one would ever have thought of the religion he believes had it not been taught him.

The different religions, then, are owing to the different teachings. Fairness compels us to suppose that all are innocent alike in their respective opinions. We cannot think that any of them believe they are in error. In fact, no one can believe he is in error. All belief is in consequence of what we suppose to be true But each one is apt to believe the others in error; and not having arrived at that philosophical intelligence to comprehend the fact of the innocence of belief, have waged wars and persecutions on each other, disgraceful to reasoning beings. But these consequences were on account of their errors. There would have been no one hanged at Salem, nor any one burned at Smithfield, had people had correct knowledge on religious belief.

We all believe in accordance with what we conceive to be evidence. No difference where we were born, or under what circumstances we have been raised; no difference whether we are illiterate or educated—there is no condition in which a being possessed of reason can be placed that he does not come to conclusions in accordance with the ability of his reasoning powers in connection with what he thinks is evidence or knowledge of the case. It is common for us to be in error, but impossible for us to know it at the time. Had we more knowledge we would believe differently. Belief is a sequence of knowledge. When we are erroneous in our conclusion it is because we do not know enough. If we were perfect in knowledge we should be perfect in belief. We should be more anxious to obtain knowledge in order to be true believers than to persecute others. What we believe is forced upon us by what we conceive to be evidence. We cannot possibly believe contrary to what evidence convinces us is true. The will and desire would often lead us to believe what the evidence forbids. All phenomena in nature demonstrate an exact or adequate cause of their existence—so does our belief. One is as insuperable as the other.

The laws that govern matter are no more certain than the laws that govern belief. If we could believe at will, would we not be fools to be in error? If disbelief, or what is often called skepticism, or infidelity, be sin, why is it? It must be because of its supposed errors. But who is the most likely to be in error, the assumed believer or the so-called unbeliever? The believer is often too credulous and is more liable to imposition and to be in error than he who doubts and examines more carefully before he adopts an opinion. If error is sin, the probabilities are that the believer is the greater sinner. But the facts are, neither are sinners, neither knowing his errors; and which one is the unbeliever, when each believes all he can under the circumstances. We always believe what to us appears true. We cannot believe a lie as such, that is to believe a lie to be truth. We should ask no reward for believing what the evidences to our senses compel us, because it is no merit in us. Neither should we be condemned for not believing that which the evidence to us fails to convince.

The improvement of the times in consequence of the increase of liberal views seems to indicate that the time is not far distant when these facts will be more understood, will be appreciated and practiced to the great benefit of mankind. The bloody sword of religious contention can be laid away as of no use under the reign which decrees that mental freedom is no sin, but a natural right.

We should punish for improper conduct from necessity, to protect virtue and maintain our common rights, to keep society in good order, but cease our persecution for a difference of belief. S. WEST.

Bushnell, Ill.

KANSAS LAND FOR SALE.

Eighty and one hundred and sixty acres of Kansas land. Soil of the BEST QUALITY; TIMBER AND RUNNING WATER. Well adapted for Stock Raising. Address

G. H. KRUSCHKE,
4t12 Davenport, Iowa.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF

CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact fac simile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is in England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on live issues with a promptitude unequaled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest, cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers.

The following are a few of the contributors: Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, Goldwin Smith, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Lionel A. Tallemache, M. E. Grant Duff, M. P., Hon. Robert Lowe, Leslie Stephen, John Morley (the editor), G. H. Lewes, Alfred R. Wallace, Frederick Harrison, Prof. Tyndall, Prof. Huxley, Prof. Darwin, Prof. Clifford (author of supernatural religion), Sir John Lubbock, Anthony Trollope, T. Adolphus Trollope, Sir H. S. Maine, Sir David Wedderburn, and numerous others.

Published every month.

Rose-Belford Publishing Co.,
tf 60 York St, Toronto, Ont.

Subscription Price, $5.00 per year.

JUST OUT!

AURICULAR CONFESSION AND Popish Nunneries.

BY WM. HOGAN,

Twenty-five years Confessing Priest. A very interesting work. 220 pages. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine. 177

NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.

THE

Great Magnetic Remedy.

DO YOU SMOKE?
DO YOU CHEW?
DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective. Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed we warrant the REMEDY to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.

Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.

Address,
J. A. HEINSOHN & CO., Manufacturers,
918 CLEVELAND, OHIO.

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE. Truly one of the most valuable works that have appeare within the last ten years. By PROF. DRAPER. Price, $1.75.

The Career of Religious Ideas;

THEIR ULTIMATE,

The Religion of Science.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

An able examination of the Religions of the World—the subjects treated as follows: Chap. I.—Introductory; Chap. II.—What is Religion? Chap. III.—Fetishism; Chap. IV.—Polytheism; Chap. V.—Monotheism; Chap. VI.—Value of Ancient Bibles; Chap. VII.—Man's Moral Progress Dependent upon his Intellectual Growth; Chap. VIII.—Theological Problems; Chap. IX.—Man's Fall; Chap. X.—Free Will, Necessity, Responsibility; Chap. XI.—Duties and Obligations of Man to God; Chap. XII—The Ultimate of Religious Ideas.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents. Postage prepaid. D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

The Popes and Their Doings.

NO. 3 OF THE "HOLY CROSS SERIES."

Being brief stories of fully one hundred and fifty of the conspicuous and sinful Popes—the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God—who filled the chair of the Holy See in Rome during several centuries. The cheapest and most popular history of the Popes ever written. A friend styles it "rich, rare and racy." 273 pp., 12mo. Sent by mail at the very low price of 50 cents in paper; 75 cents in cloth.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

POSITIVELY

$50 WOHTH OF INFORMATION

in form of a nice book of over 100 pages, well illustrated, sent post-paid, for $1.00

BY A PRACTICAL CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep the hens and hen-roosts free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in mid-winter. How to manage setting hens, chickens, etc., and how to preserve eggs a great length of time. Best breeds of hens, etc. Enclose $1.00 with order.

E. D. BLAKEMAN, Circleville, Ohio.

[Mr. Blakeman is a school-boy friend of ours. We know him well; he is entirely reliable, and the information he has to impart upon the poultry subject is valuable.—ED. T. S.] 91f

TWO BOOKS ON FINANCE.

SPECIFIC PAYMENTS BETTER THAN SPECIE PAYMENTS.

BY EDWARD D. LINTON.

CONVERSATIONS ON THE CURRENCY.

BY EDW'D D. LINTON AND GEO. D. DRURY.

The question to be met and settled now is, Shall money continue to rule and curse mankind, or shall it be made to serve and bless?

Price 25c. For sale at this office.

The Priest in Absolution,

The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

☞ The twenty-five other numbers of the "Holy Cross Series" are being brought out as rapidly as possible.

BOOKS FOR THE THOUGHTFUL.

AGE OF REASON, AND EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Being an investigation of True and Fabulous Theology. By THOMAS PAINE, author of "The Rights of Man," "Crisis," "Common Sense," etc. With an Essay on his Character and Services, by G. J. HOLYOAKE. 12mo, 130 pp. Postpaid, paper, 50c.; cloth, 60c.

SECULARISTS' MANUAL OF SONGS AND CEREMONIES, for use at Marriages, Funerals, etc. Edited by AUSTIN HOLYOAKE and CHARLES WATTS. Flexible cloth, 12mo, 128 pp. Postpaid, 50 cts.

SERMONS. By J. W. CHADWICK. Postpaid, 6c. "Best Use of Sunday," "God On Our Side," "Higher Reverence," "Economy and Waste," "Self-Respect," "Immortal Life," "Rational Church," "Belief in Immortality," "The Coming Man," "Essential Piety of Modern Science," "Simplicity of Religion."

MUSIC IN THE WESTERN CHURCH: A Lecture on the History of Psalmody, illustrated with examples of the Music of various periods. By WM. A. LEONARD, author of "The Christmas Festival," etc. Flex. clo., 89 pp., 75c.

THE CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY AND CUSTOMS. Together with a Selection of Carols. By WILLIAM A. LEONARD, author of "Hindu Thought," etc. Flexible clo., 56 pp., gilt side-stamp, 50 cts.

ENGLISH PAMPHLETS.

(Postpaid.)

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Inspiration of the Bible: A Reply to the Bishop of Lincoln, 25c
Cromwell and Washington, A Contrast, 25c
Autobiography of Bradlaugh, with his Portrait, 10c
George the Prince of Wales, with Recent Contrasts and Coincidences, 10c
American Politics, 10c
What is Secularism? And What Can It Do for a Man that Christianity Cannot? 5c
Letter to E. V. Kenealy, M. P., 5c

BY CHARLES WATTS.

Discussion with Rev. Alex. Stewart of Aberdeen, on the Question, "Is the Belief in the Being of an Infinite Personal God Reasonable?" and "Are the Four Gospels Authentic and Worthy of Credit?" 50c
Christian Evidences Criticised: Origin of Christianity, Historical Value of New Testament, Miracles, Prophecies, The Practical Value of Christianity, The Progress of the Christian Religion, each 5c, or bound in one pamphlet, 35c
Letters on Taxation of the Land, and Miscellaneous Poems, by Edwin Burgess, 50c

IRON-CLAD AND MANNA SERIES.

IRON-CLAD SERIES.

No.		Cts.
1	Atonement. Charles Bradlaugh,	5
2	Secular Responsibility. G. J. Holyoake,	5
4	Influence of Christianity on Civilization. Underwood,	25
5	Gleanings from Parker, Frothingham, Voysey, and others. Winans. Ea.,	10
6	Miscellaneous "Index" Tracts.	10
7	Buddhist Nihilism. Prof. Max Mueller,	10
8	Religion of Inhumanity. F. Harrison,	20
9	Relation of Witchcraft to Religion. Lyall,	15
10	Epidemic Delusions. Marvin. Cloth,	50
11	Philosophy of Spiritualism. Marvin,	50
12	Tyndall's Belfast Inaugural, and Portrait,	15
13	Essay on Miracles. David Hume,	10
14	Land Question. Charles Bradlaugh,	5
15	Were Adam and Eve our First Parents? Charles Bradlaugh,	5
16	Why do Men Starve? Chas. Bradlaugh,	5
17	Logic of Life, Deduced from the Principle of Freethought. George J. Holyoake,	10
18	A Plea for Atheism. Chas. Bradlaugh,	10
19	Large or Small Families? A. Holyoake,	5
20	Superstition Displayed, with a Letter of Wm. Pitt. Austin Holyoake,	5
21	Defense of Secular Principles. C. Watts,	5
22	Is the Bible Reliable? Charles Watts,	5
23	The Christian Deity. Charles Watts,	5
24	Moral Value of the Bible. Chas. Watts,	5
25	Free Thought and Mod. Progress. Watts,	5
26	Christianity: Its Nature, and Influence on Civilization. Charles Watts,	5
27	Essays Before Free Relig. Ass'n. 1873,	35
28	Thoughts on Atheism. Austin Holyoake,	5
29	Is there a Moral Governor of the Universe? Austin Holyoake,	5
30	Philosophy of Secularism. Chas. Watts,	5
31	Has Man a Soul? Charles Bradlaugh,	5
38	Is there a God? Charles Bradlaugh,	5
39	Labor's Prayer. Charles Bradlaugh,	5
40	Poverty: Its Cause and Cure. M. G. H.,	10
41	Miscellaneous Sermons. Frothingham,	10
42	Science and Bible Antagonistic. Watts,	10
43	Christian Scheme of Redemption. Watts	5
44	Logic of Death; or, Why Should the Atheist Fear to Die. George J. Holyoake,	10
47	Poverty: Its Effects on the Political Condition of the People. Bradlaugh,	5

MANNA SERIES.

No.		Cts.
1	Original Manna for "God's chosen,"	5
2	B. F. Underwood's Prayer, per dozen,	10
3	New Life of David. Chas. Bradlaugh,	5
4	Why I was Excommunicated. Barnard,	20
5	200 Questions Without Answers,	5
6	Dialogue between a Christian Missionary and a Chinese Mandarin,	10
7	Queries Submitted to the Bench of Bishops by a Weak but Zealous Christian,	10
8	Search After Heaven and Hell. A. Holyoake,	5
9	New Life of Jonah. Chas. Bradlaugh,	5
10	A Few Words about the Devil, "	5
11	New Life of Jacob, "	5
12	Daniel, the Dreamer. Austin Holyoake,	10
13	Specimen of the Bible: Esther, "	10
14	Acts of the Apostles: A Farce, "	10
15	Ludicrous Aspects of Christianity, "	10
16	Twelve Apostles. Charles Bradlaugh,	5
17	Who Was Jesus Christ? "	5
18	What Did Jesus Teach? "	5
19	New Life of Abraham, "	5
20	New Life of Moses. "	5
21	A Secular Prayer. A. Holyoake. Per doz.	10

All postpaid. For $2 we will send to one address $2.25 worth, and $6 worth for $5. Special discounts to the trade.

CHARLES P. SOMERBY,
PUBLISHER, BOOKSELLER, IMPORTER AND PRINTER,
139 EIGHTH ST. (Between Broadway and Fourth Avenue), NEW YORK.

THE MAGNETIC TREATMENT.

Send 25 cents to DR. ANDREW STONE, Troy, N. Y., and obtain a large, highly-illustrated book on the system of Vitalizing Treatment. Also The New Gospel of Health for $1.25, a masterly work on progressive medicine and healing by magnetism, 519 pages, illustrated with 120 cuts for personal manipulations, explanatory of the sublime science of healing without medicine. 1y5

"PATRIOTIC WAVERS!" The old, bright and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," the "FAMILY FAVORITE" and home paper for THE MILLION. Established 1865. There's nothing like it. Old and young, rich and poor, saint and sinner,—"it's true for ALL." It is a large 8-column, 8 page paper, crowded with charming Tales, Sketches, Stories, Poems, Wit, Humor, Fun, Recipes, Puzzles, Humorous Poems, etc., etc. In its "ROGUE'S CORNER," every Swindler, Quack, Humbug, and Fraud is fully, freely, and truthfully exposed. No one can be swindled who reads the "BANNER." 100,000 people read and rely upon this National Paper. TRY IT ONCE AND YOU ... Only 75 cents a year, or with Premium of SIX Charming Chromos, or 8 free Dictionaries, only $1. Trial Trip, three months, 15 cents. Specimens FREE. Don't put it off but SEND NOW. Address, "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

ASTROLOGY.

PROF. LISTER, Astrologer, 505 W. 23d st., New York. 44 years' practice, 27 in Boston. Can be consulted by letter. Send for Circular. Address all letters 505 West 23d st., New York City.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COLLECTION

OF

FORMS, HYMNS, AND RECITATIONS.

Forms for organizing Societies, Forms for Constitutions and By-laws, for Funeral Services, Marriage Services, Naming of Infants, Obituary Notices, Epitaphs, Wills, etc. Also, nearly 500 Liberal and Spiritualistic Hymns, original and selected; for Public Meetings, Funerals, Social Gatherings, etc., etc. The whole supplemented by a fine selection of Recitations, comprising many of the finest poetical gems in the language. Nearly 600 pages, at the extremely low price of 75 cents in cloth. The price is made low, so that every family can have a copy. Let none fail to have it. D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

BROUGHTONS
INVIGORATING
SYRUP 25 CTS.

A certain cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Stomach, Liver or Kidney Diseases, Weakness, &c. 25 cents per bottle. Incurable cases solicited and cured or money refunded. The same ingredients put up in powders to be sent by mail. Sample bottle, circular, and 2615
Advice Free, 495 Broome St., N. Y.

READER, that little cottage contains one of the choicest libraries in the country. I buy my books of J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole, Bronson, Mich. Rare O. P. works a specialty. Lists for stamp. 3m1

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

Address D. M. BENNETT, Publisher
141 Eighth St., New York.

DO YOU WANT Books, Cards, Prints, Chromos, Photographs, Albums, Gold Pens, Pencils, Paper, Stationary, Knick-knacks, Notions, Novelties of every description? Bargains of unrivalled nature—send 10c—send only to the old, original and only "HEADQUARTERS." Established, 1836. We originated what is now an enormous trade. We import books weekly. Supply all, Scientific, Legal, Medical, scarce, foreign and other books not often to be obtained—in fact, supply ANYTHING AND EVERYTHING in the Book or any other line. Our large store has four floors crowded with cards of books on every known subject, and all offered very low. CATALOGUES FREE. Information given. Send stamp, and send now. Address, HUNTER & CO., PUBLISHERS, BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION; or an answer to the question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Divinely-Inspired and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman. Paper, 20 cents: cloth, 50 cents.

GOLD Any worker can make $12 a day at home. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine. 1y7

SEEDS.

Best and Cheapest in America, or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from Grower, postage or express paid, and get fresh, true, and reliable seeds. I can and shall beat any firm in America in quality and low prices. Beautiful illustrated Seed Catalogues and Garden Guide free.

Address R. H. SHUMWAY,
10'5 Seed Grower, Rockford, Ill.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition: had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

Works of Thomas Paine.

COMMON SENSE. His first and most important political work. Clear type. Paper, 15 cts.

THE CRISIS. Containing Nos. I. to XVI., inclusive. Written in the "times that tried men's souls" during the American Revolution. 12mo. Full, clear type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth 80 cts.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN. Written in defense of his fellow man. A work almost without a peer in the world. On full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON. On large, clear type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON AND AN EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. Complete in one volume, on full, bold type. Containing "Common Sense," "The Crisis" (sixteen numbers), and "The Rights of Man," with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. Complete. 12mo. Composed of the "Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "An Essay on Dreams," "Of the Religion of Deism," etc., etc., with a life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

THOMAS PAINE'S GREAT WORKS. Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Containing a Life of Paine, his POLITICAL WRITINGS—"Common Sense," "The Crisis," "Rights of Man"—his THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS—"Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine" "An Essay on Dreams," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "Of the Religion of Deism"—all in one large volume, crown-octavo, of THE TRUTH SEEKER LIBRARY, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3.00; colored leather, red burnished edges, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. By Calvin Blanchard. 12mo. Large, clear type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Published by

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

BEYOND THE VEIL

A very neat and entertaining volume, giving beautiful descriptions of life, occupations, etc., in the Spirit World. Dictated by the spirit of Percy B. Randolph, through the mediumship of Mrs. Francis H. McDougal and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson of California. With a steel-plate engraving of Dr. Randolph.

Price $1.50, post-paid by mail.

D. M. BENNETT
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine. 1y7

TRUE TIME. 20,000 SOLD. The GENUINE Swiss Magnetic COMPASS, INDICATOR AND TIME-KEEPER. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveller, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY HOOT desiring a reliable Time and Direction and also a superior Compass. Usual watch size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat OXIDIZE case. Perfection guaranteed. WARRANTED to detain correct now and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1.00; 3 for $2.00. Circulars sent free. BEWARE of a "bogus" article offered as a "premium" or "for the 4th inst." Ask the Genuine. Send all orders to the Sole Agent, J. J. KING & CO., Bridgeport, Ct.

TRUTH IS MIGHTY!

Professor Martinez, the great Spanish Seer and Wizard, will for SIX Cents, with your age, height, color of eyes and look of hair, send to you a correct picture of your future husband or wife, (initials of real name, the time and place where you will first meet, and the date of marriage. Address, Prof. MARTINEZ, Box 4324 P. O. Boston, Mass. This is no humbug!

Gems of Thought.

A LIE, though it be killed and dead, can sting sometimes, like a dead wasp.—Mrs. Jameson.

HE who has not a good memory should never take upon himself the trade of lying.—Montaigne.

MAN is the jewel of God, who has created this material world to keep his treasure in.—Theodore Parker.

HE who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes; for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain one.—Pope.

LIFE at the greatest and best is but a forward child that must be humored and coaxed a little till it falls asleep, and then all the care is over.—Goldsmith.

WE sleep, but the loom of life never stops; and the pattern which was weaving when the sun went down is weaving when it comes up to-morrow.—Beecher.

LITERATURE has now become a game in which the booksellers are the kings; the critics, the knaves; the public, the pack; and the poor author, the mere table, or thing played upon.—Colton.

A MAN ought to carry himself in the world as an orange-tree would if it could walk up and down in the garden—swinging perfume from every little censer it holds up to the air.—Beecher.

NO LIE you can speak or act but it will come, after longer or shorter circulation, like a bill drawn on nature's reality, and be presented there for payment—with the answer: No effects.—Carlyle.

AS IT is the chief concern of wise men to retrench the evils of life by the reasonings of philosophy, it is the employment of fools to multiply them by their sentiments of superstition.—Addison.

THE web of our life is of a mingled yarn, good and ill together; our virtues would be proud if our faults whipped them not; and our crimes would despair if they were not cherished by our virtues.—Shakspere.

WHAT a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! How infinite in faculties! In form and moving, how express and admirable! In action, how like an angel! In apprehension, how like a god!—Shakspere.

AFFECTION can withstand very severe storms of rigor, but not a long polar frost of downright indifference. Love will subsist on wonderfully little hope, but not altogether without it.—Walter Scott.

LOVE is the crowning grace of humanity, the holiest right of the soul, the golden link which binds us to duty and truth, the redeeming principle that chiefly reconciles the heart to life, and is prophetic of eternal good.—Petrarch.

THE cure for all the ills and wrongs, the cares, the sorrows, and the crimes of humanity all lies in that one word "love." It is the divine vitality that everywhere produces and restores life. To each and every one of us it gives the power of working miracles if we will.—Mrs. Child.

LIFE is sweet as nitrous oxide; and the fisherman dripping all day over a cold pond, the switchman at the railway intersection, the farmer in the field, the negro in the rice-swamp, the fop in the street, the hunter in the woods, the barrister with the jury, the belle at the ball, all ascribe a certain pleasure to their employment, which they themselves give it.—Emerson.

THE laugh of mirth that vibrates through the heart; the tears that freshen the dry wastes within; the music that brings childhood back; the prayer that calls the future near; the doubt which makes us meditate; the death which startles us with mystery; the hardship which forces us to struggle; the anxiety that ends in trust; are the true nourishment of our natural being.—Martineau.

WE talk of human life as a journey, but how variously is that journey performed! There are those who come forth girt and shod and mantled, to walk on velvet lawns and smooth terraces, where every gale is arrested and every beam is tempered. There are others who walk on the Alpine paths of life, against driving misery and through stormy sorrows, over sharp afflictions; walk with bare feet and naked breast, jaded, mangled, and chilled—Sidney Smith.

NO ATOM of matter was ever created, and none can be annihilated. Not an atom is ever lost or used up in all the changes of nature's great laboratory. Not one ever had a beginning, nor will one ever have an end; neither can a single atom always remain in any single form. Even the hardest adamant slowly and steadily disintegrates, changes, and enters into new combinations and new identities, just as you and I, reader, must inevitably do when our little life here is lived and done.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

AS REASON throned on intelligence will ascend to the comprehension of the laws of the physical universe, Conscience will become the shining light of the moral world, shedding its pure radiance over the character. This is possible to every human being. However debased and brutalized by the accidents of time and place, the spirit has within itself the immortal germs of goodness and purity. If not awakened in this life, they will be at some period in the hereafter. Life in man is a continuity not broken by death, and the hour of change known as repentance is never gone by. In the future life, the spirit, freed from the conditions of physical existence which crushed it in the dust, has a brighter field; and where before all influences were earthward, all become spiritward.—Hudson Tuttle.

Odds and Ends.

BOUND to occur—a muzzle.

NEVER strike a moustache when it is down.

DISTURBING the grave: Making a sober man laugh.

IT makes a great difference whether glasses are used over or under the nose.

YOUNG folks grow most when in love. It increases their sighs wonderfully.

THE fool seeketh to pick a fly from a mule's hind leg; the wise man letteth the job out to the lowest bidder.

NOTHING is so fatal to the romance of a kiss as to have your girl sneeze at the very moment of osculation.

THE buckwheat cake of our fathers was of a more respectable size than those of the present degenerate age.

"HOW CAN I leave thee?" said Adam to Eve. She made no reply, but calmly pointed to the fig-tree in the distance.

A WEALTHY Chinaman wears two watches. A fashionable American girl wears unnumbered clocks on her stockings.

IT is said of the Chicago banks that thirteen out of eighteen are opposed to silver. Silver is too bulky to run away with.

WOMEN are proverbially severe in their criticisms of each other's attire. It makes all the difference in the world whose dress is gored.

THE difference between a fool who has been through college and a fool who has not is that the latter knows he is a fool while the former does not.

BRIDGEPORT Standard: "A Bridgeport man courted his wife seven years, and after living with her two, now acknowledges that it was a court of errors."

"YOU are writing my bill on very rough paper," said a client to his attorney. "Never mind," said the lawyer; "it has to be filed before it comes into court."

A PRISONER was tried the other day who was described by the reporters as "a woman of masculine appearance." Naturally she was tried at the Middlesex Sessions."

"HEAVENS! what a cow!" was the approving remark of a teetotal parson of Vermont, after swallowing a potent punch which had been offered to him as a glass of milk.

"WHY, Sammy," said a father to his little son, the other day, "I didn't know that your teacher whipped you last Friday." "I guess," he replied, "if you had been in my trousers you'd a known it."

"DO YOU know where I can get room to store a load of salt?" asked a countryman of a Boston clerk. "Perhaps my father can accommodate you," was the reply, "he has plenty of salt rheum on his hands."

MORAL suasion is good enough in its way, but a half-pint of catnip tea will do more towards inducing the colic to let go its grip on a young baby's interior department than all the moral suasion in America.

"DID anything about the defendant strike your eye as remarkable?" asked a judge of the plaintiff in a case of assault and battery. "It did, yer honor." "And what was it?" continued the judge. "His fist, yer honor."

THAT was a funny indictment which arraigned a woman in Milwaukee, the other day, for disturbing a religious meeting by "riotously eating nuts and noisily champing the same with her teeth." The woman was acquitted.

THE mild winter does not keep the bad grocer from mingling his bad flour with his buckwheat flour, and selling the mixture to unsuspecting customers. In the warm by and by there will be no buckwheat cakes for the bad grocer.

THOSE who have read about the strife for social precedence between the wives of Cabinet ministers and the wives of Senators unanimously agree that the Chinese precaution of drowning female infants is not half so wicked as it seems.

A LONDON attorney having died exceedingly poor, a shilling subscription was set afoot to pay the expenses of the funeral. Most of the attorneys and barristers having subscribed, one of them applied to Toler, afterward Lord Chief Justice Norbury, expressing the hope that he would also subscribe a shilling. "Only a shilling to bury an attorney? Here is a guinea; go and bury twenty-one of them."

THE FROGGIE'S PARTY.

The frog who would a wooing go,
Gave a party, you must know;
And his bride, dressed all in green,
Looked as fine as any queen.
Their reception numbered some
Of the best in Froggiedom:
Four gray froggies played the fiddle—
Hands all around and down the middle;

Some stern old croakers there did come,
In white chokers, to the room;
While the belles, with rush-leaf fans,
Danced with beaux in green brogans,
Flirted in the bowers there,
Hidden from the ball-room's glare.
Three old froggies tried a reel—
Twist 'em, turn 'em, toe and heel.

One little Miss was asked to sing,
But she had a cold that spring;
Little frogs were sound asleep,
Late hours—bad for them to keep.
Each one wished the couple joy,
No bad boys came to annoy;
This next fall, the news is spreading,
They will have their silver wedding.

—From the Nursery.

Truth Seeker Tracts.

No.	(REVISED LIST.)	Cts.
1.	Discussion on Prayer. D. M. Bennett and two Clergymen.	8
2.	Oration on the Gods, Ingersoll.	10
3.	Thomas Paine. "	5
4.	Arraignment of the Church. Ingersoll.	5
5.	Heretics and Heresies. "	5
5.	Humboldt. "	5
7.	The Story of Creation. Bennett.	5
8.	The Old Snake Story. "	2
9.	The Story of the Flood. "	5
10.	The Plagues of Egypt. "	2
11.	Korah, Datham, and Abiram. Bennett.	2
12.	Balaam and his Ass. "	2
13.	Arraignment of Priestcraft. "	3
14.	Old Abe and Little Ike. Syphers.	3
15.	Come to Dinner. "	2
16.	Fog Horn Documents. "	2
17.	The Devil Still Ahead. "	7
18.	Slipped Up Again. "
19.	Joshua Stopping the Sun and Moon. D. M. Bennett.	5
20.	Samson and his Exploits. Bennett.	2
21.	The Great Wrestling Match. "	2
22.	Discussion with Elder Shelton. "	10
23.	Reply to Elder Shelton's Fourth Letter. D. M. Bennett.	3
24.	Christians at Work. Wm. McDonnell.	5
25.	Discussion with Geo. Snode. Bennett.	5
26.	Underwood's Prayer.	1
27.	Honest Questions and Honest Answers. D. M. Bennett.	5
28.	Alessandro di Cagliostro. C. Sotheran.	10
29.	Paine Hall Dedication Address. B. F. Underwood.	2
30.	Woman's Rights & Man's Wrongs. Syphers.	2
31.	Gods and God-houses. "	2
32.	The God's of Superstition and the God of the Universe. D. M. Bennett.	3
33.	What has Christianity Done? Preston.	3
34.	Tribute to Thomas Paine. "	2
35.	Moving the Ark. D. M. Bennett.	1
36.	Bennett's Prayer to the Devil.	2
37.	Short Sermon. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	1
38.	Christianity not a Moral System. X. Y. Z.	3
39.	The True Saint. S. P. Putnam.	3
40.	Bible of Nature vs. The Bible of Men. J. Syphers.	3
41.	Our Ecclesiastical Gentry. Bennett.	1
42.	Elijah the Tishbite. "	3
43.	Christianity a Borrowed System. "	3
44.	Design Argument Refuted. Underwood.	2
45.	Elisha the Prophet. Bennett.	3
46.	Did Jesus Really Exist? "	3
47.	Cruelty and Credulity of the Human Race. Dr. Daniel Arter.	5
48.	Freethought in the West. G. L. Henderson.	5
49.	Sensible Conclusions. E. E. Guild.	3
50.	Jonah and the Big Fish. D. M. Bennett.	1
51.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets. No. 1.	5
52.	Marples-Underwood Debate, Underwood.	3
53.	Questions for Bible Worshipers. B. F. Underwood.	2
54.	An Open Letter to Jesus Christ, Bennett.	5
55.	The Bible God Disproved by Nature. W. E. Coleman.	3
56.	Bible Contradictions.	1
57.	Jesus Not a Perfect Character. Underwood.	2
58.	Prophecies.	2
59.	Bible Prophecies Concerning Babylon. B. F. Underwood.	2
60.	Ezekiel's Prophecies Concerning Tyre. B. F. Underwood.	2
61.	History of the Devil. Isaac Paden.	5
62.	The Jews and their God.	10
63.	The Devils Due-Bills. John Syphers.	3
64.	The Ills we Endure—their Cause and Cure. D. M. Bennett.	2
65.	Short Sermon No. 2. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	2
66.	God Idea in History. H. B. Brown.	5
67.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets No. 2.	5
68.	Ruth's Idea of Heaven and Mine. Susan H. Wixon.	2
69.	Missionaries. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	2
70.	Vicarious Atonement. J. S. Lyon.	3
71.	Paine's Anniversary. C. A. Codman.	3
72.	Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. D. M. Bennett.	2
73.	Foundations. John Syphers.	3
74.	Daniel in the Lion's Den. Bennett.	2
75.	An Hour with the Devil. "	10
76.	Reply to Erastus F. Brown. D. M. Bennett.	3
77.	The Fear of Death. D. M. Bennett.	5
78.	Christmas and Christianity. D.M.Bennett.	5
79.	The Relationship of Jesus, Jehovah, and the Virgin Mary. W. E. Coleman.	2
80.	Address on Paine's 139th Birthday. Bennett.	5
81.	Hereafter, or the Half-way House. John Syphers.	1
82.	Christian Courtesy. Bennett.	2
83.	Revivalism Examined. Dr. A. G. Humphrey.	5
84.	Moody's Sermon on Hell. Rev. J. P. Hopps, London.	2
85.	Matter, Motion, Life and Mind. Bennett.	10
86.	An Enquiry about God's Sons. "	2
87.	Freethought Judged by its Fruits. B. F. Underwood.	1
88.	David, God's Peculiar Favorite. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	3
89.	Logic of Prayer. Charles Stephenson.	3
90.	Biblo-Mania. Otter Cordates.	2
91.	Our Ideas of God. B. F. Underwood.	1
92.	The Bible; is it Divinely Inspired? Dr. D. Arter.	5
93.	Obtaining Pardon for Sins. Hudson Tuttle.	1
94.	The New Raven. Will Cooper.	5
95.	Jesus Christ. D. M. Bennett.	10
96.	Ichabod Crane Papers.	10
97.	Special Providences' W. S. Bell.	2
98.	Snakes. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.	2
99.	Do the Works of Nature prove a Creator? Sciota.	5
100.	The Old and the New. R. G. Ingersoll.	5
101.	116th Anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday. Bennett et als.	5
102.	The Old Religion and the New. W. S. Bell.	1
103.	Does the Bible Teach us all we Know. Bennet.	2
104.	Evolution of Israel's God. A. L. Rawson.	10
105.	Decadence of Christianity. Capphro.	2
106.	Franklin, Washington and Jefferson Unbelievers. Bennett.	2
107.	The Safe Side. H. B. Brown.	5
108.	The Holy Bible a Historical Humbug. S. H. Preston.	1
109.	Ghosts. Ingersoll, 4 pp.	5
110.	Materialistic Prayer. Bennett, 4 pp.	1
111.	Reply to Scientific American. Bennett.	1
112.	Sensible Sermon. Savage, 8 pp.	2
113.	Come to Jesus. Bennett, 8 pp.	2

SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

1.	Hereditary Transmission. Prof. Louis Elsberg, M.D.	5
2.	Evolution; from the Homogeneous to the Heterogeneous. B. F. Underwood.	3
3.	Darwinism. B. F. Underwood.	3
4.	Literature of the Insane. F. B. Marvin.	5
5.	Responsibility of Sex. Mrs. Chase, M.D.	3
6.	Graduated Atmospheres. J. McCarroll.	2
7.	Death. Frederic R. Marvin, M.D.	5
8.	How do Marsupial Animals Propagate their kind? A. B. Bradford.	5
9.	The Unseen World. Prof. John Fiske.	10
10.	The Evolution Theory—Huxley's Three Lectures.	10
11.	Is America the New World? L. L. Dawson.	10

Discount on one dollar's worth 10 per ct. off; on two dollars' worth 20 off; on five dollars' worth 40 off; on ten dollars' worth 50 off.

As few or as many of any given kind may be ordered as desired.

RADICAL BOOKS.

SENT POST PAID AT THE PRICES ANNEXED.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

Age of Reason. Paine. Paper covers.	25
" " " Cloth "	50
" " and Ex. of Proph. Paper 50; cl.	75
A Few Days in Athens. Frances Wright.	75
Apocryphal New Testament.	1 25
An Eye Opener. Paper, 50; cloth,	75
Antiquity of Christianity. Alberger.	25
Analysis of Religious Belief. Viscount Amberly. $3.00, 4.00, and	4 50
Apples of Gold. Susan H. Wixon.	1 50
Anti-Theological Lectures. Rev. R. Taylor.	2 00
Antiquity and Duration of the World.	25
Astronomy and Worship of the Ancients.	25
A. J. Davis' Entire Works,	27.00
Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub.	15
Bible in India. Jacolliot.	2 00
Buckle's History of Civilization. 2 Vols., 8vo.	4 00
Burgess-Underwood Debate, 50 and	80
Bible in the Balance. Fish.	1 00
Bacon's Novum Organum.	2 00
Bhagvad-Gita, or Dialogues of Christna and Arjuna.	1 75
Buechner's Man, Present and Future.	4 00
Christianity before Christ. Craven.	25
Chapters from the Bibles of the Ages.	1 50
Criticism on the Theoligical Idea of Deity.	1 00
Childhood of Religion. Clodd.	1 25
Childhood of the World. Clodd, 40 and	60
Christianity and Materialism. Underwood.	15
Cause of Religious Ideas. Tuttle,	1 00
Conway's Sacred Anthology.	4 00
Colenso on the Pentateuch, Abstract of.	25
Devil's Pulpit. Rev. Robt. Taylor,	2 00
Diegesis "	2 00
Denton's Irreconcilable Records,	50
" Our Planet, Past, Present, and Future,	1 50
" Radical Rhymes.	1 25
" Who are Christians. Deluge.
Denton's Common Sense Thoughts, Be Thyself, What is Right? Man's True Saviors, Sermon from Shakspere's Text, God Proposed, Spiritualism True, Orthodoxy False, 10 cents each.
Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science.	1 75
" Intellectual Development of Europe, 2 vols.,	3 00
Darwin's Origin of Species,	2 00
" Descent of Man, (Impr'd Ed.)	3 00
Descent and Darwinism, Schmidt,	1 50
Einstein's Origin of Religious Ideas.	1 00
Exeter Hall, Wm. McDonnell,	60 & 80
Errors of the Bible, Wright,	35 & 60
Essence of Religion. Fuerbach. 40 and	80
Eight Scientific Tracts.	20
Frothingham's Religion of Humanity,	1 50
" Child's Book of Religion,	1 00
" Stories of the Patriarchs,	1 00
" Safest Creed,	1 50
" Transcendentalism in New England,	2 50
Faraday's Various Forces of Nature.	2 00
Fiske's Myths and Myth-Makers,	2 00
God Idea in History, Tuttle,	1 25
Good Sense, D'Holbach,	1 00
Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages.	2 50
" Lost and Hostile Gospels,	3 25
Graves' Sixteen Crucified Saviors,	2 00
" Biography of Satan.	60
Grey's Enigmas of Life.	2 00
" Creeds of Christendom. 2 Vols.	7 50
Heroines of Freethought, Mrs. Underwood.	1 75
Heathens of the Heath, McDonnell,	1 00 & 150
Hume's Essays and Treatises,	1 50
Huxley's Lay Sermons,	1 75
" Man's Place in Nature.	1 25
" Critiques and Addresses,	1 50
History of all Religions Sects. Evans.	1 00
Haeckel's History of Creation. 2 Vols.	5 00
Hollick's Nerves and the Nervous.	1 00
Humboldt's Works.
Ingersoll's Gods and other Lectures. 30 and	50
" " " etc., Large Edition.	1 25
Influence of Christianity on Civilization.	25
Infidels' Text Book. Cooper.	1 00
Jehovah Unveiled.	35
Jamieson's Clergy a Source of Danger.	1 00
Josephus' Complete Works.	2 50
Johnson's Oriental Religions. 8vo.	5 00
John's Way.	15
Kneeland's Review.	1 00
" Hymns.	35
Koran, with Notes and Life of Mahomet.	2 75
Lecky's Rationalism in Europe. 2 Vols.	4 00
" History of European Morals.	3 00
Life of Thomas Paine. Blanchard. p 50; cl	75
Lewes' Biographical History of Philosophy.	3 50
" Problems of Life and Mind.	3 00
Lizzie Doten's Poems of Progress, and Inner Life, each	150
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization,	2 00
" Pre-Historic Times Illustrated,	5 00
Lyell's Elements of Geology, 770 cuts.	3 40
" Principles " " 2 vols. and maps,	3 00
Monks and Popes. Alberger.	1 00
Morley's Life of Voltaire,	2 00
Martyrdom of Man. Winwood Reade.	3 00
Peeble's All Around the World,	2 50
" Seers of the Ages,	2 50
Plato's Divine and Moral Works,	2 20
Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion.	30 & 50
Physical Man, Tuttle.	1 50
Paine's Common Sense.	12
" Crisis. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Rights of Man. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Theological Works, with portrait	1 50
" " " paper,	1 00
" Political Works, cloth,	1 50
" Great Works Complete. Crown octavo, with life and portrait.	3
" Political Works, steel portrait.	1
" Life, by Calvin Blanchard with portrait Paper, 50; cloth	75
Parturition without Pain,	1 00
Plain Home Talk and Medical Common Sense, E. B. Foote, M.D.,	1 50
Proctor's Six Lectures on Astronomy,	20
Reason, the only Oracle of Man. Ethan Allen	50
Syntagma, Taylor,	1 00
System of Nature, D'Holbach,	2 00
Self-Contradictions of the Bible.	25
Studying the Bible, Mrs. Slenker.	75
Spencer's (Herbert) Entire Work,
Strauss' Old Faith and New,	2 00
" New Life of Jesus, 2 vols.,	12 00
Supernatural Religion, 2 Vols., 8vo.,	8 00
Sexual Physiology, Trall,	2 00
Talleyrand's Letter to Pope Pius vii.	25
Tyndall (Prof. John) Entire Works,
The Christ of Paul,	2 00
The Case against the Church,	75
The Relations of the Sexes. Mrs. Duffey.	2 00
The Voices, Warren Sumner Barlow.	1 25
The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 5
The Champions of the Church, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 50
Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, etc., 75 &	1 00
Truth Seeker Tracts, Vols. I, II, III, and IV., by the lot, 50 &	75
The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations,	75
The Outcast, Winwood Reade,	30
Talks with My Patients, Mrs. Gleason, M.D.,	1 50
Underwood-Marples Debate,	25 & 50
Underwood's Twelve Tracts.	20
Vestiges of Creation.	75
Volney's Ruins,	1 00
Volney's New Researches in Ancient History.	1 50
Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary,	5 00

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 13. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, March 30, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A MICHIGAN woman of wealth and strong convictions has hired a man to preach a literal hell throughout the country.

HOW MANY expressions one meets with which come manifestly from a tender heart! and how many, alas! from a tender head!

THE benighted Africans who dwell along the borders of Lake Ngami are to enjoy the benefits and blessings of a new missionary station.

The Christian Intelligencer says that there is heresy in the Church of Christ to-day, and that it is alarming. Yet it does not say what is going to be done about it.

AN Iowa clergyman is said to have given $75 and "four formal, earnest prayers" for a horse. The prayers were for the welfare of the man from whom the horse was bought.

THE Trustees of Provincetown, Mass., have made up their minds that they will have no more profanity in the streets, and have ordered a rigid enforcement of the law on that subject.

A CHURCH festival was held at Memory, Taylor county, Iowa, last week, and among the mills for grinding out the cents was a vote for the prettiest girl, which ended in a fight, fists and knives being freely used.

THERE is wild excitement among people in Trigg county, Kentucky, over an expectation of the near approach of the Judgment Day. Many have abandoned business and all earthly concerns, and given themselves up to religious exercises.

A MOTHER whose crying infant made the sermon of her pastor almost inaudible was going from the hall when the clergyman spoke up, saying: "My good woman, don't go away. The baby doesn't disturb me." "It isn't for that I leave, sir," was her reply; "its you distrubs the baby."

THE House of Representatives in passing, by a large majority, a bill giving the right to practice in the United States courts to female lawyers who have been admitted to the bar in their respective States, score another victory for the sex. Slowly but surely the rights of women are being defined.

THE WOMEN OF ESSEX WANT THE "FREE COINAGE" ACT.—Fifty women of Essex, Mass., have petitioned the State Legislature to do away with the marriage ceremony, as it is an effete institution, and was established by one "Moses, a foreign barbarian, with a dash of his pen."—Chicago Tribune.

THE story comes from Deadwood that a member of a certain church organization was bowie-knifed by a zealous deacon for putting a counterfeit quarter in the contribution-box, and the excited pastor, without leaving his pulpit, shot the good deacon for creating a disturbance during divine service.

IT is related by the London Times that a woman who recently died at Ashcott, at the age of one hundred and four years, had for the last forty of them been in the habit of drinking gin to excess, often spending a thousand dollars a year for it. It is gravely suggested that but for this habit she would not have thus been cut off in her prime.

JOSEPH COOK, having exclusive news of the death of Ruskin, treated his Boston audience the other day to an obituary notice of that eminent man, and spoke of him as "a sun yet below the horizon of ordinary lives." The news that Ruskin still lived did not reach Boston till Cook's audience had been dismissed and the wicked reporters had gone off with the obituary.

ALTHOUGH mistress of the seas, and already tenfold stronger there than Russia, England is still collecting war ships wherever she can find them. She is said to have bought four ironclads ordered by the Turks, the ironclad Independencia built for Brazil, a large ironclad built for Japan, besides putting in commission the Wivern, an ironclad built for the Confederacy. Couldn't we improve the shining hour by trading off to England some of our old ironclads? Thus the Halifax award might be reduced.

THE acceptance of verbal evidence in the absence of written proofs having been granted in the case of the young lady who claims to be a daughter of the Cardinal Antonelli, 100 witnesses, priests, and others, are to be called. It is said that a great deal of scandal will come to light, and that the trusted friend of the late Pope, so pious and chaste himself, will prove to have been a veritable Don Juan.

LEW WONG, a chinese murderer recently hanged in California, sent for a clergyman in order to have the Christian religion explained to him, so that he might decide whether it was better than his own. He listened attentively for two hours, but finally said that the matter was so complicated that he couldn't hope to understand it fully in the short time that was left to him, and that therefore he would take the risk with a more familiar faith.

AT Fort Scott, Kansas, the Congregational church has determined to abandon its house of worship. A Massachusetts lady presses her claim of $5,000, and a Boston man his of $2,400. As the church building is not worth so much as $7,400, the mortgage holders will sell out and take their chances; while the people of the church can watch their opportunity to buy the church for almost nothing. Then they can start anew, free from debt. This is the way it is done in New York and Brooklyn.

THE members of two Baptist churches in this city are having the liveliest kind of a quarrel about money matters. One church assisted the other out of a financial strait about fourteen years ago, and they have been litigating ever since, at a cost of about $10,000. Things are coming to a focus now, and feelings between the churches are very bitter, though no blood has been shed as yet. If these Christians made a religion of their business, instead of making a business of their religion, there would be less trouble in the world.

COL. INGERSOLL writes to the Washington Post as follows: "An item started by the Chicago Times is going the rounds of the press to the effect that I refused to pay my board in Providence. This is an orthodox lie. The truth is that a minister hailing from Chicago, probably a correspondent of the Times, 'answered' me in Providence, and then ran away without paying his bills. The doing of such things is so common on the part of peripatetic evangelists that my name, I suppose, was substituted to make the story seem wonderful. I pay my own bills; I am not a believer in the vicarious atonement.

"R. G. INGERSOLL."

THE spectacle at the recent seat of war in Asiatic Turkey will rank with the most terrible in history. There is danger, with the approach of warm weather, that the 20,000 victims of typhus imbedded in the snow and mud near Erzeroum, will infect the country for hundreds of leagues around. In Europe, the blood-drenched battlefields of Bulgaria bid fair to repeat the story of the Roman Campagna, where the air for ages was poisoned by the multitude of the slain. The efforts of the International Sanitary Commission in dealing with this frightful state of affairs deserve the support of both public and private benevolence.

A GOOD story is told of a deacon in Tennessee, who was in the habit of riding a bucking mule—that is, a mule that can make a camel's back of its straight one and by a spasmodic movement of its four legs and hump, discharge its rider like a cannon ball. The other day they came to the edge of the worst mud hole in the State, and the mule gave unmistakable indications of bucking. The good deacon knew that he was about to be thrown, and his mind skurried about for a prayer. His table grace came easiest:—"Lord, for what we are about to receive make us humbly thankful," he exclaimed, and the mule had bucked and he was in.

ONE of the queer things of the day in ecclesiastical financiering is the case of the eminent Chicago clergyman, who goes into bankruptcy owing $15,000, and yet wants to hold on to a fund which his generous friends have made up for his maintenance. The fund is about $25,000, which, according to the best arithmetic, would pay the brother's debts and leave him a much larger sum than belongs to the average clergyman. This thing has an unpleasant look, and lays the eloquent and learned gentleman open to a suspicion that he does not want to pay his debts. Let him preach next Sunday from the text, "Provide things honest in the sight of all men," and see what he can make out of it.

A DOCTRESS writes to the Australian Star that more quarels arise between husband and wife owing to electrical changes affecting their nervous systems by occupying the same bed than by any other disturbing cause. "There is nothing," she says, "that will derange the system of a person who is eliminative in nervous force like lying in bed all night with another person who is almost absorbed in nervous force. The absorber will go to sleep and rest all night, while the eliminator will be tossing and tumbling, restless and nervous, and wake up fretful and disheartened." No two persons should habitually sleep together, according to this authority; one will thrive and the other lose.

A VERY extraordinary condition of things exists in England as regards the institution of clergymen to livings. The Bishop of Peterborough, for instance, stated in 1875 that since he had been Bishop he had been called upon to institute one clergyman who was paralytic; another so aged and infirm that he applied for leave of perpetual absence; a third who was a reclaimed drunkard, and whose intemperance had occurred in a neighboring parish; and a fourth who had resigned a public office rather than face a charge of the most horrible immorality. In each of these cases the facts were well known to the parties presenting these persons to livings; but as regards every one of them the Bishop was advised that he had no legal power to refuse institution.

THE Governor of New Mexico has deeply offended the ecclesiastics of that Territory by vetoing a bill to repeal what is known as the "burial law," which prohibited the burial of the dead beneath the floors of churches. Until the passage of the act two years ago it was the usual practice of the wealthy New Mexican Roman Catholics to bury their dead in the churches, the price of a sepulchre ranging from $250 to $1,000, according to the proximity to the altar. When the ground under the floor was full of dead bodies, they were exhumed, and reinterred elsewhere—a practice which has been twice repeated in the parish of Albuquerque. The bill was passed over the Governor's veto by an almost unanimous vote, as was also another bill forever exempting the property of the Society of Jesus from taxation.

A PEASANT girl at Cheppy, in the Department of the Meuse, France, had an apparition of the Virgin in an apple tree. The bishop and the clergy manifested no enthusiasm, and the supernatural would have gone to waste if poor Collin had not taken measures to insure its success. He took the ground that in this commercial world even a miracle will fail unless it is properly backed up by capital. He induced a couple of bankers to advance him funds, and the miracle company was formed. With the money so procured he had commemorative medals struck; he had chaplets blessed and an immense number of photographs taken representing the apple tree and the features of the apparition. A very large number of these objects were sold by him throughout a district extending many miles in every direction from the apple tree. Pilgrims soon began to flock to the place by thousands, and miraculous cures took place as a matter of course. As many as 2,500 pilgrims are known to have visited the tree in a single day. Unfortunately for the dividends of the enterprising company the police stepped in, not to dispute the authenticity of the miraculous apparition, but to prosecute Collin for hawking his pious fetiches without a license. He was fined $10 for the offense, and that circumstance gave rise to a quarrel between the associates. He maintained that the firm ought to pay the fine collectively, as well as bear the burden of expenses incurred by floating the concern. The financial partners not only would not hear of any such thing, but sued Collin for $2,400 advanced to him. The latter, exasperated, then wrote a pamphlet exposing the whole swindle. Unluckily for himself, he did not stop there, but sent libelous post cards to one of his associates, and forged the signature of the public prosecutor to a document summoning the other to appear and answer for having aided and abetted in a serious case. A fortnight ago the ingenious fellow was sentenced to three weeks' imprisonment for swindling and blackmailing.

Events of the Week.

THE Sultan of Morocco is dead.

BEECHER starts on another lecturing tour.

FIFTEEN inches of snow in the Catskill mountains.

COUNTERFEITS of the new silver dollar are already in circulation.

A LARGE fire occurred in Philadelphia on the 25th inst. Loss, $1,000,000.

THE steamer City of Berlin, from Europe, brings $250,000 in silver bullion.

GREAT fire in the Non-explosive Lamp Company's works, Cleveland, O. Loss, $225,000.

A LADY seventy-nine years of age was murdered by her daughter in Syracuse on the 24th.

THE famine is extending over the northern provinces of China, involving unparalleled distress.

GERMANY has sent a formidable expedition against Nicaragua to enforce her claims for the insult to Consul Eisenstuck.

HIGHWAY robbery is becoming alarmingly frequent of late in this city and Brooklyn. There have been several cases within the past week.

POPE Leo has decided to be non-committal in regard to European affairs. The Jesuits recently proposed to make Rome their headquarters, but the Pope did not favor the scheme.

A BILL has been introduced in the State Legislature to compel the use of the Moffet bell-punch in the liquor saloons of this State; it has been very successful in Virginia. The bill will probably pass.

HESTER, McCue, and Tulley, three Mollie Maguires, were hanged in Bloomsburg, Pa., on the 25th, for a murder committed ten years ago. As usual, they were seen safely through to heaven by several clergymen.

O'LEARY, the Chicago pedestrian, has carried off the champion belt and $2,500 prize in the great international walking-match at London. He walked 520 miles in six days, and is now the champion pedestrian of the world.

THE Eurydice, a British war vessel, used as a schoolship, was struck by a gale on the morning of the 24th off the Isle of Wight, and capsized, while the men were mustering for prayers. Over three hundred lives were lost.

THE Irish are kicking up quite a row about the "skirmishing fund" which they have been accumulating for use against the English Government. It amounts to $50,000, and they want to know who is drawing the interest on it.

THE steamer Magenta exploded her steam-chimney while on her way down the Hudson from Sing Sing on the 23d. Two men were instantly killed, three fatally wounded, one is missing, and several were badly scalded. Carelessness.

A MAN dropped dead in a synagogue in this city a day or two ago, and a Western minister had his tongue paralyzed recently while preaching. We wish it distinctly understood that these were not just punishments by an outraged Deity.

MOLLY MAGUIRISM appears to prevail in our American colleges and theological seminaries. Bates' College, Lewiston, Maine, now comes to the front as a candidate for blackguardistic honors. The students have had a pitched battle, but none were killed.

THE sloop of war Wyoming, which sailed from this port on the 23rd with goods for the Paris Exposition, sprung a leak when five hundred miles out, and put back for repairs. The United States navy appears to be principally composed of a lot of leaky old tubs.

TWO NEGROES were hanged for murder at Newcastle, Del., a few days ago. Notwithstanding the assurances of their spiritual advisers that they were going straight to the arms of Jesus, they were loth to leave this miserable world. Their souls were saved with ease, but, judging by their pitiful appeals for life, they would prefer having their bodies saved and letting their souls take chances for salvation.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER IV.—CONTINUED.

Just then the baby opened its eyes, smiled, and stretched out its hands to Sue, who hastily rose to take it in her arms; but a sudden change passed across its countenance—a slight shiver, and all was over. As Myra gently and reverently laid the little form in the cradle, the door opened, and Mrs. Conway came staggering into the room. The doctor sprang forward to assist her, but, pushing him aside, she said, "I want my baby. What have they done with it? I've been asking for it all day, and no one will bring it." She stooped over the cradle, and as her eyes fell upon the little white face, she screamed out, "Merciful Providence! it's dead!" And before any one could catch her, she fell across the cradle in a fit.

The doctor and her husband took her to her room and laid her on the bed, and as soon as they got a glimpse of her face they saw, by its gray, pinched appearance, that the shock had killed her. Sue was borne fainting from the room, and Myra followed to attend upon her. The deacon and doctor alone remained with the dead.

For a moment it seemed as if the veins in the forehead of the deacon would burst, so swollen and purple did they appear. All at once he broke out into a perfect torrent of blasphemy, rage, and malediction. He cursed God, his dead wife, his boys, and himself. He was perfectly wild and frantic with rage and horror. The doctor, seeing his condition, suffered him to go on till he somewhat exhausted himself, then attempted to reason with him and bring him to his senses; but it was of no use. He would hear nothing; and at last, when he had got tired of cursing, he all at once began to talk to his dead wife, calling on her to awake and come back, promising to be kind and good to her in future, and to try and make her home pleasant and happy. Then he grew solemn and grave, and began to talk to himself. "'The Lord loveth whom he chasteneth.' Yes, yes, he loves me, and so he chastens me. He loved his only Son more yet, so he chastened him more than he has me. He had him crucified, and made him suffer for all the sins of all mankind. I have only a few little sins, so I ought not to suffer much. I have always asked forgiveness for all my sins and made atonement for them, so I know this is not sent as a warning—only as chastening; therefore I'll try and bear it."

Just then his eyes fell upon a long, deep scar on his wife's arm. How well he remembered it!—one day when, in a rage, he had struck her with the sharp edge of a carving-knife because she had ventured to dispute his word about some trifle. How quickly she had bound it up, and told the children, on their return from school, that she had fallen and cut it on a piece of glass! Poor woman! she had borne many a blow from him; but she was now beyond it all, and his conscience gave him slight twinges as he thought over many incidents of their unhappy past, while sitting there in silence beside the cold, still form of her who had tried to be a good, faithful, loving wife to him.

The two girls, Meta and Ida, had been living out on the farm for a few weeks, and a messenger had been dispatched for them early in the morning. About three o'clock in the afternoon news was brought that the horse had run away, throwing them both down a steep embankment, killing Meta outright, and that Ida had died before they could get her home. The doctor, who had gone to the door in answer to the rap of the boy who brought the sad news, called Edith, and bade her keep Sue in her room till the bodies of the girls should be brought in, and then he would be with them, and assist in preparing her for the awful tidings. Ere long the litter arrived, and sympathizing neighbors flocked in, and kind hands prepared the four bodies for burial. They were laid side by side in the mother's bed. Not one word had the deacon said through it all. The doctor had gently told him of this last calamity before the bodies arrived; but he sat as if turned to stone, and stared vacantly at all who addressed him. At last the old minister, Rev. Mr. Morton, came into the room, and, going up to him, placed his hand on his shoulder, and said, "My brother, let us pray."

"Pray!" said the deacon, bitterly, "pray! Why should I pray? Can prayers bring the dead to life? Can prayers restore what is irretrievably gone? Haven't I been deacon of your church for twenty long years, and faithfully performed the duties of my office? Haven't I led a true Christian life? And what is my reward?"

"The reward of all good deeds is sure and certain," said the minister, solemnly. "If not in this world, then in another will you be recompensed according to deeds done in the body. We are all poor, miserable sinners, and deserve little or nothing at His hands, and yet he gives us blessings innumerable every day of our lives."

"Yes, see how good and kind he has been to me," said the deacon, bitterly. "Infidels like Darwin can live surrounded by all that is beautiful, bright, and desirable, and life is but a continual pleasure to them; while I, God's holy servant, who have faithfully labored for years in his vineyard, must be 'chastened' because he loves me!"

"Brother, I fear you are not cherishing a contrite and humble spirit," said the minister. "He doeth all things well, and it is not for you or me to judge or criticise his will. I know your afflictions are severe; but he will give you strength if you ask it. The grace of God will be with you. You must learn to 'kiss the hand that wields the chastening rod.' 'Though thou slay me, yet will I trust in thee,' for 'there is none I desire on earth but thee.' My brother, you have so often quoted these blessed sayings for others, why not take them now to your own heart?"

"Because they don't fit my case," said the deacon. "I am like Job, cursed beyond my strength; and all the man in me cries out in tribulation. You need not quote Scripture to me, for I have the whole book at my tongue's end, and I find no consolation in its false promises."

"Well, since you refuse all consolation, I will leave you, and call again in a few hours, trusting that you will then be better prepared for sympathy and advice."

CHAPTER V.

TWO WEEKS have passed since the last sad scenes of our story took place. The dead have been carried to their silent resting-place, and one by one the friends departed to their homes, leaving Sue and her father alone, save an old lady to cook and to do general housework, and be company for Sue. How empty and desolate the old barn of a house seemed! Every room, though haunted by memories of the past, and echoing, as it were, the voices and steps of loved ones now no more, was lone and desolate.

Poor Sue! She had been ill almost to death, and had hoped and prayed to die; but it was not to be; and now she was slowly recovering, and this sunny afternoon she had once more taken her old seat at the sitting-room window. Her father came and placed a stool under her feet, asking if she was comfortable. She answered gratefully that she was, for it was a rare thing for the selfish man to trouble himself about the comfort of others. He had been a hard father, an unloving husband, and a cold-hearted man all his life; but his grief at his wife's death and that of his babe had shown him to be not utterly heartless. But, looking on him as the cause of all that had occurred to blast their home, Sue could not regard him with anything like filial affection, though she tried to be kind and gentle, and pitied him for his too-evident unhappiness. Though he still kept up his regular prayers and church duties, he had ceased to quote Scripture, or talk at all on the subject, save when necessity required it.

As they sat that pleasant afternoon, each wrapped in silent, moody thought, Edith came softly into the room and handed Sue a letter, saying, "It's from your brothers, I guess; and I hope it's good news, too, dear—news that will cheer and brighten you up."

Sue took the letter eagerly, and hastily broke the seal, and read as follows:

"DEAR SISTER SUE: We wrote to mother before we left home, and now we write to you, though we mean it for all who care to hear from us. We are getting on bravely with our journey, and find so many kind, good, generous people all along our way that we have only stayed out one night, and then we slept on the lee side of a straw-stack, and as warm as need be. We generally cut wood and do little turns in payment for lodging and provision, wherever we can, as we do not like to take something for nothing. Last Saturday we stopped with a widow lady who gave us ten dollars, saying she had designed it for charitable purposes and knew she could not bestow it where it would do more good than it would to us. We got a long ride on the railroad for that, which helped us along nicely. On Monday last we saved a child of three years from drowning, and the grateful mother kept us all night, gave us three dollars apiece, and filled our carpet-bags with provisions. She said she would gladly do more if she were able. We told her we did not want anything for a mere act of common humanity; but we had to take her presents, to satisfy, in some measure, her grateful heart. The next day we got a twelve-mile ride with an old farmer, who, when he heard our story, offered to take us home and keep us a few weeks on his farm, and if we were mutually pleased he would adopt us as his sons, as his two boys had both been killed during the war, and he and his wife lived alone. But we told him we preferred going on to the Black Hills, as we wanted to get rich quickly, so as to help mother and the girls to get a pleasant home. He gave us twenty dollars, telling us we could pay him again when we 'made our pile.' We have his name and address, and shall return the money if we have luck. He said he was an Infidel, and that the little he had done for us must not be called a deed of Christianity, for Christ had no more to do with it than Mohammed or Confucius had, but that it was an offering of love and duty from man to his kind. He made us think of the Darwins; and as we enjoyed the grateful hospitality of his pleasant home and heard the sound, sensible remarks of himself and wife, we felt more and more encouraged in our idea of some day believing as they do. We haven't read a word in the Bible, or made a single prayer, since we started, though there is generally a Bible in the rooms where we sleep. We talk a great deal about religion with everybody and with one another, and you would be surprised, Sue, to see how many different beliefs there are; and all the different sects seem to be sure that they only are right, and that all others are wrong. You, who have seen few but Campbellites and Methodists, do not realize that the great mass of the people are so split up into sects as they are. We often count as many as five different churches in a small town that can hardly support one decently; and the whole of them are all the while disputing with one another about mere trifles, such as immersion or sprinkling, infant baptism, a real hell, and all conceivable sorts of subjects.

"But it is ten o'clock, and we must go to bed. We are staying to-night with a Mr. Brown, an old Quaker gentleman. His wife is a nice, motherly woman, and just as kind as kind can be. We do so admire the pleasant, friendly 'thee' and 'thou.' They seem almost as nice as Infidels.

"We send bushels of love to mother, and the girls, and baby Allie, and dear, darling Sue, and all who care for it. Your loving brothers,

"SAM and BILL.

"P. S.—We send this fifty miles out of our way by a driver who has promised to mail it for us, as we don't mean father shall have the postmark to trace us by. "S. and B."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.—CONTINUED.

CHAPTER VIII.—CONTINUED.

LAWS OF TRANSMISSION BY INHERITANCE.—ADAPTATION AND NUTRITION.

In the last chapter we considered Transmission by Inheritance, one of the two universal vital activities of organisms, Adaptation and Inheritance, which by their interaction produce the different species of organisms, and we have endeavored to trace this very mysterious vital activity to a more general physiological function of organisms, namely, to Propagation. This latter in its turn, like other vital phenomena of animals and plants, depends on physical and chemical relations. It is true they appear at times exceedingly complicated, but can nevertheless in reality be traced to simple mechanical causes—that is, to the relations of attraction and repulsion in the particles or molecules—in fact, to the motional phenomena of matter.

Now, before we turn our attention to the second function, the phenomenon of Adaptation or Mutability, which counteracts the Transmission by Inheritance, it seems appropriate first to cast one more glance at the various manifestations of Heredity, which we may perhaps even now denominate the "laws of transmission by inheritance." Unfortunately, up to the present time very little has been done for this most important subject, either in zoology or in botany, and almost all we know of the different laws of inheritance is confined to the experiences of gardeners and farmers. It is not therefore to be wondered at, that on the whole these exceedingly interesting and important phenomena have not been investigated with desirable scientific accuracy, or reduced to the form of scientific laws. Accordingly, what I shall relate of the different laws of transmission are only some preliminary fragments taken out of the infinitely rich store which lies open to our inquiry.

We may first divide all the different phenomena of inheritance into two groups, which we may distinguish as the transmission of inherited characters, and the transmission of acquired characters; and we may call the former the conservative transmission, and the latter the progressive transmission by inheritance. This distinction depends upon the exceedingly important fact that the individuals of every species of animals and plants can transmit to their descendants, not only those qualities which they themselves have inherited from their ancestors, but also the peculiar, individual qualities they have acquired during their own life. The latter are transmitted by progressive, the former by conservative inheritance. We have now first to examine the phenomena of conservative inheritance, that is, the transmission of such qualities as the organism has already received from its parents or ancestors (Gen. Morph. ii. 180).

Among the phenomena of conservative inheritance we are first struck by that which is its most general law, and which we may term the law of uninterrupted or continuous transmission. It is so universal among the higher animals and plants, that the uninitiated might overestimate its action and consider it as the only normal law of transmission by inheritance. This law simply consists in the fact that among most species of animals and plants, every generation is, on the whole, like the preceding—that the parents are as like the grandparents as they are like the children. "Like produces like," as is commonly said, but more accurately "similar things produce similar things." For, in reality, the descendants of every organism are never absolutely equal in all points, but only similar in a greater or less degree. This law is so generally known that I need not give any examples of it.

The law of interrupted or latent transmission by inheritance, which might also be termed alternating transmission, is in a measure opposed to the preceding law. This important law appears principally active among many lower animals and plants, and manifests itself in contrast to the former in the fact that the offspring are not like their parents, but very dissimilar, and that only the third or a later generation becomes similar to the first. The grandchildren are like the grandparents, but quite unlike the parents. This is a remarkable phenomenon, and, as is well known, occurs also very frequently, though in a less degree, in human families. Every one of my readers doubtless knows some members of a family who, in this or that peculiarity, much more resemble the grandfather or grandmother than the father or mother. Sometimes it lies in bodily peculiarities, for example, features of face, color of hair, size of body—sometimes in mental qualities, for example, temperament, energy, understanding—which are transmitted in this manner. This fact may be observed in domestic animals as well as in the case of man. Among the domestic animals most liable to vary—as the dog, horse, and ox—breeders very frequently find that the product by breeding resembles the grandparents far more than it does its own parental organism. If we express this general law, and succession of generations by the letters of the alphabet, then A = C = E, whilst B = D = F, and so on.

This very remarkable fact appears in a more striking way in the lower animals and plants than in the higher, and especially in the well-known phenomenon of alternation of generations (metagenesis). Here we very frequently find—for example, among the Planarian worms, sea-squirts or Tunicates, Zoophytes, and also among ferns and mosses—that the organic individual in the first place produces, by propagation, a form completely different from the parental form, and that only the descendants of this generation, again, become like the first. This regular change of generation was discovered by the poet Chamisso, on his voyage round the world in 1819, among the Salpæ, cylindrical tunicates, transparent like glass, which float on the surface of the sea. Here the larger generation, the individuals of which live isolated and possess an eye of the form of a horse-shoe, produce in a non-sexual manner (by the formation of buds) a completely different and smaller generation. The individuals of this second smaller generation live united in chains, and possess a cone-shaped eye. Every individual of such a chain produces, in a sexual manner (hermaphrodite) again, a non-sexual solitary form of the first and larger generation. Among the Salpæ, therefore, it is always the first, third, and fifth generations, and in like manner the second, fourth, and sixth generations, that are entirely like one another. However, it is not always only one, but in other cases a number of generations, which are thus leapt over; so that the first generation resembles the fourth and seventh, the second resembles the fifth and eighth, the third resembles the sixth and ninth, and so on. Three different generations alternate with one another; for example, among the neat little sea-buoys (Doliolum), small tunicates closely related to the Salpæ. In this case it is A = D = G, further, B = E = H, and C = F = I. Among the plant-lice (Aphides), each sexual generation is followed by a succession of from eight to ten or twelve non-sexual generations, which are like one another, but differ from the sexual generations. Then, again, a sexual generation reappears like the one long before vanished.

If we further follow this remarkable law of latent or interrupted inheritance, and take into consideration all the phenomena appertaining to it, we may comprise under it also the well-known phenomena of reversion. By the term "reversion," or "atavism," we understand the remarkable fact, known to all breeders of animals, that occasionally single and individual animals assume a form which has not existed for many generations, but belongs to a generation which has long since disappeared. One of the most remarkable instances of this kind is the fact that in some horses there sometimes appear singular dark stripes, similar to those of the zebra, quagga, and other wild species of African horses. Domestic horses of the most different races and of all colors sometimes show such dark stripes; for example, a stripe along the back, a stripe across the shoulders, and the like. The sudden appearance of these stripes can only be explained by the supposition that it is the effect of a latent transmission, a relapse into the ancient original form, which has long since vanished, and was once common to all species of horses; the original form, undoubtedly, was originally striped like the zebras, quaggas, etc. In like manner, certain qualities in other domestic animals sometimes appear quite suddenly, which once marked their wild ancestors, now long since extinct. In plants, also, such a relapse can be observed very frequently. All my readers probably know the wild yellow toad-flax (Linaria vulgaris), a plant very common in our fields and hedges. Its dragon-mouthed yellow flower contains two long and two short stamens. But sometimes there appears a single blossom (Peloria) which is funnel-shaped, and quite regularly composed of five individual and equal sections, with five corresponding stamens. This Peloria can only be explained as a relapse into the long since extinct and very ancient common form of all those plants which, like the toad-flax, possess dragon-mouthed, two-lipped flowers, with two long and two short stamens. The original form, like the Peloria, possessed a regular five-spurred blossom, with five equal stamens, which only later and by degrees have become unequal (compare p. 17). All such relapses are to be brought under the law of interrupted or latent transmission, although the number of intervening generations may be enormous.

When cultivated plants or domestic animals become wild, when they are withdrawn from the conditions of cultivated life, they experience changes which appear not only as adaptations to their new mode of life, but partially, also, as relapses into the ancient original form out of which the cultivated forms have been developed. Thus, the different kinds of cabbage, which are exceedingly different in form, may be led back to the original form, by allowing them to grow wild. In like manner, dogs, horses, heifers, etc., when growing wild, often revert, more or less, to a long extinct generation. An immensely long succession of generations may pass away before this power of latent transmission becomes extinguished.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier.

THIRD PROOF OF THE FALSITY OF RELIGION, DRAWN FROM PRETENDED VISIONS AND DIVINE REVELATIONS.

We now come to those pretended visions and divine revelations on which Christians found and establish the truth and certitude of their religion.

To give a just idea of these, I do not think I could do better than to state, generally, that if any one at the present time had the hardihood to boast of having been the recipient of such like, and take credit to himself in consequence, he would infallibly be regarded as a fanatic or a madman.

The following are some of these pretended divine revelations and visions:

God, say these pretended sacred books, having for the first time appeared to Abraham, said to him, "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee" (Gen. xii, 3). Abraham, having gone to this land, says the story, God appeared to him a second time, and said to him, "Unto thy seed will I give this land" (Gen. xii, 7). In gratitude for this gracious promise, Abraham built God an altar.

After the death of Isaac, Jacob, his son, going one day to Mesopotamia in search of a wife that would suit him, having journeyed all that day, and finding himself fatigued, lay down to sleep, with a stone for his pillow. And he dreamed he saw a ladder set upon the earth, the top of which reached to heaven; and angels were ascending and descending this ladder; and he looked and saw that God himself stood above it.

And God said to him: "I am the Lord God of Abraham, thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed.

"And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south; and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blssed.

"And behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of."

And Jacob awoke, and said, "Surely, the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not. . . . How dreadful is this place! this is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." And he rose up early in the morning and took the stone that he had used for a pillow and set it up and poured oil upon it, and vowed a vow that if God would keep him safe until he returned to his father's house, he would give him a tenth of his possessions.

Here, again, is another vision: While keeping the flocks of his father-in-law, Laban, who had promised him all the speckled and spotted cattle as his hire, he dreamed one night that he saw the males leap on the females, and that they conceived lambs speckled and spotted and of divers colors. And in this dream God said to him, "Lift up now thine eyes and see; all the rams that leap upon the cattle are ring-streaked, speckled, and grizzled; for I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee. . . . Now, arise; get thee out from this land and return unto the land of thy kindred." As he was returning with all his family and all his possessions, he met, the story goes on to say, with a strange man, with whom he wrestled through the night, even to the rising of the sun. This man, seeing that he could not prevail against him, asked him what his name was. Jacob told him, and he said: "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel; for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed" (Genesis xxxii, 25, 28).

Such were among the earliest of these pretended divine revelations, and all those that followed are not any better. Now, is there anything divine in such crude dreams and such vain delusions? If any one now were to tell us of such fooleries, in the belief that they were divine revelations, as, for instance, a foreigner going to France, and, after having visited its finest provinces, should declare that God had appeared to him in his own country and told him to go into France, and that he would give to him and his descendants all the great lands, lordships, and provinces of that country; that he had made a covenant with him, that he would multiply his race, that he would make his posterity as numerous as the stars of heaven, etc., who would not laugh at such folly, and look upon him who uttered it as either a fool or a madman? And there is no reason whatever to induce us to judge or think otherwise of all that has been put into the mouths of those pretended holy patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, touching the pretended divine revelations that had been vouchsafed them.

With regard to the institution of bloody sacrifices, the Scriptures clearly attribute them to God. As it would be too unpleasant to enter into more ample details concerning these disgusting ceremonies, I refer the reader to Exodus, chapter twenty-nine.

But were not the men of those days both foolish and blind, to think they were honoring God by torturing, killing, and burning his own creatures under the pretext of offering him sacrifices. And now, in these our own days, how can the Christians be so blasphemously stupid as to believe and require others to believe that they cannot make themselves more acceptable to their God the Father than by offering him daily as a sacrifice his divine Son, in memory of his having been shamefully hung on a cross, where he wretchedly and miserably gave up the ghost? Assuredly, this does not proceed from an obstinate blindness of spirit.

As for the items of the sacrifices of animals, they consist but of colored garments, blood, plucks, livers, kidneys, hoofs, skins, dung, smoke, cakes, certain measures of oil and wine, the whole stinking and offered with filthy ceremonies, as miserably grotesque and absurd as even the most threadbare of worn-out tricks of legerdemain. But what is more horrible still is that the law of this detestable Jewish nation ordained the offering up of human sacrifice. The barbarians (for such they were) who made this abominable law ordained (Lev. xxvii) that any man who had been vowed to the god of the Jews, whom they called Adonaï, should be mercilessly slaughtered, and it was in obedience to this execrable decree that Jephthah immolated his daughter, that Saul was going to immolate his son.

And, again, another proof of the falsity of these same revelations is the non-fulfillment of the grand and magnificent promises that accompanied them; for certain it is that these promises never were fulfilled.

This is proved by three principal things: 1. To render their posterity more numerous than all the other peoples of the earth, etc.; 2. To render the people of their race the most prosperous, the most pious, and the most triumphant of the earth, etc.; 3. And likewise to render his alliance eternal, and that they should possess forever the land that he should give them. Now, it is certain that these promises have never been fulfilled.

In the first place, it is certain that the Jewish people, or the people of Israel, which is the only one that can be regarded as descending from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the only one to whom these promises should have been fulfilled, has never been numerous enough to be compared in number to the other nations of the globe; still less, consequently, to the sands of the sea, the stars of heaven, etc.; for we see that, at the period when they were most numerous and most flourishing, they never occupied other than the petty, sterile provinces of Palestine and its environs, and which are as nothing when compared to the vast number of flourishing countries that are scattered abroad over the face of the earth.

Secondly, these promises have never been accomplished with regard to the great blessings of which the Jews should have been the recipients; for, though here and there they obtained a few small victories over a few miserable tribes whom they plundered, they were, nevertheless, the more generally vanquished and led into bondage; their kingdom, as well as their nation, was destroyed by the Roman armies; and now, even in these our days, we see what remains of this unhappy nation regarded as the vilest and most contemptible of the human race,* having nowhere on the face of the earth either superiority or domination.

Thirdly, and finally, these promises have equally remained unfulfilled with regard to the eternal alliance that God was to have entered into with them. There neither is now nor ever was any sign or token of this alliance; and, on the contrary, they have been for many centuries excluded from the possession of the corner of earth which they claim had been promised to them forever. Thus, all those pretended promises having remained without effect, their falsity is manifest. And this proves manifestly, again, that those pretended holy and sacred books which contain them have not been written under the inspiration of God. Thus it is in vain that Christians pretend to use them as an infallible testimony of the truth of their religion.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

* It must not be forgotten that Meslier wrote this some one hundred and fifty years ago.

WAFFLES.—One pint sweet milk, four eggs, one large cupful cold rice or hominy, a little salt, flour to make a stiff batter, baking powder in the proportion of three teaspoonfuls to a quart of flour.

Correspondence Extraordinary.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. IX.

MY DEAR READERS: It would be a lengthy story, indeed, were I to detain you long enough to tell you in full how we manufactured all the primates in aeriform state, and then, by the process already partially described, gradually brought them into a compact form, and made the mass to assume a solid or semi-solid condition. The process was necessarily a slow one, and after the primates were duly separated, or evolved, time was a necessary element to perfect the completion of the grand enterprise.

After we had prepared the simple substances, it was a most interesting labor to bring them into contact and form the hundreds of chemical compounds which we devised. Had we not proved it, we would not have believed that such an almost interminable number of substances of all kinds and descriptions could be compounded from the limited number of primates we had prepared. We found, of course, that some of these elementary substances were much more useful than others in making the compounds. The gases we made first we used far the most extensively, especially hydrogen, oxygen, carbon, nitrogen, and chlorine; and, of the more solid substances used in forming globes, we made very extensive use of iron, aluminum, calcium, sodium, potassium, sulphur, and others of the primates. Several of these we brought into contact, when the chemical union produced compounds containing qualities totally unlike the simples in their original condition. It was curious to watch these operations, and to see how, by using different equivalents of the same primates, what different results would be produced. It was equally interesting to observe how the union of two or more simples that in themselves were mild and harmless would produce compounds of the most acrid and poisonous character. It was not at all uncommon that the products of certain compounds would seem to have no properties in common with the simples of which they were composed. I remember distinctly how much surprised Jah was at some of these results; and one day he said to me, "How is this, Luce, that so many of the compounds we turn out become so completely unlike the primary elements of which we form them, and are often far more acrid and powerful than the substances from which we prepare them? Take sulphuric acid, for instance, which you tell me is composed of oxygen and sulphur in proportions of five to one. Neither of the component substances are in themselves sharp or acrid, but when they combine into one substance, how changed they become, and what a powerful, acrid compound we have in their place! and how readily this enters into combination with many other substances, simple and complex! And what a difference an equivalent more or less of oxygen makes in the compound produced! With three equivalents of oxygen to one of sulphur, the substance produced is comparatively mild; but with five equivalents of oxygen, the result is one of the most acrid, eating, and powerful substances we have produced. I notice, also, similar results in compounds produced from other elements. It is interesting to observe all these operations."

"Yes, Brother; you are quite right. The science of chemistry, in which we are now delving, and by which we have to produce all the interminable compounds, aerial, fluid, and solid, of which all our suns and worlds are composed, is one of the greatest in the whole range of sciences known to us, or which will be known to the millions of sentient beings whom we have yet to bring into existence. It is of immense utility to us now, and will be also of great use to them in future ages. I am glad you have dubbed me 'Professor of Chemistry' in the grand University of Nature. I cannot conceive that I could have any higher honor, or be employed in any more useful occupation. The art of evolving the primates from the homogeneous substances which we formed of nothing, and then producing from it the hundred primates, and then, again, the hundreds and thousands of compounds which are formed from them, producing all the varied results that can be imagined, is one of the greatest achievements that gods can be equal to, and I am satisfied that, had there been in existence thousands of other gods besides us, they could not have done what we have accomplished in this line. With you, I am truly proud of what we are now producing, and it gives me special pleasure to think that I have, individually, done so much towards creating and establishing the laws which must ever govern the combinations and operations of the matter we have made. There cannot be a shadow of a doubt but that it is one of the most important fields of study which we shall devise, for the existence of the worlds depends upon it, and also the endless millions of forms of vegetable and animal life which we are now intending to introduce upon our worlds as soon as the conditions are favorable for such life. And, Brother, you pay me the highest possible compliment when you call me the chemist and accord to me the credit of getting up the system, or science. I have to thank you for your co-operation, and the willingness you have evinced to allow me to experiment and test the substances and forces we have produced, as well as for the confidence you have reposed in my knowledge and judgment, and the honor you so cheerfully award me for what I have thus far accomplished. We have much yet to perfect—many new laws to establish and many new truths to learn and make permanent for future ages."

"I am with you, Luce, until this contract is filled, and we get our universe running in apple-pie order. What you and I cannot do, cannot be done at all."

"I guess that is about so, Jah. Considering our origin and early opportunities, I think we are pretty fair specimens for a manufacturing firm, and I think we have turned out as good work and as much of it as could have been done by scores of rival divinities had they been brought into existence in place of us. Now that we are rested somewhat, let us pitch in again and perfect these many operations we have on hand."

You can hardly expect I will take the time to explain to you in detail all the means we employed in producing the almost infinite number of compounds we formed from our primates, and the forces we set to work to condense them into compact and solid globes. The process was so complicated, and required such a lapse of time, that it would become tedious to you if I should dwell upon every point and detail to you the many expedients we found it necessary to resort to and the trials and experiments we found it needful to test before we were able to accomplish all we wished to perfect. If you will allow your minds to dwell upon the subject, you cannot help realizing, to some extent, the vastness of our enterprise in effecting the composition of the millions of worlds we had in process of formation and the immense amount of care and watchfulness necessary to be exercised in such an infinite and difficult labor as Jah and I had undertaken. If you will bear in mind, however, that all this work had to be performed before our worlds could be capable of producing and sustaining living, sentient beings like yourselves, you will feel a measure of appreciation and gratitude for the efforts made in the long ago for your benefit now.

It will doubtless strike many of you as being a wonderful thing how a light form of matter, so widely diffused through all the vast expanse of the universe, could be brought together in compact and moving spheres, but it was, as I have partially explained by the inherent forces existing in the matter we had formed and the material influences which we brought to bear. There is no matter, however light and ethereal its form of existence, but what, under influences possible to be produced, can be resolved or compressed into a solid state. Your chemists in modern times have found that by pressure alone they have been able to compress carbonic acid gas into a fluid, and then a solid state; some of you have seen this experiment performed. And quite recently your scientists have succeeded in reducing hydrogen gas—about the lightest substance known—into a solid state where it assumed the appearance of a metal, which it really is. It may be set down as a fact that all forms of matter may exist both in a gaseous and solid form, conditions being what govern all.

One of the most interesting branches of study and investigation connected with world-making and the perfection of the compounds of the various primary elements was crystallization, or crystallography. As soon as we had brought the worlds into a compact state, and they had become solid enough to assume a firm consistency, we found a vast field of labor before us in crystallizing the various fused metals and fluid substances which we had produced in such immense quantities. It proved to be one of the most interesting studies in which we ever engaged; and to devise the modes and to establish the laws by which the processes should then and forever afterwards be accomplished, you may well conclude, required a great deal of thought on our part. The way we got up prisms, angles, rhomboids, cubes, hexagons, octagons, polygons, needles, and other geometrical forms, was most curious to ourselves, and the same laws have proved a highly interesting study to many deep thinkers and philosophers, even down to your own time.

We arranged the laws of crystallization in such a way that metals in a state of fusion, and salts and other substances in a state of solution, under proper conditions, formed crystals peculiar to the substance from which they were produced, and that when the conditions were the same, the results should always be undeviating, the same substance always producing the same character of crystals. The great variety of crystals in size and form produced by us, and the accuracy with which these results were produced at every repetition of the process proved a beautiful and absorbing study. The laws we brought into existence were so perfect, they operated with such uniformity, and the organization seemed so distinct, that it is not strange if the process has been relegated to the domain of life. The atoms for the matter to be crystallized each having a definite form of its own, when by the action of heat, light, and electricity, they accumulated in crystals, followed the law of form, and always preserved the same contour and general peculiarities.

Many of the rocks, as they emerged from the semi-fluid and plastic condition, readily took the form of crystals, all the varieties of course retaining the characteristics peculiar to them; and it was the same with the numerous solutions in a fluid state. Although the forms of crystals appeared almost infinite, yet upon carefully considering their axes, angles, faces, and edges, they fell into six well-defined groups, distinguished from each other by the relative positions and lengths of their axes. These groups again subdivided into divisions according to the arrangement of their planes with respect to their axes. The six classes or systems of crystals mentioned were: 1. Regular system, in which the axes have equal rectangular, octohedron, and rhombic dodecahedron are the principal members of this class; 2. Square prismatic, in which two of the axis only were equal, all the rest being rectangular; 3. Right prismatic, in which all the axes were unequal, and all rectangular. To assist your memory, let me state to you that in each of the foregoing systems the whole of the axes were rectangular, while in the following three the axes were all inclined to each other; 4. Rhombohedral, in which these axes were equal, but not rectangular; 5. Oblique prismatic, one axis rectangular to two, but all unequal; 6. Double oblique, in which all the axes were unequal, and none rectangular. The forms belonging to different systems shaded off gradually into each other. Thus, the cube, by being slightly increased on one of its faces, became a square prism, and the square prism by having one of its sides slightly enlarged, became a right prism. Many forms were derived from each other by having slices removed from their angles and edges. Thus, the octrohedron was modified into a cube by having its angles gradually sliced away, and into a rhombic dodecahedron by having its edges treated in a similar manner.

We had a busy time of it, I assure you, in getting up all these forms of crystals, and it required so much exactitude that my Brother towards the last grew quite tired of it, and one day, as the shades of evening approached (for you must know by this time we had our mornings and evenings), he said to me in a weary sort of way, "Look here, Luce, this work is altogether too tedious and particular to suit me. I would rather be bringing nothing or very thin matter from the extreme confines of space and mixing it together, than to be puttering here week after week in getting up rhomboids, cones, prisms, and octohedrons. That seemed like business, but this don't seem like work fit for a god."

"Why, Brother Jah," said I, "for my part, this pleases me wonderfully well! I find the occupation extremely interesting. Of course it requires care and exactitude, but there is so much in the work that repays for all the care and watchfulness bestowed upon it, that it would take me a long time to tire of it."

"I really believe, Luce, it all comes from your being so much more fond of chemistry than I am. Chemistry, geometry, and mathematics, are too close and exact for my taste. I would rather manufacture thunder and hail and storms than to be puzzling my brains over these exact and critical studies. As I said before, I will give up chemistry and geometry to you. I will, of course, help you out as far as I can, but you must take the immediate control of them, and I will attend more to the heavy work belonging to our enterprise."

It is not my purpose, kind readers, to weary you with unnecessary details about the protracted labor of crystallization, nor to tire you with our conversations held from time to time. My wish is to give you as clear an idea as possible, from the metaphysical standpoint, of the labors we performed during the ages we were getting up the universe, and to apprise you as to how the work interested us. I will now close this letter with the fervent wish that you may live long, and enjoy as great a measure of happiness as usually falls to the lot of mortals in this troublesome state of existence through which you are passing. Sincerely your friend,

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

We clip the following from the Washington Post. If it is true, it must be admitted Anthony has a very bad record indeed:

ANTHONY COMSTOCK IN TROUBLE.—Anthony Comstock, who claims to be a special agent of the Post-office department for the suppression of vice, etc., is being made a martyr of in five cities, to the tune of eleven indictments by the grand juries, one United States district attorney alone having fifteen separate and distinct counts in one indictment for violation of the postal laws and acts of Congress. It is alleged that Comstock opened too many letters for the good of the public service, and got caught in his own trap set for others. Only think of Madame Restell, of New York, and Anthony in the same Sing Sing at the same time.

WE HAVE just issued a new catalogue of our publications and the books we have to sell. Sent free upon application.

Lessons in Popular Science.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.
BY D. M. B.

ECLIPSES OF THE SUN AND MOON.

The inhabitants of the world in olden times were terrified by the eclipses of the sun and moon which frequently took place, and, in their ignorance, they attributed them to the interposition of invisible deities and demons. By close observation, however, they learned after a time that the eclipses occurred periodically and were induced by natural causes. They discovered that when the moon came in a direct line between the earth and the sun an eclipse or shadowing of the latter was the consequence. If the two bodies had always followed the same track, there would have been an eclipse of the sun at every new moon; but in consequence of the inclination of the two orbits, the moon generally passed below or above the sun, when, of course, no eclipse took place. When the sun happened to be in the neighborhood of the moon's node, when the moon passed, there would be sure to be an eclipse. While the moon performed its next circuit, the sun moved so far away from the moon's node that a very slight eclipse, or none at all, took place. As the sun crossed both nodes of the moon within a year, there must have been at least two eclipses of the sun every year, and this result has taken place every year down to the present time.

The cause of eclipses of the moon were not so easy for the ancients to understand as those of the sun. Not understanding the motions of the earth and the moon the phenomenon of a lunar eclipse was a great marvel; but in time they observed that eclipses of the moon always took place when the latter was at its full, and on the side of the earth opposite from the sun. The suggestion that the earth cast a shadow, and that the moon passed into it could hardly fail to present itself, and hence it is found that many of the early observers of the movements of the heavenly bodies come to understand with considerable clearness the causes of lunar eclipses.

The reason why eclipses of the moon take place at distant periods is of the same general character as of the rare occurrence of eclipses of the sun. The centre of the earth's shadow is always, like the sun, in the ecliptic, and unless the moon happens to be very near the ecliptic, and therefore very near one of her nodes at the time of the full moon, she will not strike the shadow, but pass above it or below it. As the sun is so much larger than the earth, the shadow of the earth at the distance of the moon is much smaller than the earth itself, and ultimately comes to a point. This explains the fact that the moon must be nearer her node in a lunar than a solar eclipse. A whole year sometimes passes and no eclipse of the moon takes place.

The nature of an eclipse varies with the positions and apparent magnitudes of the sun and moon. If in a solar eclipse, the centre of the moon passes directly over the centre of the sun, then, it is clear that if the apparent angular diameter of the moon exceed that of the sun, the latter will be entirely obscured. This is called a total eclipse of the sun. Such an eclipse can only occur when the observer is near the line joining the centres of the sun and moon. If, under the same circumstances, the apparent magnitude of the moon is less than the magnitude of the sun, the whole of the latter cannot be covered, but a ring of light on the outer part of the sun will be apparent. This is called an annular eclipse. If the moon does not pass directly over the sun, it can cover only a portion of the sun's face, and forms only a partial eclipse. It is the same with the moon; if it is only partially immersed in the earth's shadow, the obscuration of the moon is only partial, while it is total when it passes directly through the shadow. An annular eclipse of the moon never occurs, because at the distance of the moon the earth's shadow is always larger than the diameter of the smaller orb.

In most eclipses of the sun the shadow of the moon comes to a point before it reaches the earth, and as the apparent angular diameter of the moon is less than that of the sun, there can be no total eclipse; but if the observer is in a line with the center of the shadow, the sun shows itself on all sides of the moon.

In about half the lunar eclipses, the moon passes so far above or below the center of the shadow that a part of her body is inside of it and part outside at the time of the greatest obscurity; this, of course, is but a partial eclipse of the moon. The magnitude of the eclipses, whether of the sun or moon, was by the ancient astronomers measured by digits. The diameter of either orb was divided into twelve equal parts, and these were called digits; the magnitude of the eclipse was stated to be equal to a certain portion of the twelve digits obscured by the shadow of the earth or moon, as the case might be. When four digits were said to be eclipsed, they meant that one-third of the surface of the orb was eclipsed, and not one-third of the diameter.

The duration of an eclipse varies according to the position of the bodies. Eclipses of the moon last much longer than eclipses of the sun. Total obscurations of the solar body last but five or six minutes, while of the lunar orb it sometimes continues two hours, and a partial eclipse nearly four hours. Total eclipses of the sun afford valued opportunities for studying the operations taking place in the vicinity of that luminary.

There exists a relation between the motions of the sun and moon which greatly aided the ancient astronomers in the prediction of eclipses. It has already been stated that the moon makes one revolution round the earth in twenty-seven days and eight hours. Since the node of the orbit is constantly moving back to meet the moon, she will return to her node in a little less than this period, namely, as shown by modern observations, in a mean interval of 27.21222 days. The sun, after passing any node of the orbit, will reach the same node again in 346.6201 days. The relation between these numbers is this: 242 returns of the moon to a node take very nearly the same time as 19 returns of the sun; consequently, if at any given time the sun and moon should start out together from a node, they would at the end of 3,685 days, or eighteen years and eleven days, be again found together, very near the same node. During the interval there would have been 223 new and full moons, but none so near the node as this.

The period just named was called the Saros, and may be applied in this way: Let us note the exact time of the middle of any eclipse, either of the sun or moon; then let us count 6,585 days, 7 hours, and 42 minutes, and another eclipse will be found of almost precisely the same character. Reduced to years, the term will be eighteen years and ten or eleven days, according to whether the 29th of February has intervened four or five times within the period. This being true of all eclipses, if all are recorded which take place within a period of eighteen years, it will be found that after ten or eleven days the series will begin over again, with the exception that the point on the earth's surface where the greatest obscuration takes place will not occur at the same hour in the twenty-four. This will prevent the eclipses being of precisely the same magnitude, and may nearly cause its entire failure. Every successive recurrence of the eclipse at the end of the period being 28 minutes further back relatively to the node, the conjunction must in process of time be so far back from the node as not to produce an eclipse at all. During nearly every period it will be found that some eclipse fails and that some new one enters in. A new eclipse of the moon thus entering will be very small indeed. At every return of the same it will be larger, until about its thirtieth recurrence, when it will be total. It will be total for about twenty-two or twenty-three recurrences, when it will become partial once more, but on the opposite side of the moon from that on which it was first seen. There will then be thirteen partial eclipses, each smaller than the last, until they fail entirely. The whole interval of time over which the recurrence of a lunar eclipse thus extends will be about forty-eight periods, or 865 1-2 years. The solar eclipses occurring further from the node, will last yet longer, namely, from 65 to 70 periods, or over 1,200 years.

It must be understood that the numbers here given are not strictly accurate for all cases, because the motions both of the sun and moon are subject to certain small irregularities which may alter the time of eclipses by an hour or more. The mean values only are given, which are near enough the truth for all practical purposes.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

RECENT SCIENTIFIC PUBLICATIONS.—Let the reader not be daunted by the title, "Physiography" which Prof. Huxley has given to a reprint of educational lectures on the elements of physical science. The name is not employed in its restricted sense of a department of mineralogy, but is substituted for the usual term—physical geography—because the author wishes to draw a clear line of demarcation both as to matter and method between his treatise and the current handbooks on the subject. Prof. Huxley's "Physiography," indeed, has very little in common with those dull descriptions of the earth which begin with telling a child that it is an oblate spheriod moving round the sun in an elliptical orbit, and end without giving him the slightest hint as to the meaning of the phenomena of the brook which runs through his village. His readers are not troubled with much about latitudes and longitudes, the heights of mountains, depths of seas, or the geographical distribution of kangaroos. But his book gives them in broad, accurate outlines, a view of the place in nature of a particular district of England, the basin of the Thames, and leaves upon their minds the impression that the muddy waters of the well-known river, the hills between which it flows and the breezes which blow over it, are not isolated phenomena to be taken as understood because they are familiar. On the contrary, the conviction dawns upon the learner step by step, that to compass even an elementary conception of what goes on in his native village he must know something about the universe; that the pebble he kicks aside to-day would not be what it is and where it is unless a particular chapter of the earth's history, finished untold ages ago, had been exactly what it was. Of course, any intelligent teacher will have no difficulty in making use of the river basin of his own district, but in Prof. Huxley's volume, addressed to Londoners, it is the movement of the Thames water at London bridge which forms the starting point of studies gradually expanded into one and twenty chapters. What is the source of the Thames? is his first question, and simple as the inquiry looks, it is not answered even in outline until the last chapter has been reached, and something said of that vast body, more than ninety millions of miles away, around which the earth is circling. And thus the spectacle of the ebb and flow of the tide under London bridge becomes in the end a symbol of the working of forces which extend from planet to planet, and from star to star, throughout the universe. It should be added that in this carefully graduated and felicitous exposition a vast amount of knowledge respecting natural phenomena and their interdependence, and even some practical experience of scientific method is conveyed with all the precision of statement which distinguishes science from common information—and this is done without overstepping the comprehension of learners who possess no further share of preliminary training than that which falls to the lot of boys and girls in a primary school. In a word, with the help of this treatise, whose modest aim is carried out with notable self-repression and consistency, the knowledge of the child may be made to grow in the same manner as that of the human race has spontaneously expanded.—N. Y. Sun.

Answers to Inquirers.

J. G.—How can I get rid of cockroaches? Ans.—Sprinkle pulverized borax where they frequent. There are many other ways to get rid of them, but they are more or less dangerous, as poison must be used. Borax is harmless.

DR. M.—1. I wish to know if there are any papers in the United States devoted to the discussion of historical subjects. Ans.—There are none devoted wholly to that subject, though many papers publish articles relating to historical investigations. 2. Will you answer questions on religious subjects through your paper? Ans.—Yes; or upon any other subject. That is what this column is for.

N. L. E.—Is there a history of Mexico going further back than the time when Cortez and his men murdered Montezuma? Ans.—Prescott's "History of the conquest of Mexico" goes back as far as any history we have of that country, but he gives little more of its history previous to the time of Cortez than could be gathered from the traditions of the natives.

ANDREAS STEEDBROOK.—Please give me the address of some German newspaper. Ans.—The Freidenker, a German Liberal newspaper, is published at 56 Oneida street, Milwaukee, Wis. In this city, the Allgemeine Zeitung, New-Yorker Journal, Staats Zeitung, and twenty-seven other German periodicals are published; and there are 305 altogether in the United States.

P. T.—How are the leaves of ferns, etc., skeletonized? Ans.—These skeletons are usually prepared by soaking the leaves in blood-warm water until the thin membranous parts have become sufficiently softened by putrefaction to be easily washed out. Dip the remaining portion in a diluted aqueous solution of sodium sulphite, and dry slowly on a piece of blotting paper in the air.

J. W. S.—In Mr. Frothingham's sermon on the "Sectarian Spirit" he speaks of Paul's and Peter's contention. Where can an account of it be found in the Bible? Ans.—Paul says, in his Epistle to the Galatians (ii, 11) "But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed." Mr. Frothingham, who probably quoted from memory, gives the passage slightly different.

SPRING HILL.—Will you please inform me how to clean files by a chemical process? Ans.—If you wish to merely clean files, remove the dirt and grease by washing them in warm potash water, then wash them in warm water and dry with artificial heat. If you wish to re-sharpen them, place 1 pt. warm water in a wooden vessel, and put in your files after cleaning them as above; add 3 ozs. blue vitriol, finely pulverized; 2 ozs. borax, well mized, taking care to turn the files over, so that each one may come in contact with the mixture. Now add 7 ozs. sulphuric acid and 1-4 oz. cider vinegar to the above mixture. Remove the files after a short time, dry, sponge them with olive oil, wrap them in porous paper, and put aside for use. Coarse files require to be immersed longer than fine.

J.—1. Has any treatise on cremation been issued? Ans.—Yes; several. Some of them as far back as 1658. The latest and best work on the subject is Eassie's "Cremation of the Dead," London, 1875, a valuable book in which nearly every source of information on the subject is indicated. 2. What is the difference between an Atheist and an anti-Theist? Ans.—There is no real difference in the meanings of the two words. Webster defines an Atheist as one who disbelieves in the existence of a God, and an anti-Theist as one who is opposed to the belief of a God. 3. Is it a fact that new-school physicians are in general more progressive theologically than their old-school brethren? Ans.—Yes. Orthodoxy in religion and orthodoxy in medicine are generally dropped together. 4. What is "Physio-medicalism"? Ans.—There is no such word in the dictionary. Those who coin new words give them any meaning they please.

The Radical Pulpit.

The Language of the Old Testament.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURE BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The Old Testament is the Hebrew Bible, and though we speak of the Old and New Testaments as one Bible, they are really two. The Old is the Bible of the Jews, the New, the Bible of the Christians. They are connected together historically, to be sure, in such a way that the New Testament can only be explained from its connection with the Old, but really they stand for different systems of thought, of speculation, and of ethics.

The New Testament was written in Greek, the Old Testament was written in Hebrew. Before saying anything about the Hebrew language, and the different phases it went through, let me say something in regard to the new method of deciding upon the dates of scriptures by the discoveries of philology. The science of philology is comparatively recent. It is a study of languages simply as languages, without any regard to literature. The philologist classifies language according to families, and traces their connections till he has discovered their sources. There are the Indo-European and the Semitic languages, which constitute families by themselves. The last idea of the philologist is this: that languages are not so many distinct and isolated manifestations, but all run together, and develop one out of another. Thus the Greek language had its evolution from its connection and roots in languages which had preceded it. In order to master Greek you must also study Sanscrit; you must learn the parent of the Greek. So with Latin and French. The French belongs to the family of Latin languages. Languages grow out of each other as branches from limbs of trees. Every language has words common to those which have gone before. The peculiarities will depend upon new words invented and old ones changed. The expert philologist, simply by study of language, can say this class of words belongs to such a generation, that form belongs to an older or a later. A particular character of words can be assigned to a particular period. There are few words in the Book of Genesis that were in use until seven hundred years before Christ. The philologist says at once, a book containing such words could not have been written by Moses, for he could not have employed words which only came into use five or six hundred years after he died.

The philological method, therefore, decides upon the antiquity of literature according to the language in which it is written. No matter to whom it has been ascribed by tradition, here is a test by which a book is assigned to a certain time. The force of this argument can only be appreciated by one who has taken some pains to examine the work of experts in philology, and to see how they have traced the dividing lines between the literature of one period and that of another. At the present time it is only possible to fix the date of any books within one hundred years. The science may, in fifty years more, be carried to such perfection that the dates of particular books can be fixed within ten or twenty years.

The books of the Old Testament, with the exception of the apocryphal ones, were written in Hebrew. We are too apt to speak of Hebrew as though it were distinct from other languages, entire and finished in itself. In fact, it went through several distinct and important phases, covering centuries of time. There was an ancient Hebrew, of which very few remnants are left, and the roots of which are lost in antiquity. There are those who do not believe that it was ever in popular use. It lasted till about six hundred years before Christ. From that time until seven hundred years after Christ the Hebrew was no longer a popular language. It was simply used for literary purposes. The popular language then was the Aramaic. Beyond seven hundred years after Christ the Aramaic ceased to be popular, and the Arabic replaced it. Hebrew held the same relation to Aramaic that Sanscrit does to Greek. It was a sacred language. It was simple in construction, but consisted almost entirely of roots. The knowledge of it was confined to scholars, and the common people knew nothing of it. The original Hebrew passed through three divisions; the Hebrew proper, the Aramaic, and the Arabic. The Hebrew proper is not a separate, round, and complete language; it underwent reconstruction. It was one of the Semitic family of languages; and, among those who know most about it, it is thought probable that the Hebrews acquired the language of the Philistines and Phœnicians when they first passed through the land of Canaan. There was no sharp distinction between the language of the Hebrews and that of the people whose land they invaded. The Hebrews gradually formed a dialect of their own. It was only when the lines became drawn between them and their neighbors, and they had their own institutions, that their language obtained harmonious development.

The present Hebrew alphabet is supposed to be of Persian origin, from Babylon. Some think it was a corruption of the cuneiform characters. Others suppose it was gradually developed from a mixture of the Jews with the Persians. The earliest writing in the Hebrew tongue must have been at a time when the people were in a condition to write. For a long period—till they were domesticated, had their boundaries established, etc.—there could have been no writing done. The period of the Judges was one of violence and confusion; of perpetual conflict with the native inhabitants of the land. There was nothing like fixed institutions among the Jews until the time of Samuel, eleven centuries before Christ. Samuel was a constructor and organizer. Then came the kings. David's reign was superb, though, in the main, a state of war. The reign of Solomon marked the splendid epoch in Hebrew history. That was the first literary period—the first time, apparently, when the Hebrew language acquired something like flexibility and richness. Tradition says, no one knows with how much truth, that Solomon was a great writer of books. It is likely that Solomon was a patron of literature.

Previous to the time of Samuel there were but fragments of literature—popular songs, war and dance songs, and short poems that could be passed from one to another, remembered and recited, which without writing could be preserved and handed from one generation to another. There are many things in the Old Testament which knowing men have picked out and decided to be genuine antique productions of the ancient spirit of the Hebrews—the morning and evening blessing pronounced in the wilderness before the camp, for instance. Renan detects words in the song of Miriam after the passage of the Red Sea which were not in existence as early as that time; and yet some think this song genuine.

There is now a series of books, nine volumes, called "Records of the Past," translated by living oriental scholars, from old inscriptions on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, some of them reaching back within a few hundred years of the time of Moses. In looking over these fragments I have been struck by their exceeding brevity. The longest one only occupies three or four pages. The next thing that attracts attention is that, without exception, they are simply the records of royal doings—the conquests of kings. They were hieroglyphics by which royal persons recorded and perpetuated their own deeds.

Moses, it is said, wrote the law on tablets of stone. How many tablets of stone would it require to write the whole of Genesis? The probability is that if Moses brought anything down from the mountain, it was simply a few records; but that he could have written even a chapter of the books ascribed to him is past all belief. Writing was in existence at the time of Moses, sacred and hieroglyphic writings, but not popular writing. There were no books written as early as that.

The first age that pretended to be literary at all was that of Samuel. The next was that of Solomon, who closed the period of great kings. It was a very short period. After Solomon, the kingdom fell into divisions, and there was no more grandeur in Israel, until we come to the literary period par eminence. The first great writer of Hebrew was the prophet Joel, whose date was 860 before Christ. From that time to say 200 years before Christ, the literary period of origin, construction, composition, and arrangement went on. The great works, the great historic and prophetic works, were written after Joel's time. That is demonstrated. There is no doubt whatever about that.

Now, put the period of Moses at 2,000 years before Christ, and you have all that interval of time between 2,000 years and 860 when there was no literature deserving of the name.

In the original Hebrew language, there are no points, vowels, or periods. All the Hebrew that we know now has been constructed for us by a series of grammarians, philologists, and scholars, who have been working for several hundred years on the Hebrew language. They gave it its present form, designed its grammar, and made it intelligible. Let me give you an idea of the difficulty these men must have had to make out the meaning of Hebrew words. I open my Hebrew Bible, and there are vowels and vowel points, all complete. There is no difficulty in reading that. This Hebrew is the product of ages of the most laborious scholarship. The original was all but unintelligible. In speaking of the New Testament manuscripts, I described to you how some of them were written on paper which had been covered up before with two or three layers of texts, a Greek play, a Latin poem, but the problem with the Old Testament Hebrew was worse than that. Here was a sacred language written from right to left without a vowel—merely the consonant forms. Even the same word, according as it was pronounced, or as it was used in one or another part of the country, had entirely different meanings. All the letters ran together without any division of words. Conceive, if you can, of the difficulty of deciphering a language like that. The Hebrew Bible contains 5,642 words, and 500 roots of words. The same word, springing from the same root may mean to see, to look, to mistake, to foresee, to experience, to appear, to present one's self, to show something, to demonstrate. The translator has to decide what the meaning of the word is, in each particular case where it occurs. Take another instance. The same word denotes a mirror, a form, an apparition, a resemblance. These translations all have a kindred meaning; they all have something to do with presentation, but nothing more definite than that.

Take another example. The same word will stand for to assent, to rule, to raise, to lift up, to build, to nurture, to rescue (from danger), to bestow victory, to celebrate (a victory), to exalt the voice, to carry off, to offer sacrifice. Also all the corresponding nouns of these numerous verbs are expressed by the same root. Imagine the confusion. According as a scholar is more or less sagacious, according as he is prejudiced, according as he pursues the scientific or unscientific method, according as he is sectarian or not, will be his interpretation of a scripture. Now, you can understand what endless confusion arises in translating the Old Testament. Can you wonder that all translations are not alike?

In the course of time a single word will, by popular use, undergo a number of changes, so that from the beginning of its significance to the end it will not be recognized as the same. A language without fixed standards must undergo continual change until it becomes something quite different from what it started. This process goes on here in America. The language which our forefathers brought from England will hardly be understood now one hundred miles from New York city. The English spoken in London cannot be understood in Yorkshire, and vice versa. The only check which keeps language from undergoing entire modification now is, the existence of men of letters who keep to the standard. The original Hebrew, before the literary age, was fluctuating.

Let me give you another instance of the difficulty of interpreting a language written as the ancient Hebrew was. Take the letters g, t, a, which correspond to similar ones in Hebrew. This may be a noun, or a verb, or a participle. It may have nine meanings. Take the letters d, b, h, r. The word formed by the corresponding letters in Hebrew may have five different meanings, one of which is a word and another a pestilence. How are you to detect the true meaning unless you are scholar enough to run the significance along the line and trace the meaning of the whole.

In the time of Moses, the Hebrew language was unformed, elementary. Moses could not have written Hebrew. If he wrote at all, the language must have been a mixture of Egyptian and the popular language his people picked up in Canaan.

In speaking of the language of the Old Testament, we must dismiss from our minds at the outset, simply from the data furnished by philology, the idea that Moses had anything to do with writing the Old Testament. In fact, the idea that Moses had anything to do with the authorship of the Old Testament is really modern, and was not entertained by the best scholars among the Jews at the time of Christ. It came in later, when it became necessary to give all the sanction possible to the Old Testament writings. Of course what I have said about the language of the Old Testament is a mere outline. I have only touched upon it, but so far as I have gone I have given you the results of the best scholarship at the present time—the results of scholars who have made this matter their life study.

If I were to choose the people with whom I would spend my hours of conversation, they would be certainly such as labored no further than to make themselves readily and clearly apprehended, and would have patience and curiosity to understand me. To have good sense, and ability to express it, are the most essential and necessary qualities in companions. When thoughts rise in us fit to utter among familiar friends, there needs but little care in clothing them.—Anon.

SENSATIONS DURING HANGING.—A question has arisen which very few living persons are in a position to answer, viz., what are the sensations experienced during hanging? Some of the few who have been able to give any account of their consciousness at so critical a moment say that, after one instant of pain, the chief sensation is that of a mass of brilliant colors filling the eyeballs. The Quarterly Review (lxxxv.) treating on this matter says: "An acquaintance of Lord Bacon who meant to hang himself partially, lost his footing, and was cut down at the last extremity, having nearly paid for his curiosity with his life. He declared that he felt no pain, and his only sensations were of fire before his eyes, which changed first to black and then to sky-blue. These colors are even a source of pleasure. A Capt. Montagnac, who was executed in France during the religious wars, but was rescued from the gibbet at the intercession of Marshal Turenne, complained that, having lost all pain in an instant, he had been taken from a light of which the charm defied description. Another criminal, who escaped through the breaking of the halter, said that after a second or two of suffering, a light appeared, and across it a most beautiful avenue of trees." All agree that the uneasiness is quite momentary, that a pleasurable feeling immediately succeeds, that colors of various hues start up before the eyes, and that these having been gazed at for a limited space, the rest is oblivion. The mind, averted from the reality of the situation, is engaged in scenes the most remote from that which fills the eye of the spectator.—All the Year Round.

Communications.

Paine was Junius.

The first letter of Junius is dated January 21, 1769; the last, Janurry 21, 1772. The first copy of the book identifying Paine as Junius was exhibited at a meeting for free discussion in Washington on Sunday, January 21, 1872, and the first public announcement of the discovery was then made. The book opens with these words: "One hundred years ago to-day Junius wrote * * * his last letter * * * Washington, D. C., January 21, 1872,". Of these five coincidences it might be presumptive to say they are providential, but it is certain they were not all premeditated; for the public announcement was made at one of a series of regular weekly meetings, and the thought of the coincidence of date did not occur to any one more than a week before. Not more than three persons present had ever before heard an intimation that Paine was Junius, nor was he who made the announcement aware of the claim more than three weeks before.

Of the forty or more writers, on whose behalf the authorship of these letters has been claimed, one after another has been set aside until the ablest critics have given up in despair the attempt at discovery. The identity of Sir Philip Francis alone has retained any degree of stability, but mainly upon the endorsement of Macauley, who though a scholar was no critic, and whose logic on this question has been justly characterized by the Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, in a recent article in the International Review, as a non sequitur.

The claim of the identity of Paine with Junius is now six years old, and if there is a single fact incompatible therewith, it is time it were produced. When found, the claim will be given up. The critics have almost with one accord ignored the question; either because they were unacquainted with the writing of both or because a decent discussion of the merits of Paine was tabooed. A few feeble objections have been raised by persons uninformed on the subject. Most of these have been anticipated and completely answered in "Junius' Unmasked." The first and most plausible one that strikes the superficial reader of Paine's works is his statement, in "Common Sense," that he "never published a syllable in England." Yet he wrote in 1774 a Plea for Excisemen, and got it published in a pamphlet. Indeed, he had more to do with its publication than Junius had with his letters; but in both cases the publication was made by another.

The Rev. J. W. Chadwick in a recent lecture on Paine sought to refute his identification as Junius by saying that "he practiced no concealments and his variety was enormous;" that Paine "wielded a battle-axe at noontide; Junius, a rapier in the dark;" that "if Paine had written the Junius letters he would have proclaimed it on the housetops;" that "in 1774 Paine published his first pamphlet—a plea for the increase of the salaries of the excisemen," in which "there is hardly a stroke to suggest the author of 'Common Sense;' and to suppose that the author had already written the tremendous invectives and malignant sarcasms of Junius is to invert the order of intellectual development."

Unfortunately for the last part of this argument the fact is overlooked that the same pen which in 1774 produced the Plea for Excisemen only a few months later in the Pennsylvania Magazine manifested the elegance and brilliancy of Junius, and within two years produced a work equal to that of Junius. Now, is it not "inverting the order of intellectual development" to suppose that the author of "Common Sense" had never attempted anything before in England, in the way of composition, but the plain unpretending petition of the excisemen? That was good enough in its way, but Junius had promised if he lived to come again, and many were still hunting for "the mighty boar of the forest" who in his safe retreat was biding his time, and was too cunning to betray himself in a humble petition to Parliament. So in that memorial he studied plainness, and sending a copy of the pamphlet to Dr. Goldsmith, he writes, "It is my first and only attempt." Yes, indeed, the first and only one of that kind, as Thomas Paine. The subterfuge was an innocent one, like that of Junius defending himself under the name of Philo-Junius, and neither Goldsmith nor the British people ever could suspect the writer of that pamphlet to be Junius.

If vanity was a characteristic of Paine, so it was of Junius. The two characters coincide in every known particular. "If I am a vain man," says Junius, "my gratification lies in a narrow circle. I am the sole depository of my own secret, and it shall perish with me." Paine was the most secretive of men, and he was probably the only living man capable both of writing as Junius did and keeping it to himself. He never told why he separated from his wife, saying it was nobody's business. He surprised even his bosom friend Franklin when he produced "Common Sense," and not till several editions were out did his name appear as its author. He projected a plan of returning to England in disguise, and getting out a pamphlet in secret to arouse the people to revolution (a second advent of Junius pursuant to promise). He wrote an address and declaration for a club in England, and only revealed himself as the writer when Horne Tooke, the supposed author, had stated that Paine wrote it, and even then he avowed it only to save Tooke from the embarassment of being jocularly accused of praising his own work.

It is conceded that Philip Francis, as a writer, never rose to the level of Junius. None but a rash critic will assign Paine to a lower level. And as to courage and vanity which Mr. Chadwick pleads in bar of the claim of Paine, the learned Dr. Parr interposed the same plea against Francis: "No, sir," said he; "Francis did not write those letters; he is too brave to fear disclosure, and too vain to keep it to himself."

It has been objected that "Paine's associations could not have afforded facilities for obtaining the material for these letters." I aver that the material amounted to much less than has generally been believed. I beg pardon for publishing this extract from a private letter of Mr. James Parton to me five years ago:

"I cannot believe that Paine was the author of the Junius letters; those shallow and false productions were far beneath him. I cannot think so meanly of Paine. Junius was nothing and knew nothing."

After several months I answered the letter, expressing my surprise at his low estimate of Junius. In reply he informed me that in gathering material for a life of Franklin he became familiar with the lives of the men whom Junius descanted upon, and "discovered that he knew them not—that he was not in the circle of the well-informed." Exactly so; and that only fortifies the claim of Paine. That he was outside of the circle of the well-informed is abundantly evident from his private letters to his publisher and by his correspondence with John Wilkes, to whom he applied for information. In some cases he was compelled to hazard an assertion for a fact, and it is not surprising that he was often in error.

But it is not upon such a basis that the reputation of Junius rests. A hater of law and lawyers, he was able upon a legal question to confound Blackstone and Mansfield; a foe to tyranny, he almost overthrew the British ministry; a despiser of pedantry, he stands now, after one hundred years, the model of rhetoric, unsurpassed in eloquence by the greatest masters of ancient or modern times. W. H. B.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

"According to My Gospel."

ROM. II, 16; 2 TIM. II. 8.

Yes, Paul had a gospel; and it was not the same as that according to Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John. If it had been the same, it would not have been proper to call it his gospel, but the gospel. The four gospels above mentioned are supposed to have been written by eye-witnesses of the scenes which they describe, or they were compiled in accordance with statements made by eye-witnesses; but Paul did not receive his gospel from man, nor was he taught it but by revelation of Jesus Christ after he had ascended to heaven (Gal. i, 11, 12). Paul, if we are to believe him, and he swears to it (Gal. i, 20), did not get his gospel from the other apostles, or from those that were eye-witnesses, as Luke did; but he got it direct from headquarters. Jesus Christ probably found out after he ascended to heaven that the four writers above mentioned had made a poor job of writing up the gospels, and he longed to get some one at it that had had more experience with the pen than either of those fellows. Hence, he waylaid Paul, who was somewhat of a scholar, and scared him into the faith, and told him the real facts of the case. Paul went about for fourteen years and preached it as it was told to him from heaven—and, of course, damned everybody that did not believe him, and cursed everybody that preached any other version of it—before he ever compared notes with the other apostles to see whether he had it anywhere near like theirs or not (Gal. ii, 1, 2). But, after fourteen years, Paul was getting on in years, and he probably began to be uneasy about his own safety, and to fear lest by any means he "should or had run in vain." So, it seems about this time Jesus advised him to go up to Jerusalem and compare notes with those fellows up there that had been preaching the gospel which didn't come by revelation, as his had come, for fear he had not got it quite right.

Paul had prescribed this spiritual medicine freely to every person for fourteen years without expressing a doubt of its correctness or safety; but, like a great many other doctors, he had a great deal more faith in giving it to others than in taking it himself. He touches it mildly in his letter to his flock; but he evidently feared that the medicine was not exactly the thing for his case. He therefore had a private talk with some of the aristocrats or grand moguls of the church at Jerusalem, and explained to them how he understood the matter. He does not tell us how much these fellows differed from him; nor how broad a grin lit up Peter's countenance when he heard the new version of the old story; but he fails to conceal the fact that his story was entirely different from theirs. He hints at various differences in the third and fourth verses; speaks of circumcision and of loose church discipline. But we may fairly conjecture that he did not want the laity at Galatia to understand the real points of difference any more than the laity at Jerusalem. He acknowledges that he concealed them from the latter; and we may reasonably conclude he did not divulge them to the former. He, however, tells them (verse 5) that he did not "give place" to these fellows "by subjection; no, not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel [i. e., his version of it] might continue with them." He did not want to go around and confess that he had been preaching lies for fourteen years; therefore he stuck to it that his way of it was right. In verses 6, 7, and 8, he makes it appear that it was a drawn game between him and Peter, and that they agreed to divide the spoils and the honors between them. Peter was to have the circumcision and Paul the uncircumcision, and, as things have turned out, Paul gets, we think, much the best of the bargain. Peter, James, and John agreed to this arrangement, probably because they thought any kind of gospel was good enough to send to the heathen. So, they laid their hands on Paul on condition that he should not preach his heresies in any place near there, but go to the heathen, and they added another important proviso in the tenth verse, "Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I, also, was forward to do." Hence, we find Paul always collecting money from his Gentile churches to take up to the poor (most likely Peter, James, and John belonged to that class) at Jerusalem.

Paul generally tries to make it appear that he differed from the other fellows mostly about circumcision. But we must never forget that, according to his own confession (Gal. ii, 2), he kept these things secret from the laity. He did not tell the laity at Jerusalem what kind of a gospel he preached to the Gentiles; and neither does he tell the laity in Galatia what kind of gospel the other fellows were preaching at Jerusalem. But, thanks to the printing-press and the more general diffusion of knowledge, the laity now know more of those things than they then did. The real points of difference between Paul's gospel and Peter's can now be studied with ease. Paul rejects the miraculous conception and ignores the very existence of the Virgin Mary, who plays such an important role in Matthew's gospel. He makes Jesus a man until after his crucifixion and death; and makes him the Son of God only from the time of, and through his resurrection from the dead (Rom. i. 3 and 4; also 2 Tim. 2, 8). This is giving to Jesus an entirely different origin, and, therefore, Paul's Jesus and Matthew's Jesus are not the same person. Hence, all those who preach the Jesus of Matthew, preach a different gospel from Paul; and it is no wonder, therefore, that those fellows in Jerusalem were anxious to have Paul go to the heathen; and that they only consented to have him preach there on condition that he would remember the poor. But another important difference between Paul's gospel and the gospel of the church at Jerusalem was that Paul rejected the witnesses of the resurrection of Jesus given by them, and manufactured different and very much stronger testimony than they had.

We are not told by any of them that any one witnessed the resurrection, but that certain individuals saw him (Jesus) after he was raised.

Matthew's witnesses are:

1. Mary Magdalene;

2. The other Mary. He supposes we knew all about her and therefore does not give her a formal introduction to us;

3. The eleven; but he tells us that some doubted, and consequently the jury did not agree. Just how many doubted he saith not.

Mark's witnesses:

1. Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils!

2. Two of them; but he saith not who the them are;

3. The eleven; but Jesus could not get them to believe.

Luke's witnesses:

1. Cephas and Cleopas. Who the latter was, and what kind of reputation for truth and veracity he bore, we know not. Cephas could not always be believed on oath. Perhaps the other man's plain, simple word was more reliable;

3. The eleven; but "they yet believed not" How witnesses that could not believe themselves should expect to succeed in convincing others is a mystery.

John's witnesses:

1. Mary Magdalene;

2. The disciples, minus Thomas;

3. The disciples, plus Thomas;

4. The disciples, viz: Simon Peter, Thomas, called Dydimus, Nathaniel, two sons of Zebedee, and two others—names not given.

Witnesses given in Acts: Apostles.

Paul's witnesses:

1. Cephas;

2. The twelve; notwithstanding one of them had had a serious fall, which failed to fracture any bones, but caused a prolapsus of his bowels and speedy death; and his successor had not yet been appointed;

3. Above five hundred brethren; no sisters; not even Mary Magdalene out of whom he cast seven devils;

4. James; but what James we are not informed by this deponent;

5. All the apostles;

6. Last of all, Paul.

Thus it is evident that Paul's gospel differed from Peter's on more important points than that of circumcision. This is what he "calls my gospel" and he sums it up briefly in 2 Tim. ii, 8: "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David (not a half-breed between Mary and the Holy Ghost) was raised from the dead according to my gospel." The testimony on behalf of the resurrection according to Paul is much stronger. He has many more witnesses and they are men—not women; and he says not that any of the five hundred even doubted. J. G. M.

Memphis, Tenn.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of Reading Matter than any other Journal of its class.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1878.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 40.

Great Jehovah, is there not a marked discrepancy in the statements in the New Testament as to the number that Jesus appeared to after his resurrection, and the number of occasions on which he appeared? Does not Matthew state that it was on two occasions—to the woman, and to the eleven in Galilee? Does not Mark state it was on three—to Mary Magdalene, to two disciples, and to the disciples at meat? Does not Luke say it was three times—to Cleopas and his companion, to Peter and to the eleven, and others? Does not John state it as four—to Mary Madalene, to the disciples without Thomas, to the disciples with Thomas, and several on the Tiberias Lake? Does not Paul make the appearances amount to six—to Peter, to the twelve apostles, to more than five hundred, to James, to all the apostles, to Paul himself? Does any one of the inspired writers on this important subject agree with either of the others?

Do not similar disagreements exist as to when and how Jesus made his ascension?

Does not Matthew think so little of the event, if he knew anything about it, that he never even alluded to it?

Does not Mark narrate the wonderful affair in these few words: "So then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven and sat at the right hand of God"? Is not that a very indefinite manner in which to describe one of the most remarkable events that ever took place in the world?

Does not Luke narrate it in a still different manner, and say thy Son "led his disciples out as far as to Bethany, when he lifted up his hands and blessed them, whereupon he was carried up into heaven"?

Does not John ignore the matter, and say nothing whatever about it, the same as though it never took place? Is it not equally as singular as in Matthew's case that he said nothing about the event? Had it even taken place, would not Matthew and John both have described it?

Does not the writer of Acts, in attempting to narrate the particulars of the occurrence, stating that Jesus was addressing his disciples upon the subject of not departing from Jerusalem, about the baptism of John and of the Holy Ghost, and of the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, then say, "And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight"?

Is it not, to say the least, most singular that such a remarkable event as that when the Son of God, who had been residing upon the earth in human form for more than thirty years, took his departure for heaven, the incident should be stated so differently by thy inspired writers, and that two of thy most important scribes should never allude to it at all?

Is it not fair to conclude that, had such an event ever occurred, and had Matthew and John known anything about it, they would, at least, have mentioned it? Is not the fact of their not alluding to the affair in the slightest degree sufficient grounds to cause people to think that no such occurrence ever took place?

As it is admitted by able Bible critics that the last twelve verses of the last chapter of Mark are spurious, and what is there said about the ascension is thrown aside, does it not leave the story resting on very insufficient grounds—the statement of Luke, supposed also to be the writer of the Acts, and who does not claim that he was present and saw the ascension?

Can it be strange that a regret should exist that if Jesus, while in the body, was absolutely taken up into the upper atmosphere, and thence to heaven, a more detailed, consistent, and satisfactory account of it was not given?

If doubts exist in the minds of men as to the authenticity of the narrative, can it by any means be strange?

If Matthew and John were authorized by thee to write up the life and doings of thy Son, did they not fail greatly in their duty to thee, to themselves, and to the world by not paying the slightest attention to it?

Is there not a discrepancy also as to the time Jesus remained on the earth after his resurrection and before his ascension? According to one statement of Luke, was it not less than one day—"To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise"—while in the same chapter he says Jesus did not ascend till the third day after the crucifixion, while in Acts it says he was seen of his disciples for forty days? What are we to conclude of the reliability of a story that is thus told in three different ways by the same writer? Is not the only sensible course which can be pursued to discard it altogether?

Is there not also a slight discrepancy as to the time Jesus remained in the grave after his burial? Is not Jesus himself reported as saying, "For as Jonas was three days in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth"? On the other hand, is it not stated that he was one day and two nights in the sepulchre? Is there a rule in celestial mathematics by which one day and two nights can be made three days and three nights?

As Jesus declared on several occasions that he would be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, can it be justly claimed that remaining some thirty-six or forty hours in a sepulchre on the surface of the earth was carrying out his prediction? Can the sepulchre by any possibility be made to be the heart of the earth?

But if he did not remain in the sepulchre, but immediately took up his journey to the heart of the earth, or the center, after making a journey of four thousand miles and four thousand miles back again, through dense and highly heated matter, what portion of the day and two nights would he have on his hands to make up the three days and three nights which he was to pass in the heart of the earth?

Is there not an absurdity about the entire story impossible to be reconciled with reason and consistency? Is it not quite difficult to comprehend the possibility of his journeying four thousand miles and back again and remaining in the heart of the earth three days and three nights, when he had only one day and two nights in which to accomplish it all?

What kind of a biographer or historian is it who narrates the most trivial events, like noticing little children strolling into the corn-fields on the Sabbath, or riding on an ass, visiting a fig tree, and then to pass in utter silence the momentous finale of an important life—the rising up bodily through the atmosphere into heaven? As we have seen that two of the biographers of thy Son say nothing of such an event having occurred, and as what is said by the third is admitted by the best judges to be spurious, as then the fourth is the only one who has anything to say about it, and he does not claim to have been present and a witness of the remarkable occurrence, are we not justified in entertaining the strongest doubts as to the reality of such an incident ever having taken place?

Is it really a benificent arrangement to cast souls into eternal fire for not being able to believe in such a mass of inconsistencies being devised or dictated by them?

Is there not a want of harmony of statement which should be looked for in writers, who were inspired by thee, in the account of the embalming of the body of Jesus after his crucifixion?

Does not John relate how Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus took possession of the body of Jesus, after the crucifixion, and embalmed him with about a hundred pounds in weight of myrrh and aloes?

While Mark seems to know nothing of this embalming, does he not relate how Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James and Solome, purchased spices, and on the first day of the week visited the sepulchre where Jesus was laid for the purpose of doing what Joseph and Nicodemus had already performed?

Does not Luke give a similar statement, while Matthew seems to have been entirely ignorant of both the embalming performed by Joseph and Nicodemus and the design to embalm on the part of the females mentioned by Mark?

Is it not singular after Jesus had on several occasions told his disciples of his coming trial and execution, and that on the third day he would rise again; that after his death they seemed to have forgotten all about his promised resurrection in so much that, according to Mark, they questioned among themselves, "What this rising from the dead should mean"?

So far from the disciples looking for the resurrection of Jesus according to the promise he had made them, were they not unwilling to believe the statement of the women when they brought the intelligence to them that he had risen? Did their doubt and unbelief indicate that he had told them about his rising from the dead, and that they believed his words?

Does not Paul say, in giving his testimony as to the resurrection, "He was seen by Cephas, then by the twelve, and after that he was seen by five hundred brethren at once"? Do either of the other narrators mention anything about five hundred of the brethren at once? Were there at that time so many as five hundred of the brethren?

How could Jesus have been seen by the "twelve" after his resurrection, when Judas had absented himself from their number, and had already killed himself?

When Paul said that Christ died for our sins, "according to the Scriptures," and that he rose again on the third day, "according to the Scriptures," had he any authority in the Scriptures for such a statement?

As the New Testament was not compiled for hundreds of years after that time, and as the Old Testament was all the Scriptures that were recognized, was there anything in the Scriptures that alluded in any way to the death and resurrection of Jesus?

In the mention which is made of Paul's vision, is not the same contradictory characteristic perceptible in the three statements which are given? According to the first account, is it not stated that when he saw a light from heaven and heard a voice, he fell to the earth, and the men who journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man; while, in another account, is it not stated that "all fell to the earth"?

Does it not say, in one instance, that the men heard the voice, and in the next that they heard not the voice?

Are not such disagreements most unfortunate in a record which we are called upon to believe is the truth from heaven? Would it not have been far better to have preserved the semblance, at least, of accuracy and consistency?

Really, is not the muddle connected with all these contradictory passages, as well as of many others not here alluded to, together with the efforts made by the clergy to explain them and harmonize them, quite enough to shake the confidence of every candid, inquiring mind?

Is the element of heavenly truth of such a character that it can be perverted, inconsistent, contradictory, and unreasonable, and still continue to be divine truth? Is not truth always the same, always harmonious, always consistent? [TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Great Religions of the World.—Continued.

CHRISTIANITY.

I will not take the time to review his life and teachings. All are familiar with them. I will only glance at the results which have grown out of them, and the conduct of the Church which bears his name, but which he did nothing to establish. In looking over the history of the last fifteen hundred years, we find that the Church of the peaceful Jesus has shed more blood, taken more human life, caused wider devastations, spread more desolation over the fair face of the earth, than has any other system of religion in the world, or, in fact, all other systems put together. It has has been truthfully said that the devotees of Christianity have shed enough human blood to make a sea that would float all the ships and navies of the world. The number of widows and orphans made by this system of religion are so great that could they be placed upon a single page they would appal the stoutest heart. The numbers of human beings that were put to death in the name of this beautiful religion are variously estimated at from 75,000,000 to 150,000,000—probably twice the number that have been slaughtered in all the other religious wars that have taken place for thousands of years. Yes, the religion which has been built upon the doctrines of Jesus has caused the destruction of far more of precious human life than the believers in the teachings of all the other redeemers, reformers, sages, and teachers that have figured in the world. Even in the "Holy Inquisition," an abominable institution that was devised to persuade people by the soft and sweet influences of racks, wheels, pincers, and scores of other infernal machines that broke the bones and sundered the joints, to yield their individual opinions and accept the dicta of priests and bishops. If they could not be persuaded by those gentle means, death was produced by fires, both hot and slow, and by every horrible means that the ingenuity of man could devise. In this Christian institution which for nearly five hundred years was the diabolical engine of the Church, Victor Hugo, the eminent French writer, estimated that five millions of unfortunate human beings were fiendishly tortured to death. The numbers who have been compelled to yield up their lives at the stake cannot be computed, but they are appalling indeed.

I cannot dwell upon the damning record which the Christian religion has made for itself, neither is it a pleasant picture to contemplate. If it has been an improvement in some respects upon the systems which have preceded it, it has cast more gloom, spread more unhappiness, over this lovely globe than all the other religious systems combined.

I have already detained you too long, and must soon draw to a close. I have only briefly glanced at some of the principal religions of the world, many others must be passed in silence, and much that might be said of those alluded to must be omitted. In taking a view of the whole religious world for four thousand years past, we find an impressive lesson is to be learned. These different religions have attracted the earnest attention of a large share of the people who have lived upon the earth, and they have wielded a powerful influence over the lives, the destinies and the happiness of mankind.

In nearly every system of religion which man in his ignorance has devised, the great central idea has been that there were invisible gods dwelling in the sky, or somewhere else, that must be placated, appeased, and kept in a favorable frame of mind by constant praises, adoration and prayer, and to perform these services a vast retinue of priests have been necessary. In securing the happiness of man, and in developing his highest abilities and bringing out his better qualities, these religions have been failures. Whenever present duties here have been neglected for services in the clouds, the time has been worse than thrown away.

Those religions which have been devoted most to the actual needs of man, to his wants and necessities, here, and now, which have made him perform his duties towards his family, his neighbors and his fellow-beings around him—regardless of gods, devils, and hells—have made him happier and have contributed most to his good.

From this let us learn to make our religions conform to our daily wants. Let us live for the world we are in, and know something about it instead of fixing our gaze upon a world that we know little or nothing of, and can know little of while we are here. One world at a time is an excellent rule to go by. If we do our full duty here and now we shall accomplished all that we can do, and we will not have occasion to reproach ourselves for any shortcomings.

The religions of the past have been too much devoted to the gods and not enough to man—too much above the clouds and not enough on the earth. The religion of the future will not be for gods but for men. The gods will be left to take care of themselves, and if men are wise they will learn to take care of themselves.

They will devote their time and strength and abilities to making themselves and their fellow-beings happy, and the gods and their priests will surely have to dispense with their services.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Prohibitionists Defeated in Connecticut.

The Sun contains the following:

"The temperance people of New Canaan and Norwalk, Conn., have been fighting the liquor dealers of those places in the courts, and have suffered signal defeats. On Wednesday morning, in the Superior Court in Bridgeport, the case entitled The State agt. Charles Scott was tried. Anthony Comstock's employees, Britton, and Rosenthal, his companion, testified to the buying of a bottle of whiskey from Scott, and produced the whiskey in the court-room. Scott, in his own behalf, and two other witnesses, testified in flat contradiction of the testimony of Comstock's men, and the jury's verdict was, 'Not guilty.' Thereupon the State Attorney nolled the ten remaining Canaan cases.

"In the case entitled The State agt. Isaac Lee, of Norwalk, eight witnesses testified for the State, and ten in behalf of Lee, and Judge Culver charged against him, but the jury declared him not guilty. Thereupon the State Attorney struck the table with his clenched fist, and nolled the remaining fifteen cases from Norwalk.

"The cost of the liquor prosecutions in New Canaan and Norwalk reached about $2,000, and not a dollar has been received in return. On Thursday night many of the Norwalk dealers kept open house to all visitors."

The Joseph Britton alluded to in the foregoing is Comstock's principal accomplice in entrapping unwary victims and then testifying against them when brought before the courts. But within the last few weeks the credibility of his evidence has been badly shaken. He was arraigned before the Jefferson Market Police Court, where perjury was proved against him in reference to swearing in his vote at a former city election, in making oath that he had no bet pending on the election. Mr. Myers, an intelligent and respectable druggist on Tenth street, made oath that Britton had made two bets with him on the election; but, as there was no second party to corroborate his testimony, Justice Duffy did not see fit to hold him, though many an unfortunate fellow has been sent to prison on less reliable testimony. In another case—the trial of Mr. Blandin, who was decoyed by Britton, under the name of J. B. Andrews, dealer in the "rich, rare, and racy," to bring the photograph of a nude figure from Boston and present it to said Britton, alias Andrews—for this grave offense, Blandin, who is a respectable young man, and has maintained a good reputation, was taken off to prison, where he was incarcerated some three months before his trial. Upon the testimony of Britton and Comstock he was convicted and sentenced to another term of imprisonment of three months and a fine of one hundred dollars. On this trial Britton is charged with having again committed perjury. He swore he had not been arraigned for perjury, when he had been, and evidence had been given establishing his guilt under the charge. It is by such evidence that Comstock prosecutes his aggressive persecutions against unfortunate persons unable to make a vigorous defense. Will such men always be allowed to hold the rod of terror over the heads of men far better than themselves?

The Champions of the Church.

We are now turning out this forthcoming volume at the rate of twenty pages per day. We can assure our readers that it will contain a great amount of valuable information never before incorporated in a single volume. We cannot help thinking every reader of these pages ought to bespeak a copy. It will be really worth the price asked for it; and if any one buying a copy, upon reading it, thinks he would prefer other works of our publication, we will exchange with him if returned in good order. We would like one thousand additional orders for it. Those who order before the first of May, and advance the price of it, shall receive one of the first copies published, and also now a premium of the "Priest in Absolution," or the same amount in tracts or other pamphlets.

Price of the "Champions," cloth, $3.00; leather, red edges, $4.00; morocco and gilt edges, $4.50; post-paid, by mail.

A Step in the Right Direction.—The Society of American Artists, who are holding their first annual exhibition in the Kurtz Gallery, Twenty-third street near Broadway, have opened their gallery on Sunday afternoons, free to the public. This is a generous move in the right direction, and we hope workingmen and families will profit by the opportunity. Good paintings are a means of instruction often superior to books, and this Society deserves the hearty thanks of all the Liberal people for their act. The charge for admission on week days is 25 cents.

Our young Spiritualistic friend, Lessie N. Goodell, is now fairly welcomed into the lecture field. She has been lecturing in this State the past winter, to appreciative audiences. An interested listener informs us, that her last lecture was delivered in New Haven, Conn., before a large audience, who were unanimous in her praise as an inspirational speaker, of earnestness, vivacity, and power; of lady-like and pleasing deportment, who enunciates clearly and distinctly indisputable truths, which appeal powerfully to the higher moral sentiments. Her address is Amherst, Mass.,

Prof. J. R. Buchanan is continuing his course of lectures on Anthropology and Psychology, on Wednesday and Saturday evenings at Republican Hall on 33d street, near Broadway. Those who attend are highly interested both with his philosophy and his experiments.

The Resurrection of Jesus.—We would specially recommend to our readers Brother W. S. Bell's revised edition of this little work. It is a thorough and exhaustive examination into the whole subject, and shows up in a clear light the absurdities and contradictions connected with the legend. Send twenty cents to W. S. Bell, New Bedford, or to this office, and get a copy.

Some Liberal Journals.

The Winsted Press, Duluth Tribune, and Seymour Weekly Times, all Liberal papers, deserve an earlier and better notice than we have time to give them, though they are welcome weekly visitors. They are devoted to Freethought to some extent, and are "newsy" and valuable in other directions.

They endeavor to express the "courage of their opinions" in a fair and candid spirit which is calculated to settle the wavering doubts of those who are almost persuaded to abandon the attempt to prove the inspiration or paternity of the Bible by the Bible. They thus fill a space in the field of Liberal literature and discussion which will not only benefit those who take these local papers, but this feature or departure will eventually extend their circulation. Monroe of the Times, Mitchell of the Tribune, and Pinney of the Press, have already made their mark with their trenchant pens.

As the Savenska Amerikanaren, and Freidenker—both Liberal papers—come to us in languages (Swedish, and German) which we do not understand, we are only able to condense, through our young and intelligent friend, Evald C. Hammar, of Knoxville, Ill., a translation from the former paper, having some remarks in relation to us and our work:

"Not long ago we witnessed insane efforts in Sweden for the suppression of the Freethought press, which partially succeeded; but we did not think that we should so soon learn of a similar persecution in this boasted land of freedom as that of our brave cotemporary, the editor of The Truth Seeker in N. Y. city, which was enacted ostensibly under the charge of indecency or to that effect, meaning blasphemy, no doubt, which charge was not sustained. This Truth Seeker attacks and explodes the ancient dogmas and superstitions, which, it says, are borrowed from the pagan mythology and born of ignorance and fear, which Christians reserve as a bugbear to frighten people from hell right into heaven. It teaches, instead, that a temperate and moral life and love to humanity is its own reward, and that nature and science are our best teachers. So it attempts to show up the fraud which maintains in fashionable style, at the expense of the poorer classes, numerous churches, preachers, and untaxable property, which are idle six days in the week and useless on the seventh. It claims that the God or Jehovah preached about is cruel in threatening eternal torture, said to be reserved for his unregenerated children. It says that we have in this Christian country proportionately more stealing, murder, lying, and fraud than is perpetrated in heathen or Mohammedan lands, and that these crimes are not by any means confined to those excluded from the churches through poverty, infidelity, or other reasons.

"We will add, without endorsing or denouncing his opinions, that the editor of The Truth Seeker is an enlightened, respectable, and sincere man, and he writes his views in an orderly and fitting style, as the judge in his case admitted, while his persecutor is an uncultured person without judgment and unfit for the delicate position he has assumed to fill."

We thank our friend for the above, and Mr. Hammar for the translation.

Plain Talks on Practical Religion.—George Albert Lomas, editor of the Shaker Manifesto, has sent us a neat pamphlet of twenty-four pages, containing several well-written treatises in support of Shaker faith and life. It is printed very neatly, and is sold at the low price of five cents, with one cent for postage. Every reader would do well to send for a copy. Address G. A. Lomas, Shakers, New York.

The Kirografer and Stenografer is a new magazine, devoted to reform in orthography, chirography, stenography, and kindred arts and sciences. It advocates a new system of script, type, and short-hand, which shall practically have one common alphabet. It seeks to introduce the scientific standard as the only proper test for a system of writing or printing. This number contains a new "Mathematical Alphabet" for script, type, and short-hand, a review of the Alphabetic Basis of the Leading Stenographies of the World, and other articles and illustrations on phonetics Published by J. B. and E. G. Smith, Amherst, Mass. Price, $1.00 per annum.

The Kirografic Teecher is before us. It has passed to the second edition, and comes out enlarged to 100 pages, with fine wood engravings. It is offered as a text-book for common schools and colleges. It is intended to be used in schools as a system of script, founded on a stenographic alphabet, for the purpose of teaching a phonetic orthography. The author claims that one or two years' time can be saved to children in acquiring a common elementary education by the adoption of a phonetic method of writing in place of or in conjunction with the common script.

This work is devoted to the literary style exclusively, and the author claims that it is the first successful effort in the world to develop a literary style of writing which has an exclusive stenographic alphabet, devoid of contractions, for its basis. The work is profusely illustrated with engravings.

This system of writing is the invention of John Brown Smith, who introduces innovations on the old alphabetic principles of Pitman's and other systems. He strikes out in the field of invention, and introduces a new alphabetic principle for stenography by abandoning shading and other inconsistencies of other systems. He writes all with light strokes, and joins his circles, hooks, loops, and other principles of contraction, in the exact order of writing or reading them. Those desiring further information about this new system can learn them by an examination of his review of stenographic systems in the introduction to this book. It is published by J. B. and E. G. Smith, Amherst, Mass. Price, $1.00.

Views of Our Heavenly Home.—We some time ago received from the publishers, Colby & Rich, Boston, a copy of this work by our friend Andrew Jackson Davis. It is a sequel to his work entitled "The Stellar Key to the Summerland," and in the 290 pages it contains, it gives profuse descriptions of "the happy hunting ground" where mortal spirits are said to congregate after the fitful struggle of life is over, and they become bright angels in realms of ether far above the earth.

It is not a little curious how Mr. Davis ascertains with so much accuracy about the geography and topography of the heavenly country in the vicinity of "the Milky Way" that he can make maps, and sketch designs of its mountains, lakes, and rivers; but those who can accept his statements as facts, and easily believe that he presents simply the truth of the matter, must necessarily enjoy great pleasure in reading the work. And those even who have not unshaken confidence in the revelations made, may be able to read the book with much interest. It is published at a moderate price. In paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents. For sale at this office.

The Physiologist and Family Physician.—We extend a welcoming hand to this excellent sixteen-page monthly, issued under the editorial control of Sara B. Chase, A. M., M.D. It is a progressive medical journal, and avows its design to be "a harbinger of healing to the household, a guide to the grand vestibule of the temple of life and physical purity, harmony, and happiness," to popularize the subject of physiology, and to present to the people information upon such medical matters as lie at the very foundation of the earthly well-being of man. It proposes to promulgate truths which the whole world would be benefited by knowing and practicing, and to familiarize every family into which it shall go with the saving principles of health and the great fundamental laws of life. Its grand, single purpose will be to elevate and bless human kind, and be in fact a physician for the people. The object is certainly a good one and the enterprise deserves the support of an appreciative public.

The number before us contains several well-written articles, among which are "The Equality of Woman," b Elizabeth Oakes Smith; "Ozone, the Great Disinfectant and Sanitary Power of Nature," by E. G. Cook, M.D.; "Husbands and Wives," by the editor; "Floriculture," by Mrs. E. D. Slenker; "Freaks and Follies of Fashion," by S. H. Preston, as well as several other excellent articles.

The terms are $1.50 per year, or fifteen cents per single copy. Address Sara B. Chase, M.D., 56 West 33d st., New York.

The Financial Problem.

In The Truth Seeker before me(No. 10), I find a short article by J. Petty, entitled "The Financial Problem," and although I agree with the author, and all honest men, that our present system of monetary circulation is a miserable failure and a swindle, and that the railway system is as bad, I do not see how either would be materially improved by coming under the absolute control of the Government.

A circulating medium is, or should be, for the benefit of the laborers, and should represent either a certain amount of labor, or a product of labor; and this currency should be under the direct control of the class which has the greatest interest in its welfare. The Government, which is but a sham covering, under which a set of swindlers and ignoramuses defraud the people, has had too much already to do with our currency, as the condition of the laboring people will testify to-day. All that we need is the right for the people as individuals, and not as Government, to say what shall be legal tender, and to let the demand, and that alone, limit the supply.

All banks that are needed, let the people establish and control.

Labor is the only basis upon which a really useful and honest currency can rest. Being the producer of the thing represented, it should have the entire control of whatever is used as the representation.

We have given up a pretty good share of our individual rights to the Government already, and the effects have not been the most pleasing that could be wished. Now, I propose that we retain the few that we have left, regain as many more as we can, and see if we cannot furnish ourselves with an honest, efficient currency. We can, at worst, make no greater blunders than our Government makes, year after year.

Plenty of a paper currency, redeemable in a definite amount of labor, or a product of labor, is what we need.

Mr. Petty says, "All the railroads in this country ought to be owned by the Government." I think that the laborers ought to own them—those who build them and run them—and control them, paying all costs, and receiving all profits as the reward of their labor.

No, I think that no benefit will be gained by putting the Government in absolute control of the currency and railroads, for it is a notorious, although shameful fact, that our Government is run by the moneyed class, and being under the control of the Government is being under the control of this class.

The laborers are certainly a majority, and I hope that they will soon realize it, and claim their right to think and act for themselves in some things at least.

It should rest with the individual laborer to say how long he shall work, how much he shall receive for his labor, and by what means that compensation shall be represented.

Marian, Mass. C. W. Hammond.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER V.

THE VALLEY.

The Ghouls and Dragons.—The Ball of Fire.

1. And Simon fell down headlong into the valley.
2. And the whole valley was full of gloom, and orror, and pitchy darkness, and the air thereof was agnant, and fetid and unwholesome.
3. And the valley was full of huge, and unsightly, and shapeless trees, called Doctrines; and the trees were covered with the loathesome slime called Grace-ogod, and their branches grew down towards the ground, and filled the whole valley, so that the pilgrims could scarce pass through it.
4. And the ground was thickly covered with mud and filthy mire, such as prevailed in the gutter by which Simon had traveled.
5. And upon the mud and the mire was there everywhere strewed the brains of such as had passed, for all that came that way, by reason of their fear and haste, and the darkness of the valley, did assuredly brain themselves against the trees and their branches.
6. And on each side of the valley rose up great and mighty precipices, which did overhang and threaten to fall down continually, and their name was Condemnation.
7. And the valley was inhabited by all fierce and horrible creatures.
8. There did the hobgoblins gibber, and the ogres hold high revel;
9. There did the ghouls have ghastly sport, and restless fiends make hideous feastings;
10. There did many demoniac beasts wander, and the dragons prowl about.
11. And the griffin, whose stature was more than forty and three ells, dwelt here, and a huge snake, whose length was a furlong and furlongs and half a furlong.*
12. And the hobgoblins were called Delusion, and the ogres Destruction.
13. And the ghouls were called Hallucination, and the restless fiends Frenzy.
14. And the demonaic beasts were called Idiocy, and the dragons Imbecility.
15. And the griffin was called Despair, and the snake Insanity.
16. And Simon fell headlong into the mud and mire of the valley, and when he came to know of it, he bellowed forth lustily, and gathered himself up, and would have run more quickly, but that he was compelled to go slower by reason of the mud and the darkness.
17. And as he hasted forward, he presently brained himself against one of the trees.
18. And his hurts, by running against the trees, were exceedingly grievous, and his brains issued forth; and immediately he was surrounded by the hobgoblins and the ogres, and they tormented him very grievousiy, and trampled him down in the mire, and stamped upon him, and bedeviled him till he was ready to give up the ghost, had there been any to receive it.
19. And while they were busy with him, there came up two legions of the ghouls, and after them half a legion more, and they began to bite and to kick, and to leap upon him, and to batter him against the trees, and to trip him up as he ran.
20. And presently there came up also a troop of the dragons, and more than six of the demoniac beasts, and the dragons tormented him with their sharp claws, and the demoniac beasts did battle for him, tugging this way and that, till he well nigh went both ways together.
21. And Simon was in very great straits, and his eye-glass, by reason of his many tumblings into the mud and mire, had become exceedingly clear.
22. And suddenly he saw in the air above him, as it were, a great ball of fire, and the dimensions thereof were very great, and the fire very fierce and hot, and the hissing thereof was like unto the hisssing of eleven thousand snakes.
23. And on the ball of fire were written, as in letters of blood, these words, The wrath to come.
24. And Simon beheld, and would have trembled but that he trembled already more than he was able.
25. And the ball of fire drew near apace, and though it was hot it gave out no light, but rather made the darkness more dark.
26. And Simon fled and got not away; for the demoniac beasts, and the ghouls, and the dragons, and the ogres, and the hobgoblins continually tripped him up, and trampled him in the mire, and bit and gnawed at him, and dragged him hither and thither, and tossed him about, and all the while the great ball of fire drew near; and Ahrimanes pursued, and the hag, Fearohell, laid on her scourge.
27. And presently there came up the griffin called Despair, and seized Simon in his hideous jaws, and shot him into the air amongst the branches of a certain tree, the name of which was Predestination; and when Simon fell down again he fell into the jaws of the vast serpent called Insanity.
28. And the serpent shot him forth again through the branches of the tree, and he fell into the jaws of the griffin, and immediately the griffin shot him back, and he fell again into the jaws of the serpent.
29. And after this manner did the griffin and the serpent torment him for the space of nine full days and the third part of an hour.
30. And all the while was he cast from either to the other, through the branches of that tree, and was followed by the great and terrible ball of fire; which did continually threaten to burst upon him.
31. And after this fashion was Simon tormented, night and day was he tormented, and against the tree and the branches thereof was he continually cast, and was battered and bruised, so that what remained of his brains issued out, and he was destitute.
32. And when he was destitute his tormentors ceased to torment him.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

*From this passage it will be at once seen whence Daniel's "time, times, and a half" was derived.—TRANSLATORS.

Communications.

A Materialistic View of Spiritualism.

BY JENNIE BUTLER BROWN.

All subjects present not only a positive, but also a correlative negative aspect to the explorer in the field of disputed phenomena and fact; and not until the conceptive and perceptive faculties of the human mind have been able to grasp and cope with the seemingly unknowable, and submit any given phenomenon to the crucial tests of unequivocal applied philosophy, can comprehensive science supersede baleful superstition and ignorant speculation concerning that which heretofore has been erroneously known as supernaturalism.

Supernaturalism is not only fast becoming an obsolete word, but the truth is with corresponding rapidity forcing itself upon the masses, that, from the very nature of things, this is of necessity a meaningless word, and as such it is loosing altogether its application. With few exceptions, intelligent materialists now concede the fact of what is called spiritualistic phenomena, though the majority persistently aver that the spiritual hypothesis is an error and dispute vehemently the affirmed nature of its manifestations.

Now, I propose, as the result of considerable study, research, and experiment, to demonstrate something of the actual nature of spirit phenomena, as well as the possibility—I ought rather to say, the probability—of an after-life from a materialistic standpoint.

The science of spiritism proper is based upon such disclosures of the material sciences, and of natural philosophy as have been so practically attested as to be placed beyond all attempt at contravention.

This science embodies all other established sciences and philosophies, and is in itself the grand culmination of them all.

Without material science, it were utterly impossible for us to have a spiritual science, inasmuch as without a physical organization, it would not be possible for nature, under her present régime, to generate a spiritual organization; but this being the case, the unprejudiced and intelligent student of nature will not question her omnipotence, nor deny to evolution the logical sequence of her natural operations by admitting the processive theory as fact until a certain organic structure has become the result, and then insisting upon a retrogressive movement of nature, which shall resolve all things into their primordial condition, preparatory to trying the same experiment over again for an innumerable succession of times, possibly improving a little upon the specific precedent with each operation, generically sensing our thought. Now, nature never works in any such tread-mill fashion, and her slow patience is not the result of limited power, but rather of her persistent determination to equilibrate with the closest exactitude all her arrangements as she proceeds. Therefore we need not reverse the assertion we have made, and declare that the spiritual body, once generated, cannot exist as a conscious entity after the physical body shall have disintegrated, and changed the form of its existence.

I have heard Prof. Eccles talk of consciousness, as being one of three entities, the real nature and modus operandi of which are still shrouded in mystery. He tells us that we cannot conceive an idea of a something that is composed of nothing, but he still persists, if I do not mistake his meaning, upon basing his theory of consciousness upon the palpable error of assumption that this individual consciousness is not composed of matter.

He speaks of force as one entity, consciousness as another, and matter as still another entity separate and distinct from the two first named, thereby going back, it would seem, upon his own statement to the effect that a something cannot be made up of nothing.

He does talk very glibly about a conscious something, which, not being composed of matter, must necessarily, according to his expressed idea, be composed of nothing—a trifle inconsistent you see. I notice, however, that many persons whose arguments are otherwise quite sound, seem to base their assumptions upon this same untenable hypothesis.

Let us now take up a few facts in their relative order, and prove a scientific possibility, if not a demonstrated actuality of such affirmation of conscious existence after the dissolution of the physical body, as we feel justified in making.

First, then, something must always exist as something. This is self-evident, but not more so than is the correlative negative fact that nothing must always remain nothing. If, therefore, this consciousness that inheres in the physical organism be an entity, it logically follows that it must be a something, and if it be something it must be composed of something, and that something must be something, for it surely is impossible that something can be nothing. If, then, we have within the physical body a conscious something, it cannot be composed of nothing, and this being the case, it follows as an imperative alternative that this something is composed of matter, this being the positive of fact in its negative relation to nothing, which is simply the absence of matter. We start from this point, then, with the assertion that that part of the human organism known as the individual consciousness of man is itself composed of real, tangible molecules of living matter. We may call it spirit. Now, what part of speech does that department of the science of language which we call grammar, tell us that the word spirit is when used in this connection? It is classed as a noun. What is a noun? Any thing we can see, smell, touch, taste, hear, feel, or in any way perceive with the senses. Now, is it possible for the human mind to conceive of any such thing as an indefinite nothing having at the same time all the properties of a definite something?

To any sane mind the bare attempt to establish such a preposterous absurdity upon the basis of fact proves the utter imbecility of the person who undertakes to separate spirit and matter.

Nevertheless we propose to show that man does possess a conscious spirit that can and does exist and act, subject to certain conditions, independent of the physical body.

I will even go so far as to affirm that the spiritual organization is subject to the same natural laws as is the physical body, though with such various modifications and qualifications as become necessary to a higher order of existence and the negative conditions of a differing organic structure.

I even go so far as to affirm that the spiritual body may be made subject to the same anatomical study, dissection, and analysis as the corresponding or grosser material body; the pathology of its diseases as easily traced, its diagnoses as intelligently and correctly comprehended and explained; and I am firmly fixed in the opinion that the ills that torment society are, for the foregoing reasons, of such a complex nature, having their sources rooted so deep down below the surface of common thought and supposed possible investigation of the mysterious phenomena connected with the subject of Spiritualism, that only the gradual development, and popularization of spiritology as the legitimate result of legitimate scientific research and practical investigation will ever wholly dispel them, that is, so change the form of their existence that eternal harmony be educed from present conditions, and there remains nothing to afflict humanity.

Now, we understand that everything, whether visible or invisible, is composed of some form or combination of forms of matter. Therefore we assert the well-known fact of natural philosophy that all substance, being of a necessity composed of molecules of matter, is ponderable, and, in differing degrees, subject to the same natural laws. The old-school materialist asks, and from his standpoint not illogically, "How can a man's body die and yet live? or how can he have two bodies which occupy the space of only one, acting at the same time, and as one? Is it not a fact set down in natural philosophy that no two bodies can possibly be made to occupy the same space at the same time?" We answer this question in the affirmative, because it can be answered in no other way, and proceed to explain the real philosophy of facts in this connection; facts which we can defy the whole world of scientists and philosophers to disprove.

Let us ask, Of what is the material body composed? Well, mainly of gaseous substance, you say. Well, we again ask, are these gases solid, either in their primordial condition or in the organic structure of man? You tell me, No.

We are ready now to illustrate a point. We take a transparent jar and fill it with any certain gas, so full that not another single particle will flow in. In this jar you can see nothing; it is perfectly transparent, but you know what is in the jar, and that the jar is full Now then, we will take another kind of transparent liquid gas, and, without allowing gas No. 1 to escape, we pour into the same jar a quantity of gas No. 2, and we find that the jar will receive just as much of gas No. 2 as though it did not contain a particle of gas No. 1, not a single molecule of the first having escaped, or been displaced, still we can see nothing, although we know the two gases have united or coalesced. The operation has been invisible, but is none the less a fact.

Now, we must ask, are these two gases occupying the same space at the same time? Here is involved that general property of matter, designated the porosity of matter. Although incidental to the same geometrical space, the molecules of the two gases do not of course occupy the same space at the same time. The facts are these: The molecules of gas number one are of certain shape, and are intersected with minute pores, so that when gas number two flows into the jar, its molecules enter into these pores, the molecules of the two gases overlap each other; they cohere and are as one.

These gases maintain an exact relative position to one another, therefore we say there exists between them a chemical affinity.

This is a single illustration, on a small scale, of the relation and adaptation of matter and matter.

The human organism is a complex illustration on a larger scale of the foregoing application of scientific and philosophical principles.

Let us see. We will call that which is commonly termed the physical organization gas 1, and the spiritual organization gas 2. The mocleules of the one have their dwelling-place in the forces of the other, and vice versa. They are two separate and distinct organisms, but, having a chemical affinity for each other, they cohere and are as one body, incidental to the same geometrical space, but not occupying the same space at the same time.

It is set down in natural philosophy and in chemistry that "one gas is a vacuum for another gas."

Now, the relative position of body and soul is just the same as that of gas and gas, with the fact understood that the human being is a complex structure, and its counterparts are compounded of differing quantities and qualities of the same constituent elements, each having its own peculiar function to perform independent of, and still dependent on, one another.

The special material attributes of the spiritual body consist in a wonderful attractive molecular force, which draws, with an almost irresistable power, the particles of the physical body to itself; whereas the function of the physical body consists in the inherent adhesive property of its molecules; therefore we see that while the spiritual body is active and attractive, the physical body is inert and passive, and can only be made otherwise when the magnetism of spirit force is brought in contact with it in the close affinitive manner we have already described.

Another thing: The specific gravity of the physical man is much greater than that of its spiritual counterpart, so that the grosser material incumbrance serves, during the partnership between body and soul, as an anchor which keeps the conscious individual at the bottom of this immense sea of ether that throughout the infinity of space is spread above and around us.

[CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

Col. Ingersoll at Harrisburg, Pa.

Col. Ingersoll was advertised some ten days previously to deliver a lecture at the Opera House, on Thursday evening, Feb. 28th. The Telegraph, a rigidly orthodox sheet, was the chosen vehicle to make the lecture a failure. Two valiant gentlemen, signing themselves "Pastor" and "Layman," were among those ready to do the slandering and lying in this nefarious business. To the credit of the Telegraph and Patriot they admitted several articles containing a mild plea for fair play and justice. But our detractors returned to the charge, quoting abstract reports from lectures delivered by Ingersoll, to the effect that he called God a "demon," unqualifiedly, etc. Now, as every one knows, including, it is to be hoped, Rev. G. H. Humphrey, and Rev. Dr. Babbitt of Watertown, N. Y., newspaper reports are very unsafe to go by. But the most laughable feature about the matter was these incognito 19th century night-owls of superstition frantically demanding and calling for the names of those who were instrumental in bringing the great arch-heretic to endanger the souls of the "dear people." They promised to hold up these offenders before the "outraged sense of decency"—a favorite, pharisaical expression by the way—which in other words meant that they would not kindle the fires of Smithfield, because they cannot and dare not, at least before they succeed in smuggling their rascally "God-in-the-Constitution" measure into the organic law of the land. No, they would now only destroy a man's business, blacken his reputation, and, if possible, reduce his family to misery and destitution, and end by predicting that a "brimstone hell" would be his future residence, if not wishing him there already.

The evening came. Three or four of the clergy, no doubt stimulated by the success of the Colonel in the lecture field, entered the lists, and on this particular occasion lectured without charge to the "dear people" on the "Signs of the Times," etc. It was truly a majestic sight to see the "waters of orthodoxy" stirred to their depths, and that one man, backed with nothing but reason and common sense, should scare the clergy and their followers, backed by popularity, wealth, and the "help of the Infinite God" thrown in. It reminded one of the great Virginia scare by John Brown. Notwithstanding these herculean efforts, joined to the fact that on this particular evening occurred the Governor's reception, Col. Ingersoll appeared before a highly intelligent audience which in point of numbers exceeded that at Wendell Phillips' lecture given a short time previously. He fully sustained his brilliant reputation, and held the large audience enchained by his eloquence for two hours. His most radical utterances were heartily applauded, and his remorseless ridicule of religious superstitions, past and present, were greeted by roars of laughter. With fiery energy, scathing irony, and polished sarcasm he handled his would-be detractors and their nonsensical doctrines.

This being the first Radical lecture delivered before the general public in this part of Pennsylvania, it is a notable event. This section was settled by orthodoxy, and, thus far, being untroubled by organized heresy, it has become arrogant as well as impudent. It has taken it into its head that the whole community was about unanimous in its earnest support. But this is far from being the fact. Orthodoxy would be astonished to see the number of persons who have no faith in it, and yet who through its brutality and persecutions are obliged to give it at least outward support. Although southern Pennsylvania has the reputation of being very religious, it has more than the average number of scandals among both clergy and laity. It is admitted that some of our counties send more convicts to the penitentiary than many others containing less religion but more morality. Hypocrites no less than pharisees abound, owing to the unchecked influence of an arrogant, puritanical church. Notwithstanding the manifold exposures that come to light, the people persist in giving their hard-earned money for the support of an ignorant, lazy, and sleek-fed priesthood. They denounce mere morality, while their dupes through their teachings, somehow get the idea that they can sin until the eleventh hour, and then cheat the devil out of his dues by laying hold of the bankrupt scheme of salvation. Such a doctrine can only lead to vice and immorality. The advent of Col. Ingersoll will result in good. It will lead people to thinking, and when that spirit is aroused, a great step has been gained. To hear the clergy talk, one would think that we embrace about all the virtue and intelligence afloat, simply because they are constantly boring us with that same old story of the cross, etc. In this country they still preach a world made out of nothing; an old woman biting an apple; the great flood with a menagerie sailing upon it; praying at a mark, and the hydropathic and homeopathic plans of salvation. Pennsylvania is a slow State, but all this will be altered by and by. These doctrines are only a Sunday religion, for the support of which the people toil the remaining six days. After a while they will get their eyes open and discard all this nonsense. OBSERVER.

Iowa Convention.

The Iowa Convention has come and gone. While the attendance was not as large as could have been desired, it made up in earnestness what it lacked in numbers. Many counties were represented, and many more would have been had the notice been published earlier.

I have forwarded to the editor of this paper the daily newspaper report of the convention, second day, which contains the constitution of the league, resolutions adopted, and list of officers, which I presume he will publish. The first day's proceedings were opened by the election of Mr. Joel P. Davis, of Des Moines, as President, and E. C. Walker, Secretary, of the meeting. Rev. H. A. Reed was selected as Assistant Secretary. Committees were appointed, resolutions presented and ably discussed, and other routine work was disposed of; the committees being ordered to report at nine o'clock Friday morning.

Thursday evening Mr. Underwood delivered a very able address upon the State and Church question. One very interesting feature of the afternoon session was Mrs. Mattie H. Parry's beautiful rendition of Gerald Massey's superb poem, "The People's Advent."

Now, as to the work to be done: By our constitution the Executive Committee will appoint, as soon as possible, an agent in each county in the State, whose duty it will be to immediately associate with himself or herself two other residents of the county to form a county central committee, to take charge of the work in that county and assist in the organization of local leagues, scatter Liberal documents, etc., etc.

In a few days a partial list of these agents will be reported, and ere the close of the year we hope to have the full committees made up in every county.

Liberals! remember that no political reform can be wrought save through organization. It is freely admitted that the initiatory force is personal thought, but when it comes to action, organization is imperative. Before the principles of any reform can become embodied in the fundamental law and political institutions of the land, it is necessary that many millions of men and women shall have worked together in unity. We can never garner into the storehouse of national life the products of individual thought until he shall have organized.

As Corresponding Secretary of the State League of Iowa, I want to hear personally from every Liberal in the State. We have a great work to do. Let there be no sluggards among us, but let us all be workers in the great field of Liberalism. E. C. WALKER, Corresponding Secretary Liberal League of Iowa.

Money.

The finance question is an intricate subject. It is one upon which intelligent men and women, after much thought, differ widely. I frankly acknowledge that it is the deepest water I ever waded into. I have concluded, however, to give my views upon the nature and use of money, with its bearing upon the fiuance question. It is rather a new field of thought for me, and if I fail to create a sensation or to influence Congress, I shall not be disappointed.

Then, What is money? is the first thing to settle.

In order to do this, we must go back and examine into the primitive condition of man (theoretically), and trace as best we can the rise, growth, and use of money. In the beginning man's wants were few, and being contiguous so far as he was acquainted, barter was entirely the means of exchange. By and by for obvious reasons barter became inconvenient. They felt the necessity of a medium of exchange. Verbal or written promises to pay were too unreliable to pass current. It required property, something tangible, to meet the general want. Governments were too weak and unreliable to make their "promises to pay" legal tender. Nothing met this want better than the precious metals, gold and silver. Iron being plentiful and cheap was too bulky. The same with lead. For ages the metals and barter met the wants of money. Property acted as money; gold and silver are not money, but property as much as lead. As the world grew more populous and commerce more extensive, the precious metals were found to be inconvenient and insufficient. Then men began to have enough confidence in each other to take their "promises to pay" in gold and silver and other property, in lieu of the precious metals. Those men issuing these "promises to pay" were called bankers. Governments began also to issue "promises to pay" in gold and silver. The people received it as money, because they had confidence that the bankers and governments would redeem in gold and silver according to promise. Finally governments issued "promises to pay" in gold and silver, making it a legal tender for all internal debts. But we have not yet reached what I consider real money. I arrive at the following conclusions: 1. Money is not property, but a "promise to pay" in property. Not only gold and silver, but anything else wanted and for sale; 2. Money is simply a medium of exchange. Were all men honest and just so that there would be no need of government, the simple "promise to pay," verbal or written, of individuals would be all the medium needed. A note given by A to B, promising so much gold, silver, lead, iron, or wheat by weight, is pure money, and good money if A has enough property and there are no exemption laws.

But the trouble is the want of a uniform and popular money. A and B are known only by a few; therefore their "promises to pay," however good, necessarily have a limited circulation in the nation. Then it devolves upon the government to supply that want. Now, how to do it is the question. How are the people to get it proposed? There are three methods: 1. Internal improvements; 2. By running the government with it; 3. By loan (at low interest). I object to all of them for the following reasons: The first method exalts the laborer to the detriment of the property holder; the second is too slow, and the third puts the cart before the horse. In fact, all of them reverse the true method.

It is beyond the just powers of government to make money. The great business of governments is to protect men from each other. Little else is required of governments. Then, the duty of government is not to make money, but to guarantee the fulfillment of individual "promises to pay." Let government sell form and stamp at cost to individuals, regulating sales according to property, guaranteeing the public against over issue. Said money, not to be redeemed in so many ounces of gold or silver (that fluctuates in value) but in labor, or its satisfactory equivalent. Let so many hours of labor be the standard for a dollar. Of course, each individual issuing money must secure the government—when called on must redeem in labor individually, by proxy, or satisfactory equivalent in goods, farm produce, gold, silver, etc.

Holding these views, I come to the following conclusions: 1. Government has no right to make "promises to pay" only when based upon future taxation. And that should be avoided by paying cash; 2. Congress has no more right to regulate the value of silver than of wheat or lead; 3. Let the people's money be issued immediately, to take the place of gold and silver in redeeming government bonds and money. Pay off the national debt by direct and gradual taxation; 4. Let gold and silver be worth just what they will bring in market by weight as precious metals.

Let us have the views of others. What is money? Who can answer. O. JONES.

Mineral Springs, Arkansas, Feb. 18, 1878.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK is one of those pestiferous fellows who seek to make notoriety and money in a brawling care of others people's morals. Purchasing, or more probably in possession at first, of a collection of obscene books, prints, and instruments to facilitate abortion, he goes at the expense of Government from town to town scaring respectable people out of their wits, and through their alarm putting money in his own pockets.

Now, we have no earthly objection to St. Anthony following this for a living. He cannot do any harm, and may possibly do some good; but we do object to his being made a mail agent, with free access to mail cars and post-offices, to finger at his sweet will other people's mails. The circulation of obscene books and prints is bad, and the transmission of drugs horrible, but the sacredness of the mails is of more importance to us than the suppression of such stuff.

Anthony Comstock is a fraud. There is not a State in the Union that has not in its criminal code ample provisions for the suppression of this infamous evil, if the authorities care to enforce them. And if they do not care, all the howling activity of this later St. Anthony is of little avail. The fellow has been caught tampering with other people's letters, through the facilities afforded him in an abuse of the Post-Office Department, and we trust that he may not only be duly punished, but that our authorities may be taught that to attempt the suppression of a crime by the commission of crime degrades the law, by making it do that which it was enacted to prevent.—Washington Capital.

The following is from the Boston Post of the 14th, which shows a healthy state of public sentiment. Many papers have been afraid to say what they really thought of Comstock and his laws; but they begin to throw off the shackles and speak the truth:

The monster petition presented to the Senate for the abolition of Anthony Comstock & Co., by repealing or materially modifying the act of Congress passed in 1873 for the suppression of "obscene literature," receives an unexpected support from the firm of Comstock & Co. itself, as furnished in the story of the young lawyer who was ruined by its alleged conspiracy against him. If evidence is procurable in that way we should not hesitate to pronounce the remedy worse than the disease. The petition alluded to recites that the act of 1873 reverses the policy and practice of our Government since its foundation; that the Government was established, not to limit the rights of personal liberty and freedom of conscience, of the press, and the expression of opinion, but to protect them; and that the present law violates the letter and spirit of these fundamental principles of our Government and is capable of being used, and in fact is used, for the purpose of moral and religious persecution. It ought to be plain enough that while the United States mails are not established for the dissemination of immoral and licentious matter, neither are they to be maintained as hiding-places either for those who seek to become censors of the press or those who would maliciously waylay others. Like all other public agencies, the mails are liable to abuse, even with the closest legitimate watching; but that fact is not to be set up as the pretext for exercising tyranny or wreaking vengeance upon persons who may in one way and another be distasteful to the spies which the law now allows to crawl into the mail-bags.

Letters from Friends.

GENESEO, ILL., March 18, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have received some circulars from Seth Wilbur Payne soliciting my influence and subscription to the Age of Reason, but I can see no reason in this age to justify tearing down an established champion of the true faith to try an unestablished experiment, and therefore shall not take the Age. I want the "Champions of the Church." WM. H. TERPENING.

DENVER, COL., March 16, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to your inquiry I would say that I have received a paper and some circulars from Seth Wilbur Payne's office, and can not imagine where he got my address. I know of no place in New York where Payne would be likely to get my address except at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Yours truly, CHAS. ROTH.

VERMILLION, KAN., March 17, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In reply to "Information Wanted" would say that I have received begging circulars and specimen copies of Payne's Age of Reason. In my opinion he is the thief. Yours truly, E. CAMPFIELD.

ELKLAND, PA., March 20, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: That man Payne has stolen your mailing list, sure. He sends his circulars to all your subscribers here, and I think to no others. I do not think a copy of his Age of Reason (?) is taken at this office.

G L. P.

PEARL ROCK, March 15, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have received a prospectus, and later a copy of Payne's Age of Reason. I have no desire to take any more papers at this time, and if I had, I should not take that with my present views. These are the hardest times that I have ever seen. There is no sale for anything not positively a necessity, and money at 25 to 40 per cent. We will try to pay you some time. Yours truly, THOS. TRACY.

BOSTON, March 23, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: Put me down for ten copies of the "Champions" in cloth, three in leather, and one in morocco. FRANK RIVERS.
28 School street.

OTTUMWA, IOWA, March 20, 1878.

MR BENNETT, Dear Sir: You requested your friends to inform you if they received papers or circulars from persons having no means of knowing their address excepting through your mail list. I have received papers and circulars from Seth Wilbur Payne. How he got my name I cannot tell, but I have received circulars at two different times, and his paper once. I have paid no attention to them, and do not intend to. I do not want his paper. O. C. GRAVES.

DETROIT, MICH., March 18, 1878.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: There is a paper sent to my address from your place or number called Payne's Age of Reason, without my order or consent. Please stop it and you will oblige me. I know not how he got my address. Let THE TRUTH SEEKER come. WM. PENFIELD.

WALTON, IND., March 21, 1878.

MR EDITOR: Seth Wilbur Payne sent me two flaming posters, and one number of his age of reasonable falsehood. How he got my address I cannot tell, unless he filched it from your room. Yours truly, E. VAN BUSKIRK.

NEWPORT, MINN., March 17, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have read two copies of Payne's Age of Reason, the first dated January 12th, and the last March 2d. How he got my name, I do not know. I have never answered the call he sent me to get subscribers. If this will do you any good, you can print it. Anything that I can do for you I will do cheerfully. I am satisfied with THE TRUTH SEEKER, for it is the only light I ever got that satisfied me, and I think it ahead of anything ever printed. W. R. MUNZER.

HINSDALE, N. H., March 23, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: You may not be aware, but it is the truth nevertheless, that your friend, Seth Wilbur Payne, not only mails specimen copies of his valuable sheet to those who never asked for it, and who do not want it, but he is constantly violating the post-office regulations in sending specimen and single copies to non-subscribers at pound rates. He sends such transient copies at two cents per pound, when he should prepay every such paper with a one cent stamp. Knowing how gladly he would pitch into you could he find cause, I write this that you and others may see that this good Age of Reason man and friend of Scar-faced Tony is not above cheating the Government when he can. Respectfully yours, H. & Co.

BUFFALO, March 20, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: You see by the enclosed that we have organized a Liberal League. We and the German Freethinkers' Association, which has one hundred members, are each going to have a charter. One of their members recently died and left them $2000.

Our association begins with sixty members. Our platform and demands of Liberalism are the same as suggested by the National Liberal League: Total separation of Church and State; National protection for national citizens; Universal education the basis of universal suffrage, and A secular republic. Respectfully yours,

ED M. SELLON.

LISBON, IOWA, March 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have received two circulars, and also a copy of the Age of Reason, from S. W. Payne, requesting me to subscribe for his paper; but I am not able to take more than one Liberal paper. THE TRUTH SEEKER is good enough for me. I have also received a printed letter from Payne, stating that he had been in prison, and that his printing-office was sold, for libeling a church deacon. Now, if this be true, he is too much of a Liberal. He took the liberty to slander his fellow-man, and of course he was served right. Such characters are more a disgrace to Liberals than a credit. I do not know how he obtained my address. Fraternally yours, as ever,

JOSEPH LEVY.

NOBLE, RICE CO., KAN.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I received begging documents, printed letters, posters, and the like, at three different times from S. W. Payne, and as you are the only publisher who has my name, I supposed you had lent your list to your neighbor. I also received three copies of the Age of Reason, which might properly be called the age of lies, and I hope I shall not be bored with them any more. Hoping this will assist you in ferreting out the thief, I remain your well-wisher, A. S. LECLERC.

ELKLAND, PA., March 20, 1878.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: Your reply to Mr. J. Newell, of Ypsilanti, Mich., in your issue of the 16th inst., pleased me wonderfully. I am so glad that you are willing to investigate the phenomena of modern Spiritualism. When the great and learned Agassiz was asked to be one of an investigating committee, he became indignant, opened the door, and pointed the offender to depart; this was unworthy so great a man. It was but another proof that all human beings have their weaknesses and defects.

Since my abiding faith in Spiritualism—its philosophy and phenomena—yield me so much of undisturbed happiness, such assurance, and at times a trust amounting to sublimity, I would like to speak somewhat of my experience, hoping thereby to encourage or aid others who are propounding the question of all questions, "If a man die shall he live again?" I do not simply believe that the dead live, but I know that I have seen and talked with those who had been laid away in the grave! Since a child of seven years I have been subject to spiritual impression and guidance: at that age twice I lay in trance for hours. I then passed beyond visual boundaries to the spirit-world or spirit existence. When restored to consciousness, I told of persons, scenes, and conditions that startled the common ear. Then my fear of death ceased, and my child-grief was great that I had to come back; in comparison, earth-life seemed discord, inharmony.

In 1873 I went to Moravia, N. Y., to the medium Mrs. Mary Andrews; we had seances conducted much as the one you mention, held by Mrs. Maud E. Lord—twelve, fifteen, and eighteen at a time present. Spirits came, called persons by name, who were incognito, gave their own names and directions as to our sitting; spirit lights came in response to singing and repeating of some beautiful poem; the most delightful perfume filled the apartment, strong currents of air swept over and around, purple-tinged clouds formed above our heads, and some were sprinkled by falling drops. Let me say, deception of any kind was out of the question; we were an intelligent people there to investigate. But the most skeptical, after two or three seances, said "There is no trickery here." Spirits would counsel, cheer, and encourage their friends; gentle pats were felt; departed wives and mothers would come and plead for the tender care and protection of their orphan children. The light being called for, many hands were shown at a time—and such beautiful hands—then the materialized person, with all the characteristics of earth life, just as natural even to the style of combing the hair, caps, eye-glasses, palsied hands. The identity was complete; these materialized forms talked sometimes as plainly as we mortals. I wish those who question the purity and the morality of genuine spirit-circles could know the sacredness of the time and scene. To me it was as if the gates of heaven were thrown wide open. Jacob's ladder was indeed there, and the angels were ascending and descending. They come back to comfort, aid, guide, and counsel aright; true, we do not always see them with the physical eye, for the spiritual form is invisible to mortal eye, unless it accretes from the aural surroundings wherewith to materialize.

Your idea of an etherial spiritual form, inhabiting the rude material, coincides with my own; this spirit form, at times, goes out, even while the soul actuates the natural body. I, too, believe death does not materially change our soul conditions; as we have lived, so we pass into the world of spirit; has our life been true, beautiful, useful, so we are spiritually; as we attract here, so shall we be related there; as mind goes forth unfettered, annihilating space, time, so I believe, spiritually, there will be few impediments. Spiritually there will be no fixed abode; eternal progression is the soul's destiny. There is no God save those which men have invented; no devil, hell, or torments, save those which man has created. Goodness, purity of life, truthfulness, ever bring happiness to the possessor; the reverse, suffering and woe. The erring, the vicious, are ever objects of compassion. Circumstances, over which we, as individuals, had no control, have made us what we are. Seeds of vice, hatred, and murder are sown in ante-natal conditions. How my heart pities and compassionates the erring! Evil is but undeveloped good, and in the great eternity will bud and blossom into beauty, and bear golden harvests for the reapers. Life is eternal, and perfection the goal of being.

I was at Moravia and Cascade ten days. I could write pages in detailing the spirits that came. I will sometime tell you how I was influenced to secure this home. At that time my husband was carrying on much business; I did not dream of want; our means were ample, but spirits controlled me. I purchased this lot, and built under their control. I could not resist, and it is wonderful how I stood under the pressure. I should now be homeless were it not for them; they are with me much of the time, though I am practical, not visionary.

Before my husband died, I saw it all in a vision, even to the hour and minute on which he passed over; this was in April; he passed in August. I told of it, and it proved as I saw it, although I was so exhausted from caring for him I did not think of it until my mind was called to it by those whom I had told of the vision. I beg your pardon, but people here are all orthodox. I love dearly to talk to such a fearless-souled man as you are.

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

CENTRAL, S. C., March 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am, as perhaps you know, a trial subscriber to Payne's Age of Reason. I at first sent thirty cents, thinking, as it was so cheap, it might circulate to some extent in this impoverished section of country. It was not long, however, before I became thoroughly disgusted with Mr. Payne, and was sorry I ever gave him any support; but, as I had got my foot in it, I concluded to "grin and endure," till the time was up; and as I had never received Nos. 1 and 3 of the Age of Reason, I sent a dime for the missing numbers. I soon received a card from Mr. Payne, stating that Nos. 1 and 3 could not be supplied, and wishing to know what I desired him to do with the dime—asking if he should add it to my subscription. I wrote back to Mr. Payne that if he was done slandering and abusing you and extolling that infernal, contemptible Comstock, he could place the dime to my credit.

I notice that in the last two or three numbers of the Age of Reason there is but little said about you or THE TRUTH SEEKER. I guess Mr. Payne is sick; and by the time he frees himself from this noose of his own manufacture, I think he will be ready for initiation into the Y. M. C. A., and if he could only get Mr. Peterson to join in with him, what an addition it would be to the throne of grace!

Well, when my time is up with the Age of Reason, I shall take leave of Mr. Payne. I have long since dropped Common Sense, for the same reason that I shall soon drop the other; but I never expect to drop THE TRUTH SEEKER till I drop on the bosom of old Mother Nature.

I am rather in arrears with you now, but hope ere long to send you a remittance. Farewell. May your useful life continue many years hence. I don't see how we Liberals could do without you. Think of me occasionally. I am growing old and my health is getting feeble. I shall soon pass out. Fraternally, R. M. CASEY.

HASTINGS, MICH., March 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I inclose $1.00 towards copy of the "Sages," and will send balance soon with a renewal of subscription. I wish to say that, in my judgment, Seth W. Paine would confer a great benefit on the Liberal public if he would "step down and out" of the publishing business. His recent articles about you are evidence that he has but little regard for the truth. Even an attack upon the Christian religion would now come from him with a bad grace; and I will not contribute to the support of a publisher whose highest aim seems to be to make money by slandering his neighbors.

Sincerely yours, GEORGE WOOD.

518½ CONGRESS ST., PORTLAND, ME.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please say in your next paper that I contemplate going West about the middle or end of April, with a purpose of locating at some point as a physician, and I should like to correspond with parties in localities favorable to Liberalism, where I might lecture occasionally in adjacent villages and towns. I would also like to make engagements for lectures, discussions, etc., immediately. My ability as a clairvoyant magnetizer, as well as my scientific knowledge of materia medica, I believe is pretty well known; and as to my ability as a lecturer and debater, the people of the West know me well. Address

D. W. HULL.

N. B.—I am now in correspondence with parties in Iowa. I prefer not to go so far, but shall act for the best when I hear from others. Let me hear from all, whether far or near. D. W. H.

TECUMSEH, MICH., March 18, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have received at different times two circulars and a number of copies of the Age of Reason. I wondered at the time how its editor could have come by my name; but since learning your loss of a list of names, the wonder ceases.

Yours for truth and this world, J. GUIWITS.

LOWELL, NEB., March 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have been receiving circulars and solicitations to subscribe to Payne's Age of Reason. I think my name and address were obtained from your list, for this reason. The P. O. is Kearney, as it happened by mistake I added the word Junction to it, when I gave it to you. No one else has it in that way except Payne, who sends also to this R. R. station by that name. Yours, T. H. HECOX.

WINSTED, CONN., March 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: My attention is called to the following communication in Payne's Age of Reason for March 16:

"NOT STOLEN.—In THE TRUTH SEEKER for March 9, 1878, there is a communication from H. W. Pinney, of Mill Brook, Conn. Please inform H. W. Pinney, in your paper, that it was I who sent you the article entitled 'Hell in a Hamlet,' and that it was not stolen from THE TRUTH SEEKER exchanges. Truly yours,

"W. T. CHAMBERLAIN."

As the inference which casual readers may draw from this would tend to exonerate Payne from the charge of literary theft made (and proven) by your Hartford correspondent and H. W. Pinney some time ago, it should be observed that Mr. Chamberlain does not specifically declare that he was the author of the article disingenuously appropriated by Payne, but simply that he "sent" it to Payne, and that "it was not stolen from THE TRUTH SEEKER exchanges," which last declaration is the denial of a supposed claim which I am not aware to have been made by anybody.

The simple fact is, that the article taken by Payne from The Winsted Press, and addressed to himself as an original communication, was written by a particular friend of mine, in my own library, and in my presence; and I forwarded a copy of the Press containing it to the Age of Reason office (as well as a copy to yourself). But it matters not how Payne acquired the printed article. He appropriated it in a dishonorable manner. If Mr. Chamberlain copied the article in his own manuscript and "sent" it to Payne as original, then he, too, is a literary thief. He doesn't now claim to have done so; but he damns himself as so "swift a witness" for an ignoble scoundrel that there is no foreseeing that he'll not so declare next time.

Yours truly, LEON CASE.

WEST UNION, March 17, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: As you wished information in regard to Payne's paper, I can say that I have received Payne's Age of Reason and circulars quite often for the past two months. Also, C. H. Carpenter, who takes your paper, has received the same.

About the time Payne joined the Young Men's Christian Association (I suppose he joined them, if he did not he ought to), I had six names for him, but on getting another TRUTH SEEKER it knocked the whole thing in the head, and not one of them would take it. Truly yours,

J. F. SMITH, JR.

CLARION, WRIGHT COUNTY, IOWA, Feb. 16, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: There are so many down on Seth Wilbur Payne, poor fellow, that I feel quite sorry for him. He cannot help being mean, and should be pitied more than blamed. He probably stole your subscription list; I am quite sure he did. No man ever addressed me by the name of H. Crooks, until you did on THE TRUTH SEEKER. We have received several numbers of Payne's Age of Reason. The first two or three were addressed to my wife, S. E. Brooks, and the last one to H. Crooks, which name was undoubtedly taken from your list. Respectfully,

H. Brooks.

Sterling, Iowa, March 16, 1878.

Friend Bennett: Seeing a statement in your paper that you had had your mailing list stolen from your office, I cheerfully give you facts in my own case. When I subscribed for your paper I gave my order to Mr. Johnson, your agent, and he, through mistake, gave you the name Charles Marr, instead of Solomon Marr; but as my family is the only one round here of that name there has been no trouble, and as I got the paper regularly I did not think it worth while to have it corrected: but about four or five weeks ago I received Payne's Age of Reason for two weeks, and he, too, made the same mistake in my name. Now, all my other mail matter and papers come in my proper name, Solomon Marr. Perhaps Mr. Payne can inform you how he came to make that mistake. I hear that Thomas Scarborough received copies of Payne's paper at the same time, though he says that he is entirely unknown in New York except through The Truth Seeker's list.

Solomon Marr.

Farley, Iowa, March 13, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: The Freethinkers of this place have formed a "Liberal Library Association," and, by each contributing a small sum of money, have placed before the reading public a class of literature that makes "Old Theology" quake. Our volumes are free for all to read, and the young people, and many of the older ones, are hungry for just such matter as is found in Liberal and Reform books and periodicals. I have about thirty volumes of my own, and they are almost continually out being read by those who are willing to investigate for themselves. Our association meets every alternate Sunday, for the purpose of discussing such questions as the speaker of the evening may see fit to introduce. We have thus far depended on home talent, and with such success as to attract the attention of the pulpit, from which source we receive an occasional advertisement, but not in very flattering terms. In spite of "Old Orthodoxy," however, the fires of liberty burn. The single spark of Infidelity that twelve years ago in this town struggled for an existence has been fanned into a flame that the blood of a thousand Lambs could not extinguish.

A.

Minneapolis, Minn., March 16, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: In your Truth Seeker of the 8th inst, I read a notice under the heading "Information Wanted," from which it appears that your mail list has been stolen from your office, together with some postage stamps. Now, as I read that the thought entered my mind that I have been receiving several copies of Payne's Age of Reason, together with a begging circular from the editor of the last named paper, and I wondered how my name could have been known to the editor and publisher of said paper. You are the only one that could have my name and address, for I do not take any other paper than The Truth Seeker, i. e., of all those published east of Chicago. For my part I do not like the paper Payne's Age of Reason, for I do not approve of his (the editor's) conduct against you. Had it not been for that, I should have done something for it, and did a little in the way of sending the many circulars received to some of my friends until his course towards you was apparent. Yours truly, John F. N. DeFlon.

Rosenberg, per Tampa, Fla., March 15, 1878.

Dear Friend Bennett: As it is a long time since our Truth Seeker has had a letter from our sunny State, I think it proper, at this time of business stagnation and laborers' starvation in North and West, to give an account of our country and its people, and their progress here.

The climate is splendid. Fresh vegetables and many kinds of fruit all the year round. Last month the orange-trees commenced to bloom, while the golden fruit was still on the trees. The heat of summer is not so excessive as in many Northern States, because the summer months coincide with the rainy season, and, besides this, we have almost constant sea-breezes to mitigate the heat. Land for homesteads is scarce, though about thirty miles off the Bay some is still left. State land can be had, though not to a large extent, for from seventy cents to one dollar an acre. Most of the land consists of high, dry pine ridges, requiring much manure and muck for farming. Muck is abundant in numerous ponds. For building sites and orange groves these dry ridges are quite suitable. The balance is low pine land and hummocks, which are very fertile. The settlement of this part of the State commenced about three years ago, and therefore everything is new; hardly any fruits can be had yet. But improvements are made very fast, and immigrants are pouring in. And if the merits of this country were known in the North, many more would come before they have spent their last cent there, waiting for better times. The old settlers subsist mainly by stock-raising, hunting, fishing, and gathering oysters; for cultivating the soil they do not care much. Since Northern people are coming in, the country is changing for the better, and society is improving. What a new country like this needs is industrious hands. The daily wages are from $1 00 to $1 50, but laborers can hardly be had at that price, and much work has to be left undone. I am willing to give to every laborer's family (if a dozen families come together), for eighteen days' work, a ten-acre lot, suitable for orange and other fruit trees, and healthy to live on. A house for our climate takes about one week's work for a man, and about $5.00 expenses besides. But to build up a society, we need other classes of people, too, though I cannot advise them to come at once if they, and especially the ladies, have not a great deal of courage, to enable them to endure the hardships and privations of a life in the backwoods. For them it would be more advisable to remain a few years longer in the North, where they have society, schools for their children, and comforts of every kind, and follow their occupation, whilst somebody here is planting and cultivating for them an orange grove. Many families in the North have already availed themselves of this opportunity, but there is plenty more room for others. The trees will come into bearing in about five years after transplanting, and will not cost more than three dollars each, including the price of land, clearing, fencing, furnishing, planting, and cultivating the trees, and the taxes for five years.

In answer to many inquiries from our friends, I have to state that we have never yet regretted our migration to this country. We are enjoying good health, have plenty of exercise, and our orange-trees (now twelve hundred and ten in number) are growing nicely; four are in bloom now, and some more will follow every year, until, in five years, they will all be in bearing. And as a man has made, this year, from one full-grown tree, one hundred and twenty odd dollars, there will be, eventually, a fortune in our grove. The unemployed multitude in the large cities ought to come to this country, where they can easily build up an independent home for themselves and their families.

K. Engler.

Pittsburgh, Pa, March 18, 1878.

Mr. Editor: Some years since I was fortunate in having a neighbor who was a good trance medium, and received through him many very interesting communications on the Deity, spirit-life, etc., which are recalled to my memory by the article headed, "Is There a Future Life?" in the last Truth Seeker. One evening, I complained to the intelligence that, although his communications were very interesting, instructive, and elevating, yet they were not entirely satisfactory, inasmuch as they did not give a full and comprehensive idea of spirit-life, and asked him to teach us the mysteries of the spirit-world.

The reply came promptly:

"Teach you the mysteries of the spirit world? Go, teach the unborn child the arts and sciences; teach it the mysteries of algebra; teach it to trace the comet's flight through fields of unlimited space and predict the time of its return; teach it to rob the silkworm of its shroud, fill the robe with invisible gas and on it mount above the clouds. Man has done all these things, and why can you not teach them to the unborn babe? Simply because from want of development it cannot comprehend such things. Listen; you bear the same relation to the spirit-world that the unborn babe does to this, and can no more comprehend the mysteries of that world than the babe can of this. The child comes into this world with its powers and faculties dormant. One by one they are developed, strengthened, and matured, until finally he wakes up to the consciousness that he is a man. So, when you enter the spirit-world everything appears strange and incomprehensible; you are but a spiritual infant, though your dormant faculties and powers will soon be brought into operation. By clairvoyance you can see all things; by clairaudience you can hear all things; by intuition you can know all things, and finally you will wake up to the consciousness that you are a God! Then can you exclaim with Christ, 'I and my father are one;' then can you comprehend the beautiful relation existing between you and God, and can understandingly pray to 'Our Father which art in heaven;' then can you truly exclaim with Christ, 'All power is given to me in heaven and upon earth.' But this consciousness of possessing unlimited power will not beget pride, for it will be accompanied by the knowledge that God and angel, archangel, cherubim and seraphim, spirit and man, animal, vegetable, and mineral, are all one and the same thing in different stages of development; then you will not despise the meanest thing, for you will know that what that is, you have been, and what you are, that will be. The poet Pope was truly inspired when he wrote:

'All are but parts of one stupendous whole.
Whose body nature is, and God the soul.'"

The above teaches that this life is the fœtal life of the spirit, as the uterine is the fœtal life of the body; and as the fœtus is not required to learn or practice anything belonging to this life, so we are not required to learn anything belonging exclusively to spirit-life. If we faithfully perform our duties to ourselves and neighbors here, nothing more is required from us. As nothing can be annihilated in the material world, so nothing can be annihilated in the spiritual. Hence life in the spirit-world is a natural and unavoidable necessity.

A. Wilcox.

Richford, Vt., March 5, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: When I subscribed for your paper, I did so because I liked its title; and I have never been sorry. Truth (real fact) was the object of my pursuit, and you have answered my expectation remarkably. When I joined the Methodist sect, I supposed truth was the grand object of their aim. After experiment and observation, I was disappointed. Faith and numbers were what they were after. For this cause I commenced critical examination as a farmer, instead of a preacher of Godology. I had a farm before I was a Methodist, and thought I was more capable of managing a farm than a church. I commenced with the first chapter of Genesis, to prepare myself for whatever was in the future, and be honest with myself. I think now that any one who wishes to use his own reasoning powers unshackled by priestcraft, and who will read thoroughly the first three chapters of Genesis, and weigh every sentence as the words of a being who "created the universe out of nothing," will come to the conclusion that "God," "He," "Our," and "Us," and "Lord God," got man into existence purposely to make him as damned as the God-power could make him, and fixed things in such a manner that all children must be born totally-depraved sinners, and then to torment them in an endless hell because they were so born; as though it was a great privilege to be made out of nothing, so that we could be roasted alive in hell fire eternally! Praise ye the Lord! This is the reason why I could not be a Methodist, or any other Christian, priest. Whatever others may think or do, I must do my own thinking in this matter, and even tell my own thoughts.

But we are told that Jesus Christ came into the world to save these totally-depraved sinners—and that Jesus gave them all into the hands of a human, damning priesthood, together with the keys of heaven and hell; so they can dispose of us all as they please. And the world has been cursed with ignorance, bigotry, falsehood, and hypocrisy ever since, according to all history. Either Christianity is a priestly fabrication, a lie, or the God-power, "Almighty Jehovah," has a poor faculty to make books to meet the capacity of creatures made in his own image. Either gods are non compos mentis, or priests are the most consummate liars on earth. Oh, when will men begin to learn how little we know? how much we take for granted?

I am astonished that you have written so much, brother, and so well, and "stand yet, as an iron pillar strong," battling against the ecclesiastical and political monster that has tyrannized over the laboring classes these ten thousand years.

I am sorry to see so many professed Liberals trying to divide the small company. Many of those who seem to want to arrest the effort to impart truthful information on the subject of devil and hellology have got my name and sent me circulars to assist them to sell their papers. I made some effort, but could effect nothing. I do what I can with The Truth Seeker and your books and tracts, and admire your grit and ability. Just let Teed, the Romulus, go, and attend to the real wants of the people. You are getting higher in the estimation of thinking men here, but still you must expect that bigoted and hypocritical Gospel-workers will be excited. "What shall we do when the devil is dead? What shall we do when hell is gone! What shall we do when it is known that the old Jewish Yahoo is all the God Christians have ever had, except what they have spliced on to him?" The pretended people of this monster God have murdered millions to make this priest-forged character stand on its legs.

I don't know but that, since the Y. M. C. A. D——n! Society have so much trouble about obscenity in New York (we hear but little about it in Vermont; the people are civilized), Congress had better pass an act to prevent the sexes being born so; or else get parents to "train up their children in the way they should go;" or stop the Sunday-schools, which are a fruitful source of hypocrisy. Will a law made by Congress have any more effect than the law made on Sinai? "Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined," law of Congress or not. Children should be taught to be honest with self, truthful and just to others. But we have no more such teaching in the Church or State than we have in "Hamlet." We have not much such teaching anywhere. God made the universe out of nothing in six days; but he don't know what to do with a dead man unless his case is pettifogged by a priest. Think of it! Pursue on your way! Priestcraft and kingcraft may prevail even in republican America, and destroy liberty.

Sincerely yours, Joseph Noyes.

Useful Recipes.

Harvard Drink.—Mix equal parts ale and sodawater, and add sugar and a lemon.

University Night-cap.—Take half a tumblerful of tea, with a wineglassful of milk and sugar to taste, to which add a wineglassful of brandy; beat one egg and mix.

Turkey Hash.—Cut up the remains of a turkey into small dice with a very little of the dressing; put the gravy you have left in a saucepan with the bones and pieces that you do not use in the hash, adding, if necessary, a little boiling water, together with sweet marjoram, nutmeg, grated lemon peel, salt, and pepper, and mushroom catsup, to taste; let it stew slowly one half hour, then strain it, put in the turkey, and let it simmer one-quarter of an hour, or just long enough for the turkey to get well heated through; serve on three cornered bits of toast buttered just around the edge of the dish, and if you like you may sift bread crumbs over the top and some small pieces of butter and brown it in the oven or with a heated salamander.

Stewed Oysters.—Take each oyster out separately from liquid; strain juice to get out any piece of shells there may be in it; add one pint of milk to every quart of oysters; boil milk and juice, adding salt and pepper to taste; when the above is boiling, put in oysters, and when just beginning to boil, take off at once and serve. The last direction insures the oysters, being tender, plump, and cooked also.

A Boiled Plum Pudding.—Grate the crumb of a twelve cent loaf and boil a quart of rich milk, then strain it and set it to cool; pick over a pound of currants and a pound of seedless raisins; strew over them three large tablespoonfuls of flour; roll fine a pound of brown sugar, and mince as fine as possible three quarters of a pound of beef suet; prepare two beaten nutmegs and a large tablespoonful of powdered mace and cinnamon; also, the grated peel and the juice of two large lemons or oranges; beat ten eggs very light, and when it is cold stir them gradually into the milk, alternately with the suet and grated bread; add by degrees the sugar, fruits, and spices, with a large glass of brandy and one of white wine; mix the whole very well, and stir it hard; then put it in a thick cloth that has been scalded and floured; leave room for it to swell, and tie it very firmly, pasting the tying place with a small lump of moistened flour. Put the pudding into a large pot of boiling water, and boil it steadily six hours, replenishing the pot occasionally from a boiling kettle. Turn the pudding frequently in the pot; prepare half a pound of citron cut in slips, and half a pound of almonds blanched and split in half lengthwise; stick the almonds and citron all over the outside of the pudding as soon as you take it out of the cloth; send it to table hot, with a little alcohol or brandy poured around it in the dish, and lit with a match. To be eaten with the wine sauce, or with cold wine or sugar.

New England Brown Bread.—Four cupfuls rye meal, three of yellow Indian-meal, one small cupful molasses, one teaspoonful soda, one-half teaspoonful cream tartar; mix very soft with sour milk, or buttermilk; little salt; steam four hours and bake two.

Oyster Stuffing.—Oysters for stuffing turkey should be bearded and chopped fine; a little mace should be added.

Trifles.—Yolk of one egg, enough prepared flour to make a stiff dough; roll very thin, cut in fanciful shapes, and fry in hot lard; turn them immediately after dropping them into the lard; they should not remain in more than three seconds, and should be of a light yellow color; drain them on a large flat dish; when cold sprinkle with red sugar.

Potato Pie.—One pound of mashed potato, rubbed through a colander; one-half pound of butter rubbed to a cream with two cupfuls of white sugar; six eggs, the whites and yolks beaten separately; the juice of one lemon, squeezed into the potato while hot; one teaspoonful of nutmeg, the same of mace. Bake in shells of paste, or in dishes lined with good paste, without covers. To be eaten cold.

Scrapple.—Take a fresh pig's head or other cuttings of pork; if a head, carefully clean it, put it into a pot with a gallon of water, let it boil until the meat leaves the bone, then strain, putting the liquor back into the pot; be careful to get all the bones out, put the meat into a chopping-bowl, mince fine, season with salt, pepper, sage, thyme, and marjoram; stir well, and add it to the liquor; thicken with yellow Indian-meal until the spoon stands alone; let it boil an hour, stirring occasionally; turn into square tin pans; when wanted for use cut into thin slices and fry a light brown.

The Truth Brigade.

[A PARODY.]

All the time, all the time,
All the time onward;
All into truth and light
Are marching many hundred!
Forward the truth brigade!
Theirs not to be dismayed,
All into truth and light
Marched the many hundred!

Forward the truth brigade!
Dispelling darkness and shade!
Not though the world knew
That many had blundered.
Theirs is to make reply,
Theirs is to reason why,
Theirs is to do or die;
All into truth and light
Marched the many hundred!

Priests to right of them!
Priests to left of them!
Priests in front of them!
Who loudly thundered;
Right through the priests they broke,
With many a daring stroke,
Some of them making it tell,
Ingersoll giving them hell;
Right into truth and light
Marched the many hundred!

Laying their arguments bare,
They that read them there,
Astonished the world!
While all the priests grumbled,
"Look back," the hundreds said,
"Then look afar ahead,
And choose which road to take,
Before it be too late;"
Then they looked back,
Back looked many hundred.

Ruins to right of them!
Ruins to left of them!
Ruins behind them!
Old and unnumbered,
And then, with many a sigh,
They thought of days gone by,
But ne'er would they return
To their old hell to burn,
But would prefer to learn;
Learn with many hundred.

Now is the time for all
To help and roll the ball,
To destroy the priest's blunders,
Soon is the time to come
THE TRUTH SEEKER has begun,
Begun with many hundred!

GEO. F. KESSLER.

Baltimore, March 18, 1878.

Borrowed Light.

BY F. D. LACY.

"Seek not to walk by borrowed light,
But keep unto thine own;
Do what thou doest with all thy might,
And trust thyself alone."
Let thine own reason be thy guide,
And go where duty calls;
Keep truth and justice on thy side,
Though all creation falls.

Let not a power on earth enslave
Thine intellectual light;
Yield not to those who howl and rave,
But battle for the right.
May guiding angels lead the way
To virtue, truth, and love:
And man become as perfect here,
As angels are above.

Do good to all, and to the least
May kindly feelings reign,
Such influences serve the best,
And never taught in vain;
I'd rather labor for the poor,
And light reward receive,
Than be a monster to devour,
Or prince to rob and thieve.

Shun all temptations of delight,
That lead to guilt and shame;
But all obstructions firmly fight,
Upon the road to fame.
What reason teaches you to do,
Or bids not to be done,
Obey and readily pursue,
Where wisdom can be won.

Proclaim your sentiment if true,
Though all the world deny;
Teach to the world the facts you know,
Though for it you must die.
"Seek not to walk by borrowed light,
But keep unto thine own;
Do what thou doest with all thy might,
And trust thyself alone."

Nirvana, Mich., March 16, 1878.

Science and Religion.

John Jasper, of Richmond, a colored man and preacher, has lately been informed by some light-minded person that the evidence of the senses is not to be depended upon in regard to the relations of the earth to the sun, and that, in fact, the sun does not go round the earth, but the earth round the sun. Jasper has inquired abroad and has found that faith in this mischievous opinion that the earth goes round the sun is widely spread, that nearly everybody believes in it, and that it has been accepted from the mouths of a ribald and impious lot of fellows called philosophers. As an energetic champion of astronomical truth and plain religion, Jasper has determined that this thing must stop just where it is; that there has been enough of it, and that the world must be set right and reclaimed from its great error, and that the people must be properly put on their guard against the philosophers. In fact, Jasper has burst with impetuous fury into the middle of the great battle of religion against science; and, in virtue of his faith in the evidences on the side of religion, and in virtue of the vigor and simplicity with which he presents those evidences, he must be recognized as the great leader of the religious world in this warfare. He rests his case mainly on the Bible, and no champion of religion would ask a firmer support. The Bible talks of the rising and going down of the sun, and it would not say "that anything could go down that was standing still all the time." Then there was Joshua, who told the sun to stand still, which would have been a ridiculous superfluity if the sun had really never moved. And as to the earth's revolving round the sun, "what would become of the ocean?" It would be spilled out, of couse, "all over the land." Thus on the argument from the Bible and from what he sees—and seeing is believing—the Rev. John Jasper has proved the case of religion against philosophy to the full satisfaction of his congregation in Richmond, every one of whom held up his right hand as an evidence of his faith that the sun and not the world went round. Philosophy, knowledge, science, are utterly used up—pulverized, dissolved, and evaporated by this onslaught. Jasper has left them not a word to say, and as the great champion of the Church he is without a rival. All champions that have come out in this battle hitherto have been feebler than Jasper. They have compromised a little with knowledge. They have admitted, in fact, half it claims, and been satisfied with mere subterfuges. In Jasper alone there is no compromise, and the ecclesiastical world is to be congratulated upon the appearance of the first champion who has really done its cause justice.—N. Y. Herald.

"BEYOND THE VEIL." Posthumous work of Paschal Beverly Randolph, aided by Emmanuel Swedenborg and others, through the minds of Frances H. McDougall and Luna Hutchinson. 262 pp. 12 mo. D. M. Bennett, New York, 1878. Cloth, $1.50.

Probably the most eccentric, erratic mind that has been prominently connected with the modern Spiritual movement was Dr. P. B. Randolph. Being a sang mêlée, his mother of African extraction and his father of the celebrated Randolph family of Virginia, his life was a strange medley of intellectuality and sensuality, of lofty, sublimest thoughts and lowest, deepest groveling—sensitive to an extreme and unstable as water; his death by his own hand being in full keeping with his fitful, tortuous career.

Not content with the dozen or more volumes given to the world during his earth-life, the restless Randolph has projected through the minds of two lady mediums of California (his attractions were always feminine) another contribution to the ever-widening range of Spiritual literature. One of these ladies, Mrs. McDougall, will be remembered by the readers of Brittan's Quarterly as the medium through whom the experiences in spirit-life of Col. Baker were so graphically depicted and so eloquently portrayed in the pages of that excellent journal. A portion of those experiences of Col. Baker have been embodied in the posthumous work of Dr. Randolph, their publication in permanent form thus being secured, as they well merited to be.

We can cordially recommend "Beyond the Veil" as a deeply-interesting, well-written narrative of scenes and incidents in the spirit-clime. The language is ever above mediocrity, and often glowingly eloquent. A large amount of useful and instructive information relative to the spirit-world, its customs, society, the daily life of its inhabitants, etc., can be gathered from this volume. We feel assured that no one will ever regret its purchase. A steel portrait of Dr. Randolph embellishes the work, the publication of which has entailed considerable expense upon the lady mediums presenting it to the world; and we hope that by its extended sale they may be secured against any loss possibly incurred in its issue.

Among the many subjects of interest enchaining the attention of the reader, may be noted the following: Birth of the spirit; the two magnetic currents connecting earth and the spirit-world, and the aerial cars navigating those currents; the location of the spiritual spheres or zones; spiritual food and clothing and how procured; building materials, architecture, house-furnishing, and kinds and uses of labor in the spirit-world; the sanitary forces; the social system, and amusements thereof; death, or transition to higher spheres; marriage and its rites; uses of consolidated sunshine; exercise of will power and clairvoyance; views of the heavenly bodies; the spiritual suns and the Great Central Sun; sanataria, or hospitals for the treatment of insane and undeveloped spirits; first experiences of General Custer and his massacred band in spirit-life; the hells (quite an apropos subject just at this time); the heavens of poets, inventors, statesmen; the negro race in spirit-life; the Heaven of Heavens, with views of Zoroaster, Socrates, Plato, Issiah, Jeremiah, Mary the Madonna, Jesus, Joan of Arc, Christna, Buddha, Sappho, Theodosia of Tyre, Porphyry, and Polycarp; Sermon on Mount Beatus by Jesus the Nazarene, etc., etc.

Randolph, it will be remembered, while on earth was a devoted Rosicrucian, addicted to occultic rhapsodies, voudooistic charms, and magical mummeries; and claimed a membership in Oriental Theosophical lodges and brotherhoods. It seems unfortunate, that, just as the theories and principles so ardently advocated by him for years should obtain prominence in Spiritualistic circles, he should pass to the spirit-existence, leaving others to reap all the glory (?) accruing from the dissemination of Occultism. Were Randolph alive in the flesh to-day, how he would revel in the present discussion of the mysteries of the occulto-Rosicrucianc-hermetico-alchemico-astrologico-theosophico astralo-theurgico-Isis-Unveilingo-elementalo-sub-mudano-Ansatierico voudooico-cabalistico-thaumaturgico-Art Magico-koboldo-akasoico-condensed vaporo—elementary bombast and nonsense with which America and England are being flooded. Randolph, it seems, has discovered his error upon these subjects since his entrée into the spirit-country, as two chapters of "Beyond the Veil" are devoted to a discussion in the spirit spheres upon the existence of "elementary" spirits and the truth or falsity of re-incarnation: in the course of which the believers in both these absurd dogmas are completely routed by Socrates, Pythagoras, and other ancient sages, who deny positively and emphatically the being of such a nondescript monstrosity as an "elementary" anywhere in the universe, and as emphatically declare the utter fallacy of such absurdities as conscious pre-existence and re-incarnation; in all of which Randolph coincides. Randolph dead is thus wiser than Randolph living.

We must confess our inability to accept as literal truth all contained in this handsome volume. It is probable that a portion of it (particularly in the early part of the work) may have emanated from Randolph's spirit presence; but much of the latter portion we regard as unreliable in detail—a dim obscured reflection of the truth, mayhap—to be accounted for by the psychological condition of the mediums when writing it. Most of that pertaining to Jesus and the Madonna is unquestionably imaginative and unreal. Some of it, however, savors strongly of Randolphism, as exemplified in his various earthly productions, all of which are noted for the wild and fanciful nature of their contents.

Despite these defects, there is much good sense and sound philosophy in this work, together with much valuable information vouchsafed regarding supernal life, as previously indicated.

"THE PRIEST IN ABSOLUTION." The "Holy Cross" Series. No. 1. Fifty pages. D. M. Bennett, New York. Paper, twenty-five cents.

The enterprising Liberal publisher, D. M. Bennett, has undertaken the publication of a long list of pamphlets—The Holy Cross Series—all bearing upon the immoral doctrines and practices and the cruel outrages and persecutions of Holy Mother Church, from the sixth century to the present time. Some of these are works that have been tabooed and interdicted by European authorities, and are now for the first time to be published in America. The first of the series is "The Priest in Absolution," which takes its title from the infamous book issued by the Society of the Holy Cross, an English Ritualistic body, as a manual for Priests in receiving confessions; the publication of extracts from which not many months since occasioned deep excitement both in England and America. This manual teaches habitual confession as a duty, and enjoins upon the priest an intrusion upon the consciences of those who confess to him even on the most delicate points. The most searching, prying questions are to be put to all, married or unmarried, the maden just budding into womanhood as well as the matured matron, relative to their social, affectional, and sexual relations, in word, thought, and deed; even little children must be subjected to the disgustingly-indelicate queries of their prurient father confessors. Much of the work is too vile for publication, even in Latin.

The pamphlet just issued by Mr. Bennett is a criticism and denunciation of this vile Christian publication, expositive of its terrible deformity, and warning the public against the insidious advances of the Anglo-Ritualistic Confessional, worse even as it is than the time-honored (?) Roman Catholic institution which it apes. In addition to extracts from the original "Priest in Absolution," the work is enriched with copious citations from the "Confessional Unmasked," and from a rare and curious work, Gavin's "Master-Key to Popery," together with excerpts from other rare books and pamphlets. The immoral, debasing, and polluting effects, both upon the confessors and those confessing, are depicted in all their terrible reality; and it is to be fondly hoped that the tide of immorality, lewdness, and hypocrisy necessarily engendered by the practical operation of the principles of this grossly-impure publication may be, in some measure at least, rolled back, by the widespread circulation of the antidotal pamphlet of Brother Bennett. It well merits an extended sale.—W. E. Coleman in Spiritual Offering.

Matrimonial.

A YOUNG man would like to correspond with a Liberal lady, with matrimonial intentions. Money no object. A young widow not objected to. Address "P. J.," Campton, Ill. 1t13

Matrimonial.

AN accomplished and good-looking daughter of a Southern planter, who is a Freethinker, would correspond with a gentleman of similar views and of honorable character, with a view to matrimony, if willing to live in the home of her aged father—a widower—whose home she supervises. Address "TRUST," this office. 3t13

CHOICE SEEDS! For only 25c. I will send to new customers, for trial, 6 packets Flower Seeds, including the choicest Double Portulaca, new Phlox Grandiflora, Striped Petunia, and new Japan Cockscomb; mixed colors of each. Price-list free. L. W. GOODELL, Seed Grower, Amherst, Mass. 1t13

KANSAS LAND FOR SALE.

Eighty and one hundred and sixty acres of Kansas land. Soil of the BEST QUALITY; TIMBER AND RUNNING WATER. Well adapted for Stock Raising. Address
G. H KRUSCHKE,
4t12 Davenport, Iowa.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF

CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

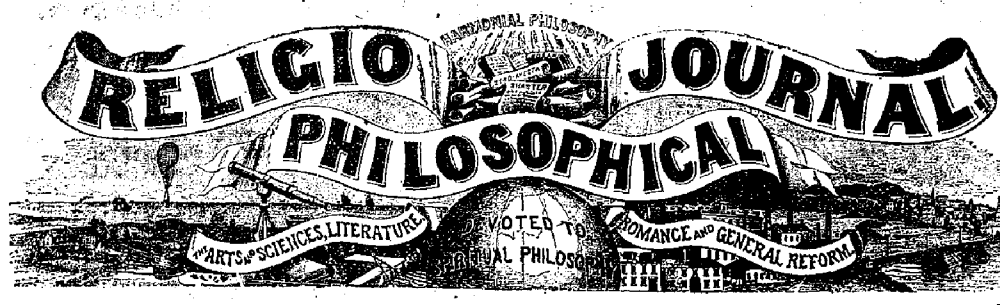
Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact fac simile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is in England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on live issues with a promptitude unequaled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest, cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers.

The following are a few of the contributors: Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, Goldwin Smith, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Lionel A. Tallemache, M. E. Grant Duff, M. P., Hon. Robert Lowe, Leslie Stephen, John Morley (the editor), G. H. Lewes, Alfred R. Wallace, Frederick Harrison, Prof. Tyndall, Prof. Huxley, Prof. Darwin, Prof. Clifford (author of supernatural religion), Sir John Lubbock, Anthony Trollope, T. Adolphus Trollope, Sir H. S. Maine, Sir David Wedderburn, and numerous others.

Published every month.
Rose-Belford Publishing Co.,
tf 60 York St., Toronto, Ont.
Subscription Price, $5.00 per year.

JUST OUT!



AURICULAR CONFESSION
AND
Popish Nunneries.

BY WM. HOGAN.

Twenty-five years Confessing Priest. A very interesting work. 220 pages. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.
D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine. 1y7

TRUE TIME. 50,000 SOLD. The GENUINE Swiss Manvelo COMPASS, ELEVATION AND TIME-KEEPER. A perfect GEM for the pocket of every traveller, trader, boy, farmer, and for EVERY BODY desiring a reliable Time-keeper and also a superior Compass. Genuine Swiss plate, steel works, open crystal, silver or steel CASE, Perfection guaranteed. WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order—if fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it. This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent to any part of the world, safely packed, by return mail, postage paid to any address, for only $1.00; 3 for $2.00. Circulars sent free. BEWARE of "bogus" articles offered as a "premium."—Get the BEST.—Get the Genuine. Send all orders to the sole Agents, J. J. KIND & CO., Brattleboro', Vt.

Truth Wears no Mask, Bows at no Human Shrine, Seeks neither Place nor Applause: She only Asks a Hearing.

JNO. C. BUNDY, EDITOR. | CHICAGO, 1878. | $3.15 IN ADVANCE. SINGLE COPIES, EIGHT CENTS.

A large Eight-page Weekly Paper, devoted to the Exposition of Modern Spiritualism. Established in 1865. Published by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, Chicago.

We take the liberty to give a few extracts from different sources, showing the standing of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL where best known and by those well calculated to judge.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL of Chicago, is publishing a series of articles, entitled, "The Ethics of Spiritualism," by Hudson Tuttle. We advise those who are opposed to Spiritualism, yet who dare investigate to the extent of a little quiet reading, to subscribe for the JOURNAL while these "Ethics" are running.—Fulton (N. Y.) Times.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, published in Chicago, is the most sensible and enterprising Spiritualist paper we have seen yet. As there are many Spiritualists among our readers, we advise them, if they are not subscribers to the JOURNAL, to send and get it. While we have no faith in its teachings we can see that the editor is honest in his opinions, and does what he thinks is right.—Iroquois Times.

PROF. S. B. BRITTAN writes: * * * "I am pleased to witness the great improvement you have made in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. It gives evidence of careful editorial labor, discrimination and an improved digestion of the various materials that make up the weekly report. * * * I look upon its present as a resurrection state to a higher life and enlarged usefulness."

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, We wish this beacon-light of the cause in the West a prosperous future, and feel sure that its conductors will ever (as in the past) be found working for human good and the advancement of liberal thought and spiritual unfoldment among the people.—Banner of Light.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, published at Chicago, and devoted to the advocacy of Modern Spiritualism, appears to be as much interested in exposing the fraudulent claims and practices of mediums, as in defending the philosophy of which it is the representative for the West. Its course has made it many friends, not only among the better class of Spiritualists, but among those who are not Spiritualists.—Toronto, Ont., Free Thought Journal.

ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS writes as follows:—

* * * "I am glad to note the improved tone and increased power evinced by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. May grand success constantly attend your enterprise." * *

REV. SAMUEL WATSON, D. D., Editor of The American Spiritual Magazine, gives us the following tribute:—

* * "I congratulate you on your management of your paper. It is much improved."

PROF. B. F. UNDERWOOD, in a late letter to the Boston Investigator, says:

* * * Since Col. Bundy has had control of the JOURNAL, it has, in my opinion, improved fifty per cent. Col. Bundy is admirably fitted to conduct a paper. He has taste and tact combined with a large amount of firmness and decision, together with business experience and talent, and good literary attainments." * *

One of our pleasant and valued exchanges is the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, of Chicago, a handsomely printed eight-page paper, which manfully battles for the right, and against all forms of wrong, believing that of all kinds of slavery, that of the mind is worst.—Toledo (Ill.) Banner.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL seems to have got the inside track among the religious weeklies. The inference from which is that the treatment of the whole range of religious questions by philosophic inquiry is a more popular method than the professional and special defense of particular theories.—Chicago Sunday Times.

HUDSON TUTTLE, the well known author, writes:

"Every reader of the JOURNAL will rejoice at its ringing notes, which show that the right man stands at the front."

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL is a well printed, well edited paper and affords much material for sober thought.—Charleston (W. Va.) Journal.

May the glorious old ship, the JOURNAL, on whose battle-flag flying at her "main" is inscribed, "Truth against the world," have a long and brilliant record in crushing error beneath the iron heel of truth!—Voice of Angels, Boston.

All Spiritualists, and those who are investigating the subject of Spiritualism, will find this paper invaluable as an assistant in their researches.

The OPPONENTS of SPIRITUALISM, who desire to be familiar with its progress and development, will find the JOURNAL a fair, candid and trustworthy channel of information. We respectfully commend the paper to all classes.

TERMS: $3.15 PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

Specimen Copies, FREE.

REMITTANCES by Money Order, Registered Letter or Draft at our risk.

Address, JNO. C. BUNDY, Editor, CHICAGO, ILLS

BOOKS FOR THE THOUGHTFUL.

AGE OF REASON, AND EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Being an investigation of True and Fabulous Theology. By THOMAS PAINE, author of "The Rights of Man," "Crisis," "Common Sense," etc. With an Essay on his Character and Services, by G. J. HOLYOAKE. 12mo, 180 pp. Postpaid, paper, 50c.; cloth, 60c.

SECULARISTS' MANUAL OF SONGS AND CEREMONIES, for use at Marriages, Funerals, etc. Edited by AUSTIN HOLYOAKE and CHARLES WATTS. Flexible cloth, 12mo, 128 pp. Postpaid, 50 cts.

SERMONS. By J. W. CHADWICK. Postpaid, 6c. "Best Use of Sunday," "God On Our Side," "Higher Reverence," "Economy and Waste," "Self-Respect," "Immortal Life," "Rational Church," "Belief in Immortality," "The Coming Man," "Essential Piety of Modern Science," "Simplicity of Religion."

MUSIC IN THE WESTERN CHURCH: A Lecture on the History of Psalmody, illustrated with examples of the Music of various periods. By WM. A. LEONARD, author of "The Christmas Festival," etc. Flex. clo., 89 pp., 75c.

THE CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL: ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY AND CUSTOMS. Together with a Selection of Carols. By WILLIAM A. LEONARD, author of "Hindu Thought," etc. Flexible. clo., 56 pp., gilt side-stamp, 50 cts.

ENGLISH PAMPHLETS.

(Postpaid.)

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Inspiration of the Bible: A Reply to the Bishop of Lincoln, 25c
Cromwell and Washington, A Contrast, 25c
Autobiography of Bradlaugh, with his Portrait, 10c
George the Prince of Wales, with Recent Contrasts and Coincidences, 10c
American Politics, 10c
What is Secularism? And What Can It Do for a Man that Christianity Cannot? 5c
Letter to E. V. Kenealy, M. P., 5c

BY CHARLES WATTS.

Discussion with Rev. Alex. Stewart of Aberdeen, on the Question, "Is the Belief in the Being of an Infinite Personal God Reasonable?" and "Are the Four Gospels Authentic and Worthy of Credit?" 50c
Christian Evidences Criticised: Origin of Christianity, Historical Value of New Testament, Miracles, Prophecies, The Practical Value of Christianity, The Progress of the Christian Religion, each 5c, or bound in one pamphlet, 35c
Letters on Taxation of the Land, and Miscellaneous Poems, by Edwin Burgess, 50c

IRON-CLAD AND MANNA SERIES.

IRON-CLAD SERIES.

No.		Cts.
1	Atonement. Charles Bradlaugh,	5
2	Secular Responsibility. G. J. Holyoake,	5
4	Influence of Christianity on Civilization. Underwood,	25
5	Gleanings from Parker, Frothingham, Voysey, and others. Winans. Ea.,	10
6	Miscellaneous "Index" Tracts.	10
7	Buddhist Nihilism. Prof. Max Mueller,	10
8	Religion of Inhumanity. F. Harrison,	20
9	Relation of Witchcraft to Religion. Lyall,	15
10	Epidemic Delusions. Marvin. Cloth,	50
11	Philosophy of Spiritualism. Marvin,	50
12	Tyndall's Belfast Inaugural, and Portrait,	15
13	Essay on Miracles. David Hume,	10
14	Land Question. Charles Bradlaugh,	5
15	Were Adam and Eve our First Parents? Charles Bradlaugh,	5
16	Why do Men Starve? Chas. Bradlaugh,	5
17	Logic of Life, Deduced from the Principle of Freethought. George J. Holyoake,	10
18	A Plea for Atheism. Chas. Bradlaugh,	10
19	Large or Small Families? A. Holyoake,	5
20	Superstition Displayed, with a Letter of Wm. Pitt. Austin Holyoake,	5
21	Defense of Secular Principles. C. Watts,	5
22	Is the Bible Reliable? Charles Watts,	5
23	The Christian Deity. Charles Watts,	5
24	Moral Value of the Bible. Chas. Watts,	5
25	Free Thought and Mod. Progress. Watts,	5
26	Christianity: Its Nature, and Influence on Civilization. Charles Watts,	5
27	Essays Before Free Relig. Ass'n, 1873,	35
28	Thoughts on Atheism. Austin Holyoake,	5
29	Is there a Moral Governor of the Universe? Austin Holyoake,	5
30	Philosophy of Secularism. Chas. Watts,	5

MANNA SERIES.

No.		Cts.
31	Has Man a Soul? Charles Bradlaugh,	5
38	Is there a God? Charles Bradlaugh,	5
39	Labor's Prayer. Charles Bradlaugh,	5
40	Poverty: Its Cause and Cure. M. G. H.,	10
41	Miscellaneous Sermons. Frothingham,	10
42	Science and Bible Antagonistic. Watts,	10
43	Christian Scheme of Redemption. Watts	5
44	Logic of Death; or, Why Should the Atheist Fear to Die. George J. Holyoake,	10
47	Poverty: Its Effects on the Political Condition of the People. Bradlaugh,	5
1	Original Manna for "God's chosen,"	5
2	B. F. Underwood's Prayer, per dozen,	10
3	New Life of David. Chas. Bradlaugh,	5
4	Why I was Excommunicated. Barnard,	20
5	200 Questions Without Answers,	5
6	Dialogue between a Christian Missionary and a Chinese Mandarin,	10
7	Queries Submitted to the Bench of Bishops by a Weak but Zealous Christian,	10
8	Search After Heaven and Hell. A. Holyoake,	5
9	New Life of Jonah. Chas. Bradlaugh,	5
10	A Few Words about the Devil, "	5
11	New Life of Jacob, "	5
12	Daniel, the Dreamer. Austin Holyoake,	10
13	Specimen of the Bible: Esther, "	10
14	Acts of the Apostles: A Farce, "	10
15	Ludicrous Aspects of Christianity. "	10
16	Twelve Apostles. Charles Bradlaugh,	5
17	Who Was Jesus Christ? "	5
18	What Did Jesus Teach? "	5
19	New Life of Abraham, "	5
20	New Life of Moses. "	5
21	A Secular Prayer. A. Holyoake. Per doz.	10

All postpaid. For $2 we will send to one address $2.25 worth, and $6 worth for $5. Special discounts to the trade.

CHARLES P. SOMERBY,
PUBLISHER, BOOKSELLER, IMPORTER AND PRINTER,
139 EIGHTH ST. (Between Broadway and Fourth Avenue), NEW YORK.

NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.
THE
Great Magnetic Remedy.
DO YOU SMOKE?
DO YOU CHEW?
DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

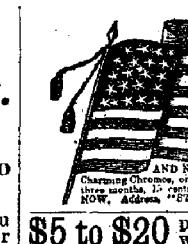
If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective. Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

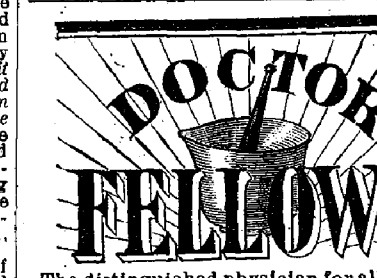
If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed we warrant the REMEDY to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.



Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.

Address,
J. A. HEINSOHN & CO., Manufacturers.
968 CLEVELAND, OHIO.



SEEDS.
Best and Cheapest in America, or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from Grower, postage or express paid, and get fresh, true, and reliable seeds. I can and shall beat any firm in America in quality and low prices. Beautiful illustrated Seed Catalogues and Garden Guide free.

Address R. H. SHUMWAY,
1015 Seed Grower, Rockford, Ill.

"IT STILL WAVES!" The old, original and only "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER," the "FAMILY FAVORITE" and the pioneer paper for THE MILLION. Established, 1865. There's nothing like it. Old and young, rich and poor, adult and sinner,—it waves for ALL." It is a large 40-column, 8 page paper, crowded with charming Tales, Sketches, Stories, Poems, Wit, Humor, Fun, Serious, Puzzles, Humorous Poems, etc., etc. In its "BOGUS'S CORNER," every Swindler, Quack, Humbug, and Fraud is fully, freely, and mercilessly exposed. No one can be swindled who reads the "BANNER." 100,000 people read and rely upon this National Paper. TRY IT ONCE AND YOU WILL NOW. Only 75 cents a year, or with Premium of SIX Charming Chromos, or a fine Dictionary, cloth, 251 pages, only $1. Trial Trip, three months, 15 cents. Specimens FREE. Don't put it off; but SEND NOW. Address, "STAR OF BETHLEHEM BANNER," Biddeford, Me.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine. 1y7

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

The Career of Religious Ideas;
THEIR ULTIMATE,
The Religion of Science.
BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

An able examination of the Religions of the World—the subjects treated as follows: Chap. I.—Introductory; Chap. II.—What is Religion? Chap. III.—Fetishism; Chap. IV.—Polytheism; Chap. V.—Monotheism; Chap. VI.—Value of Ancient Bibles; Chap. VII.—Man's Moral Progress Dependent upon his Intellectual Growth; Chap. VIII.—Theological Problems; Chap. IX.—Man's Fall; Chap. X.—Free Will, Necessity, Responsibility; Chap. XI.—Duties and Obligations of Man to God; Chap. XII.—The Ultimate of Religious Ideas.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents. Postage prepaid. D. M. BENNETT.
141 Eighth St. N. Y.

BROUGHTONS
INVIGORATING SYRUP. 25 CTS.

A certain cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Stomach, Liver or Kidney Diseases, Weakness, &c. 25 cents per bottle. Incurable cases solicited and cured or money refunded. The same ingredients put up in powders to be sent by mail. Sample bottle, circular, and 2675
Advice Free, 495 Broome St., N. Y.

THE MAGNETIC TREATMENT.

Send 25 cents to DR. ANDREW STONE, Troy, N. Y., and obtain a large, highly-illustrated book on the system of Vitalizing Treatment. Also The New Gospel of Health for $1.25, a masterly work on progressive medicine and healing by magnetism, 519 pages, illustrated with 120 cuts for personal manipulations, explanatory of the sublime science of healing without medicine. 1y5

ASTROLOGY.

PROF. LISTER, Astrologer, 505 W. 23d st., New York. 44 years' practice, 27 in Boston. Can be consulted by letter. Send for Circular. Address all letters 505 West 23d st., New York City.

DO YOU WANT Printing-press, Type, Cards, Stencils, Albums, Gold Pens, Pencils, Paper, Stationery, Rubber-stamps, Notions, Novelties of every description? Beware of unreliable imitations—avoid risk—send only to the old, original and only "HEADQUARTERS." Established, 1865. We originated what is now an enormous trade. We import books weekly. Supply all Scientific, Legal, Medical, secret, foreign and other books not often to be obtained—in fact, supply ANYTHING AND EVERYTHING in the Book or any other line. Our large store has four floors crowded with cards of books on every known subject, and all offered very low. CATALOGUES FREE. Information given. Send stamps, and send now. Address, HUNTER & CO., PUBLISHERS, HUNTSVILLE, N. Y.

PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION; or an answer to the question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Divinely-Inspired and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

GOLD Any worker can make $12 a day at home. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., 1y7 Augusta, Maine.

The Popes and Their Doings.
NO 3 OF THE "HOLY CROSS SERIES."

Being brief stories of fully one hundred and fifty of the conspicuous and sinful Popes—the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God—who filled the chair of the Holy See in Rome during several centuries. The cheapest and most popular history of the Popes ever written. A friend styles it "rich, rare and racy." 273 pp., 12mo. Sent by mail at the very low price of 50 cents in paper; 75 cents in cloth.

Address D. M. BENNETT.
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

POSITIVELY
$50 WORTH OF INFORMATION
in form of a nice book of over 100 pages, well illustrated, sent post-paid, for $1.00
BY A PRACTICAL CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep the hens and hen-roosts free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in mid-winter. How to manage setting hens, chickens, etc., and how to preserve eggs a great length of time. Best breeds of hens, etc. Enclose $1.00 with order.

E. D. BLAKEMAN, Circleville, Ohio.

[Mr. Blakeman is a school-boy friend of ours. We know him well; he is entirely reliable, and the information he has to impart upon the poultry subject is valuable.—ED. T. S.] 9tf

TWO BOOKS ON FINANCE.
SPECIFIC PAYMENTS BETTER THAN SPECIE PAYMENTS.
BY EDWARD D. LINTON.

CONVERSATIONS ON THE CURRENCY.
BY EDW'D D. LINTON AND GEO. D. DRUHY.

The question to be met and settled now is, Shall money continue to rule and curse mankind, or shall it be made to serve and bless?

Price 25c. For sale at this office.

The Priest in Absolution,

The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

☞ The twenty-five other numbers of the "Holy Cross Series" are being brought out as rapidly as possible.

Gems of Thought.

FRIENDS are won by those who believe in winning.—T. W. Higginson.

NOTHING more excites to everything noble and generous than virtuous love.—Henry Home.

WHEN we read, we fancy we could be martyrs; when we come to act, we cannot bear a provoking word.—Hannah More.

HE who has no taste for order will be often wrong in his judgment and seldom considerate or conscientious in his actions.—Lavater.

THE way to conquer men is by their passions. Catch but the ruling foible of their hearts, and all their boasted virtues shrink before you.—Tolson.

THE real wants of nature are the measure of employments, as the foot is the measure of the shoe. We can call only the want of what is necessary poverty.—St. Clement.

LOVE teaches cunning even to innocence, and when he gets possession his first work is to dig deep within a heart and there lie hid, and, like a miser in the dark, to feast alone.—Dryden.

PURITY of heart and life are the richest of human possessions; perfect obedience to the highest attractions of the soul, the only means of their attainment.—George Bacon.

MAKE the bridge from the cradle to manhood as long as you can. Let your children be children as long as they will. Let them be children and not little apes of men and women.—Anon.

A GENEROUS nation is grateful even for the preservation of its rights, and willingly extends the respect due to the office of a good prince into an affection for his person.—Junius.

A LIE always needs a truth for a handle to it, else the hand would cut itself which sought to drive it home upon another. The worst lies, therefore, are those whose blade is false, but whose handle is true.—Beecher.

GOOD men think more of making good roads to good schools, good houses, fields, and gardens, than calculating how they can get a harp and crown in an imaginary heaven in the unknown and uncertain hereafter.—A. H. Wood.

MANNERS are the happy ways of doing things; each one a stroke of genius or of love, now repeated and hardened into usage, they form at last a rich varnish, with which the routine of life is washed, and its details adorned. If they are superficial, so are the dew-drops which give such a depth to the morning meadows.—Emerson.

WHAT is a weed? A plant whose virtues have not yet been discovered. There is not a property in nature but a mind is born to seek and find it out. War is the extension of a gun-barrel. Cant is useful to provoke common sense. The flower of civilization is the finished man, the man of sense, of accomplishment, of social power—the gentleman. Here (in the United States) is all mankind in his shirt-sleeves.—Emerson.

ALL lies disgrace a gentleman, white or black, although I grant there is a difference. To say the least of it, it is a dangerous habit, for white lies are but the gentleman ushers to black ones. I know of but one point on which a lie is excusable, and that is when you wish to deceive the enemy. Then your duty to your country warrants your lying till you are black in the face; and, for the very reason that it goes against your grain, it becomes, as it were, a sort of virtue.—Marryat.

TRUTH will never die; the stars will grow dim, the sun will pale his glory, but truth will be ever young. Integity, uprightness, honesty, love, goodness, these are all imperishable. No grave can ever entomb these immortal principles. They have been in prison, but they have been freer than before; those who enshrined them in their hearts have been burned at the stake, but out of their ashes other witnesses have arisen. No sea can drown, no storm can wreck, no abyss can swallow up the everlasting truth. You cannot kill goodness and integrity and righteousness; the way that is consistent with these must be everlasting.—Spurgeon.

OBEDIENCE to law is productive of the greatest pleasure, but most rarely is it practical or possible for the mind to know that such will be the result of a determinate action. The martyrs and heroes of the world testify that happiness has no part in their determination of right and duty. Not for happiness stood Leonidas with his three hundred in the pass of Thermopalæ; nor Joan of Arc at the head of the French army; nor Washington with his bleeding soldiers at Valley Forge. The love of country, the generous emotion of liberty, blotted out every vestige of happiness as a motive, and to brand them with such ignoble motive is sacrilege.—Hudson Tuttle.

WHEN we get rid of this Bible, this God and Jesus idea, we shall have removed a mountain from the pathway of progress. The Bible and its God, its Jesus, its heroes and its heroines, are all warlike and uncivilized in their tendencies. Christ is called the "Prince of Peace," but his conduct was often anything but peaceful, and his doctrines are full of ire and wrath, especially when he supposes that his honor or that of his so-called father or any of his pet hobbies were in danger. Those without swords are advised to buy them, even if they sell their coats to pay for them. True, they may have been compelled to use carnal weapons in self-defense, but we who are more civilized need a higher and better law than his to go by, and therefore should put away the old book as a rule of life, for we have not only outgrown swords, but nearly all corporeal punishments, even as we shall in time outgrow all punishments, here and hereafter, needing only to know the right to do it.—Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A MARRIAGE license was lately returned to an Alabama official, having indorsed upon it the following: "dis here cupple Fale to marry and de-lisens is returned Blank.—J. McMillan. M. G."

SCIENCE MADE EASY.—Friend to scientific authority: "Doctor, how is a man to tell a mushroom from a toadstool?" Scientific authority: "By eating it. If you live, it is a mushroom; if you die, it is a toadstool."

A YOUNG lady who prided herself on geography, seeing a candle aslant, remarked that it reminded her of the "leaning tower of Pisa." "Yes," remarked a wag, "with this difference—that is a tower in Italy, while this is a tower in grease."

THE remark of a contemporary (says a New York paper), that many of our successful lawyers commenced life as preachers, is gracefully corrected by one of the legal gentlemen referred to, who begs leave to state that he began life as an infant.

A COUPLE of Yankee neighbors became so inimical that they could not speak to each other; but one of them having been converted at a camp meeting, on seeing his former enemy, held out his hand, saying, "How d'ye do, Kemp? I am humble enough to shake hands with a dog."

THE LITTLE DREAMER.

A little boy was dreaming,
Upon his nurse's lap.
That the pins fell out of all the stars,
And the stars fell into his cap.

So, when his dream was over,
What should that little boy do!
Why, he went and looked inside his cap,
And found it wasn't true.

—From the Methodist.

PHASES OF VENUS.

First phase.
A moustache—a vine—
A miss—
A whisper—"Mine?"—"Thine"—
A kiss.

Second phase.
Orange flowers—a veil—
And fears—
Cake—presents—by rail—
And tears.

Last phase.
A broomstick—some hair—
A curse—
Relatives there—
Divorce!

DIDN'T KNOW HE WAS LOADED.—"You will please observe," said old Mr. Lambwell, as he led us through his school the other day, "that the boys are required to display the utmost attention to quietness and discipline, and in a short time become even divested of that most annoying disposition to tease each other; in short, they soon settle down into the gravity of mature years, under the wholesome system I have introduced."

We at this moment arrived in front of several boys who were standing around a bucket of water, and one had just charged his mouth with the contents of a tin cup, while the old gentleman was stooping to recover his pen from the floor, when another passing along behind, snapped his finger quickly beneath the drinker's ear, and caused him by a sudden start to eject the contents of his mouth over the pedagogue's bald pate. Starting upright, with his hair and face dripping, the master said:

"Who did that?"

The party unanimously cried out: "Jim Gun, sir."

"Jim Gun, you rascal, what did you do that for?"

Jim, appalled at the mischief he had done, muttered out that it was not his fault, but that Tom Owens had snapt him.

This changed the direction of old Lambwell's wrath, and shaking his cane portentously over Owens' head, he asked:

"Did you snap Gun?"

The culprit, trembling with fear, murmured: "Yes, sir; I snapt Gun, but I didn't know he was loaded."

THE FEBRUARY FLY.

Feb. 21.—A bright warm day. One Fly came out and made himself most objectionable.

Little Fly, whence came you?
Little Fly, whence came you?
Go away,
Wait till May.
That's too soon.
Make it June.
Little Fly, whence came you?

Little Fly, I blame you!
Little Fly, I blame you!
Why? Becuz
'Tis your buzz
Near my hair
Makes me swear,
That is why I blame you!

Little Fly, I hate you!
Little Fly, I hate you!
Now—oh dear!
On my ear!
Off he goes
To my nose!
Little Fly, I hate you!

Little Fly, I 'dash'd' you!
Little Fly, I 'dash'd' you!
'Dash' was strong,
'Dash' was wrong.
I admit,
Ha!—a hit!
Little Fly, I've smashed you!

(End of the Fly and the Sonnet.)

—From Punch.

Truth Seeker Tracts.

No.	(REVISED LIST.)	Cts.
1.	Discussion on Prayer. D. M. Bennett and two Clergymen	8
2.	Oration on the Gods. Ingersoll.	10
3.	Thomas Paine. "	5
4.	Arraignment of the Church. Ingersoll.	5
5.	Heretics and Heresies. "	5
5.	Humboldt. "	5
7.	The Story of Creation. Bennett.	5
8.	The Old Snake Story. "	2
9.	The Story of the Flood. "	5
10.	The Plagues of Egypt. "	2
11.	Korah, Datham, and Abiram. " nnett.	2
12.	Balaam and his Ass. "	2
13.	Arraignment of Priestcraft. "	8
14.	Old Abe and Little Ike. Syphers.	3
15.	Come to Dinner. "	2
16.	Fog Horn Documents. "	2
17.	The Devil Still Ahead. "	2
18.	Slipped Up Again. "
19.	Joshua Stopping the Sun and Moon. D. M. Bennett.	5
20.	Samson and his Exploits. Bennett.	2
21.	The Great Wrestling Match. "	2
22.	Discussion with Elder Shelton. "	10
23.	Reply to Elder Shelton's Fourth Letter. D. M. Bennett.	3
24.	Christians at Work. Wm. McDonnell.	5
25.	Discussion with Geo. Snode. Bennett.	5
26.	Underwood's Prayer.	1
27.	Honest Questions and Honest Answers. D. M. Bennett.	5
28.	Alessandro di Cagliostro. C. Sotheran.	10
29.	Paine Hall Dedication Address. B. F. Underwood.	2
30.	Woman's Rights & Man's Wrongs. Syphers.	2
31.	Gods and God-houses. "	2
32.	The God's of Superstition and the God of the Universe. D. M. Bennett.	8
33.	What has Christianity Done? Preston.	3
34.	Tribute to Thomas Paine. "	2
35.	Moving the Ark. D. M. Bennett.	1
36.	Bennett's Prayer to the Devil.	2
37.	Short Sermon. Rev. Theologicus. D.D.	1
38.	Christianity not a Moral System. X. Y. Z.	3
39.	The True Saint. S. P. Putnam.	3
40.	Bible of Nature vs. The Bible of Men. J. Syphers.	3
41.	Our Ecclesiastical Gentry. Bennett.	1
42.	Elijah the Tishbite. "	3
43.	Christianity a Borrowed System. "	3
44.	Design Argument Refuted. Underwood.	2
45.	Elisha the Prophet. Bennett.	3
46.	Did Jesus Really Exist? "	3
47.	Cruelty and Credulity of the Human Race. Dr. Daniel Arter.	5
48.	Freethought in the West. G. L. Henderson.	5
49.	Sensible Conclusions. E. E. Guild.	3
50.	Jonah and the Big Fish. D. M. Bennett.	1
51.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets. No. 1.	5
52.	Marples-Underwood Debate. Underwood.	3
53.	Questions for Bible Worshipers. B. F. Underwood.	2
54.	An Open Letter to Jesus Christ. Bennett.	5
55.	The Bible God Disproved by Nature. W. E. Coleman.	8
56.	Bible Contradictions.	1
57.	Jesus Not a Perfect Character. Underwood.	2
58.	Prophecies.	2
59.	Bible Prophecies Concerning Babylon. B. F. Underwood.	2
60.	Ezekiel's Prophecies Concerning Tyre. B. F. Underwood.	2
61.	History of the Devil. Isaac Paden.	5
62.	The Jews and their God. "	10
63.	The Devils Due-Bills. John Syphers.	3
64.	The Ills we Endure—their Cause and Cure. D. M. Bennett.	2
65.	Short Sermon No. 2. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	2
66.	God Idea in History. H. B. Brown.	5
67.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets No. 2.	5
68.	Ruth's Idea of Heaven and Mine. Susan H. Wixon.	2
69.	Missionaries. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	2
70.	Vicarious Atonement. J. S. Lyon.	3
71.	Paine's Anniversary. C. A. Codman.	3
72.	Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. D. M. Bennett.	2
73.	Foundations. John Syphers.	3
74.	Daniel in the Lion's Den. Bennett.	2
75.	An Hour with the Devil. "	10
76.	Reply to Erastus F. Brown. D. M. Bennett.	3
77.	The Fear of Death. D. M. Bennett.	5
78.	Christmas and Christianity. D.M.Bennett.	5
79.	The Relationship of Jesus, Jehovah, and the Virgin Mary. W. E. Coleman.	2
80.	Address on Paine's 139th Birthday. Bennett.	5
81.	Hereafter, or the Half-way House. John Syphers.	1
82.	Christian Courtesy. Bennett.	2
83.	Revivalism Examined. Dr. A. G. Humphrey.	5
84.	Moody's Sermon on Hell. Rev. J. P. Hopps, London.	2
85.	Matter, Motion, Life and Mind. Bennett.	10
86.	An Enquiry about God's Sons. "	2
87.	Freethought Judged by its Fruits. B. F. Underwood.	1
88.	David, God's Peculiar Favorite. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	3
89.	Logic of Prayer. Charles Stephenson.	3
90.	Biblo-Mania. Otter Cordates.	2
91.	Our Ideas of God. B. F. Underwood.	1
92.	The Bible; is it Divinely Inspired? Dr. D. Arter.	5
93.	Obtaining Pardon for Sins. Hudson Tuttle.	1
94.	The New Raven. Will Cooper.	5
95.	Jesus Christ. D. M. Bennett.	10
96.	Ichabod Crane Papers.	10
97.	Special Providences. W. S. Bell.	2
98.	Snakes. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.	2
99.	Do the Works of Nature prove a Creator? Sciota.	5
100.	The Old and the New. R. G. Ingersoll.	5
101.	110th Anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday. Bennett et als.	5
102.	The Old Religion and the New. W. S. Bell.	1
103.	Does the Bible Teach us all we Know. Bennett.	2
104.	Evolution of Isrrel's God. A. L. Rawson.	10
105.	Decadence of Christianity. Capphro.	2
106.	Franklin, Washington and Jefferson Unbelievers. Bennett.	2
107.	The Safe Side. H. B. Brown.	5
108.	The Holy Bible a Historical Humbug. S. H. Preston.	1
109.	Ghosts. Ingersoll, 4 pp.	5
110.	Materialistic Prayer. Bennett, 4 pp.	1
111.	Reply to Scientific American. Bennett.	1
112.	Sensible Sermon. Savage, 8 pp.	2
113.	Come to Jesus. Bennett, 8 pp.	2

SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

1.	Hereditary Transmission. Prof. Louis Elsberg, M.D.	5
2.	Evolution; from the Homogeneous to the Heterogeneous. B. F. Underwood.	3
3.	Darwinism. B. F. Underwood.	3
4.	Literature of the Insane. F. R. Marvin.	5
5.	Responsibility of Sex. Mrs. Chase, M.D.	3
6.	Graduated Atmospheres. J. McCarroll.	2
7.	Death. Frederic R. Marvin, M.D.	5
8.	How do Marsupial Animals Propagate their kind? A. B. Bradford.	5
9.	The Unseen World. Prof. John Fiske.	10
10.	The Evolution Theory — Huxley's Three Lectures.	10
11.	Is America the New World? L. L. Dawson.	10

Discount on one dollar's worth 10 per ct. off; on two dollars' worth 20 off; on five dollars' worth 40 off; on ten dollars' worth 50 off.

As few or as many of any given kind may be ordered as desired.

RADICAL BOOKS.

SENT POST PAID AT THE PRICES ANNEXED.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

Age of Reason. Paine. Paper covers.	25
" " " Cloth "	50
" " " and Ex. of Proph. Paper 50; cl.	75
A Few Days in Athens. Frances Wright.	75
Apocryphal New Testament.	1 25
An Eye Opener. Paper, 50; cloth,	75
Antiquity of Christianity. Alberger.	25
Analysis of Religious Belief. Viscount Amberly. $3.00, 4.00, and	4 50
Apples of Gold. Susan H. Wixon.	1 50
Anti-Theological Lectures. Rev. R. Taylor.	2 00
Antiquity and Duration of the World.	25
Astronomy and Worship of the Ancients.	25
A. J. Davis' Entire Works.	27.00
Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub.	15
Bible in India. Jacolliot.	2 00
Buckle's History of Civilization. 2 Vols., 8vo.	4 00
Burgess-Underwood Debate. 50 and	80
Bible in the Balance. Fish.	1 00
Bacon's Novum Organum.	2 00
Bhagvad-Gita, or Dialogues of Christna and Arjuna.	1 76
Buechner's Man, Present and Future.	1 00
Christianity before Christ. Craven.	25
Chapters from the Bibles of the Ages.	1 50
Criticism on the Theoligical Idea of Deity.	1 00
Childhood of Religion. Clodd.	1 25
Childhood of the World. Clodd, 40 and	60
Christianity and Materialism. Underwood.	15
Cause of Religious Ideas. Tuttle.	1 00
Conway's Sacred Anthology.	4 00
Colenso on the Pentateuch, Abstract of.	25
Devil's Pulpit. Rev. Robt. Taylor.	2 00
Diegesis " "	2 00
Denton's Irreconcilable Records.	50
" Our Planet, Past, Present, and Future.	1 50
" Radical Rhymes.	1 25
" Who are Christians. Deluge.
Dentons' Common Sense Thoughts, Be Thyself, What is Right? Man's True Saviors, Sermon from Snakspere's Text, God Proposed, Spiritualism True, Orthodoxy False. 10 cents each.
Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science.	1 75
" Intellectual Development of Europe, 2 vols.,	3 00
Darwin's Origin of Species.	2 00
" Descent of Man, (Impr'd Ed.)	3 00
Descent and Darwinism, Schmidt.	1 50
Einstein's Origin of Religious Ideas.	1 00
Exeter Hall, Wm. McDonnell.	60 & 80
Errors of the Bible, Wright.	35 & 60
Essence of Religion. Fuerbach. 40 and	80
Eight Scientific Tracts.	20
Frothingham's Religion of Humanity.	1 50
" Child's Book of Religion.	1 00
" Stories of the Patriarchs.	1 00
" Safest Creed.	1 50
" Transcendentalism in New England.	2 50
Faraday's Various Forces of Nature.	2 00
Fiske's Myths and Myth-Makers.	2 00
God Idea in History, Tuttle.	1 25
Good Sense, D'Holbach.	1 00
Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages.	2 50
" Lost and Hostile Gospels.	3 25
Graves' Sixteen Crucified Saviors.	2 00
" Biography of Satan.	60
Grey's Enigmas of Life.	2 00
" Creeds of Christendom. 2 Vols.	7 50
Heroines of Freethought, Mrs. Underwood.	1 75
Heathens of the Heath, McDonnell.	1 00 & 150
Hume's Essays and Treatises.	1 50
Huxley's Lay Sermons.	1 75
" Man's Place in Nature.	1 25
" Critiques and Addresses.	1 50
History of all Religions Sects. Evans.	1 00
Haeckel's History of Creation. 2 Vols.	5 00
Hollick's Nerves and the Nervous.	1 00
Humboldt's Works.
Ingersoll's Gods and other Lectures. 30 and	50
" " etc., Large Edition.	1 25
Influence of Christianity on Civilization.	25
Infidels' Text Book, Cooper.	1 00
Jehovah Unveiled.	35
Jamieson's Clergy a Source of Danger.	1 00
Josephus' Complete Works.	2 50
Johnson's Oriental Religions. 8vo.	5 00
John's Way.	15
Kneeland's Review.	1 00
" Hymns.	35
Koran, with Notes and Life of Mahomet.	2 75
Lecky's Rationalism in Europe. 2 Vols.	4 00
" History of European Morals.	6 00
Life of Thomas Paine. Blanchard. p 50; cl	75
Lewes' Biographical History of Philosophy.	3 50
" Problems of Life and Mind.	3 00
Lizzie Doten's Poems of Progress, and Inner Life, each	150
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization.	2 00
" Pre-Historic Times Illustrated.	6 00
Lyell's Elements of Geology, 770 cuts.	3 40
" Principles " " 2 vols. and maps.	3 00
Monks and Popes. Alberger.	1 00
Morley's Life of Voltaire.	2 00
Martyrdom of Man. Winwood Reade.	3 00
Peeble's All Around the World.	2 50
" Seers of the Ages.	2 50
Plato's Divine and Moral Works.	2 20
Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion.	30 & 50
Physical Man. Tuttle.	1 50
Paine's Common Sense.	12
" Crisis. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Rights of Man. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Theological Works, with portrait	1 50
" " " paper,	1 00
" Political Works, cloth,	1 50
" Great Works Complete. Crown octavo, with life and portrait.	3
" Political Works, steel portrait.	1
" Life, by Calvin Blanchard with portrait Paper, 50; cloth	75
Parturition without Pain.	1 00
Plain Home Talk and Medical Common Sense, E. B. Foote, M.D.,	1 50
Proctor's Six Lectures on Astronomy.	20
Reason, the only Oracle of Man. Ethan Allen	60
Syntagma, Taylor.	1 00
System of Nature, D'Holbach.	2 00
Self-Contradictions of the Bible.	25
Studying the Bible, Mrs. Slenker.	75
Spencer's (Herbert) Entire Work.
Strauss' Old Faith and New.	2 00
" New Life of Jesus, 2 vols.,	12 00
Supernatural Religion, 2 Vols., 8vo.,	8 00
Sexual Physiology. Trall.	2 00
Talleyrand's Letter to Pope Pius vii.	25
Tyndall (Prof. John) Entire Works.
The Christ of Paul.	2 00
The Case against the Church.	75
The Relations of the Sexes. Mrs. Duffey.	2 00
The Voices. Warren Sumner Barlow.	1 25
The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers. Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 5
The Champions of the Church. Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 50
Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, etc., 75 &	1 00
Truth Seeker Tracts, Vols. I, II, III, and IV., by the lot, 50 &	75
The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations.	75
The Outcast, Winwood Reade.	30
Talks with My Patients. Mrs. Gleason, M.D.,	1 50
Underwood-Marples Debate.	35 & 60
Underwood's Twelve Tracts.	20
Vestiges of Creation.	75
Volney's Ruins.	1 00
Volney's New Researches in Ancient History.	1 50
Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.	6 00

THE TRUTH SEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 14. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, April 6, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

"We can use a few more postage stamps."—Age of Reason.

The difference between a boy and a barn is that shingles are applied to the roof of the barn.

The man who plants a tree little knows what he is conferring upon posterity—especially if it's a birch.

A good substitute for gutta-percha has been discovered. It is called balata, and is the hardened rosin of a tree growing on the banks of the Amazon.

The Wesleyan College at Cincinnati is in a bad way for the want of $80,000. This must be raised within ninety days, or the property will have to be sold.

Spurgeon agrees with Moody as to the marriage of believers with unbelievers, and obstinately refuses to unite a professor of religion to one who is not.

J. F. Goodrich, who led the singing during several of Murphy's temperance revivals in the West, is under arrest in Virginia for bigamy. He is said to have five living wives.

Two hundred and twenty street lamps at Providence, R. I., which extend over a distance of nine miles, are now lighted and extinguished by electricity, in less than fifteen seconds, by one man.

Rev. Mr. Talmage says he believes the time will come when every prominent church will have a hospital on one side and a bakery on the other. Of course the bakery will be on the yeast side.

The Rochester Democrat and Chronicle thinks that the Stewart Hotel for Workingwomen is "designed for those who are just poor enough to be compelled to work and not handsome enough to get married."

A handsome legacy is said to have been left to Rev. O. B. Frothingham and other relatives by his uncle, Sidney Brooks, a very rich man, who died recently. It is, perhaps, well that rich uncles will sometimes die.

"What is your chief consolation in life?" asked the pastor of a young lady in a Bible class. The young lady blushed and hesitated, but said, "I don't like to tell you his name, but I have no objection to telling you where he lives."

Mr. J. B. Knight, of the Franklin Institute, in Philadelphia, a scientific engineer, has made a thorough examination of the Keely motor during a period of five months, and reports that it is a fraud, and that the varied parts of its apparatus have been constructed with intent to deceive.

Du Chaillu says the hardest thing the missionaries in Africa have to do is to counteract the demoralizing influence of the traders on the natives. Even the vessels which carry missionaries carry also rum and whiskey, and the stimulants take effect before the missionaries do. The effect of the liquor is more permanent, too, than the effect of the labor of the missionaries.

The Independent says: "'The results of skepticism,' said the Rev. Carlos Martyn, at the Thirty-fourth Street Reformed Church, in this city, 'are Voltaire, Tom Paine, and Bob Ingersoll—bad, worse, worst.' Thomas Paine and Robert Ingersoll would have been equally effective—unless Mr. Martyn has a congregation of bullies—and would have been more gentlemanly." The Independent is a gentleman.

He had Changed His Views of Hell.—The Rev. C. R. Henderson, of the First Baptist Church of Terre Haute, Ind., has tendered his resignation. He has changed his views in regard to eternal punishment, and they do not agree with the doctrine of the Baptist Church on that subject. Mr. Henderson is in perfect accord with the Church in every article of its creed except that relating to eternal punishment.

The Rev. Mr. Jasper (colored) of Richmond nails his flag to the mast and bids defiance to the adherents of a science that observes phenomena and relies upon complicated mathematical calculations instead of sticking to the Bible. The Bible is a good enough scientific authority for Brother Jasper, and he preached another sermon Sunday to an immense congregation, demonstrating, to his own satisfaction and that of his hearers, that the sun revolves around the earth. The excitement among the dusky theologians of Richmond runs high, and it will be fortunate if the disputants do not come to blows before the end of the dissussion is reached.—N. Y. Sun.

The Presbyterian ministers of Chicago hold weekly meetings for debate and mutual improvement. For weeks they have been enjoying a prolonged wrestle with the first three chapters of Genesis, and have not yet made up their minds as to whether these chapters are to be taken literally or allegorically. As the discussion proceeds, the probability of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion seems more and more distant.

Religious Intolerance.—Prof. Felix Adler's exclusion from the Temple Sinai, Chicago, in which he had been advertised to lecture, was explained in a letter by the Rev. Dr. Kohler, who said: "I shall not allow my temple to be disgraced by a lecture to be delivered within its walls by one who blasphemes God and Judaism." He also speaks of Prof. Adler as one who "has deserted the Jewish flag and openly professes his disbelief in God and immortality."

Prayers that were Answered.—An old darkey who was asked if in his experience prayer was ever answered, replied: "Well, sah, some prayers is ansud an' some isn't—'pends on w'at you axes fo'. Just arter de war, w'en it was mighty hard scratchin' fo' de cullud breddern, I 'bsarved dat w'en eber I pway de lord to sen' one o' marse Peyton's fat turkeys fo' de ole man, dere was no notis took ob de partition; but when I pway dat he would sen' de ole man fo' de turkey, de matter was tended to befo' sun up nex' mornin', dead sartin."

Why are the Churches so Poorly Attended?—Churches are numerous and the pulpits are supplied with divines whose theological lore is in keeping with the times. Yet these places of worship are very poorly attended, and while the ministers are wasting their week's work on a few meek and lowly followers of the cross, whole armies of young men and old men are whiling away their existence playing draw poker. Investigation would develop the fact that for each man who regularly sits under the droppings of the sanctuary, ten sit at a poker table.—Indianapolis Journal.

Can This be True.—Bayard Taylor has been appointed United States Minister to Berlin. Bob Ingersoll was first suggested for the position, but a howl went up from the religious press, and Ingersoll was not appointed. While all this clamor was going on the President appointed Bayard Taylor, despite the fact that Ingersoll's Infidelism is not knee-high to that of Taylor, who for years in a quiet, but most determined way, has publicly and privately stated that there is no God, no heaven, no devil, no hell, no hereafter. It appears that the religious press is not opposed to Infidelity, only to the man who makes the most noise about it.

It is the firm belief of the Catholics in California that Bishop Alemany is responsible for all the loss of property and wretchedness of those who have lost their all by the late floods in that State, inasmuch as the bishop prayed for rain by special request, and, as a matter of course, a man of the bishop's well-understood influence could produce a response. It did rain at once, to order. Then the bishop took no further interest in the matter, and went about his general business in miracles, etc.; but as it came a little too heavy, a second request was made to the bishop to stop it; but not he! and, to punish his constituents for bothering him with such trifles, he just let it pour. And now many of them are making it a personal matter and a little warm for the bishop.

Moody says there is too much rottenness in the Church, and he wants the Church to wake up and purge it out. He says that "men join the Church for the purpose of obtaining position and the confidence of society, and soon we hear of defaulters in $200,000 or $300,000. Some ministers are so anxious to have a long roll of names in their Church, that they hustle in any one who comes along, without regard to fitness. We want downright honesty in the Church." And then he adds that he knows of ministers who are doing more harm than Infidels. This is rough on the ministers, and perhaps some of them might justly complain that Brother Moody misunderstands and misrepresents them. It is an unfortunate fault of Moody that he is in the habit of thus denouncing men who, though very good men in their way, do not thoroughly adopt his views or his methods.

Last Sunday marked an era in theology and science among the colored population of Richmond, Va. Pastors John Jasper of the Baptist Church and Draper of the Methodist held a public discussion as to whether the sun moves round the earth or the earth round the sun. As no building in Richmond was large enough to contain the crowds, the disqussion took place in the full glare of the afternoon sun, in an open field. Jasper refused to read any other book than the Bible, while Draper consulted the astronomy books. The adherents of Draper consider Jasper an ignorant fellow, but Jasper sticks to it that all needed astronomical science, as well as everything else necessary to salvation, is to be found in the Bible. The discussion was lively enough, and was attended by great crowds of white folks, who went to see the fun.

A memorial, to which nearly half a million signatures of members of the Church of England were appended, has been sent to Queen Victoria, praying her to use all the influence at her command "to repress the practice of auricular confession, which is so repugnant to the conscience and feelings of this Protestant country." Among the signatures are those of 75 noblemen, 37 ladies of title, 39 baronets, 23 right honorable and honorable gentlemen, 93 members of Parliament, 4 sheriffs, 655 Magistrates and justices of the peace, 41 mayors and aldermen, 973 bankers and merchants, 22 admirals, 46 generals, 202 colonels, 99 majors, 247 captains, 4 deans, 4 archdeacons, 30 canons, 3,286 clergy, 1,628 church wardens, 728 surgeons, 350 physicians and doctors of medicine, 138 barristers, 812 solicitors, 1,194 schoolmasters, and 393,713 members of the Church of England not classified. Among the signers is the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh.

THE REASON.

Tell me, little darling, why those tears—
  Tell me why this outward sign of sorrow;
So that I may drive away your fears,
  And from my love great comfort you may borrow.
Has any one presumed to treat you ill?
  Dared 'gainst your fair name to utter treason?
My most unhappy heart will not keep still
  Until, my love, you give to me the reason.

Dear friend, it is beyond your power to guess
  Why you have found me here alone, and weeping,
No woe or sadness doth my heart oppress;
  No smothered trouble in my soul is sleeping;
No one has ventured to use me amiss;
  'Gainst my good name there's no show of treason.
The cause whereof I weep is simply this:
  I've been grating horse-radish—that's the reason.

—Theo. S. Dobbs.

The following is an extract from one of "Tiddy" Witt Talmage's recent red-hot orthodox sermons: "I turn to the same old book, and I find out that the son of Mary, who was the Son of God, the darling of heaven, the champion of the ages, by some called Lord, by some called Jesus, by others called Christ, but this morning by us called by the three blessed titles, Lord Jesus Christ, by one magnificent stroke made it possible for us all to be saved. He not only told us there was a hell, but he went into it. He walked down the fiery steeps. He stepped off the bottom rung of the long ladder of despair. He descended into hell. He explored the darkest den of eternal midnight; and then he came forth lacerated and scarified and bleeding and mauled by the hands of infernal excruciation, to cry out to all the ages, 'I have paid the price for all those who would make me their substitute. By my piled-up groans, by my omnipotent agony, I demand the rescue of all those who will give up sin and trust in me.' Mercy! mercy! mercy! But how am I to get it? Cheap. It will not cost you as much as a loaf of bread. Only a penny? No, no. Escape from hell, and all the harps and mansions and thrones and sunlit fields of heaven besides in the bargain, without money and without price.'"

Events of the Week.

Rev. John Marples has committed suicide.

Fire in New Orleans on the 1st. Loss, $100,000.

The New York Sixpenny Savings Bank has failed.

France is said to be meddling in Mexican affairs.

The steamer City of Pekin takes $216,000 to China this week.

Two men were carried over Niagara falls and drowned on the 1st.

Fires at Springfield, Mass., and Memphis, Tenn. Damage, $100,000.

Fisher, the last of the Molly Maguire murderers, has been hanged.

One cent per ounce has been added to the postage on printed matter.

General Grant has been presented to Pope Leo by Cardinal McCloskey.

All the coal mines in the Schuylkill region commenced operations this week.

Thirty-five miners were killed by an explosion in the Opedall colliery, England.

The Baptist Conference has decided that women may preach the word of God.

Nicaragua has been frightened into a compliance with the demands of Germany.

A woman in Andover, Mass., aged seventy-eight, has murdered her sister aged seventy-six.

The American ship, P. R. Hazeltine, was wrecked off Cape Horn. But few of the crew were saved.

Two hundred weavers in Fall River and two hundred in Lawrence, Mass., are on a strike. Wages were cut down.

A party hostile to the Pope exists among the Cardinals. They are displeased with his allocution and his appointments.

Two Virginians have fought a duel with pistols. Distance, nine feet. Result, one corpse and one mortally wounded Virginian.

Two Englishmen have arrived here with orders for the purchase of 20,000 horses, ostensibly for cab and car horses, but more likely for cavalry.

Prospects are brighter in Cuba. The recent Spanish successes there have been discovered to be, as usual, nothing more than Spanish blowing.

The Stewart Women's Hotel has been opened to the public. Board, six dollars per week. It seems to be a cross between a convent and a penitentiary.

The Dominion Government has been instructed by the home Government to place British Columbia in a state of proper defense against invasion. This savors of war.

Our Government has concluded to recognize Diaz as the President of Mexico. The N. Y. Sun will, it is rumored, follow suit, and recognize Hayes as President of the United States.

Madame Restell has been frightened into committing suicide by the valiant Knight o Obscenity. Anthony complacently folds his arms and, with a sly wink at the venders of vaseline, says, "Thank God; another pearl in my heavenly crown. I did it with my little prevention-of-conception bill."

There is every indication of further complications in Europe. Russia, Prussia, Austria, France, and England, appear to be making every effort to be ready at a moment's notice for a conflict. Lord Derby, English Secretary of Foreign Affairs has resigned, and Lord Salisbury has taken his place. Russia has ordered 500 more cannon, Prussia has forbidden the exportation of horses, as they may be needed for her cavalry, France is preparing her fleet for active service, Austria is massing her troops on her frontiers, Servia is preparing for action, the Greeks are pitching into the Turks already, and all that is now needed is an excuse for the first blow. The Christians have succeeded in driving the Mohammedans out of Europe, and now they are preparing to fight like demons, or Christians, about the disposal of the booty

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER V.—Continued.

Sue passed the letter to Edith as she finished reading it, and whispered to her to lay it on the table when she should have read it, so that her father could have it if he wished. This being done, Edith went with Sue to her room, as she was beginning to be really tired with her long sitting up and the excitement of reading the news from her brothers. As they passed into the bedroom Sue glanced back, and saw her father slip the letter into his pocket and go to the library. She rejoiced at this mark of interest in the boys, and, cheered by the bright, hopeful words they had written and the kind sympathy of Edith, she sank into a deep, refreshing slumber.

Edith had hardly reached home when she saw Myra Scott coming up the garden walk, and, meeting her at the door, gave her a hearty welcome. When they arrived at the little sitting-room, the girls sat down for a good talk. Edith told all about her call at Conway's and the letter from the boys. Then Myra, in her turn, told Edith what a feast she and her father had had in reading a lot of Truth Seeker and Liberal tracts that Mr. Darwin had lent them.

"I've brought them over for you to read, dear Edith," she said, "for I never half enjoy a pleasure that is not shared by you. I know you will be interested in them, though you may not be as ready to accept all they say as father and I were. I tell you, The Truth Seeker is just splendid. We are going to send on money to-day for a year's subscription. We all want truth, and I think this little paper will help us to find it. It is honest, frank, and fearless in discussing all subjects, and we have literally fallen in love with its genial, pleasant, and clever editor and proprietor, Mr. Bennett. Mrs. Darwin says they have taken it ever since its first issue, and that they feel as if they and Bennett were all one family, and could hold all things in common. I begin to see now why those who think warmly and enthusiastically upon the same subjects, and have their whole hearts and souls in them, are apt to run into communism, just as the Essenes and early Christians did. I feel as if I could do all or anything to help Bennett to keep up this little gem of a paper, which has done so much towards opening my eyes to truth and fact. Only just think what a change has come over me since you read your uncle's letter to us! Then we believed the Bible; now, for my part, I doubt it all! Well may it be said, 'We know not what a day or an hour may bring forth'! We (father and I) have concluded to withdraw from the Church, and be free and independent. We have got our eyes so wide open that we find it impossible to shut them up any more, and it really seems like martyrdom to sit and hear the old 'platitudes and inanities' rehearsed week after week, and eat bread and drink wine under the pretense that they are the flesh and blood of Christ."

"I confess, Myra, that I am not much surprised that you are going to withdraw from us," said Edith; "for you know you and your father were always somewhat skeptical upon many points, and since the Darwins came, the subject of theology has been discussed so thoroughly that it is no marvel that you have developed into absolute antipathy to Christianity."

"Not exactly antipathy, Edith dear, for I have really enjoyed my membership among you too much to ever be able to actually dislike the old-time beliefs of my girlhood. The kindly greeting of 'Sister Myra' has always sounded sweet to my ear, when falling from the lips of those who were near and dear to me from all the loved associations of the past; and it will be hard now to see them pass me coldly by, or, perhaps, fling out a sarcasm or bitter taunt upon my new opinions and beliefs. But I shall do what I think is right, and fearlessly meet the consequences, trusting to retain some of my old friends—you, and the Darwins, and Jennie, and Sue—so I shall not be entirely alone. There is no turning back for me, you know, if I am once convinced that I am on the road to truth and right."

"That is so, Myra. You were always self-willed and self-opinionated, but so honest and true-hearted that no one can help respecting and loving you," said Edith, warmly.

"Thank you for your kind, encouraging words," said Myra. "They are doubly valuable just now, when everything I have loved and valued most seems slipping away from me, and one cherished theory after another is being utterly demolished by the calm, philosophic, irresistible blows of fact and science.

"But, Edith dear, I must tell you something funny," said Myra, brightening up and speaking in her old impulsive way. "I was in to see Sue one day last week, and got to talking on religion with her father, and I told him plumply that I thought the Christian mythology was no more to be relied upon as being correct and true than were many other of the great mythologies of the world, either ancient or modern. You should have seen him glare and frown at me. If looks could kill, I should have been lifeless matter in less than no time.

"'If these are your sentiments, Miss Myra,' said he, in a stern, pompous tone, 'I would advise you to keep them to yourself, and not be poisoning other people with them. If I ever hear of you talking in my daughter's presence again in such a blasphemous manner, I shall forbid her to associate with you. You are traveling in the footsteps of that bad, wicked, vile wretch, Tom Paine. You will please remember what a horrid death he died, recanting all his unbelief and atheism, and calling upon Christ to save him; and when his daughter came to him, asking him in which faith she should be reared, his or her mother's, he replied, "In your mother's, my child," thus showing by his actions in his last hours which belief he thought safest and best.'

"'All pious lies, deacon, every one of them,' said I. 'I've seen real Infidels now, and read Infidel books and papers, and you can't stuff me any more with such nonsense as that. I've found out that Infidels are as consistent and as good, if not better, than Christians are. Paine was a good man, and was always doing and saying something for the benefit of others—something to make the world better, wiser, and happier. He wasn't an Atheist, either, but a Deist, and was loved and respected by all who knew him. He never thought of recanting his opinions. Nor did he ever have a daughter. It was a daughter of Ethan Allen who was said to have asked her father on her deathbed whether she should die in his or her mother's faith. But when history shows that Ethan Allen never lost a daughter during his lifetime, you will see that the whole story is a monstrous pious fraud.'

"The old deacon fairly stamped with rage, and exclaimed, 'You are very pert and presumptuous, miss, to pretend to know more than I do, and I a deacon of the church and old enough to be your father! Perhaps you will deny your God and your blessed Savior next!'

"'I shouldn't wonder, deacon, if I did,' said I, laughing, 'for I am beginning to see that the world has been immensely humbugged concerning gods and Bibleology. The credulous will swallow all sorts of "stretchers," if they are only read in sanctimonious tones from a god-book, or spoken by those who pretend to be mouthpieces of the Deity. They believe a man could live three days in the stomach of a whale, immersed in the fermenting chyme and various other contents of that receptacle for digestible matters, and not a breath of pure air nor a particle of daylight to illumine the horrid scene.' A hot, sweltering time he must have had of it, don't you think so?'

"'Don't be too fast, girl; scientists now say the whale has a sort of bag in his throat, where Jonah stayed.'

"'Well, then, the Bible lies, deacon, for it expressly says he was three days in its belly. It's no use for you Christians to try to fix up this "portable pope of Christianity," with the idea that you can make it agree with fact and truth. The thing can't be done. A flat earth, with ends, corners, and jumping-off places; a universal deluge; mountains so lofty that you can see all parts of a round world; trees that will die by being cursed; dry bones that will become living men; fish that will bring money to pay one's taxes; asses that talk; witches that can call up ghosts of the departed—can never be made to tally with science, however hard you may try to reconcile them. Why, I knew a man—a county superintendent of schools, too—who refused to believe that the world was round or turned over; he insisted that if it were we would all fall off! Smart superintendent, wasn't he? He would never cover up early beans or cucumber or tomato plants, to keep them from being frost-bitten, lest he should be frustrating the designs of Divine Providence.'

[To be continued.]

Modern Martyrs.

The first martyrs were for Christianity. The latest were for Infidelity. Early Christians were thrown to wild beasts and put to death before large crowds of people, and this was part of a programme for the Roman people in holiday keeping. Ere long the tables were turned, and Christians, on obtaining power, practiced similar atrocities against those who differed from them in opinion. Christianity was in the ascendant through the dark ages, and was a primary cause of the darkness. Ignorance and cruelty reigned supreme from A. D. 300 to A. D. 1500. Printing was invented; the compass, telescope, and many items showed the dawn of a better day, when the clouds of ignorance were to be dispelled and knowledge to be substituted for faith. The Church now used authority and force to control opinion—tortured and killed thousands. "But," says our modern Christians, "we repudiate such doings; it was the cruel Catholic who murdered for opinion." Shade of Servetus! come forth and tell us if it was not John Calvin, the reformer, who roasted you by a slow fire, because you could not see his five points. Was it alone "Bloody Mary" who burned heretics? "Good Queen Bess" did the same. Long since their time witches have been burned. I think I hear the modern Christian suggest, "all these horrors were long ago and should be forgotten." At the commencement of the nineteenth century Thos. Aikenhead, a boy of sixteen, was indicted and tried at Edinburgh for denying inspiration of Scripture, and when suffering from cold, saying he wished himself in hell, was hung, and buried at the foot of the scaffold. The spirit of Christian persecution remains, although its power is slipping away. In Texas an Infidel M. D. was lately stripped and whipped by good Christians for opinion's sake. Lant and Train and others have been imprisoned for an opinion; Bennett barely escaped. This brings us to the present time. Who that dares to think for himself cannot bear witness to the cruel and despotic tendency of Christians to ostracise from society all who differ from them. It is moral death for many a Freethinker among a Christian crowd, and would be physical death if law and growing public sentiment did not forbid it.

F. J. Emary.

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.—CONTINUED.

CHAPTER VIII.—Continued.

LAWS OF TRANSMISSION BY INHERITANCE.—ADAPTATION AND NUTRITION.

A third law of conservative transmission may be called the law of sexual transmission, according to which each sex transmits to the descendants of the same sex peculiarities which are not inherited by the descendants of the other sex. The so-called secondary sexual characters, which in many respects are of extraordinary interest, everywhere furnish numerous examples of this law. Subordinate or secondary sexual characters are those peculiarities of one of the two sexes which are not directly connected with the sexual organs themselves; such characters, which exclusively belong to the male sex, are, for example, the antlers of the stag, the mane of the lion, and the spur of the cock. The human beard, an ornament commonly denied to the female sex, belongs to the same class. Similar characteristics by which the female sex is alone distinguished are, for example, the developed breasts, with the lactatory glands of female mammals and the pouch of the female opossum. The bodily size, also, and complexion differ in female animals of many species from that of the male. All these secondary sexual qualities, like the sexual organs themselves, are transmitted by the male organism only to the male, not to the female, and vice versa. Contrary facts are rare exceptions to the rule.

A fourth law of transmission, which has here to be mentioned, in a certain sense contradicts the last, and limits it, viz., the law of mixed or mutual (amphigonous) transmission. This law tells us that every organic individual produced in a sexual way receives qualities from both parents, from the father as well as from the mother. This fact, that personal qualities of each of the two sexes are transmitted to both male and female descendants, is very important. Goethe mentions it of himself, in the beautiful lines—

"Von Vater hab ich die Statur, des Lebens ernstes Führen Von Mütterchen die Frohnatur und Lust zu fabuliren."

"From my father I have my stature and the serious tenor of my life.
From my mother a joyous nature and a turn for poetizing."

This phenomenon, I suppose, is so well-known to all, that I need not here enter upon it. It is according to the different portions of their character which father and mother transmit to their children that the individual differences among brothers and sisters are chiefly determined.

The very important and interesting phenomenon of hybridism also belongs to this law of mixed or amphigonous transmission. It alone, when rightly estimated, is quite sufficient to refute the prevailing dogma of the constancy of species. Plants, as well as animals, belonging to quite different species, may sexually mingle with one another and produce descendants which in many cases can again propagate themselves, and that indeed either (more frequently) by mingling with one of the two parental species, or (more rarely) by pure in-breeding, hybrid mixing with hybrid. The latter is well established, for example, in the hybrids of hares and rabbits (Lepus Darwin, ii, p. 147). The hybrids of a horse and a donkey, two different species of the same genus (Equus), are well known. These hybrids differ according as the father or the mother belongs to the one or the other species—the horse or the donkey. The mule produced by a mare and a he-donkey has qualities quite different from those of the jinny (Hinnus), the hybrid of a horse and she-donkey. In both cases the hybrid produced by the crossing of two different species is a mixed form, which receives qualities from both parents; but the qualities of the hybrid are different, according to the form of the crossing. In like manner, mulattoes produced by a European and a negress show a different mixture of characters from the hybrids produced by a negro with a European female. In these phenomena of hybrid-breeding, as well as in the other laws of transmission previously mentioned, we are as yet unable to show the acting causes in detail; but no naturalist doubts the fact that the causes are in all cases purely mechanical and dependent upon the nature of organic matter itself. If we possessed more delicate means of investigation than our rude organs of sense and auxilliary instruments, we should be able to discover those causes, and to trace them to the chemical and physical properties of matter.

Among the phenomena of conservative transmission, we must now mention, as the fifth law, the law of abridged or simplified transmission. This law is very important in regard to embryology or ontogeny, that is in regard to the history of the development of organic individuals. Ontogeny, or the history of the development of individuals, as I have already mentioned in the first chapter (p. 10), and as I subsequently shall explain more minutely, is nothing but a short and quick repetition of Phylogeny dependent on the laws of transmission and adaptation—that is, a repetition of the paleontological history of development of the whole organic tribe, or phylum, to which the organism belongs. If, for example, we follow the individual development of a man, an ape, or any other higher mammal, within the maternal body from the egg, we find that the fœtus or embryo arising out of the egg passes through a series of very different forms, which on the whole agrees with, or at least runs parallel to, a series of forms which is presented to us by the historical chain of ancestors of the higher mammals. Among these ancestors we may mention certain fishes, amphibians, marsupials, etc. But the parallelism or agreement of these two series of development is never quite complete; on the contrary, in ontogeny there are always gaps and leaps which indicate the omission of certain stages belonging to the phylogeny. Fritz Müller, in his excellent work, "Für Darwin," has clearly shown in the case of the Crustacea, or crabs, that "the historical record preserved in the individual history of development is gradually obscured, in proportion as development takes a more and more direct route from the egg to the complete animal." This process of obscuring and shortening is determined by the law of abridged transmission, and I mention it here specially because it is of great importance for the understanding of embryology, and because it explains the fact, at first so strange, that the whole series of forms which our ancestors have passed through in their gradual development are no longer visible in the series of forms of our own individual development from the egg.

Opposed to the laws of the conservative transmission, hitherto discussed, are the phenomena of the transmission of the second series, that is, the laws of progressive transmission by inheritance. As already mentioned, they depend upon the fact that the organism transmits to its descendants not only those qualities which it has inherited from its own ancestors, but also a number of those individual qualities which it has acquired during its own lifetime. Adaptation is here seen to be connected with transmission by inheritance (Gen. Morph. ii, 186).

At the head of these important phenomena of progressive transmission, we may mention the law of adapted or acquired transmission. In reality, it asserts nothing more than what I have said above, that in certain circumstances the organism is capable of transmitting to its descendants all the qualities which it has acquired during its own life by adaptation. This phenomenon, of course, shows itself most distinctly when the newly acquired peculiarity produces any considerable change in the inherited form. This is the case in the examples I mentioned in the preceding chapter as to transmission in general, in the case of the men with six fingers and toes, the porcupine men, copper beeches, weeping willows, etc. The transmission of acquired diseases, such as consumption, madness, and albinism, likewise form very striking examples. Albinos are those individuals who are distinguished by the absence of coloring matter, or pigments, in the skin. They are of frequent occurrence among men, animals, and plants. In the case of animals of a definite dark color, individuals are not unfrequently born which are entirely without color; and in animals possessing eyes, this absence of pigment extends even to the eyes, so that the iris of the eye, which is commonly of a bright or intense color, is colorless, but appears red, on account of the blood-vessels being seen through it. Among many animals, such as rabbits and mice, albinos with white fur and red eyes are so much liked that they are propagated in great numbers as a special race. This would be impossible were it not for the law of the transmission of adaptations.

Which of the changes acquired by an organism are transmitted to its descendants, and which are not, cannot be determined á priori, and we are, unfortunately, not acquainted with the definite conditions under which the transmission takes place. We only know in a general way that certain acquired qualities are much more easily transmitted than others; for example, more easily than the mutilations caused by accidents. These latter are, generally, not transmitted by inheritance; otherwise the descendants of men who have lost their arms or legs would be born without the corresponding arm or leg; but here, also, exceptions occur, and a race of dogs without tails has been produced by consistently cutting off the tails of both sexes of the dog during several generations. A few years ago a case occurred on an estate near Jena, in which, by a careless slamming of a stable door, the tail of a bull was wrenched off, and the calves begotten by this bull were all born without a tail. This is certainly an exception; but it is very important to note the fact that, under certain unknown conditions, such violent changes are transmitted in the same manner as many diseases.

In very many cases the change which is transmitted and preserved by adapted transmission is constitutional or inborn, as in the case of albinism mentioned before. The change then depends upon that form of adaptation which we call the indirect or potential. A very striking instance is furnished by the hornless cattle of Paraguay, in South America. A special race of oxen is there bred which is entirely without horns. It is descended from a single bull, which was born in 1770 of an ordinary pair of parents, and the absence of horns was the result of some unknown cause. All the descendants of this bull produced with a horned cow were entirely without horns. This quality was found advantageous, and by propagating the hornless cattle among one another, a hornless race was obtained, which at present has almost entirely supplanted the horned cattle in Paraguay. The case of the otter-sheep of North America forms a similar example. In the year 1791 a farmer, by name Seth Wright, lived in the State of Massachusetts; in his normally formed flock of sheep a lamb was suddenly born with a surprisingly long body and very short and crooked legs. It was therefore unable to take any great leaps, and especially unable to leap across a hedge into a neighbor's garden—a quality which seemed advantageous to the owner, as the territories were divided by hedges. It therefore occurred to him to transmit this quality to other sheep, and, by crossing this ram with normally shaped ewes, he produced a whole race of sheep, all of which had the qualities of the father—short and crooked legs and a long body. None of these could leap across the hedges, and they, therefore, were much liked and propagated in Massachusetts.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier.

OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

The Christians, moreover, include among their grounds for the credibility and as assured proofs of the truth of their testimony, the prophecies which are, they affirm, sure testimonies of the truth of the revelations or the inspirations of God, none but God having the power to predict future events so long before their fulfillment, such as those foretold by the prophets.

Let us see now what were those prophets, and if they were as worthy of our veneration and respect as the Christians would have them to be. These men were neither more nor less than visionaries and fanatics, who acted and spoke according to the impulse or frenzy of their predominating passions, and who fancied, nevertheless, that it was by the spirit of God they acted and spoke; or they were impostors who counterfeited the prophets, and who, the more easily to delude the simple and ignorant, proclaimed that they acted and spoke through the spirit of God.

I should like to know what evidence would be accorded in these latter days to an Ezekiel who affirms (chap. iii and iv) that God made him eat a whole book of parchment for his lunch; commanded him to have himself bound and tied down as if he were a madman; prescribed for him to lie for three hundred and ninety days on his right side and forty on his left; commanded him to eat human excrement on his bread in guise of butter, and afterward cow-dung? What credence, I ask, in these our days, would be given to such a crazy pate by even the most imbecile of country clowns?

And again, what greater proof could there be of the fallacy of these pretended prophecies than the violent reproaches which they are constantly making one to the other of falsely speaking in the name of God: "Beware of false prophets," they say, one and all, as the vendors of a quack medicine say, "Beware of imitations." These wretched wights make God to express himself in such terms as to put to shame a Billingsgate porter. In the twenty-third chapter of Ezekiel, God says that Aholibah loved none but those "whose flesh is as the flesh of asses, and whose issue is like the issue of horses." How could such crazy cheats have known anything of futurity? Not in one single instance have any of their pretended prophecies, in favor of the Jewish nation, received fulfillment.

The number of those seers who foretold the prosperity and grandeur of Jerusalem is almost countless; therefore, it will be said, it was but natural that a conquered and captive people should endeavor to console themselves for the ills and miseries of the present by imaginary hopes for the future, as the Irish partisans of King James were never weary of inventing prophecies in favor of that monarch from the day of his overthrow. But if those promises made to the Jews had really been true ones, that nation would have long since been and would be still the most numerous, the most powerful, the most prosperous, and the most triumphant of the entire earth.

OF THE PRETENDED PROPHECIES CONTAINED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Let us now pass on the pretended prophecies contained in the gospels:

An angel having appeared in a dream to a man named Joseph, the at least putative father of Jesus, the son of Mary, said to him: "Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife; for that which is conceived of her is of the Holy Ghost.* And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins" (Matt. i. 20, 21).

This angel said likewise to Mary: "Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favor with God. And behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob, forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke i, 30–33).

Jesus began to preach, saying: "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv, 17). "Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? . . . for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. vi, 31–33).

Now, let any man who has not lost his reason examine a little whether this Jesus ever was a king, or these disciples ever the possessors of everything needful in abundance? This Jesus made frequent promises that he would deliver the world from sin. Was there ever a more lying prophecy? And is not even this, our century, one of the most striking proofs of it?

It is said that Jesus came to save his people. What a fashion of saving them! It is the greater portion or quantity that gives the denomination to a thing; a dozen or two, for instance, of Spaniards or Frenchmen do not constitute the whole Spanish or French nation; and if an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men were made prisoners of war by a still more numerous army of the enemy, and if the chief of this army should redeem but a few men, say a dozen of soldiers or officers by paying their ransom, it could not for this be said that he had delivered or redeemed his army. What, then, is this God who came to get himself crucified, and to save all mankind, and who nevertheless has left so many nations devoted to perdition? What a pitiable, what a horrible absurdity! Jesus Christ says that we have but to ask and it will be given to us; to seek and we shall find. He affirms that all we shall ask of God in his name, shall be given us, and that if we had only a grain of faith no bigger than a mustard seed, we should be able with a single word to remove mountains. Were all or any of this true, nothing would be impossible to the Christians who have faith in their Christ. And yet it is the contrary that happens. Had Mohammed made such promises to his followers as Jesus made to his, with such little success; what would not be said of him? "Oh, the cheat! The impostor! What fools they must have been to heed such a liar!" And the Christians themselves find themselves in this identical case; and not only are they unwilling to throw away their blindness, but are so ingenious in their endeavors to delude themselves and others, as to advance that these promises had their fulfillment in the beginning of the Christian era, it having been necessary at this period, say they, that Jesus's miracles should manifest themselves to the end of convincing the unbelieving of the truth of that religion; but that this dogma being once firmly established, such manifestation was no longer needed. Where in the meantime is the certitude of the truth of this proposition?

Moreover, he who made these promises did not restrict them to a certain epoch, nor to certain places, nor to certain persons in particular, but he made them generally to all: "All who shall believe in me," says he, "shall have power to cast out devils in my name; they shall speak with many tongues, shall take up serpents without being harmed by them," etc.

With regard to the moving of mountains, he says positively that whoever shall say to a mountain, "Get the hence, and throw thyself into the sea," provided he do not hesitate in his heart, but believes, what he has commanded shall be done. Are not these so many promises made in general, without restriction of time, place, or person? It is said that all religious sects and impostures shall come to a shameful end. But if Jesus Christ only meant to say that he himself had founded and established a society or sect which should not fall into vice nor error, these words are absolutely false, for there is not one single sect, society, or church in all Christendom that is not full of errors and vices, and especially the sect or society of the Romish Church, although she pretends to be the purest and holiest of them all. She long ago fell into error; she was born in it, or, rather, engendered and formed in it; and now she has even gone so far as to cherish errors that contradict the intention of him who founded her, since she has abolished the Jewish law which he approved and which he came to fulfill and not to destroy, and has fallen into the errors and idolatry of Paganism, as evident in the idolatrous worship she renders to a god of paste, to her saints, to her pictures, and her relics.

I am aware that the Christians regard it as the proof of a coarse, uncultivated mind to exact that the promises and prophecies should be understood to mean what they literally express; they abandon the literal and natural sense of the words to thrust them into another sense, which they call mystic and spiritual, and which they name allegorical and figurative, as when they say, for instance, that by the people of Israel and Judah, to whom those promises were made, we must not understand the Israelites in the flesh, but the Israelites in the spirit, that is to say, the Christians, who are the Israel of God, his true chosen people.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

* "How many like facts of cuckoldom," says Montague, "were perpetrated by the gods to the confusion of helpless mankind."

Correspondence Extraordinary.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. X.

My Dear Readers: If I wish to ever get through with my narrative, it will be necessary for me to pass over vast eras of time with a very few remarks; for you must know that the process of world-making requires such immense ages and eras that it would be wholly impracticable for me to give you the details with much degree of particularity. The aggregation, combination, and condensation, in our millions of suns and worlds, of the different forms of matter we had produced—of which I have given you a very imperfect description — were operations requiring such ages to accomplish that it will be better for you and me to just skip over the intervening thousands of years and hundreds of thousands of years, leaving you to imagine how closely Brother Jah and I attended to it in the mean time. I must confess to you, however, that he not unfrequently got impatient over the slow progress we made, and sometimes he would blurt out to me in this manner: "Now, look here, Luce, this thing is getting monotonous and tedious. Here we are, working year after year, decade after decade, century after century, and almost millennium after millennium, in perfecting our little arrangements, when it would suit me much better to bring them all about with one swoop of my hand or the speaking of a word. You are a very inventive sort of fellow, and what is the reason you cannot devise some means by which we can accomplish in a few days or hours all the vast operations which it now requires thousands of years for us to perfect? Put on your studying cap, Luce, and see if something cannot be done to change the programme. I tell you I am getting tired of this slow, poke-easy style of doing business. I don't want to be a thousand years in doing what I would like to accomplish in fifteen minutes. It may suit you to delve and plod and toil, to bring out by slow degrees the numerous processes you have on hand; but as for me, give me the quick and violent style. I like the thunder and lightning, the tornado, earthquakes, upheavals, and volcanoes. They are in my style, and seem like business. What say you, Luce?"

"My Brother, you are certainly a pretty good sort of fellow as you are, but if you had about a hundred per cent more of patience, it would improve your character wonderfully. Why will you allow yourself to get into such a flurry? Remember we have got plenty of time on our hands to bring about all we have undertaken, and there is not the slightest use in fretting over it. Let's take it coolly, and, above all things, keep our equanimity. Remember we are gods, and, besides the heavy responsibility which rests upon us in carrying out in a workmanlike manner the contract we have undertaken, we have a character to maintain. It may be set down as a good rule that whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well; and now that we have undertaken to get up a universe, let us do it so that the job will be a credit to us when we have completed it; and to do that requires time, and a good deal of it. You may be very fond of the clash and crash business of earthquakes, upheavals, etc., but I don't see how you can make a thousand years pass by in fifteen minutes. Those violent operations are mainly destructive, while with half an eye you must see that our work is essentially constructive. These grand operations we have now in hand require great care and much time. If we hurry them off without care and consideration, we shall be sure to make a botch of it, and will have to decompose it all and do it over again. Now, you must compose your mind, my Brother, and cultivate the spirit of patience. There is no use in fretting."

"Why, Luce, you are a most imperturbable, immovable sort of fellow, to be sure. You had just as soon be fifty millions of years at getting up a universe as to finish it all in a month. I must confess I am not like you in this respect. I like, when I take hold of a job, to have it done at once, so I will be ready to get about something. It never suits me to poke, poke my way through eternity. I like to see things move. I have been thinking it over a good deal, and it seems to me that if we could only get in the way of doing things by our voice, by just speaking things into existence, it would save a great deal of labor and time. Let us practice with our voices more, and let our hands and brains take a rest. If you don't like it, I will try it some time when you have gone off on one of your business trips."

"I am afraid, Jah, if you go to cultivating your voice too much, you may do more harm than good—destroy faster than you can build up. What if I should return some day from the great Alcyone and find you had been practicing with your powerful voice, and knocked fifty or one hundred of our fine worlds into smithereens! I would not like it much. We have bestowed too much time and labor upon them to spoil it all now by a little rashness. I beg you will hold your voice, and when you do use it, to let it out mildly. I tell you, these unions and combinations we are perfecting require time, and there is no such thing as dispensing with this important element. Now, it was no longer ago than last week that you were admiring a beautiful large-sized diamond which you dug out of the little world, the Earth, and you wished me to get up a big lot of them; but to crystallize them and bring them to a state of perfection requires long periods of time. Everything beautiful and grand takes time to perfect; and what is done in haste, with a word and a blow—and the blow before the word—is badly done, and of but little use after it is done. Let me again urge patience upon you. We are getting along pretty well with our contract, if you only view it in the right light. Just look back and see what we have accomplished since we commenced the universe. Remember, there was nothing in existence, and no place to put it. Now there is an immense abundance of everything, and lots of room for it. I should say we have accomplished wonders, and that we ought to be content to work on patiently and ploddingly, with the full conviction that the work of making a universe cannot be rushed through pell-mell, on the high-pressure principle. Let us, my Brother, make haste slowly. Let our moderation be exhibited to ourselves now, and, by and by, to the beings we shall bring into existence."

"Oh, Luce, you are right again, and I am wrong, as usual. Your head is all right, and it is me that is at fault. Now, I don't want to make a botch of this business we have in hand, any more than you do, but I do every once in a while get tired of going so slowly, and I thought I would just suggest to you the propriety of seeing if we could not expedite matters a good deal. I am anxious to get our job along, so that, on some of the smaller globes, we can, before a great while, commence the enterprise of evolving organic life. You have told me about it, and how, by combining our chemical forms of substance and the subtle forces we have now brought nearly to perfection, the rocks can be decomposed, or oxydized, and from this product, with the aid of light, heat, and other forces, vegetable life can be produced, and, a long time after this, that animal life will supervene. You have given your plans to me touching all these subjects, and I get a little impatient, as you see, and feel anxious to pass over the intermediate time and witness the results I am so anxious to behold. You must pardon me if this natural impatience of mine sometimes gets the advantage of me, and if, for the time being, I thoughtlessly yield to it. I am all right now, Luce, and we will go on our way rejoicing."

Of course, dear readers, I could not feel malice or dislike towards my Brother, who was so frank to own up when he was in error. Nor could I think strange that he did sometimes get a little impatient; for, to look back to the first morning we commenced the universe, it does seem like a long time ago, and after the countless intervening years and ages, the universe is still unfinished. There are thousands of suns and worlds this very moment that are yet almost in the incipient state of existence, without a particle of organized life upon them, and still thousands of years must roll by before organized life, even in its crudest forms, can exist upon them.

I will just state here, incidentally, that though the relations between my Brother and myself have changed somewhat since the times of which I am writing, and though I have engaged in a different occupation, the business of the universe and world-making goes on as in former times. The laws we established in the early dawn of creation are still in existence, and the operations of the universe continue right along without any special supervision from any quarter.

As our worlds steadily progressed in their march towards completion, I had my hands full, and so had my Brother, in attending to the scientific part of the business. We had to develop the fundamental sciences during the period alluded to. In connection with crystallization, geometry, or the science of extension, lines, surfaces, and solids, of course, came in very naturally, though it took in a much wider range than what belonged to crystallization alone. It took cognizance of all that pertained to extension, figure, magnitude, mobility, divisibility, impenetrability, weight, and inertia. These properties may be said to belong to the first classification, while in the second were placed solidity, liquidity, translucency, transparency, etc. Extension, magnitude, figure, and divisibility were the properties which were more immediately relegated to the domain of the science under consideration. In evolving it we had much studying to do with circles, semicircles, angles, triangles, rightangles, squares, parallelograms, conic sections, parabolas, hyperbolas, conoids, spheroids, rhomboids, hexagons, octagons, polygons, etc., etc. If we did not bring the science of geometry to the state of perfection that has since been attained by learned men, I must claim that we laid the foundation for it and that the principles then established by us have remained intact to the present day.

This study was also rather too intricate and puzzling to suit the taste of Jah, and I noticed he was very willing to turn the same pretty much over to your humble servant as being better adapted to my capacity than his. Of course I did not object, for like crystallization the theme was interesting to me.

Jah was more interested in attending to the various strata of which your globe and other worlds are composed. This science embraced the formation of your earth, as when from the highly heated condition it long had occupied, the production of rocks, gravel, sand, clay, etc., some of which were deposited in the oceans which at a subsequent period covered large portions of your globe. The superintendence of all these operations interested Jah greatly as well as myself. It was instructive to watch the cooling surface of the earth, the deposits that took place, and the formations that assumed existence. We supervized with closest attention, the stratification of the different eras from the azoic period, the silurian, the devonian, the carboniferous, the reptilian, and the mammalian ages. These various strata of rock, limestone, gravel, sandstone, clay, grit, and formations of various kinds were the results of protracted periods. From the early date termed the azoic period till your earth was fitted for the habitation of man was an epoch, or a series of epochs, beyond your powers of comprehension; and it is hardly worth your while for me to give in your mathematical system of notation the number of years which thus elapsed. The term was too prolonged to demand a statement of the number of years which formed it. I shall take occasion as we progress along to briefly revert to the work done during several of the eras which passed over your globe in the long, long ago.

The attention we gave to the metals, as the earth was passing through its infantile state, was of itself no slight study. We found it convenient to divide them into two important classes, or systems, one from their physical properties and the other their chemical. We again subdivided them according to their fusibility below redness; fusibility above redness; volatile metals that could be easily thrown into the form of vapor, as zinc, cadmium, etc.; fixed metals that with great difficulty could be reduced to vapor, as gold, copper, and nickel, their gravity varying from lithium, which is only about half the weight of water, to mercury, gold, and osmium, the latter of which is twenty-one and a half times heavier than water.

All metals bore a definite form of crystallization, which was produced principally in three ways—by slow solidification after fusion, by condensation from vapor, and by electrolytic decomposition. We found they differed materially in structure, not only with regard to each other, but in relation to themselves. Some crystalline, as zinc, antimony, bismuth, etc.; others, granular, like pig-iron; others fibrous, like copper, silver, bar-iron, etc.; while a few others, again, were columnar, as grain-tin, and conchoidal, as in brittle alloys. Two of the principal physical characteristics of metals are ductility (the property of being permanently extended by traction, as in wire-drawing) and malleability (the property of being extended in all directions under the hammer).

The power of metals as conductors of electricity was early observed by us—in fact, it was a part of the programme laid out before we got to the formation of that portion of the universe. We realized the necessity for excellent conductors for that wonderful force, and we decided to get up the metals with that special object. The order for conductivity for electricity and heat are much the same.

Chemically speaking, metals are divisible into the following classifications: I. The metals of the alkalies, potassium, sodium, lithium, rubidium, and cæsium. These have an intense affinity for oxygen, and decompose water of ordinary temperature. They form two or more oxides, both soluble in water. II. The metals of the alkaline earths—tarium, strontium, calcium, magnesium. The metals of this class, with the exception of magnesium, which is tolerably closely allied to zinc in many of its properties, decompose water at all temperatures, and form one oxide pretty soluble in water. III. Metals of the earths—albuminum, glucinum, cerium, and several others of great rarity. The oxides of these metals are insoluble in water, and they do not decompose water at ordinary temperatures. IV. Metals analogous to tin—zinc, cadmium, cobalt, nickel, uranium, iron, chromium, manganese. These, if heated to dull redness, decompose the vapor of water when transmitted over them, becoming converted into oxides, while hydrogen escapes. Three of them, iron, chromium, and manganese form powerful acids. V. Metals forming powerful acids with oxygen—tin, titanium, molybdenum, tungsten, vanadium, arsenic, antimony, tellurium, and one or two more. VI. This class contains bismuth, copper, lead, and thallium, metals which exert no decomposing influence on water, even at a full red heat. They form strong basic oxides and possess a great tendency for the formation of subsalts. VII. This last class contained what Jah and I denominated the noble metals, mercury, silver, gold, and platinum. These exhibit no tendency to oxidize in the air, and are incapable of removing the oxygen from water even at high temperatures. There are other distinguishing properties and traits connected with the metals, but I will not now detain you to enumerate them.

You must bear in mind that as immense in the aggregate as were the operations here scarcely alluded to, which took place on your own small globe, that we could give but a very minute portion of our time in supervising the numerous operations, for there were so many worlds passing through similar stages that our attention necessarily was devoted to them as really as to your own diminutive globe. As there were millions of worlds thus requiring our offices, you can well understand that we could give but the smallest part of our time to any one sun or world. If ten minutes only were given in a year to any one world, you will see at once that it would take a long time to make the circuit and give that time to every world in the vast circle.

You may easily infer that the two Brothers who figured extensively on those eventful occasions had about all they could attend to in looking after the innumerable suns and worlds in varying degrees of progress, and to see that nothing in all the vast laboratory went amiss; and visiting so often the different constellations, systems, suns, and worlds necessarily made us very familiar with the geography of all the vast extent of territory over which we presided. There is one thing, however, connected with the business that I may as well tell you right here, and that is that the machinery and the laws we had devised and placed in running order worked with so much certainty and precision that it was not strictly necessary that we should put in an appearance very often. It may be said, too, that all the processes seemed to go on just about as well in our absence as in our presence; but as we wished to earn our salary and to convince ourselves that we were really performing an important part in the formation of the universe, we were not remiss in our attentions.

But all this does not justify my detaining you longer with my prosiness. I have held you quite long enough for one sitting. I hope I shall meet you all well next week, when we will resume the recital which my ability to give and your patience to receive will justify. With renewed assurances of my unending friendship and esteem, allow me once more to subscribe myself your devoted friend,

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Lessons in Popular Science.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

THE PTOLEMAIC SYSTEM.

Fragments of the ancient system of astronomy have come down to us from the former ages of the world, but the only full or correct system that has been preserved to us is the "Almagest" of Ptolemy, written about the year 150 of our present era. About all we know of the views of astronomy entertained in olden times comes from this source.

Although the system of Ptolemy is erroneous in several particulars, it is, after all, a pretty correct exhibit of the apparent motions of the heavenly bodies as viewed by the ancients. Defective as we are now justified in regarding it, it has been well termed a marvel of ingenuity and research, when measured by the standard of the times. It is thought to be very proper to give a comprehensive view of these Ptolemaic views before entering the body of the work.

Ptolemy's fundamental doctrines were that the heavens are spherical in form, and all the heavenly motions spherical, or in circles; that the earth was spherical and was situated in the centre of the celestial spheres, where it remained stationary. He taught as follows:

1. The Heavenly Bodies move in Circles.—He referred here principally to the diurnal motion, whereby every heavenly body is apparently carried around the earth—or, rather, around the pole of the heavens—in a circle, every twenty-four hours.

2. The Earth is a Sphere.—That it was rounded from east to west Ptolemy proved by the fact that the sun, moon, and stars did not rise and set at the same moment to all inhabitants of the earth. It was noticed that the further the observer was west, the earlier was the hour after sunset. This showed that the sun set later as the observer traveled towards the west. It was also noticed that in traveling from the north to the south, the northern stars more and more nearly approached the horizon, giving unmistakable evidence of the rotundity of the earth.

3. That the Earth was in the Center of the Celestial Spheres.—This was demonstrated by the evenness of the apparent daily motions of the heavenly bodies. If the earth were to be displaced from the centre, either east or west, an unevenness would at once be discovered in the length of the forenoon or afternoon. No such irregularity taking place, it was firmly concluded that the earth remained permanently in the centre.

4. That the Earth had a Motion, or Translation.—The same arguments were used in this as in the last proposition. The uniformity of motion being observed from year to year, it was set down as an axiom that the earth was immovably fixed on the centre. While Ptolemy was correct in his theory of the rotundity of the earth, it is not a little singular that he should have refuted the doctrine of the earth's revolving every day upon its own axis. Some of his arguments in refutation of the diurnal revolution of the earth were singular and absurd. For instance, he said if the earth really rotated with the enormous velocity necessary to revolving in twenty-four hours, the air would be left behind. Such an argument as this would with us now have no weight whatever. Had Ptolemy and his contemporaries devoted as much attention to the physics of the earth as they gave to the astronomical studies, they could hardly have failed to become convinced of the earth's daily revolution.

The arrangement of the planets in the Ptolemaic system, giving the earth the central position, was as follows:

The Earth,
The Moon,
Mercury,
Venus,
The Sun,
Mars,
Jupiter,
Saturn.

Outside of Saturn was the sphere for the fixed stars.

Plato differed somewhat from this arrangement in his estimate. He placed Venus and Mercury beyond the sun; the order being Moon, Sun, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn.

To account for the apparent motions, east and west, of the planets, caused by their revolutions around the sun, taken in connection with the earth's orbit around the sun, the ancients devised a curious system, describing the planets as makings loops in their orbits, or a series of circles, or epicycles, as they termed them. It, of course, seems singular to us that they should not, with all the study they gave the subject, have been able to discover that the sun was the centre of our system, and not the earth, and that the apparent irregular motions of the planets to their vision were caused by their revolving around the sun, and that the observation of them was made from the earth, which was also coursing in its orbit around the same grand centre.

To assist in explaining the apparent irregular motions of the planets, Hipparchus and Ptolemy devised a theory that the planets moved in an eccentric circle around the earth, and that while on one side of the earth they were nearer than when on the opposite side of their orbits. They were ingenious in their theory, but it only shows to us now how far they were astray from the real truth.

In determining the motions of the moon, Hipparchus and Ptolemy depended greatly upon their observations of lunar eclipses. The first of these was said to have been observed at Babylon in the first year of the Mardocempad, between the twenty-ninth and thirtieth days of the Egyptian month Thoth. It commenced a little more than an hour after the moon rose, and was total. The date, in our reckoning, was March 19, 720 B.C. Eclipses were closely observed from that time till the days of Ptolemy, who lived nearly nine centuries later. Had the ancient astronomers been more precise in their observations, they would have been of no little advantage to modern astronomers in fixing accurately the mean motion of the moon. As it is, calculations can now be made of the circumstances of an ancient eclipse from modern tables of the sun and moon almost as accurately as the best ancient astronomers could have done it.

Notwithstanding the imperfect character of the observations of Hipparchus and Ptolemy, they made many discoveries of the peculiarities of the motions of the moon which show a surprising depth of research. By comparing the intervals between eclipses they found that her motion was not uniform, but that, like the sun, she moved faster in some parts of her orbit than others. To account for this, they devised the theory of the eccentric orbit, as in the case of the sun and the planets; the earth being one side, a little off the centre of their orbits. A long course of observation, however, showed that the perigee and apogee did not, with the moon, as with the sun and the planets, remain at the same points of its orbit, but moved forward at such a rate as to carry them round the heavens in a term of nine years.

"Ptolemy found, by measuring the apparent angle between the moon and the sun in various points of the orbit of the former, that there was yet another inequality in her motion. This motion has received the name of evection. In consequence of this inequality, the moon oscillates more than a degree on each side of her position, as calculated from the eccentric, in a period not differing much from her revolution round the earth. To represent this motion, Ptolemy had to introduce a small additional epicycle, as in the case of the planets, only the radius was so small that there was no looping of the orbit. In consequence, his theory of the moon's motion was quite complicated; yet he managed to represent this motion, within the limit of the errors of his observations, by a combination of circular motions, and thus saved the favorite theory of the times, that all the celestial motions were circular and uniform."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Counter Movement.

We trust the movement against the repeal of the Comstock law among the enemies of that statute, which seems to be gaining ground, may be relinquished. Let the repeal or modification of the measure be effected, if possible. If it be not possible, it will be time enough then for the formation of societies to apply the laws impartially; but an object of this kind should not thwart a movement for removing the hindrances to a more general dissemination of popular physiological knowledge and Liberal literature. If it be thought that the aiders and abettors of the present statutes have in some instances made themselves amenable to its stringent provisions, it will only be setting back the march of human progress to retain the laws for their punishment. The Liberal minds of the country should be united in the present movement; if it fails, other measures will be in order. Quite likely one year's impartial application of the law will make the public ripe for repeal. All evidence now in hand will keep and will be good for months to come. Nor should any spirit of retaliation actuate the Liberal mind; simply impartial justice should be the watchword of all who would improve the world by example as well as by precept. Retaliatory spirit comes down from the ages of savagery. With an honest desire for the impartial administration of law, however, no one can find fault. This can be carried out with "charity for all and malice toward none."—Foote's Health Monthly.

Another Phase of Comstockism.

Another illustration of the manner in which Anthony Comstock endeavors to further the ends of justice at a salary of $3,000 a year has just been given in a case which should have been presented to the present term of the District Court in Boston. The facts briefly are these: Frank Rivers was complained of before a United States Commissioner in Boston some time early in December, 1877, on a complaint charging him with circulating through the mail a copy of "Fruits of Philosophy," the famous book, which the English Government failed to suppress in England, and for which Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant were arrested. Mr. Rivers gave bail for his appearance at the March term of the District Court, but when the Grand Jury met, the District Attorney failed to present the case on account of the alleged indisposition of the perambulating immaculate Andy. It is supposed that said Andy was not desirous of having the case tried before Judge Lowell, who has a reputation of a fair-minded judge, and does not incline to the extreme views of some judges who favor centralization and believe that the powers at Washington are to control the virtues and vices of State subjects. If it be true that Comstock intended to force the case over Judge Lowell's term, he is certainly guilty of contempt of Court, and it only demonstrates the low trickery of this malicious, salaried crusader on the rights of American subjects. So much for the last phase of the agent of the Society for the Increase of Crime.

Answers to Inquirers.

E. U. M.—When was punctuation first used, and in what language? Ans.—There is reason to believe that some system of punctuation was known to the Greeks in the time of Aristotle, between three and four centuries before the Christian era; and Jerome, in the fourth century, made use of a kind of punctuation. The invention of the modern system of punctuation has been attributed to Aristophanes, a grammarian of Alexandria; but it did not come into general use until after the invention of printing, the celebrated Venetian printer, Manutius, about the fifteenth century, being the first to adopt it systematically.

J.—1. How many eclectic physicians are there in the United States? Ans.—There are no official means of determining accurately, but according to the most reliable estimates there are at least 20,000 physicians belonging to the regular eclectic organizations and working in their doctrinal faith. 2. How do the number of all the various new-school physicians compare with that of the old-school ones? Ans.—Of the 45,000 physicians in the United States, about 16,000 are exclusively old-school, though only about three-fourths of this number are governed completely by the orthodox medical code.

G. W. A.—What is the date of the oldest MS. or MSS. of the New Testament now extant, and what language is it written in? Ans.—There are no manuscripts of any of the New Testament that date farther back than the fourth century. They are written in Greek or Græco-Latin, and these are mere transcripts, and are in all probability merely transcripts of other transcripts. The New Testament manuscripts are divided into six classes, and these comprise the gospels, the Acts, the Catholic epistles, the Pauline epistles, and the Apocalypse. The oldest copies of the Greek Testament are the Codex Sinaiticus and the Codex Vaticanus, held to be of the fourth century. Next in age comes the Alexandrian manuscript and the Codex Ephraemi, both of which are claimed for the fifth century. A large proportion of the older manuscripts are very imperfect, many of them being little more than partial fragments. They are also nearly illegible. As the word of God, it may be truthfully observed that they have not been preserved by supernatural agency.

The Radical Pulpit.

The Dogma of Hell.

A SERMON BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

Had I been told, six months ago, that I should give a discourse on the subject of "hell," I should have received the information with absolute incredulity; incredulity as deep and scornful as the hunter would feel who was told that he should take his rifle and go forth to hunt the iguanodon, ichthyosaurus, or other extinct monster of the pre-adamite epoch of the planet. A thousand years ago, the doctrine was alive and formidable. It stalked abroad, immense in size, terrible in aspect. Now it is rarely seen, and when visible is but the shadow of its former self. It has left the world of philosophy and science, of literature and art, even in the wilderness of theology it is seldom met with. Its spectral image lingers near the tabernacle where the revival preacher endeavors to reproduce a system of religion that was natural in a departed era, but is unnatural in the present age; but there too it is altered, sadly changed from its former state, a mere simulacrum, a ghost, which the people are allowed to look at, as forms are seen behind gauze curtains, or as "materialized" spirits are produced under "mediumistic" conditions.

All at once, this spectre becomes alive, is seen in the midst of us, terrifies women and children in the public places. We were mistaken in supposing the monster belonged to the Silurian epoch; or to speak more exactly, we were mistaken in thinking that the Silurian epoch was sunk beneath so many layers of rock. The Silurian epoch persists. In central New York, last summer, excellent persons were found who professed to believe in the lake of fire, and were surprised that any should be so audacious as to doubt it. In New England an ecclesiastical council demurred to the ordination of a minister, on the ground that he held unorthodox opinions on this point. In New York, an eminent divine and doctor of divinity, rector of a wealthy and fashionable church, expressed contempt for the opinion of Canon Farrar that no doctrine of everlasting suffering was taught in the Scripture. The doctrine is evidently not extinct. The majority of Congregational clergymen still maintain it, some in a qualified, others in an unqualified form.

How can such a surprising phenomenon as this be explained? We are forced to recognize the fact that the tenet in question has, at present, no substantial reason for being; that people who do not wish to believe it need not, may discard it, or let it alone. Those who cling to it, do so of their own free will, because they choose to, not because authority compels them, or evidence persuades. The disbelievers are in the ascendant. The doubter is in excellent company. He has the intelligence of centuries on his side.

In theology men of the highest eminence have repudiated the idea as inconsistent with the conception of a supreme justice. Origen in the third century declared it incredible, cleared the Scriptures of it by resolving its language into allegory, and acquitted Deity of responsibility for it, by maintaining the evanescence of evil itself and teaching that Satan would at last be reclaimed. In the ninth century Scotus Erigena, one of the master minds of the Church, a man of genius, an acute and enterprising intellect, the prince of the scholastic philosophy, advocated the same views with Origen, and defended them with unsurpassed vigor and subtlety of reasoning. Others, of less distinction might, if they would, take courage from these, especially in an age when no courage is needed, as it was in theirs. At present the courage is demanded of those who maintain the doctrine, not of those who reject it. The modern theologian is unwilling to commit himself to an opinion that has against it the suffrage of modern intelligence.

Philosophy suggested to theology its doubt. The office of philosophy is to present the unity of the world, to describe the universe as a whole, consistent and harmonious in all its parts; and in its attempt to do this, it inevitably suggested misgivings in regard to a doctrine so fatal to an intelligent order of the world as this. In the last century, Joseph Butler, "the most patient, original, and candid of philosophic theologians," made a desperate stand for the belief in future punishment; and defended, or rather apologized for it, by arguing its complete accordance with the system of nature, whose divine author inflicted unspeakable agonies on beings to all appearances innocent. Such reasoning may well be called desperate. That is indeed a hopeless cause that can be maintained only at the risk of Atheism itself. To argue that God might be expected to punish people everlastingly in the future because, horribly and causelessly, he torments them in the present, may and does provoke men to ask whether it would not be better to deny the existence of God entirely, or to give the name Devil to the being who governs the world. Had Bishop Butler deliberately gone to work to prove that the world was under the dominion of Satan, he could not have argued more successfully. The only criticism one feels disposed to make on such an argument is that it lacks subtlety. is not cunning enough to persuade. It is barefaced. Origen and Scotus had no such audacity. They appealed to the conception of a Supreme Being against what seemed to them a horrible imputation upon him. They attempted to relieve him from the guilt of inflicting future agonies on innocent souls. It never occurred to either of them to defend the atrocity of hell by bring up the equally appalling atrocity of earth. It never occurred to them to give people their choice between Atheism and diabolism.

The method of Butler has been repudiated by the more rational philosophy of a later day. There are now three alternatives presented to the philosophical mind. It may either accept the ancient theory of Dualism, which allots the universe to two opposing powers, one good and one evil—the evil power holding sway over the realm of anguish, whether temporal or eternal—on which supposition, pain, death, hell, are transferred from the dominion of Deity to the domain of Satan; or, maintaining the theory of monism, which acknowledges but a single intelligent ruler of the universe, it may deny the existence of one spirit or the other, declaring for optimism with Leibnitz, and with him sustaining the opinion that good is the substantial principle, and evil the appearance, the apparition, the evanescent shadow, or for pessimism with Schopenhauer, who contended that evil was the substantial principle and that good is the illusive semblance. Or again, as a third alternative, declining to answer dogmatically the question of the world's original authorship and essential control, it may hold to some form of the development theory, which describes the universe as unfolding gradually from organic germs, and as moving onward with or without the guidance of an intelligent being. Either of these suppositions variously tempered and modified, the philosopher of our day may accept; but the supposition of an everlasting hell for human beings is not admissible. That idea the philosophic mind discards, and they who seek the companionship of such minds must abandon it.

Of the belief in "hell," science knows nothing. As knowledge extends, the dominion of pure evil shrinks. Satan retreats from one department of nature after another, and leaves the high-ways and by-ways of creation free to the passage of serene, inexorable, and regenerating law. Science discards the conception of the devil and the dogma of perdition. The scientific men who entertain these forms of opinion do so, not as men of science, but as members of the Church, whose doctrines they do not presume to call in question.

The doctrine of future punishment as held by the creeds of Christendom has always been rejected with abhorrence by the natural conscience of men, as fundamentally inconsistent with rational notions of justice. That men, even the worst men, could, in their short life-time, commit offenses deserving everlasting punishment, the agonies of hell fire, for an eternity, or even for a hundred years, nay, for a single year, for a single day, is an idea that shocks every sentiment of equity. That the Being who is supremely, ideally, absolutely just, can inflict penalties for misdoings such as no human being would lay on another, such as the most infernal cruelty never—even when maddened to insanity—devised, is a suggestion at which the natural conscience stands, always did stand, and always must stand aghast. They who believed it when they could not help themselves, when Church authority cowed their will and silenced their protest, made this moral reservation. The voice of conscience was hushed. The moral sense was forbidden to assert itself.

That the human heart resents, repels with detestation, the belief in future punishment, need not be said. Of course it does. Of course it always did. What pagan, what creature above the savage, ever cordially entertained the belief that one whom he loved was howling in hell for deeds done in the body, for sentiments entertained, or for dispositions illustrated on earth? It is easy enough to profess doctrines in which one has no interest, with which one associates no feeling; but when feeling becomes enlisted, as sooner or later it becomes, in a doctrine like this, the reaction against it is instantaneous and violent. There was a time when the heart dared not express its feeling. That time is past; now heartlessness is condemned. The voice of the heart is loud and imperative; it requires courage to resist it.

There remains the word of Scripture. Does this compel those who accept its authority to receive the doctrine of future punishment against the protest of the heart, the remonstrance of the conscience, the reasoning of philosophy, the theologian's demur? This is a question which lack of space forbids my answering in full or arguing at length. To me, with whom the word of Scripture has no more authority than reason concedes to it, the discussion is without interest. At present, it satisfies my purpose to say that, in my honest and sober judgment, the language of Scripture does not warrant the Christian doctrine. If it did, my opinion of the doctrine would be what it is. But, honestly, I think that it does not. At least, the essential thought, the true meaning, of Scripture does not. More than this I am not prepared to allow. The Universalists have not, in my judgment, fairly made out their case from the Bible. From the Old Testament they can easily, for to the Hebrew mind the doctrine is repugnant. But the New Testament contains expressions that have never been purged from the taint of the hideous thought. Language is put into the mouth of Jesus that conveys to the imagination the most horrible forebodings of doom. "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." It is hard for the grammarian to get over that.

Universalism has, however, done this much: it has cast a grave doubt on the supposed teachings of Scripture in this matter. It has made it possible to doubt whether the Bible is chargeable with the belief in question. It has even made it easy for people who believe in the inspired authority of Scripture, and who are distressed because it teaches this disheartening dogma, to retain their faith in the Bible, and, at the same time, to indulge the sentiments which are native to their hearts. This is much. Is it not as much as is demanded? Is it not, practically, everything? None need entertain the dogma on the authority of the Bible who do not choose to. The doubter has a valid excuse.

How, then, to return to my original question—how, then, can the revival of this monstrous doctrine be explained? Since there are good reasons for discarding it; since the reasons that once supported it are weakened, if not wholly disposed of; since to reject it is to be in the company of the best in repute; since even Scripture permits merciful interpretations—why is not the doctrine suffered to go unrestrained to its final account? The reply to the inquiry is close at hand.

The doctrine is necessary to the integrity of the Christian scheme; so necessary that its rejection would bring the whole structure down. The Christian scheme is a complete, logical system, compactly fitted together. Its parts all cohere. The dislodgment of one point endangers the security of the structure. To deny the Trinity is to deny the deity of the Christ. To deny the deity of the Christ is to deny the sufficiency of his atonement. To deny the atonement is to deny the desperate need of man. To deny this is to deny human depravity, is to deny the necessity of grace, is to vacate the offices of the Church, and reduce to nothing the significance of Christendom. The dogma of future punishment is essential to all the rest. It follows logically from the dogmas of depravity and redemption. There must be a doom in reserve for the unconverted. There must be a place for the unregenerate. They are by nature depraved, heirs of death, children of wrath; and their place must be the lowest and saddest conceivable. Their doom might be simply death, utter death, annihilation. But this doom would be negative, rather than positive. Death might be welcome. Annihilation might be a boon. There must be something more appalling to the vulgar imagination than that. With the idea of death must be coupled the idea of agony. Hence, as life meant felicity, death meant anguish. Hell was offset against heaven. The two were required to complete the series of conceptions which constituted the "plan of redemption." The destruction of hell would deprive the system of its motive power. The good woman of Alexandria who went about with her bucket of water in one hand and her torch in the other—the water to extinguish hell, the torch to burn up heaven—was set down as a maniac. Had she succeeded, Christianity would have seen its last day. For the fires of perdition were as indispensable to the religion as was the divine love she wished to exalt.

Thus the tenacity of Christians to their dogma is accounted for. They may keep it in the background; they may conceal it beneath figures of speech; they may say little or nothing about it; they may even permit their neighbors to forget it. The revivalist preacher may speak of it with extreme reserve and reluctance, urging the persuasions of love instead of the former exasperations of fear. Still, the doctrine is there, in its place; and when touched by the hand of criticism, it displays its vitality. They avow it who dare not disavow. They assent who dare not deny. Did the tenet stand by itself, alone, apart from the general scheme, there can scarcely be a doubt of its all but universal rejection. As it is, it is retained as a corner-stone which the builders see no way to reject.

[CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

PEARL-FISHING A LOTTERY.—Pearl-fishing is at the best only a gigantic lottery, the prizes in which bear a very small proportion to the blanks. But in this as in many other uncertain pursuits, hope always tells a flattering tale, and keeps awake the energies of thousands of interested operators. First, there are the divers, who perform the actual operations of fishing for pearls. Arrayed in nature's garb, and provided with a knife and a small bag of netting in which to collect the gathered oysters, and with a rope tied round their waists and a heavy stone attached to their feet, they are let down into the water, taking, first, a deep breath, and remaining there till forced to rise again. Expert divers will remain beneath the water for 60, 90, or even 180 seconds. This period they occupy in detaching the mussels from the rocks, a matter frequently of much difficulty. Those of very small size they do not attempt to gather, for the larger the shells the more chance of their containing a pearl. The native divers are able to guess at the age of the oyster by the resistance it offers; the older the oyster the more easily it is detached, and the greater the chance of its producing a large pearl.—Chambers' Journal.

Communications.

Paine was Junius.—Concluded.

In a letter to Woodfall dated April 12, 1769, (Misc. No. 54) which was evidently private and not intended for publication, Junius says, "And you, I think, sir, may be satisfied that my rank and fortune place me above a common bribe." This was a cunning artifice of the humble exciseman to keep up his character and avoid detection. Ten months later, in view of Woodfall's prosecution, Junius writes, saying, "Some way or other you shall be reimbursed." He knew what eclat a prosecution would give to his writings. After the trial he wrote a dedication and preface for the work. Woodfall offered to divide profits, but Junius declined, saying, "I am far above all pecuniary views;" and in the preface he assigns all his right and interest in the work to Woodfall. Thus did the lowly exciseman fulfill his promise to reimburse the publisher.

Paine's views of monarchy are alleged to have been inconsistent with those of Junius. Not so at the time when Junius wrote. But in the very next year, 1773, Paine's views began to undergo a change from hearing the remark that "Frederick of Prussia was the best fellow in the world for a king, because he had so much of the devil in him." Junius, in his famous "Letter to the King," made an indirect attack on royalty for which the publisher was indicted, tried, and convicted. It was more than a year after Paine's arrival in America before he ventured to assail hereditary succession, and even then "his invectives against monarchy" says his biographer Cheetham, "were intended against the monarchy of England, rather than against monarchy in general."

Most readers of Junius have been misled by the so-called "miscellaneous letters," first collected and published by Woodfall's son in 1812. It is upon these that the claim of Sir Philip Francis was first set up, and but few of those letters are genuine. Of the sixty-three private letters from Junius to Woodfall first published in that collection, fifty-nine or sixty are dated conjecturally by the editor, and many of the miscellaneous letters rest their sole claim on a coincidence between the dates of publication and the dates affixed to one or other of the private letters to H. S. Woodfall (London Athenæum, 1852). It is safe only to trust the authenticated "Letters of Junius," which, including a few written to him, number in all sixty-eight. The whole of his genuine and avowed "Letters" make only about three hundred pages—a very small amount of work for three years.

None were written by Junius after January 21, 1772. Yet in Woodfall's edition of 1812, there appear of a later date, five letters signed "Veteran," one "Scotus," one "Arthur Tell Truth," and one "Nemesis." They never were claimed to be written by Junius, till Woodfall's son republished them in 1812. Nevertheless, it seems as if the father was deceived by a private counterfeit letter, and supposed that "Veteran" was Junius come again. I suspect that Phillip Francis was "Veteran," "Scotus," and "Nemesis." Francis was a friend of Woodfall; they were schoolmates. Francis was second clerk to Lord Barrington, minister of war, and "he possessed so perfect a command of his pen, that he could write every kind of hand" ("Junius Identified," p. 278). It was easy for him to see Junius' handwriting in the office of his friend Woodfall. He hated his master, Barrington, and like many others, wanted to find out who Junius was. So, counterfeiting Junius' handwriting and style, he prepares a series of letters attacking Barrington, but in a private note to Woodfall, accompanying the first, he says, "Be careful not to have it known to come from me. Such an insignificant creature is not worth the generous rage of Junius. I am impatient for the book." Francis knew from a perusal of Junius' private letters, that he was waiting for some bound copies of the book. No wonder Woodfall was deceived by the clever trick. "Veteran" promised sixteen letters "ready for the press." Four of them appeared between January 28 and March 10, 1772; but instead of the fifth of the series, "Veteran" writes a short one, March 23d, announcing in the very first sentence that Lord Barrington has expelled Mr. Francis from the war office. No more letters by "Veteran" appear. Lord Barrington had probably suspected his assailant "Veteran" to be his second clerk, but nobody ever dreamed that the clerk was Junius till forty years after, when these spurious letters were republished by Woodfall's son, and attributed to Junius.

But "Veteran" had probably a double object; he hoped to catch Junius at the coffee-house where the latter received his parcels. In a private letter dated March 3d, Junius writes to Woodfall: "Your letter was twice refused last night, and the waiter as often attempted to see the person who sent for it." Junius then requested the books to be sent to another coffee-house, and two days later acknowledged the receipt of them.

Francis was probably lying in wait at the first coffee-house to catch the messenger who called for Junius' packages. But Junius was his own messenger, and being clad in homely garb, no one suspected him. Poor Francis; instead of bagging his game, he got kicked out of office. Then, abandoning the signature of "Veteran," he renewed the attack on Lord Barrington, over the signature of "Scotus" and "Nemesis."

Junius is heard of no more, and yet he promised to come again. I affirm that he fulfilled that promise four years later when he published his "Common Sense;" again when he returned to England, and published in 1787 his "Prospects on the Rubicon;" and again in 1791–2, when he published his "Rights of Man."

In his "Prospects on the Rubicon," he makes his only allusion to Junius in this remarkable passage:

"The present reign, by embracing the Scotch, has tranquillized and conciliated the spirit that disturbed the two former reigns. Accusations were not wanting at that time to reprobate the policy as tinctured with ingratitude towards those who were the immediate means of the Hanover succession. The brilliant pen of Junius was drawn forth, but in vain. It enraptured without convincing, and though in the plenitude of its rage, it might be said to give elegance to bitterness, yet the policy survived the blast."

In this reference to Junius we have the style of that author to perfection—the tone, the measure, the cadence, the figure. Paine had acquired the highest reputation as a writer in America. He had finished his work there, and was calmly waiting for some new task in the "business of a world." The thought may have occurred to him, What, if in my next great undertaking, which will be in England, the critics should suspect that I was Junius? Lest they should do so, I will make such reference to that writer as to mislead them. So, for once, Paine praised his own work, though nobody knew it. But now, after the lapse of nearly a hundred years, the very attempt to mislead helps to disclose the secret of which he said he was the "sole depository," and it should "perish with him." Not only is the style that of Junius, but coincidences of expression and sentiment strengthen the evidence of identity. Junius, with his own pen, speaks of "the generous rage of Junius." Paine in referring to the same pen speaks of "the plenitude of its rage."

Again, one of Junius' most remarkable characteristics was hatred of the Scotch, and of the policy of conciliating those treacherous adherents to the house of Stuart. In the above quotation, Paine betrays a like aversion, only softened by time and experience. And in the Declaration of Independence, which has been demonstrated to be the work of Paine, and never claimed by Jefferson to be his own until he reached the age of eighty-one, and Paine had been dead a dozen years, an obnoxious passage about the employment of "Scotch and foreign mercenaries," was stricken out. None but a Scotch-hating Englishman could have indited that passage in the Declaration.

There are more than three hundred parallels of character, conduct, opinion, style, sentiment, and language between Paine and Junius. One of the most remarkable is the fact that they both absolutely refused to receive the certain profits of their works. Find another like parallel, if you can, in all time. Paine alone, of the forty or more writers on whose behalf the authorship of those letters has been claimed, answers to all the characteristics, and redeems all the pledges of Junius. W. H. B.

Remarkable Conversion.

In Nashville, Tenn., the Rev. Dr. Dingbat was walking, last Tuesday, down towards the sulphur springs, when he heard a man blaspheming in such horrid style as was never before heard in Tennessee or Kentucky, except in some parts of Lincoln county. The man was also cruelly beating an innocent dog which he had tied up in a corner of his garden; and the yells of this quadruped made all the people sick in that part of the town.

As is recorded in the first line of this narrative, the Rev. Dingbat was perambulating, or, rather, so to speak, meandering, down towards this man's house. He got a barrel, set it up against the man's garden fence—which was twelve feet high—looked over into the garden, and proclaimed to him, in his miserable gospel tones, and quoted at him, or to him, what Dingbat thought was Scripture—and I suppose it was—thus: "You son of man, you beggar, quit pounding that dog so with that broom-handle! I tell you that after death comes the judgment, and after the judgment your soul will be required to inhabit the body of that dog forever, and forever, and ever, and amen—so help me Melchisedeck!"

The man was terrified at this inspired proclamation, and, being filled with disgust at the prospect of his awful doom, he was barely able to say, "Help me, a sinner!" He made his escape by crawling through a hole under the fence. Mistaking the street that runs down to the wire bridge, he ran down the street next to it, fell down the river bank, and was drowned in the river. He drowned so quick that his terror had not time to evaporate, and so he was saved.

The Methodists declare that the man was saved, because: 1. The preacher believed that he was quoting Scripture correctly; 2. The dog-pelter believed that the Scripture applied to him was genuine—A No. 1, as the insurance men say; 3. The man was, providentially, drowned so quick that he had no time to detect Scriptural errors, and, therefore, the conversion was genuine; the only weak spot in the programme being that he had no time or space allowed him to make Dingbat a donation of five or ten dollars.

The Presbyterian Presbytery Synod, located in one end of the town, after four days' prayer, asking for light on the subject, received light to this effect: 1. Dingbat was not regularly ordained by the Presbyterians; 2. That, in vituperating the dog-pelter, he committed two grammatical errors and omitted all punctuation, whereby the true meaning was rendered ambiguous to the understanding of the dog and of the man; 3. That the dog-pelter was pelted with Scripture that was concentrated, diluted, and contaminated with error; that, therefore, Mr. Dog-pelter died in error, as the heathen die, and as those died who put their trust in any of the twenty early editions of the Bible printed in England—which have since been repealed—each one of which contained many errors; or as the illiterate one died who, in his dying moment, was regaled with a chapter from Mark Twain, read by an illiterate but pious ignoramus who supposed that he was reading from the Good Book, he being deceived by the similarity of some of the engravings. ROYAL.

First Cause.

D. M. BENNETT: You, with all the lucid thinkers, perceive that the assumption of an eternally self-existent God explains no mysteries connected with the universe. Admit that it needs a supernatural cause to account for its origin and sublime movements, by parity of reasoning that cause must be accounted for. Deny this and affirm that the cause is self-existent and eternal, and it will follow that so may be the universe in its mutations. True, theologians argue that God is immutable, and may therefore be uncaused, while the changes of matter imply a necessity for its origin and government. Even this assumption is lame, since the essential properties of matter are no less immutable than any God can be. At the same time it is evident that the God of the Bible changes. To say nothing of the scores of passages to this effect, a little girl once proved it. She was taught by a learned Christian, for the first time, that there was a God, whose infinite and unchangeable benevolence had from pure love to make other beings happy, made her —by first making Adam and Eve—with all living animals. Being also told in answer to her query that all this was done about six thousand years ago, she again asked how long God had lived before this wonderful creation. Her teacher said forever! "Then," said she, "he was alone in eternity selfishly doing nothing, and how, without changing his nature, could he get the notion in time and for the first time of doing good, by making Adam and his animals?" The D.D. said, it was naughty thus to question the mysteries of God. But still, as good old Galileo, when forced to recant, said, "the earth moves;" so did the brains of the little girl still move in despite of her would-be tyrannical and, may I not add, stupid master. When chased down, the poor ostrich may be excused for thrusting its head in the sand, while for thinkers and pretended reasoners thus to act, betrays disgusting imbecility and cowardice. Hence it is clear that the assumption of a God, to account for the world, is no better than the untutored heathen who, rejecting the science that our earth needed nothing to stand on, placed his world upon a tremendous elephant, and that upon a huge terrapin, and when asked on what the terrapin stood, said he did not know.

Your assertions, Mr. Bennett, that matter in some form has always been, is far more in accordance with what we know than that any self-existent being spoke it from nothing into existence. Indeed, such a notion is simply absurd. Your theory also accords with the nebulous theory, rapidly making its way into the grand science of astronomy. Nor can there be any difficulty in this theory accounting for all inorganic phenomena. Geologists get along with these as Darwin does in his animal developing philosophy. But how are we to account for the origin of organic life? If vegetables cannot now start without a parental seed, how could they ages ago? Still more puzzling does the query become when applied to animal life. Could any animal, with its splendid physiology—I mean all its grand and nicely adapted organs—come from dead inorganic matter? Say that our highest animals started from the lowest type, and yet have we evidence that such could have sprung from inorganic matter? If so, is not the process going on even now?

Prof. Tyndall has, from the most painstaking experiments, ascertained the impracticability, not to say impossibility, of spontaneous generation. Now, the query in my mind is, whether we, as careful, honest truth seekers, are to say we are as yet without knowledge or even probabilities as to the origin of organic life, or to say we have attained to some facts relieving the mystery.

South Union, Ky. W. PERKINS.

GENERALIZERS AND SPECIALIZERS.—Minds of the first rank are generalizers; of the second, specializers. Below them are the crowd—some better, some worse; some duller, some brighter. Generalizers in chief recognize inferior generalizers, but are apt to snub them; while they welcome every specializer, because he brings grist to their mill.—Fraser's Magazine.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of Reading Matter than any other Journal of its class.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1878.

Was Jesus the Best and Purest Man that ever Lived?

CORNELL UNIVERSITY, ITHACA, N. Y., March 25, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Has any history ever given us the account of any person who lived a better life, taught better precepts, and died a nobler death than the person called Jesus Christ? You will oblige me greatly by giving me some light on the subject. Yours very truly,

F. S. RYMAN.

When so little is known of the life and private conduct of persons who lived from two to three thousand years ago, it is extremely difficult to decide positively which one of all the men the world has produced lived the best life, taught the best precepts, or died the noblest death. Ancient history is so blended with fable, and it is otherwise so imperfect in detail and character, that the fullest reliance cannot be placed upon it. We know comparatively little about any of the sages, teachers, and reformers of ancient times, and Jesus is no exception to the rule. There is so little absolute knowledge in reference to him that it is by no means certain that such a person ever had a real existence. All we are able to learn of him is told us in the four short books ascribed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, but which we are now morally certain were never written by those personages, and were not known to be in existence, till nearly two centuries after the time Jesus is said to have lived. No contemporaneous historian of any nation mentions Jesus, or the events connected with his story. The short mention made of him in Josephus is proved to the satisfaction of honest inquirers to be an interpolation by one of the early Christian Fathers, probably Eusebius.

In the four sketches alluded to, a very small part of the life of Jesus is given—some claim six months, some eighteen months, and others two years. Many precepts and inculcations attributed to him are given, with how much accuracy, there is great room for doubt. We have no account that he ever wrote a word himself that has been transmitted to those now living, and what was written about him was not written till a long time after his death.

There is quite as much proof that Zoroaster was a real personage as Jesus, and that he lived in Persia from twenty-five hundred to three thousand years ago; that he was a man of irreproachable character; that he taught the best of morals, and inculcated the highest worship then known in the world. Many of his reputed sayings have been transmitted to us, and they bear comparison well with what is attributed to Jesus. In character and achievements he was doubtless as much superior to the Judean reformer as his career was longer and more glorious.

There is little doubt that near twenty-five centuries ago there lived in southern Asia a man called Gautama, Sakyia Muni, and also Buddha. From all the accounts we get of him he led a blameless life, taught the purest morals, denied himself of worldly comforts, and spent his time in meditation, prayer, and in teaching his disciples. His ministry was not confined to six months nor two years, but to a long lifetime. In early life he forsook a home of affluence and powerful friends, and adopted a life of penury and deprivation. He led a life of self-denial and self-abegnation. He lived to old age and met death calmly and peacefully. His teachings were of the purest and most exalted character, and far more of them have been handed down to posterity than of the teachings of Jesus. He was a man of peace, and his followers—at least three times as numerous as the followers of Jesus—have been peaceful people, living on terms of amity and good will, while Christian nations were engaged in the most bloody and devastating wars. So far as length of public services, earnestnesss of purpose, calmness at the hour of death, the purity of his doctrines, the numbers of his followers, and their peace-loving character, Buddha ranks far ahead of Jesus.

In the Chinese empire, some five hundred years before the time of Jesus, lived a most wise and amiable man named Koong-fu-tse or Confucius. He did not pretend to work miracles, nor to have visions of the heavenly world above the clouds, but he was a most upright man and a great benefactor to his race. He taught most excellent doctrines, and inculcated precepts that have never been surpassed by any who have succeeded him. True, his moral lessons and injunctions were of a practical character and were adapted to this life rather than to that which it is thought will succeed this. His instructions were of use in the present, and were not directed solely to the future, of which no man has knowledge. He taught justice, mercy, forgiveness, friendship, kindness, and all the commendable virtues. It was he who taught that excellent lesson called the "Golden Rule:" "Do unto others what you would have them do unto you; and do not unto others what you would not have them do unto you," and this five hundred years before the dawn of the Christian era.

There were many of the old sages who lived in the world before Jesus who taught most excellent morals, and whose lives were glorious examples for their fellow men to pattern after. Among them may be named Thales, Solon, Bias, Pythagoras, Plato, Socrates, Aristotle, Zeno, Epicurus, Hillel, Philo-Judæus, Cicero, and last but not least, Apollonius of Tyana. It is, perhaps, not to be claimed that all of these characters were superior to Jesus in ability and practical example and instruction, but that many of them were, cannot be successfully denied. Many of them went deeper into the source of true and practical knowledge than did the Judean reformer, who, after all, failed to display any remarkable ability while living, or striking bravery in the hour of death. According to one of his biographers his fear and mental agony upon being arrested were most intense, to the extent that he even sweat blood. And when upon the cross and the grim monster faced him, he seemed to be overwhelmed with fear, and cried out in agony to his father, and piteously asked him why he had been thus forsaken. Many of the old pagan heroes, after the style of Socrates, died heroically and bravely, never exhibiting a scintilla of fear or cowardice.

Had almost any of the noted heathen teachers we have named, and a long list of others, been taken up and transformed into a demi-god, we should easily have seen the most astonishing quality of virtue and purity sparkling and scintillating all through their lives. We never could, as devout admirers, have said enough in their praise.

There have doubtless lived in the world since the time of Jesus, many men who would rank most creditably with him in manhood, usefulness, and excellence of character, could they for a moment all stand upon fair and equal footing. It must be remembered Jesus has largely the advantage over his compeers in the world. He has been lionized, deified, extolled, praised and worshipped as never was man praised and worshiped before, while other men have been allowed to win their good name by their own exertions without the help of flattery and distinction. This makes an immense difference in the reputation which a person may be found to be in possession of.

Of those great and pure teachers who have lived since the time of Jesus, may be named Epictetus, Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius, Averroes, Roger Bacon, Bruno, Vanini, Spinoza, and many others in still later times. Many of these were men of greater mental calibre than Jesus, and a portion of them taught morals equally good. In point of talent, energy, and devotion to a principle, Mohammed was certainly the equal of Jesus, and he also taught very good morals. That in the after part of his life he became over-ambitious, bloodthirsty, and cruel, shows the effect unlimited power has upon certain organizations. He was truly one of the few great men whom the world has produced.

If Jesus was a real character, and the imperfect account we have of him is taken as a true one, he was doubtless an amiable, well-disposed, inoffensive sort of person; but that he possessed any remarkable mental power, that he inherited or acquired any special scientific knowledge, there is no proof. In mental calibre and force he has doubtless been surpassed by thousands of individuals. In the purity of moral teachings there have unquestionably been many who have equaled him.

Comstock's Latest Victims.

Louis Wengenrath has for several years kept a confectionery in the eastern part of Brooklyn, and is regarded as an honorable man, and entitled to the respect of all who know him. His connections are good, and he moves in good society. Joseph Britton, the accomplice and tool of Anthony Comstock, has for a long time been in the habit of calling upon the confectioner, and making slight purchases in his line. A few weeks ago this unprincipled Britton said to the confectioner that their mutual political friends, Gale and Ely, wished, for a certain purpose, to get some fancy devices made in sugar, and Wengenrath was requested to furnish them. The reply was he had nothing of the kind on hand, and never had sold anything in that line. Britton importuned him from time to time to procure the fancy goods for him. At length as the names of his political friends had been given, the simple-hearted man bought the articles Britton was so anxious to procure, and handed him the same at one of his visits. He would not have taken the trouble to have procured the goods had not the names of Gale, etc, who were particular friends of the confectioner been used. The result was Wengenrath was soon arrested for violating what are known as the Comstock laws. He has recently been tried in Brooklyn, and though the accused proved an excellent character, and his friends did all they could for him, the laws are so severe that Judge Moore could not do less than impose the lowest prescribed penalty—three months' imprisonment and $150 fine.

Here is another instance of the despicable means which are employed by that man Comstock and his pliant tool to decoy and induce a good-hearted, unsuspecting person to commit an offense against a vile law he knows nothing about, and then to cause his arrest, trial, and imprisonment for an act he would never have thought of doing had he not been overpersuaded and urged to it by the most villainous intrigue and deception. This game has been played upon many well-disposed people, and the question arises in the mind of every lover of justice who becomes acquainted with the facts: How long shall this villainy be allowed to continue? Shall a man who has procured the enactment of unconstitutional and cruel laws, both in Albany and Washington, be allowed to lay his plans to inveigle unsuspecting persons to commit an offense against his laws, and then to prosecute him to the bitter end, to send him to prison for a term of years, and to disgrace him for life. This is the kind of business being done by the Society for the Suppression of Vice, which claims to be moral par excellence. This is the work being done by Anthony Comstock and his unprincipled accomplice; and every honest man will say they are far more deserving of prison and fines than the simple dupes they decoy to commit offenses. Even the president and members of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, who employ Comstock to do their dirty, contemptible work, are themselves as worthy of punishment as the persons who commit offenses which they never would have thought of committing had not the special agent of the society persuaded them to do so.

We understand these things have been brought to the knowledge of the Governor, and that he is to send a trusty agent down to inquire into the Comstock style of doing business. We hope he will receive the truth pertaining to the business, and learn the real character and true inwardness of the designing, inveigling, decoying Comstock and Britton.

Since the above was put in type, another of Comstock's victims, Madame Restell, or rather Mrs. Ann Lohman, has ended that man's prosecutions and persecutions against her by taking her life by cutting her throat in a bath-tub in her own house, on the night of March 31st, or early on the morning of April 1st. Perhaps few things are more calculated to make persons meditate suicide, or to drive them to it more irresistibly, than the persistent and malicious machinations and prosecutions of this accepted agent of "The Society for the Suppression of Vice."

It is probable that this woman performed acts that could not be justified according to the higher principles of morals, but she was not responsible for the conditions of society which makes necessary such offices as she administered. She certainly had a good side, and possibly did more good than harm in the world. It was the rich and aristocratic, the members of our fashionable churches and highest society, who patronized her establishment, and many unhappy young ladies did she save from shame and suicide who afterwards became honorable wives and brilliant members of society, and many a family did she keep from disgrace and degradation. The advice which she gave to the young ladies who visited her was often of the most friendly and sensible character. Not wishing to defend any of the acts of Madame Restell, we nevertheless would say that as bad as the woman was, she certainly was no worse than the hundreds who appealed to her to save them from the impending shame and disgrace that overwhelmed them. She was not all bad. She was a sort of necessary evil which our civilization and our system of morality has almost made a necessity.

Her avocation had been remunerative. She was known to have accumulated great wealth. This Comstock knew, and it cannot be wondered at that he longed to handle some of her thousands. His society had singularly failed to subscribe money freely for his use as in past years; in fact, the treasury of his society was far from being in a plethoric condition. He wished that the Madame's U. S. bonds and her unemployed gold might be appropriated to the noble work of deception, intrigue, and subterfuge in which he is engaged. The State laws give the informer half the amount of fines imposed. Here was an incentive. He hoped the fines against his victim might at least reach the sum of $20,000. Half that sum would be a convenient addition to make to his scanty bank account. He laid his plans. He visited the Madame, requesting her services for an unfortunate female who was in trouble. He visited her twice. He gave her a twenty dollar treasury note, for which she gave him some medicines, which, she claimed, were perfectly innocent.

Comstock and his society may feel very proud of the results they have accomplished in the Restell case, and he can number her with his other victims whom, by his relentless persecutions, he has driven out of the world. He is already justifying himself in the city papers, and claims to divide the honor of driving this unhappy woman to her death with his pastor, the Rev. Dr. Buddington, and the Rev. Dr. Tyng, both very pious gentlemen of the highest respectability and propriety. To this extent has Anthony been defeated by the rash act of the Madame: he has been deprived of the pleasure of sending her to a prison cell, and he has not been permitted to transfer to his own pocket the thousands which she had accumulated.

But despite all that can be said in favor of Comstock and his backers, his avocation and the means by which he decoys his victims into his talons are in the highest degree contemptible and unmanly, and more and more are the right-thinking people of the community coming to take this view of his work and the society which employs him.

The Sun of the 2nd inst. has this sensible article upon the subject.

DOING EVIL THAT GOOD MAY COME.—No matter what the wretched woman was who took her life with her own hand yesterday, her death has not freed the world from the last of detestable characters. Whatever she was she had her rights, and the man who cunningly led her into the commission of a misdemeanor acted an unmanly and ignoble part.

The motive avowed by Mr. Comstock, according to the reports at the time, to wit, the vindication of his own character as a public prosecutor, afforded a poor apology for the meanness to which he stooped. He had been taunted, he said, with not daring to arrest her. So he deceived and wheedled her into a crime.

Every one has rights. Even Anthony Comstock has his; but there is a healthier sentiment afloat to-day than usual, condemning the policy of doing evil that good may come, which he has seemed to be pursuing.

Tell Us How it Is.

MEMPHIS, TENN., March 26, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 16th, describing a seance at Mrs. Lord's, conveys the impression that you have become a Spiritualist, and that you have implicit confidence in manifestations of mediums though performed in the dark. Now, several of your readers here, including myself, are surprised at your new departure, having thought you to be a staunch Materialist, a la Ingersoll, Underwood, Mrs. Slenker, and others; and would beg of you to kindly express, in your next issue, whether you are a Spiritualist, and believe in rappings, guitar-playing, knot-untying, and dark cabinet performances generally. Please to comply with our request and define your position. Liberally yours,

LOUIS LANGE.

REPLY.—We will try and be as direct in our answer as our friend is in his inquiries.

1. We are a Materialist in the strictest sense of the term, and believe what is not matter is not anything. We have higher reverence for matter than anything else, because we think there is nothing else. The universe is made up of matter and its inherent forces, and our reverence for the universe is great indeed. We see many gradations of matter—the strata of clay and gravel, the granite rock, a lump of ore, a piece of wood, a measure of water, the atmosphere, hydrogen gas, imponderable ether; and we can conceive of the possibility of as many grades above the ether as there are below it.

2. We have made no "new departure" in this direction. The views we hold now as to life beyond death we have held, essentially for more than a third of a century. At times we have had our doubts and we have them still. But we have not been sailing under false colors. We have repeatedly, since we commenced the publication of this paper, frankly avowed the hope we cherished that this life is not all there is of us.

3. We have on numerous occasions received proofs which to us were satisfactory that there are intelligences not dependent on visible organizations. Those proofs might not have been sufficient for our questioner, but they sufficed for us. We shall not require him to arrive at the same conclusions we do, and presume he will be equally tolerant towards us. Intolerance illy becomes a Liberal, and it is always unpleasant to see it cropping out. It is less objectionable for a man to believe in spirit life than to be bigoted and intolerant toward others.

4. We believe the universe possesses almost unlimited powers, and we grant the possibility of its granting another lease of individual life after our cruder bodies are superseded. From the proofs we have received we are inclined to think this life is a rudimentary phase of existence—the primary—and that the ultimate will follow and be of longer continuance than this. We do not know this to be so, but from the indications we have received we are inclined to accept it and to adopt a theory in keeping with it.

5. We take but little stock in rope-tying, guitar-playing, dark cabinets, etc. We doubt not much fraud has been perpetrated by those who aim to make a living by exhibitions of this kind; but we have many times, in our own private family circle as well as in seances and public places, witnessed that which cannot be relegated to fraud. The cry of "fraud" will not explain all the curious phenomena that do take place. It may not be spirits which cause the phenomena, and science may some day explain it all on truthful grounds, but we are sure that those who can only say "fraud," have not witnessed much of the phenomena that do take place, or are too bigoted to acknowledge what they see. We are as much opposed to fraud as any person can be, but believe there is some truth in the world.

6. Some of the most remarkable incidents of the kind we have witnessed have been in the broad daylight and under the strictest scrutiny. So, though the absence of light may facilitate the operation of certain phenomena, it is not necessary for all.

7. We do not apprehend there is much danger of our going wild upon the subject of spirit manifestations. We are willing to investigate it when it is convenient for us to do so, and we have done so sufficiently to convince ourselves that it is something besides fraud. But our main duties, we conceive, belong to this life and to this world. We propose to direct all our attention and all our efforts to the here and now. If there is a future life, we propose to give it our immediate attention when we reach it. We are trying to live this life about as well as we can, and if there is a future life we shall not regret it, and we trust we will be prepared to enter upon it when the scenes of this life close upon us.

8. We see much of ignorance, superstition, and mental slavery among our fellow-men, and that they have arisen from the false creeds and false systems of theology that have ruled in the world. We see that truth has been crushed to the earth, and that error has been enthroned in its place. We are making it our labor to pull down error and to exalt truth. We are aiming to free our fellow-creatures from the shackles that bind them. We trust that all our Materialistic and Spiritualistic friends will cooperate with our efforts in this direction.

"Stop My Paper."

MEMPHIS, March 28, 1878.

MR. BENNETT, EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Enclosed please find 25c, which pays me up to date. My subscription was out March 20, '78. I want no Spiritualistic in mine. I find in your paper of March 16, '78, "Is there a Future Life?" If you had turned on the gas you would have seen who represented your father, John Bennett, deceased. I was in hopes that I had found a proper paper to read, but I see that I was mistaken. I have sent you $3.00 and $5.00 for books, and secured one subscriber for you, Mr. Moss, of Waterproof, La., my brother-in-law, but I had no idea that you was so foolish as to believe in Spiritualism. You will lose more subscribers through that nonsense. Please discontinue your TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully, S. STURM

There, kind readers, that is what we get for giving our honest convictions when the question touching them is put directly to us. Our exacting friend, because we had the candor to tell precisely what we thought upon a given subject, sees fit to part company with us. Had we used subterfuge, evasion, or silence, probably he would have been better pleased with us. We are not precisely as George Washington was at the time he owned his little hatchet. He, you will remember, could not tell a lie. We, perhaps, do not rest under the same disability, but we prefer the truth. We can lie, but we will not.

We are honest in thinking that, from time to time, for nearly forty years, we have received some slight proofs that there are existing intelligences not connected with persons in the body. Our convictions have not been positive, but we have nevertheless entertained them. We have not at any time obtruded these convictions upon our readers unless the question has been propounded to us as to what our belief upon the subject is, and then we have simply and briefly answered the inquiry. We are not running crazy on spiritual phenomena. Our mission seems to be to fight the theological errors and fables which have ruled mankind for thousands of years. We have set ourselves heartily about this work, and many good people, both believers and unbelievers in a future life, have been kind enough to approve of the work we have undertaken, and have given us their support. As a general thing, it has not been exacted of us that touching the question of a future life our views should conform to the dictum of any person. But brother Sturm sees fit to throw us overboard because in one particular we do not agree with him. His tolerance is not particularly obvious. He shows the same want of liberality which has helped to make persecuting bigots in the days of terror that are passed. Of all people in the world, intolerance more illy becomes a Liberal than any other man.

We can hardly expect that any considerable portion of our readers will agree with us in every particular, but it is to be hoped that the larger share will coincide with us in the main work we have in hand, and that non-essentials will be disregarded. If we expose the errors of priestcraft and a false theology; if we teach the truths of science, we hope it will not be insisted upon that in every particular we must subscribe to just what all our readers believe.

The question of a future life has been an open one in all ages of the world. Able minds have believed in it and other minds equally able have disbelieved in it. It must still longer remain an open question, and it is hardly worth while for us to fall out about it. We are perfectly willing our friend should arrive at his own conclusions in regard to it, and we ask him to be tolerant enough to grant us the same privilege. Those who are not in favor of this amount of toleration, of course, can say, "Stop my paper."

"Superstition in all Ages."

This is the title of a book written considerably over one hundred years ago by a Roman Catholic priest, John Meslier, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, his work called Common Sense, and now for the first time published in the English language. Translated and published by Miss Anna Knoop of this city.

A portion of this sound and valuable work has appeared within the last few weeks in the columns of this paper, and our readers can thereby easily judge of the high character of Meslier's arguments against the errors and dogmas he so perfectly understood.

Meslier died, and his writings were published in French while Voltaire and D'Alembert lived. They were highly pleased with Meslier's "Common Sense" and "Last Will and Testament," and spoke of it in the highest terms of eulogy. In fact, Voltaire edited a portion of the work, and the same was transferred to the "French Encyclopædia," from which source it was translated for our columns. In the volume under consideration, Miss Knoop gives nearly twenty letters or parts of letters from Voltaire, D'Alembert, Helvetius, and others, expressive of the pleasure derived by the writers from the work of Meslier, and of which they speak in the highest praise.

Next follows a life of Meslier, and then his "Common Sense," consisting of over two hundred short essays or propositions touching a great variety of theological subjects. At the close of these Meslier wrote as follows: "I believe, my friends, I have given you a sufficient preventive against all these follies. Your reason will do more than my discourse, and I sincerely wish that we had only to complain of being deceived! But human blood has flowed since the time of Constantine for the establishment of these horrible impositions. The Roman, the Greek, and Protestant churches, by vain, ambitious, and hypocritical disputes, have ravaged Europe, Asia and Africa. Add to these men, whom these quarrels murdered, the multitudes of monks and of nuns, who became sterile by their profession, and you will perceive that the Christian religion has destroyed half of the human race. I conclude with the desire that we may return to Nature, whose declared enemy the Christian religion is, and which necessarily instructs us to do unto others as we would wish them to do unto us. Then the universe will be composed of good citizens, just fathers, obedient children, tender friends. Nature has given us this religion in giving us Reason. May fanaticism pervert it no more. I die filled with these desires more than with hope."

Miss Knoop is worthy of great praise for bringing out this valuable volume. It has been her dream for many years to lay Meslier's most excellent observations before the American public, and for this good work she deserves the patronage of the Liberals of the country. The portion of the work which is appearing in our columns is well calculated to help the sale of the book. It will serve as a whetter of the appetite to know the entire contents of the volume, which should have a place in the library of every Liberal in the land.

339 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.50. Sent by mail on receipt of price. For sale at this office.

ON Sunday last, March 31st, the Spiritualists of this city celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of modern Spiritualism, it being thirty years ago that day that the celebrated "rappings" began in the Fox family, in Acadia, Wayne county, N. Y. The meeting was held at Republican Hall, on Thirty-third street, near Broadway, and was fully attended The speakers on the occasion were: Dr. R. T. Hallock, Chairman; Andrew Jackson Davis, Mary F. Davis, Prof. S. B. Brittan, Mrs. E. F. Jay-Bullene, and Mrs. Nellie J. T. Brigham. Several vocal and instrumental solos were creditably executed. The entire services lasted nearly three hours, and were decidedly interesting to those present.

B. F. UNDERWOOD lectured at St. Charles, Minn., March 27th, 28th, 29th; Two Rivers, Wis., April 1st; Mishicot, Wis., April 2d and 3d; Winchester, Ind., April 5th, 6th, and 7th.

MOSES HULL speaks in Latham's Hall, Ninth street, Williamsburg, Tuesday April 7th, at 2:30 P. M., and in the Harvard Rooms, N. Y., at night. Subjects of both discourses, Spiritualism.

REMEMBER the refining influence, on a young family, of a neat garden, neat dooryard, handsome, blooming shrubbery; and the healthfulness, to the female members of providing an occasional seat or arbor, where they may spend a summer afternoon in sewing or study.

Materials for fences may be provided, gravel or flagging drawn on sleds for walks; wood-houses comfortably filled; rubbish either removed or avoided; barns and barnyards put in order; and kept neat and exemplary; garden seats constructed, and many other preparations made, which the farmer cannot stop his summer work to attend to.

Remember—the highest mark of civilization is attention to domestic comforts and to domestic happiness.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER VI.

GAMMO.*

An Encounter with an Angel.

1. And I looked, and behold there came up out of the sea a very great beast, such an one as was never seen at any time, neither past, present, nor to come. And I looked, and lo, the beast had ten feet that were situate behind, and three that were situate before; even thirteen feet; and it was a very great beast.

2. Yea, a very great beast.

3. And as I looked and wondered, I heard a voice crying to me, saying, Son of man, turn hither thine eyes.

4. And I said, Nay, my lord, how can I turn mine eyes to thee, seeing I cannot see where thou art.

5. And immediately there was a great noise, and I saw an innumerable company of trumpeters with their trumpets; and they cried through their trumpets as with one voice, saying, Go look!

6. So I went and looked, and behold an angel was sitting in one of the ears of the great beast; and I fell down and worshiped.

7. And the angel said unto me, Son of man, understandest thou what thou seest? And I answered and said, No, my lord.

8. Then took he me by the hair of mine head and drew me to him into the beast's ear; and the pain was very great. And I was angered, yea, I was exceeding wroth that he should take me, who was a prophet, by the hair of mine head, and I kicked; yea, I kicked mightily, and fought bitterly with the angel.

9. And the very great beast put up one of its feet to its ear, even the ear in which I fought with the angel, as it was to scratch itself therewith, and I fell out; and, being exceedingly wroth, I gathered up stones, and stoned the beast, and the angel also.

10. And the beast bent down its head, and out of its nostrils issued a very great and fierce snort, and I fled with the swiftness of a wild hart; but the beast overtook me, and the angel took me again by the hair of mine head, and lifted me into one of the beast's ears, even that one on the southern side, but not into that in which he was seated.

11. And when the angel left hold of me I fell down through the beast's ear into a great and spacious chamber beneath, and was filled with astonishment.

12. And I heard the angel speaking unto me, but could not distinguish what he said; and the angel grew angry that I answered him not, and stretched over to see why I answered not.

13. And when he found me not, he stretched himself over and put his head into the chamber into which I had fallen.

14. And I, being still angry, sought about, and finding a spade and a rope, I took the rope and made a loop therewith, and cast it about his neck, and strangled him.

15. And he began to pull back his head vehemently, but I, digging my feet into a great heap of wax, held on valiantly.

16. And in his struggles his feet slipped through the other earhole into the chamber; and I ran and quickly bound the other end of the rope about them, so that by this means he could not get into the chamber, nor yet get his head or his feet out.

17. And the angel's body was laid across the great beast's head, and his feet were down the one ear-hole and his head down the other, and his head was made fast to his feet by the rope; and when I saw he was secure, I took the spade and began to dig and delve my way out of the beast.

18. And when I began to dig, then did the great beast begin to roar and bellow mightily, and to run about hither and thither, and to kick and to plunge.

19. But I dug away manfully, and after a time I saw daylight; and then I lay down, and put out mine head, and looked about.

20. And lo, the great beast was running about with incredible swiftness and bellowing mightily, and rushing this way and that, like one distraught. And I lay still and took comfort, and folded my arms till he should grow weary.

21. And I took note and found that the beast had seven horns and fifty-two tails; and the horns ploughed up the earth as he ran, and the tails were all erect.†

22. And the angel began to roar and rave violently, and to curse, and to swear, and to shed bitter tears.

23. And I stretched myself out comfortaby, and began to sing.

24. And when the beast grew weary and lay down, I crept out, and went my way home, and washed myself. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

* Dedicated to St. Crispin. Our reason for dedicating this singular and eminently mysterious, and therefore prophetic chapter to St. Crispin is as follows: Not being able to decipher the meaning of the title, Gammo, with which the chapter is headed, we showed it to a reverend gentleman, who with appalling irreverence suggested the addition of another letter, to wit, N. And the summary vengeance inflicted by the saint in question upon the irreverent brute, induced us to dedicate the chapter to him.—TRANSLATORS.

† It is abundantly evident that this very curious chapter has an astronomical reference. The thirteen feet represent the months in a year, the seven horns the days in the week, and the fifty-two tails the weeks in the year.—TRANSLATORS.

Communications.

A Materialistic View of Spiritualism.

BY JENNIE BUTLER BROWN.—CONCLUDED.

Going back to first principles, I would here suggest that such materialists as reject the probability of spiritual existence, or conscious individualized material life after the dissolution of the body, as we perceive and know it during earth life, had better coin a new word to use in the place of gas, as a constituent of the human organization. This word, anglo-saxon gast, old Saxon gest, German geist, originally meant ghost, or spirit, and nothing else.

I think it was a French chemist who died in the year 1644, who first used the word gaz in a purely chemical sense, and applied it to a chemically manufactured substance.

But to proceed. We are ready now for another stage of the subject. So long as the molecules of the spirit inhabit the pores of the physical body, we know that the result is what we commonly term physical life, and there is apparent action, energy, force, warmth, and lastly, consciousness. But when the spirit matter withdraws, what?

Cold, pulseless, unconscious clay, which, with due care, from sheer force of habit, remains a little time seemingly intact, but which sooner or later loses entirely its identity as a human organism.

Beyond the shadow of a doubt, then, the life force does not inhere in the molecules that enter into the composition of the physical body. But now, the question: When that change we call death takes place, what becomes of the life force? Remember the position that everything that exists is something, and something is an entity, and an entity cannot be composed of nothing.

Materialists proper, I believe, differ on this point, some affirming that when the life force withdraws, it scatters, or resolves into its original, or some other form of force or action. Some have a different theory, too elaborate to be mentioned here.

Now, if it can be shown that this something—this conscious entity to which belongs the life force—can be withdrawn and yet retain the perfectness of its form and organic structure, perhaps it will be easily seen that the spirit part of man can cohere just as well without the grosser material atoms as with them.

To illustrate, we all know that the atmosphere, though of less specific gravity than what we call material substance, is far more dense.

Why is it thus? It is so simply because the atmospheric attraction of molecule for molecule is much greater, and the degree of affinity far more perfect. See now, the affinity between molecule and molecule of spirit matter is so great that cohesion is the first principle of its construction.

Like a piece of iron ore, the particles cannot be pulled apart, yet, subject to certain conditions, they are easily divisible, though, like quicksilver, when parts are separated, unless so far removed from each other as to become insensible to individual attraction, the parts make haste to reunite.

The reason of this is partly because of inherent molecular attraction, and partly because of the relative degree of atmospheric pressure, which the spirit form has not sufficient specific gravity to resist.

The spiritual organization of man, in its normal condition, could not be disorganized if it would, and probably in most cases would not if it could.

Let us now in a few brief words, remove another materialistic objection to the Spiritualistic faith.

I have seen Prof. Eccles, the scientific lecturer—whose exhibit of apparatus is quite complete, enabling him to illustrate his points very fairly—charge a glass rod with what he is pleased to call his own personal magnetism, and then, in turn, by applying the rod, charge a thin slab of wood, which he had previously poised upon the apex of some slender instrument upon the table before him. Having charged the slab of wood, he laid the rod quickly away, and applied his fore-finger, thereby inducing the wood to follow the motion of his finger as he moved in a circle parallel with the plane upon which the wood was poised.

I was disappointed when he failed to explain the philosophy of the experiment, and I take this opportunity to do it for him, his hypothesis being wholly an erroneous one. In charging the glass rod, the Professor used a silk handkerchief, with which he briskly rubbed the rod. Now, let me tell you what actually went out from Prof. Eccles' hand through the silk cloth into the rod, and from the rod into the wood. It was nothing that was visible to any one present, still it must have been and was something.

He called it magnetic force; so it was, for magnetic force and spiritual molecular force are one and the same thing.

We call silk a conductor of electricity; that is, looking at matter in its positive and negative relation to matter, we find that silk is a vacuum through which a current of magnetic molecules may have unobstructed passage. Now for the philosophy of the operation. We all know that heat modifies molecular attraction, and consequently lessens the degree of cohesion. Now, the motion (the brisk rubbing of the rod with silk) necessary to produce heat by friction, served at once a double purpose. The rubbing of the rod with the silk fabric was sufficient to produce a degree of heat which lessened the attraction of magnetic molecules for their kind, and expansion, or spreading out of the atoms, occurred, and just at the moment when molecular attraction was least, the velocity of motion threw off nothing else than detached molecules of magnetic spirit matter, just as when the phenomenon known as a meteoric shower—accepting the telluric hypothesis—has always been the result of some violent movement of nature, heat and the velocity of motion having been the active agents which have dislodged and throw the substances to such an approximate insensible distance from the native planet, that the attractive force of earth in reactionary capacity has prevailed over other centers of gravity, resulting in drawing these substances to her surface again. That which Prof. Eccles showed by the experiment before-mentioned was actually a portion of his own spirit passing through the silk fabric into the pores of the glass and wood. But the glass and the wood could not retain these molecules. They were quick to catch and they were quick to let go. The moment spirit matter enters into the pores of a foreign substance, for which it has no real affinity, it rebounds, and unless the source from whence it came be so far removed as to annul the attraction—though the affinity still remain—they return to that source and again coalesce; if not, they are attracted by other affinities, and enter new fields of action and of labor. Such is the persistence of the natural tendencies of matter.

At the moment Prof. Eccles extended his finger toward the piece of wood, it moved like a thing of life, and for the moment it was a thing of life, having within it a living soul. Not a conscious soul, however, because the wood had not such an organic construction as could make it possible for the refined spirit matter to assume the proportions of a conscious soul. But this piece of wood, poised on the apex of a pointed instrument, followed the professor's finger around in a circle; at first, rapidly, and with regular motion, its velocity and the regularity of its motion diminishing gradually till it came to a stand still.

This was occasioned by the attraction of molecule for its kind. A magnetic current—in fact, a caravan of living molecules—was formed and headed towards the professor's finger, that being the approximate source from whence they came, and they made haste to return more swiftly than they were thrown off, inasmuch as the wood lost its charge in far less time than was consumed in receiving it.

We have now seen how it is that spirit matter can penetrate wood and other so-called solid substances by entering and occupying the cellular pores, etc., thereof, and this showing illustrates, in answer to other materialistic doubts, how a spiritual body can glide through what we usually term the solid partition or wall of a house. We have only, in this connection, to add the fact that the relative nature, the positive and negative of substance, in this case is exactly reversed, so that the spirit body stands in the relation of a solid to the wall which is a vacuum or non-cohesive substance to the spiritual body.

Old-school materialists often ask, "Why cannot we all see, feel, and touch spirit friends when you say they are present?"

Well, the reasons have a purely constitutional, temperamental, and developmental basis.

We need not enter into an acoustic elaboration of the science of sounds, the science of optics, etc. A very few words will serve our purpose.

For instance, the range of the human ear is about eleven octaves. The practical range, more especially with regard to musical or harmonious sounds, is about seven-octaves. Now, it is well known that individual or temperamental qualifications induce numerous modifications of sound. That is; the vibration of sound-waves does not affect the organic sense of hearing of all individuals alike, for the simple reason that that organic structure itself differs variously. Let us bring several persons near a full seven-octave musical instrument, while we perform harmoniously upon it. They are not all affected in the same way, or to the same extent. One may be entranced, another exhilarated, while still another may evince weariness and a disposition to move away from the source of these sounds. We produce a very faint, soft, low note; some will say they heard it, others will say they did not hear it.

We then produce a very high, but soft, faint, sound. The trained ear may catch the sound, but of those around, some will hear, others still will not hear, and yet many of these persons might instantaneously detect an inharmonious sound of the same degree. Now, this demonstrates the different organic qualities of the sense of hearing of which we have already spoken, and we are able to discover that a sound which is entirely audible to one person, is sometimes utter silence to another.

Dr. Holland says truly that silence itself is vocal if we listen well, and this fact we may all, in some degree verify for ourselves, if we will take pains to cultivate the finer and subtler sense of hearing what I shall call inaudible sounds, if the parodox be admissible.

The construction of the eye has differing modifications which associate, also, with different temperamental organisms.

Among spiritual media, there are those [termed "seeing media," "hearing media," "clairvoyant," or "impressed media," and sometimes we encounter those who have developed the ability to see and hear, and who are also susceptible to the touch of spiritual beings; but these are as yet somewhat rare, and depend not only upon the degree of physical organic sensitiveness to contact with foreign matter, but largely also upon the quality of that degree.

Considering these things, no one should demand the materialistic believer to subscribe to a personal faith in that which as yet he has no experimental knowledge of. He cannot believe beyond his ability to comprehend, nor beyond his developmental experience, although he may concede that his unconsciousness constitutes no proof of the non-existence of certain organic forms of matter.

Unconsciousness of sound proves only our organic inability to distinguish, or even hear all kinds of sounds.

Our inability to see certain organic forms by no means proves that these forms do not exist. On the contrary, it demonstrates that, as it associates with the human being, the optical arrangement is, as yet, so imperfectly developed that it cannot, in most cases, sight the finer and more ethereal creations of nature.

But by and by the mental sunshine of Freethought will bring the human family "out of darkness, and into the light," and then the more perfectly developed faculties of its members shall lift humanity up to a higher and more spiritualized plane of action as well as knowledge.

Catholic Crimes.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Four years ago I was in Paris corresponding for the Memphis Appeal. One of my letters, containing the most atrocious evidence against the Catholic Church, they dared not publish, fearing the power and anathema of this Christian monster. To THE TRUTH SEEKER, standing firmly on the bed-rock of right, I can now tell the facts with the certainty of getting a hearing. I took great pains to get the most reliable and undoubted testimony on the case, which is this: "Just previous to the Franco-Prussian war, a working-man in Paris had been walking in the summer sun, and feeling fatigued towards evening went to rest himself in the little church called "Petit St. Pére," but formerly named "Notre Dame de Victoire." This church is particularly consecrated to the Virgin. She is supposed to answer all prayers of good Catholic women who come here and pray to her. Around the altar are hung hundreds of little offerings of jewels and charms, given by the supplicants. The walls are thickly covered with memorial tablets, testimonials of miraculous cures and answers to prayers. I counted no less than four thousand of these ignorant, bigoted, placards in this church.

While this man was resting himself there he fell asleep, and being behind one of the large pillars, was not noticed when the church was closed for the night; nor did he awake till far in the night, when he was aroused by the shrieks and screams of women in distress. Comprehending at once that he was locked in, he found that he could not reach these cries for help, as the sounds came through the grating in the floor. He was forced to content himself until morning, when the doors would be opened. He then went to the Bureau of the Police, and made the statement of what he had heard, and asked for an investigation. The police went to the church, the priests denied the possibility of such an occurrence ever having taken place as that of the cries of women being heard there. More than this, they asserted that the man must have been drunk or crazy to even have been in the church at that time. So the matter was pooh-poohed away for the time being. The man, however, was not to be silenced so easily amongst his friends, who believed his statements and knew him to be both sane and sober. The priests began to feel that something must be done to stop this man's mouth, and they had him taken before a court of lunacy, tried, convicted, and put in a lunatic asylum where in a few months he died from the inquisitorial Christian treatment. Now comes the sequel.

After Paris fell into the hands of the Communists the friends of this unfortunate man applied to them, as they had the power, to search the Church of Petit St. Pére for some evidence of this strange story. This was done; the church was ransacked as a French mob know so thoroughly how to do. The earth in the vaults under the church was dug up, and the bodies of seventeen females were found, and skeletons of others numbering in all between thirty and forty. The bodies of the seventeen were placed in the vestibule of the church, and there viewed by thousands of people. I talked with several different persons who witnessed the horrible sight. One gentleman, an American physician, living and practicing in Paris at that time, was on the investigating committee. He said that these bodies were all young girls in different stages of decomposition, and that one of them could not have been dead over three months. They were all dressed as in life, even to the earrings and other ornaments, showing by the style of dress that they belonged to the middle or shop-girl class. No one could be found who knew anything of how these bodies came there, or who they were. There is a positive municipal law in Paris prohibiting the burial of the dead under churches; here certainly was a flagrant transgression of that law, besides being buried without coffins, giving strong suspicions that some horrible outrage had been perpetrated. It is not a difficult matter for a shop girl to be lost in such a city as Paris and not be missed, particularly when she comes from the country. Her employer misses her for a day or so, and then supplies her place, and no questions asked. Not making her appearance at her boarding house, they readily conclude she has either returned home or taken to the gay courtesan life, and become lost in that seething vortex of madness. The great majority being Catholic, none think of searching in that cesspool of iniquity, the Church, for lost women. The law is powerless, and gives no right of investigation behind what are termed "holy walls," so diabolism can reign in high carnival under priestly rule unmolested. After the Communists had finished their work at St. Pére, maddened with successful discovery they rushed to the convents, and there found human suffering more than enough for a thousand vicarious atonements. In one underground dungeon they found the bodies of three women who had died from suffocation, with their heads together at a little aperture which could not have afforded air sufficient for one. Confined in an iron cage in the yard was a woman who had been there three years for the crime of trying to escape. In the midst of this iconoclastic work, as well as the burning of palaces, Thier's army came in and restored the old order of things. The priests have taken care to obliterate as far as possible any effect disastrous to the Church these disclosures might produce, by simply denying the whole thing, and saying it was a put-up job by the Communists. Even the Catholics who were eye-witnesses to these revelations are so influenced by their priests now that they say it was a story gotten up to injure the Church. Oliver Wendell Holmes' lines on slavery are most appropriate to this growing power in the land:

"Oh, Lord, strangle this monster that struggles to birth.
Or taunt us no more with Thy Kingdom, on earth."

MARY J. HOLMES.

Memphis, Tenn.

My "Religious" Belief.

MR. BENNETT: Last evening, at the close of my lecture, I was questioned as to my religious opinions or belief. I summed up the following this morning, and forwarded it to the questioner, so that he might not be in doubt longer, and thought I would send it to you for publication:

1. I do not believe in the plenary inspiration of the Hebrew and Christian Bible as God's word of infallible truth; but believe it was written by men, according to their own belief and inspiration, and translated and compiled by men, who were guided by their own reason and judgment.

2. I do not believe in the Hebrew or Christian God, according to the interpretation of evangelical Christians; but believe that an all-pervading Spirit or Essence is the supreme power of the universe. Neither do I believe in a personal devil.

3. I do not believe that Jesus Christ was the very God—neither the Son of God, in any other sense than that in which every other person is a son or daughter—nor the offspring of the Supreme Cause, Essence, or Power called God. Neither do I believe him to have been an impostor, but one of the world's saviors, who lived before his time, was misunderstood, maligned, and put to death for his opinions' sake.

4. I do not, consequently, believe in the atonement by the shedding of Jesus' blood, nor in salvation from sin, in this world or in the next, through his death; but believe salvation to be the result of fleeing from all that destroys, and seeking and embracing all that saves and preserves.

5. I do not believe in the evangelical hell, or a place of literal fire and brimstone; but believe that the regrets and the remorse of the soul are all the soul can suffer, either in this world or in any world yet to come.

6. I do not believe that the Christian religion, as taught by the Christian Evangelical Church and other churches, is productive of good, but has caused more war, slavery, superstition, persecution, and bloodshed than any other known religion on the face of the earth.

7. I do not believe that the money and efforts expended in the attempt to propagate this religion at home or abroad are usefully appropriated; but believe that the same means and effort employed in teaching mankind the natural sciences, true morality, and a humanitarian brotherhood would produce a higher and more enlightened civilization, a purer social condition, and a more just and equitable distribution of the necessaries of life.

8. I do not believe that any person, or any number of persons, has any right to abridge my religious liberty, or the liberty of any one else, in thought, speech, or action, unless I am infringing upon the rights of others; or to make any laws tending thereto; or to enact or execute laws which shall compel me to conform to any of their religious rites, or to confess that any of the doctrines in their creeds is true. I believe I have no right to coerce others, in like manner, for that purpose.

My religion is a religion of life or character, not profession; my Bible, knowledge, not a book; my creed, reason, not faith; my Church, humanity, not sectarianism; my teacher, investigation, guided by my own perception, not priestcraft; my light, experience and testimony, not tradition; my hope, science, not myths; my salvation, right living and good works, not blood nor substitution; my heaven, a harmonious condition of the mind, not a place to go to when I die; my hell, wrong doing, not fire and brimstone; my evils, the ignorance and falsities of life, not a personal being—a lion going about seeking whom he may devour; my God, the immortal, infinite, absolute Truth, not a person, who is called a "man of war" (Exodus xv, 3)—a repentant, angry, whimsical being, a creature to be moved by the prayer of a mortal to change his everlasting decrees, a creator who died himself that man might live, and then saved not one in a hundred by his death—in short, the evangelical God of Christendom.

These are a few of my beliefs and unbeliefs, and if you desire a more explicit statement of the hope and knowledge that is within me, please signify, and it shall be reduced to writing for your inspection.

Hoping that the length of the article will not weary you, I subscribe myself, Yours for the truth,

ELLA E. GIBSON.

Marshallton, Pa., March 25, 1878.

Ladies' National League to Protect the Indians.

At a public meeting in the chapel of the Broadway Tabernacle on the 25th of March, the following preamble and resolutions were offered by Father Beeson, and, after full discussion, were unanimously adopted by the meeting:

1. WHEREAS, The Committee on Indian Affairs, in their report to the present Congress, affirm that it costs the Government $23 annually for each Indian, and recommend their transfer to the army; therefore,

2. Resolved, That the Indian Department of our Government is an enormous and needless tax upon the people.

3. Resolved, That, as the Indians are always peaceful and apt to learn when fairly treated, the army is unnecessary to prevent their raids, and therefore it is unjust to place them under its demoralizing contact and control.

4. Resolved, That this meeting approves of the object for which the "Ladies' National League" is formed, and that, as an expression of regret for past wrongs, there should be a general contribution for their redress; children should be encouraged to give their cents, adults their dimes, and capitalists their dollars, and the pastor of every church should be a life member of the League, until the avowal of President Lincoln is realized, that "The Indians shall have justice which will satisfy both them and their friends."

Address the Secretary, G. M. Weeks, M.D., 4 West Twenty-eighth street, or Bronson Murray, Treasurer, 238 West Fifty-second street, New York.

Supernaturalism.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: It seems to me that in avowing your belief in some supernatural or superhuman phenomena manifested at Mrs. Lord's seance you have abandoned an important position, and practically admitted the possibility, if not the probability, of the miracles recounted in the sacred Scriptures, and of direct revelations from God. If the things you experienced were "not done by mortals" they were done by something immortal—the spirits of men or the spirit of God. The believers in raising the dead, giving sight to the blind, talking with God in a burning bush, and in Mohammed's messages from heaven claim no more, for when you once admit supernatural agencies the door is wide open for all these things. I am a little skeptical in this matter of spirit materialization, possibly only because I have not had opportunity to see or feel the like phenomena. With the light I have, however, I think the phenomena you describe, although doubtless remarkable and convincing, are less difficult to account for through human agency and natural causes than it is to reconcile the theory of supernatural agency in the matter with the mass of evidence which seems to prove that the laws of nature are never set aside.

Before mentioning any of the scientific grounds for disbelieving the theory that the spirits of the dead return, I must say that it is very remarkable that the departed spirits of our friends so seldom re-visit us, if they have that power. With all our faults they loved us still, or said they did, and why, when they see us going wrong, do they not return, materialize a hand, take us gently by the ear and lead us out of danger, or at least whisper a word of caution and advice? They never have done this kindness for me; they never do it to anybody except in rare instances, and in the presence of some medium like Mrs. Lord. They let us rush headlong to the devil and give no sign, which seems singularly derelict on their part. But I cannot think they have the power to return, for the spirits I knew were good spirits, having a human sympathy and love and compassion which would impel them to come with what message and what light they were permitted.

Nor is it believable that a beneficent God would hold in leash these spirits of the dead, anxious to return with a word of encouragement, and cruelly thwart that kindly office except in the comparatively few instances recorded. Equally improbable is it that these spirits should invariably bring their message through the agency of some third person, gifted with the power of calling them to earth, as Manfred, by the power of "a wandering hell in the eternal space," called up the spirits of the earth and air. Therefore, in view of these facts, it seems, on ethical grounds, more likely that the so-called spirit manifestations are produced by spirits in the flesh than by spirits that have shuffled off their mortal clay.

But, leaving this field of speculation and appealing to science, we find very good evidence that there are no disembodied spirits to return. It is now well established that the brain, whether of man or brute, is the seat of thought or mind or spirit, that the brain is the organ of thought, and without it there can be no thought or consciousness. Mental activity seems to be a creation of the brain, wholly dependant on it and without separate existence. Says Macbeth: "The times have been that when the brains were out, the man would die, and there an end." There is an end. Anatomists claim that they can and have cut away the soul piecemeal, as it were, by removing portions of the brain, and that the mental activity, thought, consciousness, or whatever you choose to call it, is destroyed just in proportion as they removed the brain which creates it. Is it not true then, that as force and matter are inseparable, so spirit and body have no separate existence; no force without matter, no thought without brain? Why should we believe that when the body has died and returned to clay, "to stop a hole or keep the wind away," why should we believe that the spirit which was its creature continues to live and wander unclothed in eternal space, any more than we should believe that our bones may walk abroad in ghastly hideousness after the muscles which moved them in life have been eaten away by the "politic worm," or the lazy coyote?

In order to believe that the soul is immortal, we must give it an existence prior to the existence of the body, as well as after the body's decay. If it has a life independent of the animal organism, then there must have been a time when it formed a temporary partnership with the animal structure. At what period of the body's life was that? Was it at the beginning of fœtal life, or did this suppositious soul lie in wait somewhere until the moment of birth, and enter into the body with the breath of life? If so, it would seem to be at that time an exceedingly insignificant soul, having less intelligence and power than that of the infant chicken just emerged from its shell. And when three or four score years of life have wasted the body, and enfeebled the brain, this spirit that developed with the body's growth to, perhaps, vast power and splendid capabilities, seems like it, also to decay, until at the end it is oftentimes as puerile and contemptible as in the beginning of life. Is it not more reasonable, then, to believe that the mind or soul is simply an activity of the brain which has its origin with the brain, grows with it, dies with it, and has no separate existence before or after; that, therefore, there are no spirits of the dead to return to us, and that the phenomena attributed to such spirits are more likely the work of spirits in the flesh, with intent to deceive? Possibly the spirit does live after the body; the future is wrapped in impenetrable obscurity, and we know nothing of it, except the meagre and unsatisfactory messages attributed to the spirits of the dead, but from the evidence we have, it seems improbable. And personal continuance is not indispensable to our happiness or welfare here. The knowledge that this is all there is of life should rather tend to promote morality and justice among men. The thinking man would hesitate to take the life or property of his fellow, or to do him any injury, knowing that that injury would be irreparable, that there was no future world of compensation for a wrong committed here, that his victim could have no relief except as he might attempt to repair the injury, and himself no respite from the lash of an accusing conscience until that was done. The fact that men shrink from the thought of personal annihilation, is no evidence that it will not be. Many things come to us inevitably that are not welcome; many that we think would be pleasant are withheld; and probably the most of us, after the struggles and scars of an ordinary life, with its few petty triumphs and many failures, will be not unwilling to creep beneath the bosom of Mother Earth, and be forever at rest. D. W. C.

New York, March 18, 1878.

REMARKS.—"D. W. C." almost does us an injustice. If he has been a reader of what we have from time to time had to say upon the subject of supernaturalism and the universe, he must be aware that we are an unbeliever in supernaturalism, as well as in a personal, individual deity. We hold that the universe contains all that exists, and that it had no creator, founder, or inventor. As nature is the highest and only power that exists, there can be nothing super-natural, or above nature. We also wholly discard miracles. We do not think a miracle was ever performed, or ever can be. Every event that ever occurred was the result of natural cause or causes. There never was an event or an occurrence not directly produced by a sufficient natural cause.

We both believe in the universe—that it is the source of life, sensation, intelligence, and every phenomena of which we have any knowledge. The difference between us is mainly this: He limits the power of the universe, while we do not. He holds that we, in our present state of existence, are the ultimate that the universe is capable of producing; on the other hand, we accord to the universe the power of producing forms of life and existence as much above us as it has done below us. Half of the material of the universe, together with its powers or forces, are perfectly invisible to the human eye, and we are quite inadequate to say that the powers which produced us are able to do nothing higher or grander. It is possible for individual intelligences to have existences that occupy a place vastly more ethereal and subtle than the one now occupied by us. We think we have received numerous proofs—not in seances alone, but in private circles with friends and in our own family—that there are intelligences that communicate with us which we cannot see. We may be wholly wrong, but do not believe we are. We have been convinced of this, and claim to have the candor to acknowledge our convictions.

Believing that every thought is the product of a mental organization, we believe that, if there are spirits, they have bodies and brains as really as we have.

We cannot claim to be a firm believer in immortality. We think that, as individuals, we had a beginning about the time we were conceived. We have never seen any proof that we had a personal, individual existence before that. It seems logical that whatever has a beginning must, at some time, however distant, have an end—that whatever has one end must necessarily have two. But we have unlimited confidence in the powers of the universe, and we are almost prepared to yield the point that it is possible that individual life may be continued forever.

If spirits do exist, and if spirit phenomena do take place, we hold that they are wholly in keeping with the established laws of the universe, that they are strictly natural, and not supernatural. We do not understand yet all the laws of the universe; in fact, but a limited portion of them. There is probably more for us still to learn than we now know. Nature is full of wonders and mysteries. The existence of simple matter is a wonder impossible to account for. Organic combinations are an unexplained mystery which the study of a lifetime cannot solve. Life is a mystery even in its lowest forms, and in its higher grades, where intelligence, reason, and love are produced, it is still more wonderful. Can "D. W. C." declare that he understands and comprehends the highest forms of life and intelligence that the universe is capable of producing? Does he know or understand all the silent operations of nature? Does he disbelieve in the existence of everything that he cannot see with his own eyes and comprehend with his own mind? If so, we acknowledge that he has progressed much further than ourselves.

As a final word, we will say that the charge of fraud will not account for the phenomena which thousands upon thousands of honest, intelligent persons have witnessed. That fraud has been employed by numerous unprincipled persons is admitted; but that there has been a far greater number of instances where fraud was not employed is equally true. We are waiting for science and investigation to explain the seeming mystery.—[ED. T. S.]

Letters from Friends.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., March 20, 1878.

MR. BENNETT: I have several times received circulars and sample copies from Seth Wilbur Payne, addressed to my post-office box the same as on THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have no idea how he got my address unless from you list. I know of no one in New York who knew the number of my post-office box except yourself. I have reason to believe a very dishonest act has been committed.

Yours truly, L. F. JOHNSON.

PLEASANTVILLE STATION, CONN., March 25, 1875.

FRIEND BENNETT: Mr. Seth Wilbur Payne has sent me two or three outfits of posters, circulars, show cards, begging letters, etc., asking me to subscribe for his Age of Reason. He has also sent me sample copies of his paper. I believe he got my name from your mailing list, for I know not how else he could have obtained it. Is a man who will commit such a crime a proper person to advocate the Liberal cause? I am your friend, GEO. CHAMBERLAIN.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, March 29, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: I have received from your neighbor Mr. Payne, copies of his circulars, show bills, and printed letters asking for aid, as well as copies of his paper. I did not subscribe, nor ask anybody else to. I believe he took my name from your list. I don't believe in doing that kind of business. If we cannot have honest men to advocate our cause, we had better not have any. THE TRUTH SEEKER is my bible, and almost victuals and drink. I can feed as many with the truths it contains as did Jesus with his seven loaves and two little fishes. Good by,

CALVIN TUTTLE.

LA CROSSE, WIS., March 23, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Sir: I have received two circulars and one newspaper from S. W. Payne. He has made the same mistake in writing my name that you have (S. N. Parmnell, Jr.). I do not know how he got my address. Hoping that you may soon discover the thief, I remain

Yours, S. H. PAMMEL.

NEW CARLISLE, OHIO, March 27, 1878.

MR. BENNETT: I have just received the "Career of Religious Ideas," by Hudson Tuttle, sent me by you, and also three copies of your paper, for which I thank you. I will remit money for the book this week, and, if I find I can do so without injustice to any one, I will certainly subscribe for the paper. It advocates a system of universal charity and benevolence which the sects of Christendom scoff at and ridicule; but it is certainly undermining and honeycombing the heart of a cruel theology, on which heartless priests have doted with a fond affection, while tearing the vitals from the laboring classes.

Respectfully, CHAS. L. TIROGLE.

CHARLESTON, S. C., March 26, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Will you permit me to say to Mr. Harry Hoover, concerning his article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 23d, that I agree with his idea. I know it to be necessary to dress ourselves, for a good many reasons, but not to hide immoral secrets, because there are no such things about us. Parents should take pains to instruct their children in these so-called secrets, and not have them seek this information by chance, to their own disadvantage. PLAIN.

LA HONDA, CAL., March 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Mr. Payne has sent me several copies of the Age of Reason. But, from what I have read in your paper, I shall have nothing to do with it.

J. FRANKENBERGER.

COLOMA, CALIFORNIA, March 14, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed please find P. O. order for ten dollars to pay for books as per enclosed list.

I will take this occasion to remark that I am both pained and amused by the conduct of your neighbor Mr. Payne towards you lately. Some time ago I received a copy of the Age of Reason, with a request to subscribe for the same, which I did. It being a very low priced Infidel paper, and having a desire to spread the truths of Infidelity as much as I am able, I intended to try to get a few subscribers for it, and wrote Mr. P. friendly to that effect, which he printed in No. 9. In my letter I made use of the name of Bennett, for which he substituted Bradlaugh. Now, the name of Bradlaugh is a very good substitute, and so far as that is concerned I have no particular objection. But I thought it was a very small way of showing disrespect or ill-feeling towards a contemporary. I also noticed several items in his paper that were not very complimentary to you, and in fact calculated to place you in an awkward position before your patrons, but concluded that it was nothing more than a little business jealousy, and would soon die out. Have also read the Miller letter, and made up my mind that the writer was also impelled by some selfish motive. But when I saw THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 2nd inst, in which you prove the Miller letter a forgery by Payne, I thought that that was going a little too far, and concluded that Mr. Payne was actuated by very bad motives, and is not worthy of patronage from honest Infidels. If Mr. Payne had quietly sent out his paper, and instead of throwing mud at you, and trying to whitewash Comstock, had shown a friendly disposition as a co-worker in the suppression of ignorance and bigotry, there is no doubt in my mind that nearly every subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER would have given him a helping hand, as it was my intention to do. But I will not assist any one in putting down a man who has for years been an honest and fearless defender of truth, and who is likely to spend the remainder of his life in the good cause. Infidel writers should be brought to understand that they very much injure the cause in which they are working by rankling with each other. If they have differences they should settle them privately, and not drag each other around in their papers. Such conduct will do for Christians, but is very unbecoming in men who advocate our broad and liberal platform of Truth, Freedom, and Justice.

I am pleased to learn that you have barred Mr. Teed out of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Teed is evidently a man of sense, but it is not the kind that governs Infidels (common sense). With my best wishes for your continued success, I remain very truly yours, A. LOHRY.

COSHOCTON, OHIO, March 27, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In subscribing and paying in advance for seven different Liberal papers, without the fear of Mrs. Grundy, and in spite of evangelical despotism, I presume I am nearly up to the average in duty and practice of a majority of the Liberals in the country; yet I always take pleasure in exerting my influence to induce others to also subscribe for Liberal papers; and to those who can't or won't subscribe, I lend my own, and send them out as missionaries to shed light upon the ignorant and bigoted. I have had great satisfaction in watching results, and seeing the harvest gathered in from the seed thus sown. The world does move, surely.

Liberals who do not profess to live, or shape their lives "in the fear of God" or an endless hell, but to do that which is right and just in the love of right and justice—because it is right, and man's duty to himself and to others to do so—ought not very often to be caught aping Christianity by doing mean, dishonest, unbrotherly, and unmanly things, and I do not believe real, genuine, intelligent Liberals often are caught in such aping acts. But there are some mongrels and some counterfeits that "put on the livery" etc. In spite of the most stringent laws the purest gold and silver coins will be counterfeited. In spite of morality and decency, and the overshadowing influences of the Christian religion, Comstock will find more or less vulgar and obscene pictures and literature published and purchased and enjoyed by those who acknowledge the Christian religion to be far superior to Infidelity, and pronounce the latter to be a thing most horrid and altogether unlovely. I commend Comstock's zeal when he confines his efforts against the smutty trash which he says is patronized by, and pollutes the morals of, male and female students in a great number of schools and seminaries under Christian teachers and Christian influences, where it would seem that religion and Christian influences are not potent to save them. But when Comstock makes the smelling for unsavory odors among such institutions to protect the morals of Christian students a pretense and cover to suppress you and THE TRUTH SEEKER, because you are not evangelical on theological dogmas, and stamps all free thought that don't run in the old orthodox rut as obscene and blasphemous, his action becomes infamous. He abuses his office and his power for the ignoble purpose of suppressing free speech, free press, and free thought under the pretense of law, for the special benefit of orthodoxy. The people of this country are not yet quite ready for this programme. And when he can find a man to put on the uniform of a Liberal to help him in the nefarious attempt to undermine the very foundations of civil and religious liberty, it shows that Christianity has not departed from the teachings of the old Fathers in the Church, in the days of Constantine, when it was openly taught that any act, no matter how disreputable and mean, even to stealing, robbery, murder, and lying, were entirely justifiable if done in the interests of religion—done "for Christ's sake." Even St. Paul, in the charming simplicity of Christian purity and innocence, when he had been detected in falsehood, wanted to know "If the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory; why yet am I also judged a sinner" for telling lies? Of course, why? Why should not Christians have unlimited license to lie, or steal, rob, murder, imprison, torture or fine people, to suppress free speech, free thought, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, if these things were done "for Christ's sake" wherein "the truth of God would more abound" through these acts? Why not? Why should not Comstock have full liberty and power to suppress THE TRUTH SEEKER or any other paper that don't toot "for the glory of God" through the bugle proposed by priestcraft? And why should he not use Seth Wilbur Payne in the armor of a Liberal, to help do it—even to be waltzed out himself by Seth to play the character of Liberal, Infidel, and Spiritualist to help on the fraud—all of course, being done "for Christ's sake." Seth Wilbur overdid that act. His splurge not only unmasked his battery, but it exhibited the fatal boomerang that shot the shooter. I renewed my subscription to Seth's paper out of curiosity to see what the fellow would attempt in the interest of Comstock, and that is all the patronage he gets here, while Comstock's raid has just doubled your circulation in this immediate vicinity, lacking one subscriber, and he, with more will be on hand before long. THE TRUTH SEEKER has the entire confidence of Liberals here. I sent for sample copies of the St Louis Common Sense, and liked it very well, all except the Seth Wilbur Payne feature, and declined to subscribe for it, or raise a club here on that ground only. I am glad that Seth Wilbur, who claims to be a descendant of the patriot statesman Thomas Paine, has changed his name by inserting the crooked letter y into it. It is emblematic of the crookedness of his course towards you and THE TRUTH SEEKER. Last February, 9th, I wrote Seth a mild protest at his conduct, and he answered claiming that he had "proof." My idea was, that if he had any "proof" that you had been acting in collusion with Comstock to create sympathy and defraud the Liberals of the country, he ought to bring it out and give it to them as a protection against you and Comstock. On the 25th of February I wrote to Seth again, suggesting this to be his duty, but he don't seem to see it in that light as yet. Hence I send you the correspondence to show you how he plays his game by postal cards. He said he had "proof" of his charges and that he would not remain "silent and allow Liberals to be defrauded." But instead of giving Liberals his boasted "proofs" he does remain silent, and allows them "to be defrauded" by your and Comstock's collusion; or, by his refusal to give "proof," he confesses himself an infernal liar and sneak in first making the charges. He can hang upon either horn of the dilemma he chooses, while his paper of odds, and ends, and scraps, and the products of others, brains without credit, is appreciated for all it is worth. I only write to put in my disclaimer against allowing Christianity to point to Payne and charge him upon real, genuine Liberalism or Freethought. He belongs where he acts, with Comstock & Co. Yours,

W. S. WOOD.

COSHOCTON, OHIO, February 9, 1878.

Seth Wilbur Payne Esq., Dear Sir: My first remittance paid for ten numbers, and I now remit for ten more, or making in all five months. I have received your circulars, etc., asking efforts to extend circulation of your paper, etc., and I was about to get up a club but halted when you began your singular attack upon Bro. Bennett, disguised under the garb of friendship, but plainly displaying an unfriendly spirit of envy, jealousy, or malice that seems to be uncalled for from anything that has ever appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. And this you are following up in an evident spirit of unfairness that fails to commend itself to an honorable Liberal. There may be room for your paper; I hope there is, if honorably conducted. I rejoice to see Liberal papers coming into the field, and hope they will all find support, but they are not, any of them, strong enough to live by tearing down one another. Bro. Bennett has fought a glorious fight up from a small beginning, doing much to arouse the dormant Liberals of the whole country, and I do not believe that they will allow envy and malice to pull him down without a cause. You know as well as any one that Comstock was moved to action not by obscenity, but to crush free speech, and a free press of anti-evangelical tone, and your pretended ground for backing him—virtually—is too thin to disguise the animus of your course. Until I see a better reason for your policy, I cannot extend your circulation among the Liberals of this vicinity, as I doubt if you will do the cause any good. You will excuse the bluntness of my opinions, as I am a plain, blunt kind of a man, hating double-dealing and hypocrisy everywhere. I enclose postal card to acknowledge receipt of money, twenty-five cents. W. S. WOOD.

In due time I received the following on postal card:

OFFICE Age of Reason, February 11, 1878.

Mr. Wood: Yours received. No well-meaning person will object to bluntness and candor, nevertheless we think you are mistaken in the idea that our course in the Age of Reason was uncalled for. Being here upon the ground so long, we have proof of what we said. We shall carry on no war of personalities, but shall not be silent and allow Liberals to be defrauded. Fraud among Liberals is just as bad if not worse than among Christians. Remittance received which credits to July 18th. Very truly yours,

S. W. PAYNE, per H.

After waiting to see more numbers of the Age of Reason, I wrote him again as follows:

COSHOCTON, O., February 25, 1878.

S. W. Payne, Dear Sir: Your postal reply to my letter is not satisfactory as to your course towards D. M. Bennett. If, as you say, you have "proof" of what you said, it is due to Liberals that you give it to them; as yet, we have nothing but assertions, and a mean style of innuendo with no proof. Give us proof that Comstock is a Liberal or a Spiritualist, that he did not cause Bennett's arrest, or that he labored to stop the prosecution against him, as you say. Until you make good your words, your list will not increase among the large number of Liberals in this vicinity, as they detest meanness under the cloak of Liberality. It is the united judgment here that you have not made good your attacks on Bennett, and that they were born of jealousy, envy, and something worse.

Yours for the truth, W. S. WOOD.

NEW YORK, March 27, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: In justice to you and THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am prepared to say that I hail with gladness its regular weekly advent, and I scan its clear lines with much eagerness, especially as I note the successive defeats of your numerous jealous and evil-minded neighbors and contemporaries, Payne's Age of Reason, The Index, etc. The former, like Comstock, has nibbled the dust of its own gathering, while The Index has been forced to swallow its words by that honorable gentleman, Asa K. Butts. Their malicious, contemptible, and unjust attacks have decreased the number of their patrons and increased your admirers.

I do not know nor care whether my subscription is due or not; as soon as I receive my over-due monthly wages, I shall forward three dollars, whether I live out the time or not, to show my appreciation and esteem for THE TRUTH SEEKER and D. M. Bennett.

As a poor, hard-working man, I am always pleased, nay, delighted, to spend my few leisure moments with the beautiful and clear, broad, honest, and enlightened minds of Col. Ingersoll, Harry Hoover, E. D. Slenker, Clifford, Hudson Tuttle, and others. Instead of seventy thousand priests in our republic, I heartily wish we had seventy thousand Col. Ingersolls and seventy thousand Harry Hoovers. Yours gratefully and fraternally, 103 Madison avenue. EDW'D C. SWAN.

FABIUS, N. Y., March 20, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Enclosed I send you three dollars as a renewal of subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I should have sent before but money has been scarce with me, having had sickness in my family. We like the general tone of your paper, and feel as though we cannot do without it. I am glad you still keep a spare corner for friendly letters, which gives one an idea as to how the good cause is progressing all over the country.

Our little world is crammed full of beliefs, simply from a lack of knowledge. The more we know, the less are we inclined to believe. Faith relates entirely to the unknown and is the offspring of ignorance, and yet a majority of our people regard it almost superior to knowledge; and prayer is desire, and desire is an unsatisfied want, or discontentedness, and yet it is the chief weapon of the Church to bring about happiness, as though happiness was the result of discontentment.

Since all faiths and beliefs are assumptions based on ignorance, let us not be too sanguine in the matter of faith, but rather let us do what we know is right, by increasing the sum of human happiness, knowing that complete happiness exists only in the domain of knowledge.

HOMER A. BILLINGS.

RANDOLPH, N. Y., March 11, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: While many of your Liberal friends have been favoring you with words of encouragement, advice, or reproof, I have been content to be a silent observer, yet attentive withal. I am not an old subscriber, but I like the ring of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Stick to your text—the unfoldment of science, improvement of morals, advancement of ideas, for such do tend to happiness. The text is a grand one; the aim is a benevolent one; breaking the bonds of slaves, the withes of superstition that shackle the minds of men. But that you know already, so I will not dilate upon it. I note "Informatian Wanted." I received a copy of Payne's Age of Reason. I did not send for it, nor do I want it. No use for it. Got plenty of waste paper now.

I hold that but few converts can be made to any cause by vilification and abuse without point or logic. Newspapers aspire to, and do, to a great extent, direct the minds of the people; and, as to obtain pure water the fountain must be pure, so, equally, should the fountain of thought be pure, and being pure, honest. Editors stand or fall by their own merits or demerits.

Question—Why do not would-be leaders of Liberalism show their colors? Why be a Spiritualist with Spiritualists, a Deist with such, an Atheist with Atheists, and so on ad infinitum, ad nauseum? The present time, when our psalm-singing theologues are busy kicking hell out of the devil, would be a good time to ask, Why heaven or hell? Why burn the old tick and save the rotten straw. Be consistent, my friends; don't go back on your classmates. If you are a Spiritualist, get into your place; go to church, pay your tithes, and stop kicking your mother; it is not filial. My dear Deists, don't throw mud at your ma; it is unkind; and, besides, you will want all the sand you've got to sand the track of your visionary railroad, that you may not slip when en route to your imaginary heaven. Man in life should live, for in death he dies. Give us ever material facts, not "Teed-ious" theories, and I am Yours ever,

W. C. MERVYN.

DENVER, BREMER COUNTY, IOWA, March 24, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am much pleased with the course you have pursued in the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am sorry that any pretended Liberal or relative of the great and good man, Thomas Paine, should disgrace his noble work, the "Age of Reason," by giving the title to such a paper as Seth Wilbur Payne is publishing.

I am much pleased with the flashing rays of truth from Ray Chapman, as he sends broadside after broadside into the hull of aristocracy; and let him remember that the strike at Pittsburgh was only the faint thunder of a terrible storm approaching. When wealth, which is the product of labor, is used to oppress labor and tyrannize over the laborer, and cannot be diverted from such unholy use, is any harm done to labor in wiping out such wealth?

What has become of our friend Syphers, and his Agitator? I received but three numbers of his paper. Was the agitation too great for the Agitator?

About a year ago "Dr. Huntoon" held seances here very similar to the one you describe in your last issue, yet now he pronounces it all a cheat and a humbug. But on this subject of immortality will you permit a friendly question: Can we be more certain of anything than that which has one end has two? If individual consciousness is eternal in the future, must it not also be eternal in the past? Is there any good reason for believing that light is detrimental to the audible speech of "spirits"? Yours, for the truth,

M. FARRINGTON.

JAMESTOWN, WIS., Feb. 22, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I can conceive how you felt when, after your arrest, letters began to pour in freighted with sympathy and love (which money cannot buy), and the one thing needful in law—stamps; how the heart would throb and swell, and every nerve would thrill and tingle with emotion. Well, then, you can understand somewhat how I felt upon the receipt of those two books sent soon after the receipt of my remittance. Please accept my thanks; and as soon as I can bring it about—some time between the first of May and the first of August next—I will remit; I don't think I can before. The book you are at work on now—the "Champions of the Church"—I want; will take as soon as I remit for those I have. I need not express the wish "May your health be spared to battle long and lustily," for philosophers are generally long-lived, contented, philanthropic. I expect that even you will live to see blood shed for the rights of man within the United States. Very respectfully yours, E. D. PEAKE.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., March 27, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: As thirteen States have already put themselves in line with the Liberal league movement—the same number that first constituted the United States of America—I thought you might desire to publish the names of the members of the several committees. They are names of which Liberals have reason to be proud. I hope the State committees of other States will soon be perfected. The committees already organized are as follows:

Arkansas.—John Ahrens, Monticello; S. J. Mathews, Monticello; W. D. Killian, Lacy; R. F. Foster, Monticello; D. H. Rousseau, Lincoln.

Iowa.—J. C. Micheun, Adel; J. H. Strong, Des Moines; C. De Roberts, Red Oak; E. C. Walker, Florence; E. H. Gibbs, Oskaloosa.

Kentucky.—S. B. Clark, Wilsonville; J. F. Reed, Fern Creek; Dr. Robert Gilbert, Waterford; Milburn Gunn, Jefferson; William P. Beard, Taylorsville.

Massachusetts.—W. H. Soyward, Dorchester; D. C. Crandon, Chelsea; A. B. Brown, Worcester; E. A. Sawtelle, Boston; G. H. Foster, Boston.

Michigan.—Karl Schmemann, Detroit; Mrs. Orrin Gillett, Parma; Elias E. Campuny, Burr Oak; A. Skinner, Cresco; C. Barker, Bay City.

Minnesota.—J. B. Bassett, Minneapolis; J. W. Emery, Farmington; M. J. Severance, Mankato; R. C. Mitchell, Duluth; Dr. Boutelle, Lake City.

New York.—H. L. Green, Salamanca; D. M. Bennett, New York; D. L. Crittenden, Rochester; John W. Truesdale, Syracuse; J. Albert Wilson, Albany.

New Hampshire.—William Little, Manchester; Dr. F. B. Ayer, Nashua; Dr. Carl H. Horsch, Dover; John H. Elliot, Keene; Roger W. Love, Claremont.

Nebraska.—L. W. Billingsley, Lincoln; N. W. Smails, Fremont; Fulton Gault, North Platte; H. W. Parker, Beatrice; Rev. W. C. Copeland, Lincoln.

Ohio.—S. D. Stark, Cleveland; C. W. Wendte, Cincinnati; A. E. McComber, Toledo; J. E. Boynton, Elyria; S. O. Kellogg, Berlin Heights.

South Carolina.—P. W. Fuller, Columbia; D. B. Derasure, Columbia; John Janes, Columbia; W. B. Stenhouse, Columbia; A. R. Able, Lexington.

Virginia.—S. Spaulding, Norfolk; Rev. J. M. Barnes, Lafayette; Elmina Drake Slenker, Snowville; T. F. Taylor, Richmond; Jas. B. Denton, Hanover Junction.

West Virginia.—Dr. A. M. Dent, Weston; Geo. A. Lees, Morgantown; S. E. Kuykendall, Parkersburg; Dr. J. B. Crumrine, Pennsboro; Emory G. Bennett, Fayetteville.

H. L. G.

SENECA CITY, S. C., March 24, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: For some time past I have been visited every week by THE TRUTH SEEKER, but did not know to whom I was indebted for the estimable favor until a few days ago, when I visited my brother at Central, Pickens county, and he informed me that you are the one who has placed me under such great obligations. I now avail myself of the opportunity to return to you my grateful acknowledgements, and am sorry that I cannot make you sensible of the depth of my gratitude. I have for a long time past, through the kindness of my brother, had the pleasure occasionally of seeing THE TRUTH SEEKER, but having but one hand, and being encumbered with an afflicted family, besides being very poor, I have never been able to subscribe. Ever since the late war I have had a hard struggle for life. My religious as well as my political views have caused me to suffer keen persecution. I have been ostracised and driven to the verge of despair. I was always an anti-slavery man, and you can readily conceive what kind of a life I have led, here in the South, and what kind I am still likely to lead.

Well, friend Bennett, some of your enemies (I am glad they are few) call you a beggar and a selfish fraud, but this one instance of your sending me THE TRUTH SEEKER gratuitously disproves all such slanderous slang, and sets your accusers down, in my estimation, as small fry.

I must again say ten thousand thanks for your kindness. I read THE TRUTH SEEKER diligently; my children read it and are well pleased with it; and I also hand it round among the elect, some of whom read it, and with them efficacy of prayer and brimstone is going into disrepute. I shall try and do all the good with the papers I can. I hope sometime to be able to remunerate you for your kind favor to me. Go on with that good work; put all the water to the big wheel that you can. The paradise you are striving to establish here on earth beats anything I have heard of in heaven. With sincere gratitude and best wishes, I am

Fraternally yours, R. T. CASEY.

FRIEND BENNETT: Do you sometimes insert in THE TRUTH SEEKER notices similar to the following? If so, and if you will publish this, you will do a most grateful kindness to a couple of our very unfortunate and suffering Liberal friends:

If any kind person seeing this can, without distress, spare something for a needy man, sick, very low, starving, dyspeptic, and wanting care, and whose wife is lame, permanently disabled, and an invalid, unable to do her work, let them do so soon. Send to S. L. Moore and wife, Vineland, N. J. Vineland people can certify to this. N.

SNOWVILLE, VA., March 24, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I have just read "Maria Monk," No. 9 of "Holy Cross Series." It is as interesting as a novel, and more so, for it is a literal picture of real life among the nuns, as she saw and lived it herself—a picture shadowed all over with cruel barbarities perpetrated upon young, helpless, innocent, defenseless females, even by those of their own sex, who, having supreme control and government, seemed to have no more scruples in taking the life of a human being than they would in taking that of a wild beast or a noxious insect. The poor nuns were reduced to a state of mere machines, coming, going, and thinking just as they were bid; and they believed implicitly the most monstrous superstitions and absurd statements that priestly craft and cunning subtlety could concoct for the purpose of keeping their infatuated victims in a state of ignorance and submission to their will.

The most cruel and inhuman punishment, even death itself, was the result of the least attempt to disobey the rules of the convent, or of any avowal of disbelief in the dogmas and ceremonies, or the infallibility, of the Church and its holy (?) ministers. Punishment seemed to constitute one of the chief recreations of the "bosses" of this pious home (!) for the fairest, purest, and best young maidens of the land—for these were generally the victims most sought after by the owners of the institution. Just think of one of these beautiful young innocents being hung up by the feet, compelled to chew glass, wear a cap which produced torture that no strong man could live under for an hour, or being forced to drink the water which the Superior had washed her feet in—and for, perhaps, no greater offense than washing her hands without permission!

Of all the good things thou hast done for the amelioration of the woes of humanity, I know of none for which I feel more like pouring out my gratitude than this one of publishing this exposure of priestcraft and its horrid cruelties and impositions upon the most innocent and helpless of all beings, the young and tender of my own sex; and once more do I gratefully thank thee for the "Holy Cross Series." Fraternally, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

PRAIRIE CITY, IOWA, March 11, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Herewith find draft for $7.00, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to each of the following names. . . . I wish to add to your wealth referred to by jealous Paine in his Smut Rag. I have received one copy of his vile sheet, and trust it will be the last. I consider him and his paper both glaring frauds. If he chooses to fight Brute Comstock's battles, let him get out of the Liberal ranks. Yours truly, IRA E. DRAPER.

BURR OAK, MICH., March 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find draft for $16.45, for which please send TRUTH SEEKERS, books, and photographs, as specified below. Those sending for THE TRUTH SEEKER had intended to subscribe for Payne's Age of Reason, on account of its costing but little. Even if there was but little of it, they would make that little do. But, seeing his envious disposition and proneness to misrepresent facts, they chose not to patronize a man in whom they could not place implicit confidence as to truth and veracity. Therefore you obtain their patronage, as also, no doubt, that of many others throughout the land, for the same reason; so you see that the evil intentions of misrepresenting facts for your injury have again worked a financial gain for you instead. M. P. THURSTON.

DEWEYVILLE, UTAH, March 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find $5.00 to pay for my paper up to date. If there is anything left, you will please accept it as a donation. I am sorry that I have not been able to pay up sooner; but money is very scarce out here in Utah, and it is very gratifying to me to be able to send you this amount. I am very much attached to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I don't feel like doing without it, if the times are hard; I feel liberal enough to pay my share towards keeping up THE TRUTH SEEKER. I distribute all my papers among my friends and acquaintances, in trying to get subscribers for you. They all like the style of the paper well enough, but they are pinched for means, and think they can't afford to pay for it. Well, you will please send the paper right along, and I will pay as I get the money. As soon as I can spare the money I will send for the "Champions," but can't afford it at present.

I feel glad that you got out of Comstock's clutches all right, and I think he hurt himself worse than he hurt you; in fact, I think this affair brought you a good many new subscribers. Wishing you every success in the good cause, I remain, Yours truly, JOHN GERMER.

Imported Saints.

Few people are aware that a very heavy duty is now levied upon imported saints. The other day, six large saints, averaging ten feet in height, and intended for niches in the new Roman Catholic Cathedral, arrived at the Custom-house in this City, and the importer was compelled to pay a duty upon them of about $400. This incident apprizes the public for the first time that the United States taxes imported saints—a fact that ought to excite a wide-spread indignation.

This duty upon saints is understood to be levied upon all refined saints that are imported in a marble, granite, or bronze condition. It may have been originally levied either for protection, for revenue, or out of a wicked hatred of saints. Now, it can very easily be shown that it is not a protective duty. We do not manufacture saints in this country, and, hence, have no need to protect ourselves from the competition of the pauper saints of Europe. So far, almost the only saint we have produced is our good President, and he is, strictly speaking, only a crude saint, who has not yet passed into a refined marble state. The six refined saints imported last week cannot lessen his value, since they in no way come into competition with him. They were, therefore, not taxed with any view to the protection of home-made saints, and there is no protectionist who will claim that the duty on imported saints needs to be retained out of regard to American manufacturers.

Neither could this duty have been imposed with the idea that it would be an important source of revenue. The importation of saints is so insignificant that the Treasury probably has not received a thousand dollars from this source within the last ten years. There is no demand here for saints, whether crude or refined. In a crude, or fleshly state, what few saints we now have are not regarded with very much enthusiasm.

Why, then, were saints so heavily taxed by the framers of the present tariff? Evidently because they hated saintliness and were determined to keep saints, whether crude or refined, out of the country. We can easily imagine what sort of men these haters of saints must have been, and without inquiring their names, we can feel perfectly certain that, if now living, they are among the most bitter opponents of President Hayes. They may be outwardly fair to look upon, but they are inwardly full of envy, silver bills, and all uncleanliness. They hate the good and love the evil. Did those men impose duties upon imported sinners? Did they tax opera bouffe artists or put a prohibitory duty upon English capitalists imported for the purpose of grinding the faces of the poor by building railroads? Certainly not. They did not care to what extent the sinners of Europe might be introduced into our country but they were determined that European saints should be kept out.

This is a manifest duty of the revisors of the tariff. They should strike out the tax on saints, and permit every man to import, free of duty, as many saints as he may desire. This should be done, not merely in order that we may supply ourselves with cheap saints, but that the stigma of hatred to saintliness may be removed from the tariff. The more saints we have, the better, if not precisely the merrier, we shall be.—N. Y. Times.

Hearts of Oak.

The temperance lecturer is often a periodical drunkard, and the well-dressed gentleman who from a public platform gives such good advice to the masses upon the duty of every man to save money is himself impecunious. Both these parties illustrate the difference between giving good advice and being able to act wisely. The two things are as wide apart as the poles. But we must remember that each of these men is trying to make his living. It would be well, however, if the political economist would remember to give practical advice, and to admit all the difficulties in the way of such advice as he does give being accepted. For instance, it is perfectly useless to insist that people who are compelled to spend all their salaries in order to live should save money. But this is the advice which the political economist of the rostrum is continually flaunting in their faces. The political economist, meanwhile, lives in a comfortable house, has plenty to eat and drink, ambles through life in a smiling way, and has plenty of debts and no money.

There are certain stern facts which ought to be faced. Thousands of good, honest men and women in this city cannot obtain situations, and live—heaven only knows how. Thousands more who have situations realize just enough to pay the necessary expenses of existence. It is in vain to tell such men to save money. To do so is mockery. It is foolish to imagine that they are not as well aware as anybody of the possible darkness of their future. The man who goes on from year to year, using up every penny of his salary in supporting his family, not in luxury, but merely in comfort, is visited daily, perchance, by misgivings and premonitions. He lives thus, not because he likes to do so, but because he must. Do not imagine that he does not feel the possible fate impending. He knows that death, sickness, accident, pennilessness, are among the dreadful possibilities that lie in wait. But he knows, in addition, that there are other possibilities that are brighter, and that the one thing is just as likely to happen to him as the other. So he keeps his heart of oak in its integrity, and remains a man all the way through.—Telegram.

Is Spiritualism Lunacy?

MRS. SAXON'S REPLY TO DE WITT TALMAGE.

The following notice of the lecture of a dear friend, we clip from the New Orleans Times:

An extraordinary religious meeting, for New Orleans, took place at Minerva Hall yesterday. Mrs. E. L. Saxon, the wife of one of our business men, and an intelligent and respectable lady, addressed a large, well-dressed and intelligent audience of Spiritualists in reply to an allusion made to them by DeWitt Talmage the previous Sunday. Many telling hits she made at Christianity were applauded, and the response to her points in favor of Spiritualism indicated that there is in this city a large and intelligent body of people who earnestly believe in these doctrines. One of them estimated their number at ten thousand.

The discourse was preceded by some very good music, when Col. Eldridge introduced the lecturess.

Mrs. Saxon is a pleasant, motherly, earnest-looking, middle-aged lady, with a good voice and good manner for public speaking. Her pronunciation was accurate and her whole lecture, though somewhat loosely put together, indicated that she has scholarly attainments. It was too long to permit of more than a synopsis of her argument. Many beautiful flights of rhetoric must be omitted.

She began with a brief eulogy on truth, arguing that it only demands a hearing. Next, she exalted her antagonist, Talmage. He is a schooled theologian, is very dear to the orthodox world, and ranks in this country second only to the Plymouth pastor.

Then she modestly disclaimed any ambition to measure intellectual swords with so talented a man, and disavowed all pretension to ability. But an insult stings a woman as well as a man, and the insult Talmage threw down when he said that modern Spiritualism is only fit to send people to the lunatic asylum, she proposed to pick up, impudent as it might seem. She said that she was a Southern-born woman, "not a stray Yankee lecturess," and that she has fulfilled in a manner satisfactory to all interested and in a manner which defies reproach, the duties of mother, wife, daughter, and sister. She was warmly urged to speak, and her course has the sanction of husband, brother, and son—all stand by her.

She then went into an argument to prove that while Talmage is denouncing Spiritualism as insanity, he is half way on the road to Spiritaulism himself, and that he only avoids arriving at their faith by stopping short and refusing to go forward from his own premises to their logical conclusion.

In speaking in his sermon of the lovely little orphan child, with death upon its sweet lips, suddenly opening its hands and exclaiming: "Mother! Mother!" he said that he knew that its dead mother hung over it. "But," added he, "I am no Spiritualist. Modern Spiritualism is only fit to send people to the lunatic asylum."

Here is the whole thing in a nut-shell. Here is a man preaching and fearing modern Spiritualism, and in the same breath denying and denouncing it.

Mrs. Saxon adduced other illustrations from his sermon to the same effect.

She then assailed the priests. She urged that kingcraft and priestcraft had ever been fast allies. The despot has always fostered the bigot, and the bigot has always sustained the despot. Open communion with the dead—Spiritualism—was a deathblow at the occupation of the priests, and hence their fierce antagonism to it. The priestly class, speaking mysteriously in an unknown tongue, has ever flourished and fattened by standing between the people and their Maker.

To maintain their supremacy they have deftly gathered within their control all the sacred affections of the human race. The natural union of two loving hearts in the tender ties of marriage has been converted into a source of priestly revenue and an instrument of priestly power. Dead and loved relatives are exiled from the consecrated ground to exalt the priestly influence, and when a little David of a baby comes to bless a virtuous wedded union, it is seized upon by the priests and made a source of emolument. And it is not painful, but it is profitable to belong to the Church; it brings wealth, influence, honors. It sells our goods; it enables us to secure help, and it gets votes.

But to be a Spiritualist is to be persecuted, not in the same form, but in the same spirit in which Christ was persecuted. It is to be ostracised; to be loathed; to have the so-called unmoving finger of scorn (directed by the priests) pointed at you; to be insulted; despised, and deprived of one's natural associations. The son of as pure and respectable parents as ever lived, recently, in Memphis, asked a young lady to dance with him. She refused because he did not believe in God. And so on to the end.

Mrs. Saxon ridiculed hell. When in childhood she sat under the droppings of the pulpit, her mind was so inflamed she continually heard the shrieks of the damned. She excited great laughter by imitating the dismal rural pastor who opened the floodgates of hell every Sunday, and insisted that all his hearers were miserable sinners and would certainly be scorched. She denounced as preposterous the idea that the God of infinite love for his children could ever consent to their eternal torment for yielding to the weakness he had himself implanted within them

She also considered it absurd to suppose God so weak and vain as to require millions of angels to stand around his throne for millions of years and sing his praises. Sweetness does not demand adulation. Even a great man would not like to have a crowd of admirers howling about him all the time. Here she told a story of the rescue of a little child, and quoted from John Hay:

"Saving a little child,
And bringing him to his own,
Is a derned sight better business
Than loafing around the throne."

Mrs. Saxon strongly appealed for a common-sense God and a common-sense religion, and enumerated the various miraculous Spiritualistic performances which inspire her faith. She said science does not and cannot solve them. When it does, she stands ready to be converted. She also exposed some bogus exposures of Spiritualism. When a man wants to make money out of the Church he defends it. When he wants to make money out of Spiritualism he pretends to expose it.

If she should die of that loathsome disease, cancer of the stomach, people would say it was the punishment of God sent on her. If her neighbor, with the fifteen hundred dollar pew in the fine church, should die of the same disease, people would say that God chastens those he loves.

Mrs. Saxon said she had never had anything to do with sending missionaries to the benighted people of distant lands, but that she had closely studied and studiously sought to civilize the barbarians of New Orleans. She hoped that Japan, the nation where they don't get drunk, would send over a few missionaries to help her out.

She cited the immense wealth of the churches, consecrated to vanity, and denounced their exemption from taxation, while the overtaxed soldier's widow, with the scant earnings of her needle, can scarcely feed and clothe her little ones.

Finally, Mrs. Saxon read from Talmage that there are 10,000 Spiritualists in the lunatic asylums, and also some statistical facts in reply, which showed that of 28,000, inmates of asylums, 28 are there from Spiritualism and 472 are there from religious excitement, of whom 232 are clergymen. Thus, 2,000,000 of Spiritualists are taxed to support these institutions without any fair representation.

"Christians, from the mighty strongholds of wealth and power, scowl upon science in derision. Have they not invested in their costly temples, all untaxed, in which they worship the meek and lowly Jesus, $354,485,581, aside from their parsonages, worth $54,115,297 more? Have not their possessions in twenty years increased over 200,000,000?"

We own no halls, we build no churches; our God needs no temple; our praise cannot add to his glory; our weak and puny efforts cannot stir his anger. He sends his ministering spirits, and they bind our broken hearts with the tenderness of love's memories. They bid us hope all things, endure all things, for well we know that suffering "chastens, and sorrow ennobles."

It is impossible to present more than a brief outline of Mrs. Saxon's interesting lecture. She contended very earnestly, and often eloquently, for the truth of the doctrine of communion with spirits of the dead, and illustrated her discourse with anecdotes and arguments drawn from her own experience.

The Excelsior Teachers' Agency.—The promptest, simplest, most extensive and efficient in this country. An old and successful agency now enlarged and improved under a new name. School authorities needing teachers and those wishing positions are invited to correspond. Address the nearest office. Principal Offices: Boston, Albany, Washington, New Orleans, Senton, Mich., and Salt Lake City, Utah. Subscribe for the Educational News Gleaner & Advertiser. 50 cents a year. S. W. APPLEGATE, Superintendent. 1114

Matrimonial.

AN accomplished and good-looking daughter of a Southern planter, who is a Freethinker, would correspond with a gentleman of similar views and of honorable character, with a view to matrimony, if willing to live in the home of her aged father—a widower—whose home she supervises. Address "TRUST," this office. 3t13

KANSAS LAND FOR SALE.

Eighty and one hundred and sixty acres of Kansas land. Soil of the BEST QUALITY; TIMBER AND RUNNING WATER. Well adapted for Stock Raising. Address
G. H KRUSCHKE,
4t12 Davenport, Iowa.

THE SPIRITUAL OFFERING.

Vol. II., Commencing May 1, 1878.

A Monthly 48-page Magazine, devoted to the Interests of Humanity from a Spiritual and Scientific Standpoint. Published in Springfield, Mo., $1.25 per annum. D. M. Fox and Nettie Pease Fox, Editors.

Regular Contributors.

Prof. S. B. Brittan, Wm. Emmette Coleman, Mrs. Kate Osborn, Mrs. E. G. Planck, Wm. F. Jamieson, Prof. Wm. Denton, Warren Chase, J. S. Loveland, John Wetherbee, J. S. Ludlam, Esq., Miss Belle Bush, James Straub, A. W. St. John, Mrs. H. F. M. Brown, Dr. D. Higbee.

THE SPIRITUAL OFFERING, the first year of its existence, has obtained a circulation, more or less, in thirty-five States of the Union, and probably no Liberal paper or magazine ever published has in so short a time from its commencement given more universal satisfaction.

In our list of regular contributors will be found some of the best writers in the ranks of Spiritualism and Liberalism. We expect soon to add to the list of names othes eminent writers, men and women.

In the March number we commenced a department specially devoted to the review and critical notice of new publications, which will hereafter constitute an interesting feature of the magazine.

With the new volume we inaugurate a department devoted to the careful consideration and record of phenomenal Spiritualism, gathered from the most reliable sources in our own and foreign lands. Other improvements and enlargement to sixty-four pages are contemplated at an early date, if our friends will at once exert themselves in our behalf. The price is so very low that we trust every Spiritualist and Liberalist will regard it as an obligation to sustain the efforts we are making to publish a first-class magazine at a lower price than ever before attempted. To aid our friends in getting subscribers, we have arranged to send

The Offering and Banner of Light one year, $4 00
The Offering and Freethought Journal, an exponent of modern, English, German, and American Scientific Materialism, a monthly, both for 2 00

The orders for these publications should come through this office. All new subscribers can make quite a saving by availing themselves of this offer. The price of the Offering is so low we cannot offer commisions. If our friends work for us, they do so from a desire to extend our circulation, which must be large to sustain the magazine at present price.

It will be conducted independently, impartially. Nothing looking to man's welfare will be deemed alien to its pages. Unrestricted discussion of all questions of humanitarian import will be ever maintained by it. Offensive personalities and indelicacy of language will be wholly excluded. In its editorial conduct, the truth, beauty, and utility of Spiritualism in its higher phases will be advanced. It will not in any particular be a sectarian journal, but broad, progressive, and liberal—will give fair and equal expression to all forms of thought. "A fair field and no favor" it extends to all. Above all things, it aims to be Liberal, to be devoted to Liberalism in its broadest, most extensive application.

With this understanding, we appeal to our patrons, and all who would aid us in this work, to respond immediately. We desire to know as near as may be, at as early a date as possible, the number of copies of new volume necessary to print. Address SPIRITUAL OFFERING, Springfield, Mo. 2t14

JUST OUT!

AURICULAR CONFESSION
AND
Popish Nunneries.

BY WM. HOGAN.

Twenty-five years Confessing Priest. A very interesting work. 220 pages. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.
D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

TRUE TIME. $5,000 GOLD. The GENUINE Swiss Marseilla COMPASS, INDICATOR AND TIME-KEEPER. A perfect GEM for the pocket. Worth many times the price, for every traveller, lodge, boy, farmer, and for EVERYBODY desiring a reliable Time-Keeper and also a superior Compass. Usual watch size, steel works, glass crystal, all in a neat BRONZE case. Perfection guaranteed. WARRANTED to denote correct time and to keep in order self fairly used—for two years. Nothing like it! This perfect triumph of mechanism will be sent, in a neat case, prepaid to any address, for only $1.50; 3 for $3.00. Circulars sent free. BEWARE of a "bogus" article offered at a "cheap price." Our the BEST.—Try the Genuine. Send all orders to the sole Agents, J. G. KING & CO., Brattleboro', Vt.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF

CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact fac simile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is in England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on live issues with a promptitude unequaled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest, cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers.

The following are a few of the contributors: Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, Goldwin Smith, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Lionel A. Tallemache, M. E. Grant Duff, M. P., Hon. Robert Lowe, Leslie Stephen, John Morley (the editor), G. H. Lewes, Alfred R. Wallace, Frederick Harrison, Prof. Tyndall, Prof. Huxley, Prof. Darwin, Prof. Clifford (author of supernatural religion), Sir John Lubbock, Anthony Trollope, T. Adolphus Trollope, Sir H. S. Maine, Sir David Wedderburn, and numerous others.

Published every month.

Rose-Belford Publishing Co.,
tf 60 York St, Toronto, Ont.

Subscription Price, $5.00 per year.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

Address D. M. BENNETT, Publisher
141 Eighth St., New York.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COLLECTION

OF

FORMS, HYMNS, AND RECITATIONS.

Forms for organizing Societies, Forms for Constitutions and By-laws, for Funeral Services, Marriage Services, Naming of Infants, Obituary Notices, Epitaphs, Wills, etc. Also, nearly 500 Liberal and Spiritualistic Hymns, original and selected; for Public Meetings, Funerals, Social Gatherings, etc., etc. The whole supplemented by a fine selection of Recitations, comprising many of the finest poetical gems in the language. Nearly 600 pages, at the extremely low price of 75 cents in cloth. The price is made low, so that every family can have a copy. Let none fail to have it. D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE. Truly one of the most valuable works that have appeare within the last ten years. By PROF. DRAPER. Price, $1.75.

BEYOND THE VEIL

A very neat and entertaining volume, giving beautiful descriptions of life, occupations, etc., in the Spirit World. Dictated by the spirit of Percy B. Randolph, through the mediumship of Mrs. Francis H. McDougal and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson of California. With a steel-plate engraving of Dr. Randolph.

Price $1.50, post-paid by mail.

D. M. BENNETT
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

DO YOU WANT Books, Cards, Prints, Chromos, Albums, Photographs, Albums, Gold Pens, Pencils, Paper, Stationery, Knick-knacks, Notions, Novelties of every description? Beware of unreliable peddlers—send only to the old, original and only "HEADQUARTERS!" Established, 1860. We originated what is now an enormous trade. We import books weekly. Supply all Scientific, Legal, Medical, scarce, foreign and other books not often to be obtained—in fact, supply ANYTHING AND EVERYTHING in the Book or any other line. Our large store has four floors crowded with books on every known subject, and all offered very low. CATALOGUES FREE. Information given. Send stamp, and send now. Address, HUNTER & CO., PUBLISHERS, BINGHALE, N. H.

ALIUNDE;

OR,

LOVE VENTURES.

Illuminated Cover, paper, 12mo, 226 pp. Postpaid, Fifty Cents.

A ROSY-TINTED record of love in the tropics, with strange and startling adventures thereto belonging. It is like drinking wine, yellow as gold, with a rare, delicate flavor; it seems to melt in the mouth and glide down the throat, filling your whole being with some dreamy, delicious perfume of charmed Eastern lands of love and romantic story.

The ventures and adventures of Tom, Dick and Harry on the blue, mist-encircled Islands of Koro-kama and Launa-gola, seem to be but a thinly veiled satire on the money-grubbing, utilitarian spirit of life in the United States at the present time. The passion of the handsome Islanders for personal beauty, which is most graphically and amusingly described in the scene where they make the three young fellows undress in the native Council House of the Chief Zah-Zah, is probably intended as a burlesque on some of our own civilized customs.

As to costume in the Islands, being just under the equator, it would be treating the equator, and the heat thereabout, with extreme disrespect to wear any—that is, worth speaking of. Adam and Eve did not dress until they got those famous biblical leaves of absence—fig-leaves.

Descriptions of Island life, as led by Tom, Dick and Harry, three handsome young fellows from Washington City, almost make the mouth water. Glimpses of beckoning palm-trees, foamy cascades, bread-fruit and cocoanuts, pineapples, fresh figs, bananas, and universal love-making at moonlit banquets, fill many a page of the book. We have the voluptuous Island dance of the Ka-lu-lah vaguely touched upon, and the amber-tinted wine served by pretty girls at the feast of Launa-gola, and its effects finely described.

Life on far-away "Summer isles of Eden lying in dim purple spheres of sea," has for most persons a dreamy, poetic charm. Bathing in the tumbling surf on shining sands, and basking on shores of eternal summer, with nothing to do but to enjoy all the delights of a profuse and opulent Nature, seems very alluring to the care-worn, over-worked American of to-day.

The religion of the Islanders is described, and some discussions indulged in by the three youths, one of whom is a Catholic, one a Jew, and the other a Protestant. An attempt is made to convert the gay and happy Aliundeans to Christianity, but the priests of Koro-kama decline with thanks, and defend their own views—for they have "views" out there, just as we have in the United States.—Hebrew Leader.

THE contents are far from being impure, and there is no reason why they should not be taken for what they import to be—namely, the description of real experiences happening on one of those far-off islands of the Pacific which seem to have floated into this epoch out of a golden age. Mr. Harry Julian has done what he could do and what he wanted to do, and he has conveyed to his pages something of the primal freshness and the balmy brightness of the tropic waters in which he laved and the tropic shores on which he wandered. To those beautiful isles of the sea he did not carry with him any of those squeamish conventionalities which would have prevented his having an emphatically good time. Still in his teens, as were also his two chums, he made love to some dark-eyed and voluptuous daughter of the seas, and became as much married as most warm-natured youths would have become under similar circumstances. We could wish that the realism of his descriptions had been relieved with more frequent glimpses of finer spiritual sentiment. But the book has a healthy animal flavor about it, and we are not surpfised that Mr. Julian is anxious to get back again among his young companions, the handsome youths and beautiful maidens, who were "naked and not ashamed."—N. Y. Eve. Telegram.

CHARLES P. SOMERBY,

PUBLISHER, BOOKSELLER, IMPORTER AND PRINTER,

139 EIGHTH ST. (Bet. Broadway and Fourth Ave.), NEW YORK.

NICOTIANA ANTIDOTUM.

THE

Great Magnetic Remedy.

DO YOU SMOKE?
DO YOU CHEW?
DO YOU USE TOBACCO IN ANY FORM?

If you have formed either of these habits, you have many times resolved to break from their slavery, and the vain attempt has shown you what iron masters control your will. The untold millions wasted in the production and manufacture of tobacco is insignificant in comparison to the waste of health and life by its use. If the character and results of the habit were known at the beginning, in few cases would the appetite be formed. Once formed, the victim is unable to break away, and an appeal to the Will, in most cases is ineffective. Guided by the unerring principles of science, a profound study of the organic and mental changes produced by the habit, and of the compensating remedies Nature has prepared in the vegetable kingdom, has enabled us to prepare an antidote for the poisoned condition of the system, which necessitates the use of tobacco.

The habitual use of Tobacco is the cause of inconceivable disease, pain, and misery, and is the gateway to strong drink, the highway to crime. It enslaves, and although exhilarating for a time, results in lassitude, weakness, want of energy, dyspepsia, heart-disease, apoplexy, and nervous prostration. It changes the entire constitution of the physical body, and thereby is impressed on the mind. It at first acts as a poison, the system attempts to throw it off, but constant use overcomes this repulsion.

It is the object of this remedy to supply, for the time, the place of tobacco, stimulating the processes of elimination and recuperation until the system is again in a natural and healthy condition, when the desire formed will be no longer felt—in other words, the habit cured.

If the printed directions accompanying each package are followed we warrant the REMEDY to cure the most obstinate cases, if it does not, the money will be refunded.

Price, $2.00 per box. Liberal discount to Druggists and Agents buying by the Dozen or Gross.

Remittances may be made by Money Order, Draft, or Registered letter at our risk.

Address,
J. A. HEINSOHN & CO., Manufacturers.
9t8 CLEVELAND, OHIO.

SEEDS.

Best and Cheapest in America, or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from Grower, postage or express paid, and get fresh, true, and reliable seeds. I can and shall beat any firm in America in quality and low prices. Beautiful illustrated Seed Catalogues and Garden Guide free.

Address R. H. SHUMWAY,
10t5 Seed Grower, Rockford, Ill.

PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION; or an answer to the question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Divinely-Inspired and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

GOLD Any worker can make $12 a day at home. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.
1y7

Works of Thomas Paine.

COMMON SENSE. His first and most important political work. Clear type. Paper, 15 cts.

THE CRISIS. Containing Nos. I. to XVI., inclusive. Written in the "times that tried men's souls" during the American Revolution. 12mo. Full, clear type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth 80 cts.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN. Written in defense of his fellow man. A work almost without a peer in the world. On full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON. On large, clear type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON AND AN EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Full, bold type. 12mo. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. Complete in one volume, on full, bold type. Containing "Common Sense," "The Crisis" (sixteen numbers), and "The Rights of Man," with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. Complete. 12mo. Composed of the "Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "An Essay on Dreams," "Of the Religion of Deism," etc., etc., with a life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

THOMAS PAINE'S GREAT WORKS. Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Containing a Life of Paine, his POLITICAL WRITINGS—"Common Sense," "The Crisis," "Rights of Man"—his THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS—"Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "An Essay on Dreams," "Letter to Camille Jordan," "Of the Religion of Deism"—all in one large volume, crown-octavo, of THE TRUTH SEEKER LIBRARY, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3.00; colored leather, red burnished edges, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. By Calvin Blanchard. 12mo. Large, clear type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Published by

D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth st., New York.

The Popes and Their Doings.

NO. 3 OF THE "HOLY CROSS SERIES."

Being brief stories of fully one hundred and fifty of the conspicuous and sinful Popes—the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God—who filled the chair of the Holy See in Rome during several centuries. The cheapest and most popular history of the Popes ever written. A friend styles it "rich, rare and racy." 273 pp., 12mo. Sent by mail at the very low price of 50 cents in paper; 75 cents in cloth.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine. 1y7

The Career of Religious Ideas;

THEIR ULTIMATE,

The Religion of Science.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

An able examination of the Religions of the World—the subjects treated as follows: Chap. I.—Introductory; Chap. II.—What is Religion? Chap. III.—Fetishism; Chap. IV.—Polytheism; Chap. V.—Monotheism; Chap. VI.—Value of Ancient Bibles; Chap. VII.—Man's Moral Progress Dependent upon his Intellectual Growth; Chap. VIII.—Theological Problems; Chap. IX.—Man's Fall; Chap. X.—Free Will, Necessity, Responsibility; Chap. XI.—Duties and Obligations of Man to God; Chap. XII.—The Ultimate of Religious Ideas.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents. Postage prepaid. D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St. N. Y.

BROUGHTONS INVIGORATING SYRUP. 25 CTS.

A certain cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Stomach, Liver or Kidney Diseases, Weakness, &c. 25 cents per bottle. Incurable cases solicited and cured or money refunded. The same ingredients put up in powders to be sent by mail. Sample bottle, circular, and Advice Free, 495 Broome St., N. Y. 26t5

THE MAGNETIC TREATMENT.

Send 25 cents to DR. ANDREW STONE, Troy, N. Y., and obtain a large, highly-illustrated book on the system of Vitalizing Treatment. Also The New Gospel of Health for $1.25, a masterly work on progressive medicine and healing by magnetism, 519 pages, illustrated with 120 cuts for personal manipulations, explanatory of the sublime science of healing without medicine. 1y5

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

POSITIVELY

$50 WORTH OF INFORMATION

in form of a nice book of over 100 pages, well illustrated, sent post-paid, for $1.00

BY A PRACTICAL CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep the hens and hen-roosts free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in mid-winter. How to manage setting hens, chickens, etc., and how to preserve eggs a great length of time. Best breeds of hens, etc. Enclose $1.00 with order.

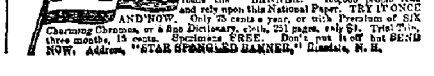
E. D. BLAKEMAN, Circleville, Ohio.

[Mr. Blakeman is a school-boy friend of ours. We know him well; he is entirely reliable, and the information he has to impart upon the poultry subject is valuable.—ED. T. S.] 9tf

TWO BOOKS ON FINANCE.

SPECIFIC PAYMENTS BETTER THAN SPECIE PAYMENTS.

BY EDWARD D. LINTON.



CONVERSATIONS ON THE CURRENCY.

BY EDW'D D. LINTON AND GEO. D. DRURY.

The question to be met and settled now is, Shall money continue to rule and curse mankind, or shall it be made to serve and bless?

Price 25c. For sale at this office.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine. 1y7

"UNCLE SAM'S" The old, original and only "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," the "FAMILY FAVORITE" and "Welcome Visitor" for THE MILLION. Established, 1863. There's nothing like it. All old and young, rich and poor, saint and sinner, "Welcome for ALL." It is a large 64-column, 8 page paper, crowded with charming Tales, Sketches, Stories, Poems, Wit, Humor, Fun, Recipes, Puzzles, Humorous Poems, etc., etc., in its "ROGUE'S CORNER," every Saturday. Quack, Humbug, and Fraud is fully, freely, and truthfully exposed. No one can be swindled who reads the "BANNER." 100,000 people read and rely upon this National Paper. TRY IT ONCE AND NOW. Only 75 cents a year, or with Premium of SIX Charming Chromos, or a Rose Dictionary, cloth, 352 pages, only $1. Trial Trip, three months, 15 cents. Specimens FREE. Don't put it off but SEND NOW. Address, "STAR SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

Gems of Thought.

PHYSIC, for the most part is nothing else but the substitute of exercise and temperance.—Addison.

IT IS NOT difficult to do good, for the means are constantly clustering about every man's lips and hands.

THAT state of life is most happy where superfluities are not required and necessaries not wanting.—Plutarch.

REPUTATION is a most idle and most false imposition, oft got without merit, and lost without deserving.—Shakspere.

THE seat of knowledge is in the head; of wisdom in the heart. We are sure to judge wrong if we do not feel right.—Hazlitt.

O, THEOLOGY! Theology! thou fillest the earth with knaves, heaven with fools, and hell with noble men and women!—Anon.

PRIDE is like the beautiful acacia, that lifts its head proudly above its neighbor plants, forgetting that it too, like them, has its root in the dirt.

WHAT a pity hell is exploded! The above being true, far better would it have been that earth and heaven should have passed away.—Anon.

ALL supernatural religions have ever been true to the rabble, equally false to the philosopher, and equally useful to the cunning statesman.—Anon.

WE SHALL never learn to feel and respect our real calling and destiny unless we have taught ourselves to consider everything as moonshine compared with the education of the heart.

THERE never did and never will exist anything permanently noble and excellent in a character which was a stranger to the exercise of resolute self-denial.—Walter Scott.

BEFORE thou reprehend another, take heed thou are not culpable in what thou goest about to reprehend. He that cleanses a blot with blotted fingers makes a great blurr.—Quarles.

THE young girl who begins to experience the necessity of loving seeks to hide it; but the desire of pleasing betrays the secret of her heart, and sometimes reveals her hopes.—Beauchere.

HASTE turns usually upon a matter of ten minutes too late, and may be avoided by a habit like that of Lord Nelson, to which he ascribed his success in life, of being ten minutes too early.—Bovee.

IT IS for the most part in our skill in manners, and in observance of time and place and of decency in general, that what is called taste by way of distinction consists, and which in reality is no other than a more refined judgment.—Burke.

MANNERS are the shadows of virtues; the momentary display of those qualities which our fellow-creatures love and respect. If we strive to become, then, what we strive to appear, manners may often be rendered useful guides to performances of our duties.—Sydney Smith.

WE ARE ruined, not by what we really want, but by what we think we do; therefore, never go abroad in search of your wants; if they be real wants they will come home in search of you, for he that buys what he does not want will soon want what he cannot buy.—Colton.

TRUTH is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out. It is always near at hand, and sits upon our lips ready to drop out before we are aware; whereas a lie is troublesome, and sets a man's invention upon the rack, and one trick needs a great many more to make it good.—Tillotson.

THE most agreeable of all companions is a simple, frank man, without any high pretentions to an oppressive greatness: one who loves life, and understands the use of it; obliging alike at all hours; above all, of a golden temper, and steadfast as an anchor. For such a one we gladly exchange the greatest genius, the most brilliant wit, the profoundest thinker.

NO OBLIGATION to justice does force a man to be cruel or to use the sharpest sentence. A just man does justice to every man and everything; and then, if he be also wise, he knows there is a debt of mercy and compassion due to the infirmities of man's nature: and that is to be paid; and he that is cruel and ungentle to a sinning person, and does the worst to him, dies in his debt and is unjust.—Jeremy Taylor.

ONE of the greatest hindrances to progress is believing we possess absolute truth, instead of realizing the impossibility of our finite minds containing anything more than the shadow of finite causation and eternal truth. Highest of all the attributes of our nature stands justice. It sounds the key-note, and all our faculties and desires must come into harmony with it, before discord and suffering can be banished from our lives.—Keeth and Reed, in Our Thought.

OH! what a delight and ecstacy it is to be free to think as we please, and seize any truth that presents itself, without stopping to ask whether it will fit into the old theological groove or not. The farther you travel on in the beautiful paths of real truth, the more you are pleased and fascinated with its charms, and the more attractive is the journey. Truth is so winning and alluring that having once enjoyed her companionship you will never be satisfied to cease your pursuit after her, and she inevitably leads all her followers and earnest and sincere worshipers to the safe, sure, and reliable goal of Atheism.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

AN ex-acting fellow—A retired player.

A CRUEL act—Pulling down the "blind."

WHEN a young lady gives herself away, she naturally loses her self-possession.

OUR boarding house has three kinds of pie on Sunday evenings; Pie, mince pie, and cheese.

GIRLS are called sweet little ducks when they come out of the milliner's hands, because they show an enormous bill.

IT is the same with oysters in a church-fair stew as with young people in love—two are company and three are a crowd.

THE manufacture of corsets has become so perfected that hugging a girl is about as satisfactory as squeezing a parlor stove—so we have been told.

"ARE you a Christian?" asked a spectacled colporteur, of a flower girl on Broadway, the other day. "No sir; I'm a Buddhist was the prompt reply."

"There's one thing I don't like about gentlemen," said a little four-year-old boy of our acquaintance. "What is it, Florry?" queried mama. "I don't like to be fondled," said the child. She will though when she grows older.

AN Alabama paper, speaking of Florida, unconsciously gets off this fishy remark: "There are numerous lakes of pure water filled with fish, some of which are only a few rods in length, while others are from two to ten miles long.

HE went to see the "Two Exiles." While the poor famished outcasts were rejoicing over their first loaf of white bread, the cruel authorities marched off with their goat. "Too bad," said he, "just as they have got a nice loaf of bread, they lose their butter."

AT dinner the other evening a fond parent asked his gracious three-year-old if he would have some lamb. The youth screwed his face up until it looked like a wet day in spring, and, jamming one fist into his eye, ejaculated: "I don't want that kind of lamb; I want one to play with."

Said Sarah to her Noah, "Dear.
This world would surely be
A desert with no oasis
Were I bereft of thee."
"Ah, love!" said he; "here's one who in
That sentiment's a sharer—
A Noah, sis, who will not be
Bereft of his Sahara."

A MAN who had fallen from a window while drunk was a sad spectacle in Philadelphia the other day. Among the crowd who surveyed the crushed and groaning form was a Front street merchant. He stood with blanched cheek for a moment, and then in a voice of horror, exclaimed: "Such is the evil of intemperance. Let's take a drink," without noting the inconsistency of his speech.

MISS EDITH HELPS THINGS ALONG.

(From the Independent.)

"My sister'll be down in a minute, and says
you're to wait, if you please,
And says I might stay 'till she came, if I'd promise her never to tease,
Nor speak 'till you spoke to me first. But that's nonsense, for how would you know
What she told me to say if I didn't? Don't you really and truly think so?

"And then you'd feel strange here alone! And you wouldn't know just where to sit;
For that chair isn't strong on its legs, and we never used it a bit.
We keep it to match with the sofa. But Jack says it would be like you
To flop yourself right down upon it and knock out the very last screw.

"S'pose you try? I won't tell. You're afraid to! Oh! you're afraid they would think it was mean!
Well, then, there's the album—that's pretty,
if you're sure that your fingers are clean.
For sister says sometimes I daubit; but she only says that when she's cross.
There's her picture. You know it? It's like her; but she ain't as good looking, of course!

"This is ME. It's the best of 'em all. Now, tell me, you'd never have thought
That once I was little as that? It's the only one that could be bought—
For that was the message to Pa from the photograph man where I sat—
That he wouldn't print any more till he first got his money for that.

"What? Maybe you're tired of waiting. Why, often she's longer than this.
There's all her back hair to do up and all of her front curls to friz.
But it's nice to be sitting here talking like grown people, just you and me;
Do you think you'll be coming here often? Oh, do! But don't come like Tom Lee.

"Tom Lee. Her last beau. Why, my goodness!
He used to be here day and night,
Till the folks thought that he'd be her husband;
and Jack says that gave him a fright.
You won't run away, then, as he did? for you're not a rich man, they say.
Pa says you are poor as a church-mouse. Now are you? And how poor are they?

"Ain't you glad that you met me? Well, I am:
for I know now your hair isn't red.
But what there is left of it's mousy, and not what that naughty Jack said.
But there! I must go. Sister's coming. But I wish I could wait, just to see
If she ran up to you and she kissed you in the way that she used to kiss Lee."

BRET HARTE.

Truth Seeker Tracts.

No.	(REVISED LIST.)	Cts.
1.	Discussion on Prayer. D. M. Bennett and two Clergymen.	8
2.	Oration on the Gods. Ingersoll.	10
3.	Thomas Paine.	5
4.	Arraignment of the Church. Ingersoll.	5
5.	Heretics and Heresies. "	5
6.	Humboldt. "	5
7.	The Story of Creation. Bennett.	5
8.	The Old Snake Story. "	2
9.	The Story of the Flood. "	5
10.	The Plagues of Egypt. "	2
11.	Korah, Datham, and Abiram. Bennett.	2
12.	Balaam and his Ass. "	2
13.	Arraignment of Priestcraft. "	8
14.	Old Abe and Little Ike. Syphers.	3
15.	Come to Dinner. "	2
16.	Fog Horn Documents. "	2
17.	The Devil Still Ahead. "	2
18.	Slipped Up Again. "
19.	Joshua Stopping the Sun and Moon. D. M. Bennett.	5
20.	Samson and his Exploits. Bennett.	2
21.	The Great Wrestling Match. "	2
22.	Discussion with Elder Shelton. "	10
23.	Reply to Elder Shelton's Fourth Letter. D. M. Bennett.	3
24.	Christians at Work. Wm. McDonnell.	5
25.	Discussion with Geo. Snode. Bennett.	5
26.	Underwood's Prayer.	1
27.	Honest Questions and Honest Answers. D. M. Bennett.	5
28.	Alessandro di Cagliostro. C. Sotheran.	10
29.	Paine Hall Dedication Address. B. F. Underwood.	2
30.	Woman's Rights & Man's Wrongs. Syphers.	2
31.	Gods and God-houses. "	2
32.	The God's of Superstition and the God of the Universe. D. M. Bennett.	3
33.	What has Christianity Done? Preston.	3
34.	Tribute to Thomas Paine. "	2
35.	Moving the Ark. D. M. Bennett.	1
36.	Bennett's Prayer to the Devil.	2
37.	Short Sermon. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	1
38.	Christianity not a Moral System. X. Y. Z.	3
39.	The True Saint. S. P. Putnam.	3
40.	Bible of Nature vs. The Bible of Men. J. Syphers.	3
41.	Our Ecclesiastical Gentry. Bennett.	1
42.	Elijah the Tishbite. "	3
43.	Christianity a Borrowed System. "	3
44.	Design Argument Refuted. Underwood.	2
45.	Elisha the Prophet. Bennett.	3
46.	Did Jesus Really Exist? "	3
47.	Cruelty and Credulity of the Human Race. Dr. Daniel Arter.	5
48.	Freethought in the West. G. L. Henderson.	5
49.	Sensible Conclusions. E. E. Guild.	3
50.	Jonah and the Big Fish. D. M. Bennett.	1
51.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets. No. 1.	5
52.	Marples-Underwood Debate, Underwood.	3
53.	Questions for Bible Worshipers. B. F. Underwood.	2
54.	An Open Letter to Jesus Christ. Bennett.	5
55.	The Bible God Disproved by Nature. W. E. Coleman.	8
56.	Bible Contradictions.	1
57.	Jesus Not a Perfect Character. Underwood.	2
58.	Prophecies.	2
59.	Bible Prophecies Concerning Babylon. B. F. Underwood.	2
60.	Ezekiel's Prophecies Concerning Tyre. B. F. Underwood.	2
61.	History of the Devil. Isaac Paden.	5
62.	The Jews and their God. "	10
63.	The Devils Due-Bills. John Syphers.	3
64.	The Ills we Endure—their Cause and Cure. D. M. Bennett.	2
65.	Short Sermon No. 2. Rev. Theologicus, D.D.	2
66.	God Idea in History. H. B. Brown.	5
67.	Sixteen Truth Seeker Leaflets No. 2.	5
68.	Ruth's Idea of Heaven and Mine. Susan H. Wixon.	2
69.	Missionaries. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	2
70.	Vicarious Atonement. J. S. Lyon.	3
71.	Paine's Anniversary. C. A. Codman.	3
72.	Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. D. M. Bennett.	2
73.	Foundations. John Syphers.	3
74.	Daniel in the Lion's Den. Bennett.	2
75.	An Hour with the Devil. "	10
76.	Reply to Erastus F. Brown. D. M. Bennett.	3
77.	The Fear of Death. D. M. Bennett.	5
78.	Christmas and Christianity. D.M.Bennett.	5
79.	The Relationship of Jesus, Jehovah, and the Virgin Mary. W. E. Coleman.	2
80.	Address on Paine's 139th Birthday. Bennett.	5
81.	Hereafter, or the Half-way House. John Syphers.	1
82.	Christian Courtesy. Bennett.	2
83.	Revivalism Examined. Dr. A. G. Humphrey.	5
84.	Moody's Sermon on Hell. Rev. J. P. Hopps, London.	2
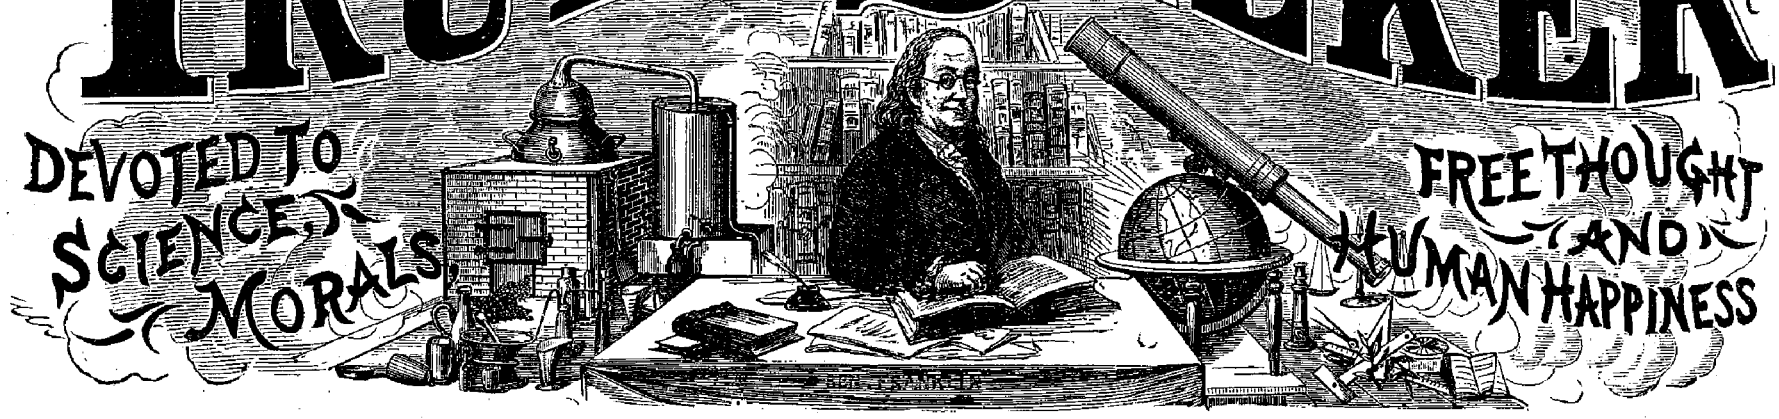
85.	Matter, Motion, Life and Mind. Bennett.	10
86.	An Enquiry about God's Sons. "	2
87.	Freethought Judged by its Fruits. B. F. Underwood.	1
88.	David, God's Peculiar Favorite. Mrs. E. D. Slenker.	3
89.	Logic of Prayer. Charles Stephenson.	3
90.	Bible-Mania. Otter Cordates.	2
91.	Our Ideas of God. B. F. Underwood.	1
92.	The Bible; is it Divinely Inspired? Dr. D. Arter.	5
93.	Obtaining Pardon for Sins. Hudson Tuttle.	1
94.	The New Raven. Will Cooper.	5
95.	Jesus Christ. D. M. Bennett.	10
96.	Ichabod Crane Papers.	10
97.	Special Providences. W. S. Bell.	2
98.	Snakes. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.	2
99.	Do the Works of Nature prove a Creator? Sciota.	5
100.	The Old and the New. R. G. Ingersoll.	5
101.	110th Anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday. Bennett et als.	5
102.	The Old Religion and the New. W. S. Bell.	1
103.	Does the Bible Teach us all we Know. Bennet.	2
104.	Evolution of Isrrel's God. A. L. Rawson.	10
105.	Decadence of Christianity. Capphro.	2
106.	Franklin, Washington and Jefferson Unbelievers. Bennett.	2
107.	The Safe Side. H. B. Brown.	5
108.	The Holy Bible a Historical Humbug. S. H. Preston.	1
109.	Ghosts. Ingersoll, 4 pp.	5
110.	Materialistic Prayer. Bennett, 4 pp.	1
111.	Reply to Scientific American. Bennett,	1
112.	Sensible Sermon. Savage, 8 pp.	2
113.	Come to Jesus. Bennett. 8 pp.	2

SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

1.	Hereditary Transmission. Prof. Louis Elsberg, M.D.	5
2.	Evolution; from the Homogeneous to the Heterogeneous. B. F. Underwood.	3
3.	Darwinism. B. F. Underwood.	3
4.	Literature of the Insane. F. R. Marvin.	5
5.	Responsibility of Sex. Mrs. Chase, M.D.	3
6.	Graduated Atmospheres. J. McCarroll.	2
7.	Death. Frederic R. Marvin, M.D.	5
8.	How do Marsupial Animals Propagate their kind? A. B. Bradford.	5
9.	The Unseen World. Prof. John Fiske.	10
10.	The Evolution Theory—Huxley's Three Lectures.	10
11.	Is America the New World? L. L. Dawson.	10

Discount on one dollar's worth 10 per ct. off; on two dollars' worth 20 off; on five dollars' worth 40 off; on ten dollars' worth 50 off.

As few or as many of any given kind may be ordered as desired.



RADICAL BOOKS.

SENT POST PAID AT THE PRICES ANNEXED.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

Age of Reason. Paine. Paper covers.	25
" " " Cloth "	50
" " and Ex. of Proph. Paper 50; cl.	75
A Few Days in Athens. Frances Wright.	75
Apocryphal New Testament.	1 25
An Eye Opener. Paper, 50; cloth.	75
Antiquity of Christianity. Alberger.	25
Analysis of Religious Belief. Viscount Amberly. $3.00, 4.00, and	4 50
Apples of Gold. Susan H. Wixon.	1 50
Anti-Theological Lectures. Rev. R. Taylor.	2 00
Antiquity and Duration of the World.	25
Astronomy and Worship of the Ancients.	25
A. J. Davis' Entire Works.	27,00
Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub.	15
Bible in India. Jacolliot.	2 00
Buckle's History of Civilization. 2 Vols., 8vo.	4 00
Burgess-Underwood Debate. 50 and	80
Bible in the Balance. Fish.	1 00
Bacon's Novum Organum.	3 00
Bhagvad-Gita, or Dialogues of Christna and Arjuna.	1 75
Buechner's Man. Present and Future.	4 00
Christianity before Christ. Craven.	25
Chapters from the Bibles of the Ages.	1 50
Criticism on the Theological Idea of Deity.	1 00
Childhood of Religion. Clodd.	1 25
Childhood of the World. Clodd, 40 and	60
Christianity and Materialism. Underwood.	15
Cause of Religious Ideas. Tuttle.	1 00
Conway's Sacred Anthology.	4 00
Colenso on the Pentateuch, Abstract of.	25
Devil's Pulpit, Rev. Robt. Taylor.	2 00
Diegesis "	2 00
Denton's Irreconcilable Records.	50
" Our Planet, Past, Present, and Future,	1 50
" Radical Rhymes.	1 25
" Who are Christians, Deluge, Dentons' Common Sense Thoughts, Be Thyself, What is Right? Man's True Saviors, Sermon from Snakspere's Text, God Proposed, Spiritualism True, Orthodoxy False, 10 cents each.
Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science,	1 75
" Intellectual Development of Europe, 2 vols.,	3 00
Darwin's Origin of Species.	2 00
" Descent of Man, (Impr'd Ed.)	3 00
Descent and Darwinism, Schmidt.	1 50
Einstein's Origin of Religious Ideas.	1 00
Exeter Hall, Wm. McDonnell,	60 & 80
Errors of the Bible, Wright.	35 & 60
Essence of Religion. Fuerbach. 40 and	80
Eight Scientific Tracts.	20
Frothingham's Religion of Humanity.	1 50
" Child 's Book of Religion,	1 00
" Stories of the Patriarchs,	1 00
" Safest Creed,	1 50
" Transcendentalism in New England,	2 50
Faraday's Various Forces of Nature.	2 00
Fiske's Myths and Myth-Makers.	2 00
God Idea in History, Tuttle.	1 25
Good Sense, D'Holbach.	1 00
Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages.	2 50
" Lost and Hostile Gospels.	3 25
Graves' Sixteen Crucified Saviors.	2 00
" Biography of Satan.	60
Grey's Enigmas of Life.	2 00
" Creeds of Christendom. 2 Vols.	7 50
Heroines of Freethought, Mrs. Underwood,	1 75
Heathens of the Heath, McDonnell,	1 00 & 150
Hume's Essays and Treatises,	1 50
Huxley's Lay Sermons.	1 75
" Man's Place in Nature.	1 25
" Critiques and Addresses,	1 50
History of all Religions Sects. Evans.	1 00
Haeckel's History of Creation. 2 Vols.	5 00
Hollick's Nerves and the Nervous.	1 00
Humboldt's Works.
Ingersoll's Gods and other Lectures. 30 and	60
" " " etc., Large Edition.	1 25
Influence of Christianity on Civilization.	25
Infidels' Text-Book. Cooper.	1 00
Jehovah Unveiled.	35
Jamieson's Clergy a Source of Danger.	1 00
Josephus' Complete Works.	2 50
Johnson's Oriental Religions. 8vo.	5 00
John's Way.	15
Kneeland's Review.	1 00
" Hymns.	35
Koran, with Notes and Life of Mahomet.	2 75
Lecky's Rationalism in Europe. 2 Vols.	4 00
" History of European Morals.	6 00
Life of Thomas Paine. Blanchard. p 50; cl	75
Lewes' Biographical History of Philosophy.	3 50
" Problems of Life and Mind.	3 00
Lizzie Doten's Poems of Progress, and Inner Life, each	150
Lubbock's Origin of Civilization.	2 00
" Pre-Historic Times Illustrated,	6 00
Lyell's Elements of Geology, 770 cuts,	3 40
" Principles " " 2 vols. and maps,	3 00
Monks and Popes. Alberger.	1 00
Morley's Life of Voltaire,	2 00
Martyrdom of Man. Winwood Reade.	3 00
Peeble's All Around the World.	2 50
" Seers of the Ages.	2 50
Plato's Divine and Moral Works.	2 20
Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion,	30 & 50
Physical Man, Tuttle.	1 50
Paine's Common Sense.	12
" Crisis. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Rights of Man. Paper, 50; cloth	80
" Theological Works, with portrait	1 50
" " " paper,	1 00
" Political Works, cloth,	1 50
" Great Works Complete. Crown octavo, with life and portrait.	3
" Political Works, steel portrait.	1
" Life, by Calvin Blanchard with portrait Paper, 50; cloth	75
Parturition without Pain.	1 00
Plain Home Talk and Medical Common Sense, E. B. Foote, M.D.,	1 50
Proctor's Six Lectures on Astronomy,	20
Reason, the only Oracle of Man, Ethan Allen	60
Syntagma, Taylor,	1 00
System of Nature, D'Holbach,	2 00
Self-Contradictions of the Bible,	25
Studying the Bible, Mrs. Slenker,	75
Spencer's (Herbert) Entire Work.
Strauss' Old Faith and New,	2 00
" New Life of Jesus, 2 vols.,	12 00
Supernatural Religion, 2 Vols., 8vo.,	3 00
Sexual Physiology, Trall,	2 00
Talleyrand's Letter to Pope Pius vii.	25
Tyndall' (Prof. John) Entire Works,
The Christ of Paul,	2 00
The Case against the Church.	75
The Relations of the Sexes. Mrs. Duffey,	2 00
The Voices, Warren Sumner Barlow,	1 25
The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 5
The Champions of the Church, Bennett. $3 00, $4 00, and	4 50
Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, etc., 75 &	1 00
Truth Seeker Tracts, Vols. I, II, III, and IV., by the lot, 50 &	75
The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations,	75
The Outcast, Winwood Reade,	30
Talks with My Patients, Mrs. Gleason, M.D.,	1 50
Underwood-Marples Debate.	35 & 60
Underwood's Twelve Tracts,	20
Vestiges of Creation.	75
Volney's Ruins,	1 00
Volney's New Researches in Ancient History,	1 50
Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.	5 00

THE TRUTHSEEKER

Vol. 5. No. 15. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, April 13, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

CANADA is doing a rushing business sending war horses to England.

ENGLAND has among her clergy millionaires and paupers. The Rev. Francis Swan, lately deceased, left $1,750,000 personality.

OVER 250,000 American stoves are now distributed over Great Britain and Ireland. They are considered excellent in every respect.

COL. INGERSOLL says there is nothing that his soul more longs for than a public discussion with this same Joseph Cook before the people of Boston.

WHEN Jo Cook, in his Montreal lecture, declared that the United States produced nothing but "mendacious shoddy," the audience saw it at once, and applauded lustily.

THE Manufacturer and Builder makes a minute calculation of the expense and advantages of the electric light, as compared with other methods of illumination, and concludes that it is seven times cheaper than gas, motive power not included; and four times cheaper, taking into account the cost of driving.

THE London World says: "The education of women in this country—and the remark is true to some extent of Europe generally—is under bondage to a mass of foolish tradition; and one of the first measures toward its reform would be the reduction of what are called accomplishments to their legitimate proportions."

SOME of the latest notions of Mr. Froude on religion are sent by telegraph from London to the Associated Press. He holds that religion is falling from its throne; that skepticism is taking its place, and that religious opinion is moving with increasing speed along a track which it will never retrace, toward issues infinitely momentous. These notions of Mr. Froude are not as novel or original as his views of English and Irish history.—Sun.

THE daily papers are out with statements that Theodore Tilton and his wife, Elizabeth, are to make up their estrangement and live together again as man and wife. Why not? If they have both done wrong, and can mutually forgive and forget, why not do so, and once more live happily together? We are among those who think Daniel Sickles acted nobly in forgiving his erring wife and living with her again. There are very few that do not need forgiveness in some direction.

OLD Mother Shipton's noted prophecy has found many believers, most of whom, however, refuse to credit the concluding statement that the world shall come to an end in 1881. The Mobile Register comes to the rescue of those who desire the world to hang on a little longer by ingeniously stating that "the end of the world" means the North Pole, and that Stanley—who, rumor says, is to sail in search of it in the Pandora—will discover it about the time in question. This prophecy seems to be about as elastic as Bible fables.

Moscow has of late been greatly excited over a "miracle" which the superstitious inhabitants are convinced foreshadows divine approval of Russia in her war against the Turks. A pond of water in the park recently froze over, with the exception of a portion in the middle, which remained open in the shape of a St. Andrew's cross. To go to this pond and make the sign of the cross in the presence of the "miracle" is regarded by the people of the city as a sacred duty. In view of this wonder, also, a paper of Moscow has plucked up the courage to predict that after the present war will come the millennium.

SORROW in Baltimore. A dark shadow has fallen on colored ecclesiastical circles in that city, for the cruel Mayor has forbidden the holding of cake walks. Some of the brethren and sisters cake-walked not wisely, but a great deal too much. They howled and yelled and screamed hallelujah with such earnestness that cake-walking became a nuisance to neighborhoods in which it was practiced. The hard-hearted action of the Mayor compels the exercise of ingenuity on the part of the colored folks to devise means for replenishing exhausted church treasuries without making an outrageous noise.

SUNDAY evening one of the prominent clergymen of Hartford called at a drug store and purchased a bottle of lager, saying that he felt the need of something of this kind. Mr. Pentecost, who was preaching there, got hold of the story and gave the clergyman a dressing-down in his sermon Monday. The Rev. Mr. Burton then got up and approved the clergyman's honesty and openness of purpose, and expressed his "contempt for those people who have a vigorous ability to notice the faults of others, and a vigorous inability to mind their own business." There was a lively little discussion, but the minister who bought the bottle of beer still goes at large.

QUEER fellows, some of those British clergymen who want wives! A "reverend gentleman" thus begins business in the advertising columns of a highly respectable English paper: A clergyman of the Church of England, 39, 5 feet 9 inches, considered good looking, a widower, with an only daughter, wishes to hear from any lady with a view to marriage who has from £6,000 to £12,000 at command, and would be willing to invest about £5,000 in the purchase of an advowson (that is, the freehold of a church, rectory house, and grounds), in some beautiful locality to produce £500 a year. Please write direct to the above reverend gentleman. . . . as this advertisement is genuine and bona fide. Address, etc.

SOME of the country pastors are complaining that the peripatetic evangelists who trot round from time to time to help them gather a spiritual harvest are disturbers of ecclesiastical peace. After a pastor has been diligently laboring for years, teaching and training his people, one of these men bounces in upon him and suddenly accomplishes a great work in what he calls the revival of dead sinners and cold Christians. A great excitement is soon astir, and people talk about the "powerful work of grace" going on in the church, and think it is all owing to the doings of the peripatetic bore who is their visitor. When he goes away which is generally after two or three weeks of arousement, the excitement subsides, and the church is found to be in a worse condition than if he had not made his appearance.

BEECHER'S experience has been such as to evidently shake his faith in the institution of marriage. He thinks an illegitimate Christ is as good if not better than a legitimate one, and is devoutly thankful that Jesus was "a brother to those who are so low that everything of which men are ashamed cluster around them." In his last Sunday's sermon, which was as radical as he thought his congregation could stand and in which he adopted Col. Ingersoll's idea of a Supreme Being, and inferentially rejected the dogma of hell, he gave utterance to the following sentiment. Had an acknowledged Infidel called Christ a "beggar's brat" he would have been denounced by the Church as an impious wretch unfit to live. Mr. Beecher is Infidel enough for all practical purposes. "Infidels," said Mr. Beecher, "hiss in round, red-hot logic that Christ was born illegitimate. Even if this were so, I would rejoice at it. It was part of his mission to be born more ignoble than any other man, if that were possible. his illegitimacy would not shake my faith in him a particle. He came to be the brother of every human being down to those who are so low that everything of which men are ashamed clusters around them. It would be blasphemous," continued the speaker, "to suppose that all of God was hidden in that baby brain. Christ came to be a vagabond child—a beggar's brat—hunted about the country by sheriffs and constables."

HONEST AND DISHONEST PROFANITY.—Some one in the crowd took occasion to mildly rebuke old Ben Wade for his profanity. He turned on his self-constituted moral instructor and asked:

"Don't you swear sometimes?"

"No, sir."

"Don't you say 'darn it' or 'condemn it' sometimes in your heats of passion?"

"Yes, I may say that sometimes. But that isn't swearing."

"Yes, it is," said Ben. "It is the meanest kind of swearing. It's mean because it is cowardly and dishonest. I have studied this subject a good deal, and my observation goes to show that a man who will say 'darn it' when he means 'damn it' is not fit to be trusted. Give me the man whose oaths come welling up from the bottom of his soul, full, round, and distinct—who says what he thinks and don't try to beat the devil round the stump—that man is an honest man every time. But the base cowards who try to deceive their Maker by their 'darn its' and their 'durn its'—hell is full of such fellows."

It must be borne in mind that he illustrated his point as he went along with "full, round, and distinct" oaths, which "came welling up from the bottom of his soul."—Detroit News.

IN calm and trustful confidence the missionary sat,
While the energetic sexton was a-passing round the hat.
The services were over, and now had come the pause
To give an opportunity to help along the cause;
But vainly went the sexton teetering up and down the aisle—
In all that congregation no one recognized the tile.
The missionary's hat returned as empty as it went;
He'd been preaching to an audience that wouldn't pay a cent.
Over the parson's face there flitted a disappointed look
As from the solemn sexton his empty hat he took;
Then smiling on the audience, he returned it to the rack,
With the words, "I'm very thankful that I've got my beaver back."

—Harper's Monthly.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION—A REMARKABLE ARTICLE FROM THE PEN OF JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE.—James Anthony Froude, the eminent English historian, has sent an article to the International Review of New York, containing most remarkable statements upon the subject of science and religion. He holds that the present state of religious opinion throughout the world is extremely critical: that theologians no longer speak with authority; that those who uphold orthodoxy cannot agree on what ground to defend it: that materialism all over Europe is respectfully listened to when it affirms that the claims of revelation cannot be maintained; and that the existence of God and of a future state, the origin of man, the nature of conscience, and the distinction between good and evil, are all open questions. He says that no serious consequences, at least in England and America, are yet outwardly apparent, and that the entire generation at present alive may pass away before the inward change shows itself in marked external symptons; but that it is certain that religious opinion is moving with increasing speed along a track which it will never retrace and toward issues infinitely momentous.

A NEW CEREAL DISCOVERED.—We have been shown a new grain, discovered about four years ago by a farmer in Surprise Valley, in the northern part of California, taken from the crop of a wild goose which had been shot by the farmer. He sowed the seed immediately after it was taken from the garner of the bird's crop, and it produced more than a hundredfold. Mr. Merithew, a farmer of this county, being on a visit to Surprise Valley, obtained some few seeds of the new grain, and succeeded in propagating it with wonderful success on his farm in Butte county. The straw and beardless head resemble wheat; the grain looks a little like rye, but is twice as large as rye. When cut as it is passing into the milk it makes a hay even superior to wheat hay. Mr. Merithew has on hand several tons of hay from this new variety of grain, and perhaps five bushels of its seed. He gave about two quarts of the seed to one of our citizens lately visiting Butte county, who was struck with the wonderful beauty of this new cereal, and brought it to Southern California for propagation. Thomas R. Bard has taken the seed, and promises to give it a thorough test upon the rich alluvial lands of the Colonia Rancho, near the seashore. It could not have fallen into the hands of a more intelligent and painstaking cultivator. It appears to us every way superior to rye, and may prove to be of great utility, as it is a fine grower, and very productive.

Events of the Week.

ANOTHER Cardinal is dead.

FAMINE prevails in parts of Brazil.

THE Santa Fe Railroad hands are on strike.

A NEW volcano has commenced operations in Peru.

THE bricklayers of this city have struck for $2.50 a day.

THE Shah of Persia has started on another European tour.

THE Oregonians have a greenback ticket in the field already.

THE Republicans were successful as usual at the late Rhode Island election.

THE salvors of the Cleopatra obelisk have been awarded $10,000 and costs.

TWENTY-FIVE thousand pounds of oleomargarine are sold daily in this city.

THE European powers are watching and waiting with decks cleared for action.

MADAME RESTELL left nearly $800,000, the bulk of her property, to her two grand-children.

THE President has nominated Justin E. Colburn of Vermont to be Consul-General to Mexico.

THE little Central American republics, Costa Rica and Guatemala, are engaged in a small but fierce war.

COL. INGERSOLL has been invited to deliver the annual address before the Lawyers' Association of Boston.

TWO PERSONS, supposed to be tramps, were burned to death in a barn in Plainfield, N. J. one night last week.

TROUBLE has begun on the course of the Congo in Africa. The missionaries are following in Stanley's tracks.

THE South African natives are making it uncomfortable for the settlers. Considerable fighting has taken place already.

TWENTY-SIX female physicians graduated from the New York Medical College for Women in this city last week. Among the number were one from England and one from Persia.

A FIFTY-HORSE-POWER boiler in a manufactory in Cambridge, Mass., exploded on the 6th. Three men were killed, another was fatally wounded, and six were more or less severely injured.

THE charges of heresy against the Rev. A. P. Adams, tried before the New England Methodist Episcopal Conference at Westfield, Mass., were sustained, and he was suspended for one year.

THERE were seven dead bodies found in the rivers around this city within two days. Suicides are coming to the surface. There were also twelve mysterious disappearances within the same two days.

THE almshouse of Steuben Co., N. Y., was burned on the night of the 6th; set on fire by an epileptic inmate. There were forty-three inmates, chiefly idiotic, crippled, or very aged, fifteen of whom perished in the flames.

THE Earl of Leitrim, his clerk, and driver were recently shot and killed while driving near the Earl's country seat in the County Derry, Ireland. He was a heartless wretch, and was about to evict eighty-nine of his tenants.

RUSSIA offers to send an embassador at once to the Vatican if the Pope will accept the present condition of the Church in the Russian empire. As an acceptance of the emperor's offer would be to admit the validity of his title of Head of the Church in Russia, and make him a sharer in God's vicegerency on earth, it is not likely that the offer will be accepted by the Pope.

A TERRIBLE collision occurred on the Lehigh Valley Railroad last week. A freight train collided with an oil train, the boiler of one locomotive exploded, the oil took fire and ran in a fiery steam to the bridge across Trout Creek setting that on fire and destroying it. Two lives lost, twenty-two persons badly burned, and a bridge, two trains, and sixty thousand gallons of oil destroyed. No one to blame, as usual.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER V.—CONTINUED.

"This settled the old deacon. He got up and bounced out of the room, saying he had an engagement; and as he closed the door, Sue and I indulged in a hearty laugh. It did the poor thing good, too. She doesn't seem at all like her old sunny self since the great family troubles—and it's no wonder, either. True, her home was never what it should have been; but, with a house full of love, life will be glad and happy, even if minor sorrows and annoyances do shadow it at times. But now she is so utterly alone that I begin seriously to fear for her health; it has been so poor since her mother's death, and she so rarely goes out, either. We must try and get her away from that, somehow, or the glum old deacon will kill her, he is so harsh and unsympathetic. But, really, I must be off. I promised father to go with him up the river to visit some patients to-night, and it is nearly time to start. Do you know, I'm getting to be quite a doctor. I've been called upon several times to prescribe for babies and small children when father happened to be absent, and I've succeeded so well that I am really encouraged. I've read, studied, and ridden with father on his rounds, and done so much nursing of the sick that I understand a great deal about the practice. I never give strong medicines nor attempt surgical cases; for you know I've had no regular course of instruction, nor have I a diploma. But I often get pay for my services—voluntary contributions from grateful parents whose children I've been enabled to restore to health. I earn it, and so feel right in accepting it. I have received ten dollars the past month, and I'm going to get a new book with four of them—Bennett's 'World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers.' Mrs. Darwin says it has the lives of living as well as dead thinkers, and I want to know some of them; so I shall write to-morrow for the book. I could borrow Darwin's, but I want one to keep and have all the time for reference; and, besides, borrowing will not help Bennett to publish other books, and, you see, I'm thinking now, all the time, how I can best aid and abet the new cause I've so fallen in love with."

And Myra laughed her rich, gleeful, infectious laugh, as she gayly sped down the garden slope and flitted through the gate like some wild and willful sprite.

"Well, mother," said Edith, turning to Mrs. May, who had sat quietly sewing at the window, with her back to the girls, all this time, "well, mother, what do you think about it all? Do you approve of Myra and her father withdrawing from the Church and pursuing their investigations?"

"Certainly, Edith; it is best for them to do so, though I regret that we cannot have the old-time unity amongst us; but I see no alternative now but for them to go ahead. If convinced of their error, they will return, like wandering sheep, to the fold of God. I hope they will, too, though I much fear they will go on till they land where the Darwins are—in cold, blank Atheism. Anyhow, I admire their frank honesty in living out what they think. I've seen so much deceit and hypocrisy that my soul is fairly sick. Just to hear old Deacon Conway talk so saintly as he does in church, and when he is with the pious preachers, elders, brothers, and sisters, and then to think of all his past life, and how he has abused his helpless and defenseless family! Give me honesty; for, even though it be linked with Infidelity, it is preferable to meanness and duplicity dressed in saintly robes and sitting at God's right hand. Myra and her father are too useful, as well as too good and honest, to be shunned even by the pious. They will have friends, let them believe as they will. The great world looks more to deeds than it does to creeds."

"Yes, mother, that is so; and I'm glad it is, for it proves the heart of man to be naturally good, and that his impulses are ever on the side of truth, right, and justice."

CHAPTER VI.

It was a lovely evening towards the last of April when Edith and Myra started to make a call upon the Darwins, whom they had not seen in some time. They had a lovely walk through beautiful green meadows, cool groves, and breezy orchards. Cherry, early apple, peach, plum, and pear trees were all in bloom, and scattering their pink and white petals like snowflakes in the air; and all along their pathway were bright and tiny flowers. The blue johnny-jump-up, the yellow five-finger, red columbine, scarlet wood-pink, jack-in-the-pulpit, and the pure white blood-root, with innumerable other floral gems, made the way short, bright, and beautiful, and by the time they arrived at the house their baskets were brimful and running over with their precious freight of floral treasures; and as they sat pleasantly chatting in Mrs. Darwin's sunny, cheerful sitting-room, they sorted and arranged them, each one dividing her collection into two equal parts, Myra giving one of hers to Rose, and Edith bestowing one of hers upon Mrs. Darwin, and laughingly telling Minnie she could draw and paint them for her share, which she subsequently did, making one of the loveliest sketches she had ever yet gotten up.

"I have brought back your papers, Mrs. Darwin," said Myra, "and am a thousand times obliged for them. We have sent on money for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and are going to try and get the whole list of tracts, and all Bennett's other publications just as fast as they are issued. I'm going to read and study till I get to be an Infidel, as you are; and I only wish I could be like you in all things."

"Thank you, my dear, for the compliment," said Mrs. Darwin. "I hope you will be a great deal wiser and better than I am. You have a long life to look forward to, and in which to improve yourself, and if my precept or example be of any assistance to you, I shall be only too glad."

Just then a tall, good-looking young man entered the room, and Mrs. Darwin introduced him to the girls as "My son William." He was very cordial and friendly, and they were all soon feeling like old acquaintances. "Willie" told them he had been in Tennessee for some time, teaching a young man how to spin, and also acting as loom-boss, and consequently he had never made many acquaintances, as yet, in his new home. But now they had gotten through fixing up, and he should have a few weeks' vacation before wool came in, and should try and make up for lost time.

"I suppose you enjoyed your visit among your old Tennessee friends," said Myra.

"Oh, yes, indeed I did," replied Willie. "It seemed almost like leaving home a second time when I came away again."

"Perhaps you left your heart behind you," said Myra, laughing, "and that's why it was so hard for you to leave."

"Oh, no; I am heart-whole and fancy-free—or was till this evening," said Willie, bending an earnest, searching gaze upon the face of his lively, bantering questioner.

Myra's eyes sank beneath his inquiring glance, and her face became suffused with blushes. Edith, pitying her confusion, turned the conversation by asking Willie when they intended to start up the factory.

"We shall commence," said Willie, "as soon as we get any wool, which will not come till the middle of May, as it has to be sheared, washed, and dried, you know, and it is too cold yet to rob the poor sheep of their winter clothing. When we get to running, I presume you will all be in to see the sight, as a factory is something new here. Ours in Tennessee was a great curiosity. The machinery, while being put up, attracted a deal of attention, and when the "picker" began to tear up the great bunches of wool, nicer and faster than a roomful of women and children could do it, they all stood amazed. Then to see it carded, and a whole row of spindles spinning nice even threads all at once, was almost equal to magic. 'What will our womenfolks do for work?' asked the old farmers; 'they will have nothing to do now but run about and gossip.' Some old ladies were really jealous, saying we had taken the very bread from their mouths by robbing them of their usual jobs of carding and spinning by hand. But we told them the world was full of work, and that they could find something to do if they looked about them; that it was hard, to be sure, to be left out in the cold by dumb, unfeeling machinery, but it would, in the end, benefit the whole country—just as the railroad had, though many old teamsters still grumbled at that innovation on 'the good old times' of hauling merchandise, etc., with horse and wagon. But when the looms came, the excitement grew still greater, and eager crowds flocked in from far and near. Whole schools, with their teachers, picnic parties, and curiosity-seekers, all came to see the elephant. 'Why, it goes itself,' says one. 'It's got sense,' says another; and one old countryman solemnly ejaculated, 'The works of the Lord are wonderful, but the works of man are greater.' Some were afraid of us because we were Yankees, and others said they would not bring their wool to an Infidel factory; but all could see on which side their bread was buttered, and one after another yielded to the spell of the enchanter, which could give them more profit out of a pound of wool than any aforetime power had ever enabled them to extract from it, and on they came, with long white sacks thrown across the back of a horse—eight, ten, and a dozen at a time—so that we had to run day and night to keep up; and in less than a year you could see our goods on the backs of men, women, and boys all over the country. The old 'blue jeans' had given way to cassimeres of steel-gray, brown, and black; to stripes, plaids, and fancy colors. But I'm afraid I'm boring you with all this. I forget you are not of the trade, and that trade-talk may not interest you."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

YOUR mother is your best earthly friend. The world may willfully do you many wrongs, your mother never; the world may persecute you while living, and when dead plant the ivy and nightshade of slander upon your grassless grave, but your mother will love and cherish you while living, and if she survive you will weep for you when dead such tears as none but a mother could weep. Love your mother!

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.—CONTINUED.

CHAPTER VIII.—CONTINUED.

LAWS OF TRANSMISSION BY INHERITANCE.—ADAPTATION AND NUTRITION.

A second law, which likewise belongs to the series of progressive transmissions, may be called the law of established or habitual transmission. It manifests itself in this, that qualities acquired by an organism during its individual life are the more certainly transmitted to its descendants the longer the causes of that change have been in action, and that this change becomes the more certainly the property of all subsequent generations the longer the cause of change acts upon these latter also. The quality newly acquired by adaptation or mutation must be established or constituted to a certain degree before we can calculate with any probability that it will be transmitted at all to the descendants. In this respect transmission resembles adaptation. The longer a newly acquired quality has been transmitted by inheritance, the more certainly will it be preserved in future generations. If, therefore, for example, a gardener by methodical treatment has produced a new kind of apple, he may calculate with the greater certainty upon preserving the desired peculiarity of this sort the longer he has transmitted the same by inheritance. The same is clearly shown in the transmission of diseases. The longer consumption or madness has been hereditary in a family, the deeper is the root of the evil, and the more probable it is that all succeeding generations will suffer from it.

PERIOD AT WHICH CHARACTERS APPEAR.

We may conclude the consideration of the phenomena of inheritance with the two very important laws of homotopic and contemporaneous transmission by inheritance. We understand by them the fact that changes acquired by an organism during its life and transmitted to its descendants appear in the same part of the body in which the parental organism was first affected by them, and that they also appear in the offspring at the same age as that at which they did so in the parent.

The law of contemporaneous or homochronous transmission, which Darwin calls the law of "transmission in corresponding periods of life," can be shown very clearly in the transmission of diseases, especially of such as are recognized as very destructive on account of their hereditary character. They generally appear in the organism of the child at the time corresponding with that in which the parental organism contracted the disease. Hereditary diseases of the lungs, liver, teeth, brain, skin, etc., usually appear in the descendants at the same period or a little earlier than they showed themselves in the parental organism, or were contracted by it. The calf gets its horns at the same period of life as its parents did. In like manner the young stag receives its antlers at the same period of life in which they appeared in its father or grandfather. In every one of the different sorts of vine the grapes ripen at the same time as they did in the case of their progenitors. It is well known that the time of ripening varies greatly in the different sorts; but as all are descended from a single species, this variation has been acquired by the progenitors of the several sorts, and has then been transmitted by inheritance.

The law of homotopic transmission, which is most closely connected with the last mentioned law, and which might be called the law of transmission in corresponding parts of the body, may also be very distinctly recognized in pathological cases of inheritance. Large moles, for example, or accumulations of pigment in several parts of the skin, tumors, also, often appear during many generations, not only at the same period of life, but also in the same part of the skin. Excessive development of fat in certain parts of the body is likewise transmitted by inheritance. Above all, it is to be noted that numerous examples of this, as well as of the preceding law, may be found everywhere in the study of embryology. Both the law of homochronous and homotopic transmission are fundamental laws of embryology, or ontogeny. For these laws explain the remarkable fact that the different successive forms of individual development in all generations of one and the same species always appear in the same order of succession, and that the variations of the body always take place in the same parts. This apparently simple and self-evident phenomenon is nevertheless exceedingly wonderful and curious; we cannot explain its real causes, but may confidently assert that they are due to the direct transmission of the organic matter from the parental organism to that of the offspring, as we have seen above in the case of the process of transmission in general, by a consideration of the details of the various modes of reproduction.

INTERACTION OF HEREDITY AND ADAPTATION.

Having thus, then, considered the most important laws of Inheritance, we now turn to the second series of phenomena bearing on natural selection, viz., to those of Adaptation or Variation. These phenomena, taken as a whole, stand in a certain opposition to the phenomena of Inheritance, and the difficulty which arises in examining them consists mainly in the two sets of phenomena being so completely intercrossed and interwoven. We are but seldom able to say with certainty—of the variations of form which occur before our eyes—how much is owing to Inheritance, and how much to Adaptation. All characters of form, by which organisms are distinguished, are caused either by Inheritance or by Adaptation; but as both functions are continually interacting with each other, it is extremely difficult for the systematic inquirer to recognize the share belonging to each of the two functions in the special structure of individual forms. This is, at present, all the more difficult, because we are as yet scarcely aware of the immense importance of this fact, and because most naturalists have neglected the theory of Adaptation, as well as that of Inheritance. The laws of Inheritance, which we have just discussed, as well as the laws of Adaptation, which we shall consider directly, in reality form only a small portion of the phenomena existing in this domain, but which have not yet been investigated; and since every one of these laws can interact with every other, it is clear that there is an infinite complication of physiological actions, which are at work in the construction of organisms.

But now, as to the phenomenon of variation or adaptation in general, we must, as in the case of inheritance, view it as a quite universal, physiological fundamental quality of all organisms, without exception—as a manifestation of life which cannot be separated from the idea of organism. Strictly speaking, we must here also, as in the case of inheritance, distinguish between Adaptation itself and Adaptability. By Adaptation (Adaptio), or Variation (Variatio), we understand the fact that the organism, in consequence of influences of the surrounding outer world, assumes certain new peculiarities in its vital activity, composition, and form which it has not inherited from its parents; these acquired individual qualities are opposed to those which have been inherited, or, in other words, those which have been transmitted to it from its parents or ancestors. On the other hand, we call Adaptability (Adaptabilitas), or Variability (Variabilitas), the capability inherent in all organisms to acquire such new qualities under the influence of the outer world (Gen. Morph. ii, 191).

The undeniable fact of organic adaptation or variation is universally known, and can be observed at every moment in thousands of phenomena surrounding us. But just because the phenomena of variation by external influences appear so self-evident, they have hitherto undergone scarcely any accurate scientific investigation. To them belong all the phenomena which we look upon as the results of contracting and giving up habits, of practice and giving up practices, or as the results of training, education, of acclimatization, of gymnastics, etc. Many permanent variations brought about by causes producing disease, that is to say, many diseases, are nothing but dangerous adaptations of the organism to injurious conditions of life. In the case of cultivated plants and domestic animals, variation is so striking and powerful that the breeder of animals and the gardener found their whole mode of proceeding upon it, or rather upon the interaction between these phenomena and those of Inheritance. It is also well known to every one that animals and plants in their wild state, are subject to variation. Every systematic treatise on a group of animals or plants, if it were to be quite complete and exhaustive, ought to mention in every individual species the number or variations which differ more or less from the prevailing or typical form of the species. Indeed, in every careful systematic special treatise one finds, in the case of most species, mention of a number of such variations, which are described sometimes as individual deviations, and sometimes as so-called races, varieties, degenerate species, or subordinate species, and which often differ exceedingly from the original species, solely in consequence of the adaptation of the organism to the external conditions of life.

ADAPTATION EXPLAINED BY NUTRITION.

If we now endeavor to fathom the general causes of these phenomena of Adaptation, we arrive at the conclusion that in reality they are as simple as the causes of the phenomena of Inheritance. We have shown that the nature of the process of propagation furnishes the real explanation of the facts of Transmission by Inheritance, that is, the transmission of parental matter to the body of the offspring; and in like manner we can show that the physiological function of nutrition, or change of substance, affords a general explanation of Adaptation or Variation. When I here point to "nutrition" as the fundamental cause of variation and adaptation, I take this word in its widest sense, and I understand by it the whole of the material changes which the organism undergoes in all its parts through the influences of the surrounding outer world. Nutrition thus comprises not only the reception of actual nutritive substances and the influence of different kinds of food, but also, for example, the action upon the organism of water and of the atmosphere, the influence of sunlight, of temperature, and all those meteorological phenomena which are implied in the term "climate." The indirect and direct influence of the nature of the soil and of the dwelling-place also belong to it; and further, the extremely important and varied influence which is exercised upon every animal and every plant by the surrounding organisms, friends and neighbors, enemies and robbers, parasites, etc. All these and many other very important influences, all of which more or less modify the organism in its material composition, must be taken into consideration in studying the change of substance which goes on in living things. Adaptation, accordingly, is the consequence of all those material variations which are produced in the change of substance of the organism by the external conditions of existence, or by the influences of the surrounding external world.

How very much every organism is dependent upon the whole of its external surroundings, and changed by their alteration, is, in a general way, well known to every one. Only think how much the human power of action is dependent upon the temperature of the air, or how much the disposition of our minds depends upon the color of the sky. Accordingly as the sky is cloudless and sunny, or covered with large heavy clouds, our state of mind is cheerful or dull. How differently do we feel and think in a forest during a stormy winter night and during a bright summer day! All the different moods of our soul depend upon purely material changes of our brain, upon movements of molecular plasma, which are started through the medium of the senses by the different influences of light, warmth, moisture, etc. "We are a plaything to every pressure of the air." No less important and deeply influential are the effects produced upon our mind and body by the different quality and quantity of food. Our mental activity, the activity of our understanding and of our imagination, is quite different accordingly as we have taken tea or coffee, wine or beer, before or during our work. Our moods, wishes, and feelings are quite different when we are hungry and when we are satisfied. The national character of Englishmen and Gauchos, in South America, who live principally on meat and food rich in nitrogen, is wholly different from that of the Irish, feeding on potatoes, and that of the Chinese, living on rice, both of whom take food deficient in nitrogen. The latter also form much more fat than the former. Here, as everywhere, the variations of the mind go hand in hand with the corresponding transformations of the body; both are produced by purely material causes. But all other organisms, in the same way as man, are varied and changed by the different influences of nutrition. It is well known that we can change in an arbitrary way the form, size, color, etc., of our cultivated plants and domestic animals, by change of food; that, for example, we can take from or give to a plant definite qualities, accordingly as we expose it to a greater or less degree of sunlight and moisture. As these phenomena are generally widely known, and as we shall proceed presently to the consideration of the different laws of adaptation, we will not dwell here any longer on the general facts of variation.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Religious Views of a Romish Priest.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier.

That by the promise made to this enslaved nation to deliver it from captivity, we must understand, not a bodily deliverance, but the spiritual deliverance of all mankind from the servitude of the devil, which was to be accomplished by their Divine Savior.

That by the abundance of riches and all the temporal felicities promised to this people, we must understand the abundance of spiritual grace; and, finally, that by the city of Jerusalem we must not understand the earthly Jerusalem, but the spiritual Jerusalem, which is the Church of Christ. But it is easy to see that these spiritual and allegorical meanings being but a sense foreign to the truth, a subterfuge of the interpreters, cannot serve in any way to demonstrate either the truth or falsehood of any proposition or of any promise whatever. It is absurd to force in this manner mystic or allegorical meanings, since it is solely in connection with the true and natural sense of terms that we can judge of truth or falsehood. A proposition, for instance, a promise which is true in the veritable sense of the terms in which it is conceived, cannot become false in itself under pretext of giving to it a meaning that is foreign to it; and in like manner those which are false in their true and natural sense cannot become veritable in themselves, under pretext of giving them a meaning foreign to them. It may well be said that the prophecies of the Old Testament added to those of the New form a collection of very absurd and puerile things. For instance, Abraham had two wives, one of whom, being but a servant, was the figure or symbol of the synagogue, and the other, being his spouse, was the figure of the Christian Church. And again, he had two sons, one of whom, the son of the servant, was the figure of the Old Testament, and the other, the son of his spouse, was the figure of the New. Who would not be tempted to laugh outright at such a ridiculous doctrine?

And again, is it not ludicrous that the hanging out of a red rag by a prostitute to serve as a signal for spies, in the Old Testament, should be the symbol of the blood of Jesus Christ, shed in the New.

If, according to this way of interpreting allegorically all that was said, done, and practised in the old Jewish law, we should interpret in like manner, all the speeches, all the actions, and all the adventures of the famous Don Quixote, we should assuredly find therein quite as many symbols and mysteries.

And nevertheless, it is on this ridiculous basis that the entire Christian creed exists. And this is why there is scarcely anything in the old law that our Christians have not tried to explain allegorically.

But the most lying and absurd of all the prophecies that ever were made is that of Jesus (Luke, 22), where he predicts that there shall be signs in the sun and moon, and that the Son of man will come in a cloud to judge all men; and he predicts this for the present generation. Has this come to pass? Did the Son of man come in a cloud?

FOURTH PROOF, DRAWN FROM THE ERRORS OF DOCTRINE AND MORALITY.

The Christian religion, apostolic and Roman, teaches and requires us to believe that there is but one God, and at the same time that there are three divine persons, each of whom is truly God. This is absurd on the face of it; for if there be three that are really God, then there are veritably three Gods. It is false to say that there is but one sole God, or, if it is true to say so, it is false to say that there are really three that are God, since one and three cannot truly be said of one and the same thing.

It is moreover said that the first of these pretended divine persons, who is called the Father, engendered the second person, who is called the Son, and that these two first persons have together produced the third, who is called the Holy Ghost; and notwithstanding that these three divine persons do not depend one on the other, and are not even one older than the other. This is again a manifest absurdity, since one thing cannot receive its being from another, without some sort of dependence on that other; and that a thing must of necessity be, to be able to give being to another thing. If, then, the second and third of these divine persons received their being from the first, they must necessarily be dependent for their being on that first person who gave them that being, or who engendered them; and it is of necessity, likewise, that the first, who gave being to the two others, should have been before those two others, since that which is not, cannot give being to anything. Moreover, it is as repugnant as it is absurd to say that a thing that was engendered or produced had no beginning. Now, according to the Christians, the second and third persons were engendered or produced; then consequently, they had a beginning; and if they had a beginning, and the first person had no beginning, as not having been engendered or produced by any other, it necessarily follows that one must have been before the other.

The Christians are themselves conscious of these absurdities, and, having not much reason to be proud of them, have no other resource left them than to say that we must reverently close the eyes of our fallible human reason and humbly adore such high and holy mysteries without seeking to comprehend them. But, seeing that that which they call faith has been solidly refuted as above, when they tell us that we must submit ourselves, it is as if they told us that we must believe blindly that which we do not believe.

The theist Christians openly condemn the blindness of the ancient pagans who worshiped many gods. They rail and laugh at the genealogy of these gods, at their births, their marriages, and the generation of their offspring; and they do not perceive that they themselves advance things that are infinitely more ridiculous and absurd.

If the pagans believed that there were goddesses as well as gods, and that those gods and goddesses married and engendered children, their belief in this wise was but natural. They had not yet imagined them without bodies or feelings, and they believed they had these as well as men. Why, then, should there not have been male and female? There does not seem to be any more reason to deny or to recognize one more than the other; and, gods and goddesses admitted, why should they not engender in the ordinary manner? There would certainly have been nothing ridiculous in this doctrine, had it been true that their gods existed.

But, in the doctrine of our Christians, there is something much more ridiculous, and much more absurd; for, besides what they advance concerning one God who makes three, and three Gods who make but one, they say that this triple and sole God has neither body, nor form, nor figure; that the first person of this triple and sole God who is called the Father, begot by himself alone the second person, who is called the Son, in his own image, being like him, without body, or form, or figure. If this be so, why is it that the first is called the father rather than the mother, and the second the son, rather than the daughter? For if the first is really more father than mother, and the second more son than daughter, it must necessarily be that there is something in the one and in the other of these two persons by reason of which one of them is rather father than mother, and the other rather son than daughter. Now, there can be but one reason for this, and that is, that they are, both one and the other, males and not females. But how could they be males rather than females, since they have neither body, nor form, nor figure? This is unimaginable, impossible, and therefore falls to the ground of itself. Nevertheless, still they say that these two persons, without body, form, or figure, and consequently without difference of sex, are father and son, and have produced, by their mutual love, a third person, whom they call the Holy Ghost, which person has not, any more than the two others, either body, or form, or figure. What an abominable mess!

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

AN important point to be observed in transplanting is not to leave the roots exposed for a moment to the rays of the sun or to a blowing dry air, which is quite as injurious to tender rootlets. If not set out at once, the roots ought to be kept damp and covered over with a cloth, or heeled in.

Lessons in Popular Science.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

THE CALENDAR.

The proper measurement of time was one of the objects of the astronomers of antiquity, and the modes of measurement adopted by them, with some modifications, have been continued to our own time.

The most natural division of time is the day, or the time necessary for the earth to perform a revolution upon its axis. The sun rises and sets once every twenty-four hours in all parts of the earth inhabited by man. At the poles, however, the sun really rises and sets but twice a year; and this is owing to the inclination the earth makes in its annual journey around the sun. When the northern hemisphere is turned towards the sun, the sun is visible at the north pole for six months, and during the remainder of the year it is not seen at all; so, even if the intense cold which prevails at the poles did not exist, the great length of the night would render the polar regions very unfit for man's abode.

The next most natural division of time is the year, the time required for the earth to perform its journey around the sun. Before the ancients understood that the earth performed this journey, they knew that the seasons recurred regularly, and this afforded a convenient measurement of time. Agricultural pursuits being the most important to man, the regular return of the seasons was watched for and calculated upon with precision.

The number of days in the year being too great for convenience in numbering, subdivisions were found necessary. Months, or moons, was the most natural division. From one new moon to another was nearly twenty-nine days and a half, and, in round numbers, thirty days became the length of the month.

The week is a division of time having no special connection with the heavenly bodies, and was probably introduced for purposes of convenience. They were named after or appropriated to the seven planents or heavenly bodies, or the deities representing them. Sunday was the sun's day; Monday, the moon's day; Tuesday, Mars'; Wednesday, Mercury's or Woden's; Thursday, Jupiter's or Thor's; Friday, Venus' or Friga's; Saturday, Saturn's.

If the lunar month had been just thirty days in length, and the year an exact number of months, there would have been no difficulty in counting time; but the month being several hours less than thirty days, and the year some twelve and a half lunar months, a great deal of confusion occurred in chronological reckoning. If the time had been kept by the number of days from the earliest records, it would have been very accurate, and we would not have gone far astray; but the variations in the length of months and years has resulted in inaccuracy and confusion.

The lunar month being nearly twenty-nine and a half days, the months were reckoned alternately twenty-nine and thirty days. But, really, the period of twenty-nine and a half days is some forty-five minutes too short. In the course of three years the account would therefore be a day in error; and it became necessary to add a day to one of the months. When these lunar months were used, the year, comprising twelve such months, consisted only of 354 days—eleven days too short. Nevertheless, such a year was for a long time used by the Grecians and the Romans, and is still used in Mohammedan countries. The Romans, however, in the calendar of Numa added twenty-two or twenty-three days to every alternate year by inserting the intercalary month Mercedonius between the 23d and 24th of February.

The irregularity and inconvenience of reckoning by lunar months caused them to be generally abandoned, the only reason for their retention being religious observances due at the time of the new moon, which among the Jews, as well as other nations, were regarded as of the highest consequence. The Egyptians, however, counted them by months of thirty days each, making their year to consist of twelve such months and five additional days, making 365 days in all. After the lapse of 1,460 years, according to the calculations of the time, each season would have made a complete course through the twelve months, and would then have returned once more at the same time of the year as in the beginning. This was termed the Sothic Period; but the error of each year being estimated too great, as is now known, the true length of the period would have been 1,500 years.

The confusion in the Greek year was partly remedied through the discovery by Meton of the cycle which has since borne his name. This cycle consists of nineteen solar years, during which the moon changes 225 times. If this number of lunar months was divided evenly into nineteen years, the length of the years was near enough for the purpose of civil reckoning. The years of each cycle were numbered from 1 to 19, and the number of the year was called the Golden Number, from having been ordered to be inscribed on the monuments in letters of gold.

This Golden Number is still used in Church calendars, especially for finding the date of Easter Sunday; this being the only religious festival in Christian countries which depends upon the motion of the moon. The rule for determining the Easter is, that it is the Sunday following the first new moon which occurs after the 21st of March. The dates of the new moon correspond to the Metonic Cycle. After the lapse of nineteen years they recur on or about the same day of the year. Consequently if a list of the dates be made on which the paschal new moon occurs, no two dates will be found to be the same for nineteen years, but the twentieth will occur on the same day with the first, or, at most, only one day's difference, and then the whole series will be repeated. Consequently the Golden Number of the year shows with sufficient exactness for the purposes of the Church on what day, or how many days after the equinox the paschal new moon occurs. The Church calculations of Easter Sunday are, however, founded upon very old tables of the moon, so that if it is fixed by the actual moon, the celebrated feast day would be found a week out of the way.

The basis of the calendars now employed throughout the civilized world was laid by Julius Cæsar. Before his time the Roman calendar was in the utmost confusion, the nominal length of the year depending largely upon the caprice of the ruler for the time being. It was well known that the length of the year was 365 1-4 days, and in order that the calendar year might have the same mean length it was prescribed that the ordinary year should consist of 365 days, but that one day should be added to every fourth year. The lengths of the months, as now used, were arranged by the successor of Cæsar.

What was termed the Julian Calendar was continued in use for sixteen centuries; and if the length of the tropical year had been exactly 365 1-4 days it would have been in use still. That period, however, being 11 1-4 minutes longer than the solar year, and the same repeated every year, amounts to an entire day in 128 years. Consequently, in the sixteenth century, the equinoxes occurred eleven or twelve days sooner than they should have done according to the calendar, or on the 10th instead of the 21st of March. To restore them to their proper and original position in the year, or more strictly to their position at the time of the Council of Nice, was the basis of the Gregorian reformation of the calendar, so called from Pope Gregory XXII, by whose order the change was made. The change consisted of two parts: First. The 5th of October, 1582, according to the Julian calendar, was called the 15th, the count thus being advanced ten days, and the equinoxes made once more to occur March 21st and September 21st. Second. The closing year of each century 1600, 1700, etc., instead of being each a leap-year, as in the Julian calendar, should be such only when the number of the century was divisible by four. While 1600, 2000 2400, etc., were to be leap-years as before, 1700, 1900, 2100, etc., were to be reduced to 365 days each. Previous to this change was called Old style, and after it the calendar was New style.

This change was early adopted by all Catholic countries, but more slowly by Protestant ones—England among the latter holding out for more than a century, but finally adopting the New Style in 1752. The Russians never adopted it at all, and the Julian calendar is still in use there. Consequently the Russian reckoning is now twelve days behind ours, two more days having been added to the ten in the time that has since elapsed.

The length of the mean Gregorian year is 365 days, 5 hours, 49 minutes, and 12 seconds, while that of the tropical year, according to the best astronomical determination, is 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, and 46 seconds. The former is, therefore, still twenty-six seconds too long, an error, however, that in 3000 years will not amount to more than one day; a change in the calendar, therefore, will not again be required for a long time to come. There is hardly a necessity for the Gregorian and the solar year to exactly agree; the difference is so slight as not to be objectionable. Summer and winter, seed-time and harvest, are, of course, of the utmost importance, but it is in no way imperative that they should recur to the exactness of a minute. Those who live 5,000 to 10,000 years after us, will doubtless make another change in the calendar if they see fit to do so.

The change alluded to met with much popular opposition, and it must be conceded that the good common sense of the people was nearer right than the wisdom of the learned. An additional complication was introduced into the reckoning of time without any other real object than the making of Easter come at the right time. For many centuries every other interest has been compelled to bow in submission to the religious or the superstitious.

As the end of the present century approaches, the question of making 1900 a leap-year, as usual, will probably be discussed, and it is possible that some concerted action may be taken on the part of leading nations looking to a return to the old mode of reckoning.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Correspondence Extraordinary.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. XI.

My Dear Readers: In what I have hitherto said to you my remarks have been general, and referred to one part of the universe as much as to another—as much to other worlds as to your own small globe; but as we have now come down to the time when the numerous suns and worlds are revolving and whirling in their own orbits and courses, and that they have become so condensed or compacted as to assume somewhat the appearance of finished suns and worlds, it will be proper for me to confine myself more particularly to your own little earth, as that is the sphere which interests you more than all others, and as it would be utterly impossible for me to give you the details of all the worlds and their growth into maturity and perfection. I do not wish you to understand that Jah and I paid any the less attention to the other worlds because I say, from now on, comparatively little concerning them. Our observations were, perhaps, equally and fairly divided among all the systems and constellations; and the laws and forces we had so devised that it required very little personal superintendence from us to keep everything in all parts of the universe in the best possible running order.

One fine morning, as Jah and I were taking a stroll of inspection and observation among the worlds in the section of the universe adjacent to your own earth, Jah, in pointing out your globe, spoke as follows: "Luce, here is a little globe that has reached a fine state of forwardness; its matter has arrived at a pretty advanced state of condensation. It being so much smaller than most of the others, it has got along faster, and will sooner be prepared for our experiment in organic forms of life."

"Yes," said I; "I have had my attention several times especially attracted to this little world; and I foresee that in connection with it we are destined to have some most interesting experiences, and that the class of beings we will ultimately bring into existence upon it will have a lively time of it. I propose that we give our special attention to this small world, and try there the grand experiments in creating vegetation and animal life before we do so on the larger worlds, which are yet more unprogressed."

"That is the idea, Luce. We will hasten our operations here; we will complete its solidification; and when it has got sufficiently cooled off on its surface, and the rocks have had time to decompose into soils, we will evolve from it beautiful specimens of vegetable and animal life."

There were few instances where Jah and I more perfectly concurred in our plans and opinions than we did in the case of your own world. I have told you that in the condensing process, as the primates and compounds gradually became more solid and compact, a very high degree of heat was produced. To such extent was this carried that your globe became a fused mass of metal, rock, etc., and for ages was several hundred degrees above zero by your thermometers. When in this fluid state you can easily understand that the heavier parts of your globe gravitated to the center; thus the densest metals pressed to the very center of the earth.

Ordinary rock is some three and a half times the weight of water, while the metals lead, mercury, gold, platinum, and osmium vary from nineteen to twenty-one and a half times the weight of water. As the earth in its entirety is about seven times the weight of water, you can form an approximate idea of what relative proportion of it is metal, and what is rock. At the center, and for hundreds of miles out, it is nearly solid metal, being a mixture of the several kinds of the heavy metals named, and for other hundreds of miles is little else than iron. Had your globe ever been in a perfectly quiescent state, few, or none, of the heavier metals would have been found near the surface; but, as the crust gradually became crystallized and hardened, internal eruptions and upheavals, from the formation of gases, etc., from time to time took place. When these upheavals occurred, veins of the fused metals were thrown out to the surface of the globe, and were interspersed with the strata of plastic or semi-hardened rocks.

Those upheavals were for a long time events of frequent occurrence, and took place long after the surface of the earth had cooled down, and the strata of rocks had assumed their present condition. These upheavals explain the existence of mountains, the inclination of the strata forming the earth's crust as well as how the fused metals were thrown up in veins, lodes, and pockets, as they are now found by your miners. Could the earth be penetrated towards its center, and the intense heat there be obviated, millions of times more of rare and valuable metals could be found almost in a state of purity than mankind have ever yet possessed. There they lay in a compact, superheated state, the heaviest near the center, as I said, and growing lighter as the surface of the earth is approached, near which little else than rocky, earthy material exists, in a fused, a plastic, a semi-plastic, or a cold, solid form. The volcanoes, large numbers of which have become extinct, show you the condition of the earth some distance below the surface.

When in active operation from internal commotion and disturbances, modified as they are by the powerful electric and magnetic currents which traverse the exterior of the metallic portions of the earth, where the metals have subsided from the fused condition—for it must be known that superheated metals repel and destroy the magnetic currents—so while they have a tremendous power on the outer portions of the earth where its crust exists, they cannot penetrate and travel through the superheated metals forming the inner portion.

Yes, for millions of years those metals in a highly fused and partially quiescent state, have formed the inner portions of the earth, and for millions of years more must a similar condition of things continue. There was a time when the extreme surface of your globe was so hot that organized life and the very existence of water in a fluid state was an impossibility. Long ages ago when the surface of the earth was in a state of fusion, and flames of fire streamed up for miles, vast quantities of hydrogen were ignited, and they burned with intense fierceness. Oxygen in immense quantities occupying a lower position, rushed in, and supported the combustion of hydrogen, and immediately formed a grand chemical union called water, and that is how the surface of the globe is so liberally supplied with that useful fluid, without which the existence of animal and vegetable life would be an utter impossibility. I had early seen the great use for the two gases, hydrogen and oxygen, and, as I told you, we made them in immense quantities, but though they existed in close contiguity, and often came in contact, they did not form water and could not till the combustion of the hydrogen had taken place, when a chemical union immediately occurred and produced water in vast quantities. You must know, too, that as inflammable as hydrogen is, it could not burn except in the presence of oxygen, which stepped in, one volume of which uniting with two of hydrogen forming your indispensible aqueous fluid, which is strictly an oxide of hydrogen, and without which your globe and all other worlds could be of no use as residences for organized life. The consumption of such vast quantities of hydrogen as existed above the earth, and the heavier gases, a large amount of heat was produced, and thus liberated was left free to make other associations and combinations.

When water was produced as I describe to you, the great heat of the surface of the earth prevented its remaining in a fluid state for an hour, or even a minute. If it fell to the earth in a condensed condition, it was immediately converted into vapor or steam, and made to occupy the atmosphere next to the earth. Coming in contact with the cold air above, it was immediately condensed, and fell in the most profuse rain that you can imagine, which, coming in contact with the heat at the earth's surface, was again immediately converted into steam, and forced above in contact with the cold air, to again be condensed, parting with its heat it had obtained at the earth, to again fall back to it. Thus millions of times over did the water now forming your oceans, lakes, rivers, streams, and springs play around the surface of the globe, changing constantly from the condensed form of water to the vapory condition of steam. You can hardly imagine what a humid, vapory, steaming condition existed in your atmosphere for many ages, and it was so dense that the sun's rays could not penetrate it; and thus for ages there was little of the sun's light that reached the earth's surface. The earth, however, had little use then for the sun's light; there was no organized life connected with it, and the vivifying rays of the sun could well be dispensed with, for its own heated and burning condition created all the light necessary for what was being done.

Let me tell you that the atmosphere which then surrounded the earth was materially different from what it now is. It was highly charged with carbon in an aerial form, or carbonic acid gas. Immense quantities of this gas existed and combined readily with the atmosphere, and made it heavier and capable of sustaining a far greater weight of watery vapor, so that at least three times the vapor that could be sustained by your present atmosphere could easily be held up then.

This redundance of carbon in the aeriform condition was afterward largely used up in the formation of limestone, marble, coal, etc., and also in the vast growth of vegetation with which in later times the earth was covered. The immense growth of rank vegetation which your scientists call the coal plant used up great quantities of the diffused carbon which existed all around the earth. The plant was principally carbon, and when it fell to the earth, and, by the water which then existed on the globe, was borne in strata and deposited in convenient beds, and afterwards covered with rock, clay, gravel, etc., which, by the action of the water and other causes, was thrown upon the carboniferous formation. By this arrangement a great body of fuel was preserved, which is now proved to be so valuable in warming your houses, running your steamships, steamboats, machinery, etc. The latent force which the coal-beds of your earth contain, and the concentrated rays of the sun were more than two hundred thousand years ago appropriated and utilized by the coal plant, and garnered safely up for the future use of a race of beings who at a subsequent epoch should occupy the earth.

But I must not get ahead of my story. I have done this in reference to some of the processes described in former letters, but I presume it matters little to you if you get the facts. That is the main object in obtaining information.

The repeated evaporation of the water hovering over the surface of the earth in primeval times when it came in contact with the cold in the upper atmosphere, and its immediate conversion to steam again when it neared the earth, served greatly to cool down the surface of the globe, and to convey the surplus heat of the earth to the cold regions above it. This operation was constantly taking place. The condensed rain would pour down upon the heated surface of the globe, and as quickly would it be sent back again in the form of heated steam; and thus the surface of the globe was kept in a heated vapor-bath for lengthy eras. In this way the water served an excellent purpose, in carrying away the excess of heat which existed on the surface of the globe; and without the aid so rendered you would not be living on the earth to-day, for its surface would still be too hot for beings like yourselves. Thus the union formed by hydrogen and oxygen has in many ways been of the greatest utility, and without this most essential element this fine little world that you occupy would have been of very little value. It is of far more consequence than all the gold, silver, platinum, and, in fact, all the other metals, that exist.

When the globe had become so cooled down that the water could remain in a fluid state upon its surface, it found access, by way of various crevices and fissures, some little distance into the crust that was then forming, and this also created many commotions and many little disturbances. When the water came in contact with the intense heat under the surface, a large volume of steam would be so suddenly engendered that convulsions like earthquakes many times occurred. Vent had to be had, even if hundreds of feet of the earth's surface had to be thrown up. In that period of the earth's existence great topographical changes in the outer surface of the earth took place. When the earth became cool enough so that water could remain in a fluid state upon its bosom, there were very slight protuberances upon the surface, and the water covered the entire globe. But the upheavals produced by the penetration of the water into the interstices and fissures, together with the formation or elimination of gases in the subterranean regions, produced immense commotions and earthquakes. Vast areas of the earth were elevated into hills and mountains, while other portions were correspondingly depressed; and these again changed position time and time again, when the ocean, which for a long time had held possession, was thrown up, and portions of the earth called dry land were submerged below the water level; thus land and sea alternately changed places. Islands and continents sank below the waves, and others rose again in other localities. The old earth you dwell upon has changed its surface more often than a snake changes its skin.

But I have talked to you enough for this time. I do not wish to become tedious to you with my dull details. It is better that I give you not too much in a single letter. Next week I will have something to say about the formation of the various geological strata of the earth's surface, being a part of the progressive stages which fitted the earth for the home of animal, vegetable, and human life. Until that time, kind friends, I wish you continued health and happiness. I subscribe myself,

Your own LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

FORTUNE can take nothing from us but what she gave.

THE motives of the best actions will not bear too strict an inquiry. It is allowed that the cause of most actions, good or bad, may be resolved into the love of ourselves; but the self-love of some men inclines them to please others, and the self-love of others is wholly employed in pleasing themselves. This makes the great distinction between virtue and vice.

MINDS of the first rank are generalizers; of the second, specializers. Below them are the crowd, some better, some worse, same duller, some brighter. Generalizers in chief recognize inferior generalizers, but are apt to snub them; while they welcome every specializer because he brings grist to their mill.—Tinsley's Magazine.

THE grandest operations, both in nature and grace, are the most silent and imperceptible. The shallow brook babbles in its passage, and is heard by every one; but the coming on of the seasons is silent and unseen. The storm rages and alarms, but its fury is soon exhausted and its effects are partial and soon remedied; but the dew, though gentle and unheard, is immense in quantity and the very life of large portions of the earth.

Answers to Inquirers.

M. P. T.—What is the meaning of the italic words in the Bible, and why are they used? Ans.—They are supply words, not found in the original, but supplied by the translators to complete the sense.

M. P. T.—What are the sensations felt in the process of drowning? Ans.—Those who have been resuscitated from drowning describe the sensation as agreeable, and attended with no pain, a going out of the lamp of life like a pleasant, receding light, until fully extinguished. The coming to is said to be very painful.

W. H. J.—In what localities and in what manner do geologists get most of their information? Ans.—This question is not extremely definite. There are no special localities for acquiring geologic information. Gulches, caverns, deep cuts, mines, etc., are favorable for explorations in this direction. The manner is in digging with the pick and shovel, blasting, etc., in connection with the consultation of approved text books.

TRUTH SEEKER.—About what time did the Christian nations begin to count time by the Christian era, as now in use? and what record of time was kept previous to that time? Ans.—Some writers claim that the use of the Christian era was adopted in the sixth century, in Italy, by Dionysius the Little, a Roman abbot. It began to be used in Gaul in the eighth century, and in Germany and England in the ninth century. Previous to the Christian era the Olympian was used by the Greeks. In Latin countries the practice was to distinguish the years by their number in the cycle of Indiction. Some interesting remarks upon the calendar and the reckoning of time will be found under the head of "Astronomy" in this issue, page 220.

J. F. W.—Do the signs of the zodiac and the moon have any effect on vegetation? Ans.—There is no question that all the heavenly bodies exert a special influence in the universe, but the fixed stars are so far away that they do not reach our globe. The sun, moon, and planets are believed by the best scientists to possess a special magnetic power, which is more or less felt on our globe. To what extent this is true has yet to be determined by future scientific investigation. That some vegetables, like cucumbers, grow better in the light of the moon than in the dark is well known. Much that has been claimed for the moon's influence is undoubtedly incorrect. The signs of the zodiac may also shed an influence, but how much we will not undertake to say.

INQUIRER.—Will you please give the dates on which the principal Church councils have been held? Ans.—To give the dates and descriptions of all the councils that have been held, a volume would be required to contain them all. The following are the most distinguished: The first called the Apostles' Council is said to have been held at Jerusalem about the year 50, but this is extremely apocryphal; of the western bishops at Arles, in France, to suppress the Donatists, was held in 314; the first Œcumenical or general council was held at Nice, presided over by Constantine, in which Arius and Eusebius were condemned for heresy, and the Nicene Creed was established, was held in 325; one at Tyre, in which the doctrines of Athanasius were held, in 335; the first in Constantinople when the Arian heresy gained ground, was held in 337; one was held in Rome concerning Athanasius in 342, and lasted eighteen months; at Sardis, attended by 370 bishops in 347; at Remini, 400 bishops attending, when Constantine obliged them to sign a new confession of faith, in 359; the second at Constantinople, 350 bishops attending, over which Pope Damasius presided, in 381; the third at Ephesus, presided over by Pope Celestin, in 431; the fourth at Chalcedon, the Emperor Marcian and his empress attending, 451; the fifth at Constantinople, Pope Vigilius presiding, in 553; the sixth, at Constantinople, in 680; authority of the six general councils established by Theodosius in 715; eighth general council in Constantinople, in 869; the first Lateran, the ninth general, in 1122; the second Lateran, Innocent II. presiding, in 1139; the third Lateran, eleventh general, held against schismatics, in 1179; fourth Lateran, twelfth general, in 1215; of Lyons, fourteenth general, under Gregory X., in 1274; of Vienne in Dauphiné, the fifteenth general, under Clement V., who presided; the order of Knight Templars suppressed, in 1311; of Pisa, the sixteenth general, Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII. deposed; Alexander elected, in 1409; of Constance, seventeenth general, Martin V. elected pope, John Huss and Jerome of Prague condemned to be burnt, 1414; of Basil, the eighteenth general, in 1431; the fifth Lateran, and nineteenth general, began by Julius II. in 1512, continued under Leo X. in 1517; the Council of Trent, the twentieth and last general council, and styled Œcumenical, as regarding the affairs of all the Christian world, held to condemn the doctrines of Luther, Zuinglius, and Calvin, in 1545.

The Radical Pulpit.

The Dogma of Hell.—Concluded.

A SERMON BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The strength, the bulwark, of this doctrine, has ever been the ecclesiastical spirit, the spirit of assumption and mental oppression. It grew up with the priesthood, and with the priesthood it prevailed, and with the power of the priesthood it declined. It never had much influence, by reason of the moral consciousness of men. It is a remarkable fact that people have for the most part been consigned to hell for offenses against ecclesiastical rule. The inhabitants of hell have been chiefly heretics sent there for the guilt of unbelief, skeptics who looked too deeply into the mysteries of dogma, Infidels who abandoned the traditions of faith. A Parsee writing, it is said, describes a woman in hell, "beaten with stone clubs by two demons twelve miles high, and compelled to eat a basin of offal, because some of her hair, as she combed it, fell into the sacred fire." A Brahmanic text, says Alger, tells of a man who, for "neglecting to meditate on the mystic monosyllable om, before praying, was thrown down on an iron floor in hell, and cloven with an ax, then stirred in a caldron of molten lead till covered all over with foam sweat, like a grain of rice in an oven, and then fastened with head downwards and feet upwards, to a chariot of fire, and urged onward with a red-hot goad." A general council of the Church condemned Origen for teaching that the doctrine of eternal punishment in hell did not comport with the idea of the infinite goodness of God. An English cardinal, early in the thirteenth century, wrote a book on the question, Is Origen saved or damned? In Bayle's Dictionary is related the vision of a hermit who saw hell uncovered, and, in the midst of it, Origen, in the company of the damned, covered with flames and confusion (Delapierre's Enfer, p. 33, note). The pains of hell were reserved for offenders against the Church, not for offenders against humanity. The hell of the Romanist is full of Protestants. The hell of the Protestant is full of schismatics. Where theological hatred does not exist there is no hell, for there are none to put into it except murderers, thieves, and liars, and none of these deserve its frightful tortures. In the priests' eyes unbelief is the soul of guilt. So will it be so long as churches claim special revelations of truth, so long as certain texts are revered as the word of God, so long as ecclesiastical institutions and rites are held to be sacred above human sanctities, so long as orders of men called religious assume the right to dictate thought and conduct to mankind.

It is vulgarly thought that the belief in future punishment is important as a check on the inordinate passions of men; that it is valuable in keeping society in order, men being more readily swayed by fear than by any other motive. This impression is, I am persuaded, quite mistaken. It is not probably true that men are more powerfully affected by fear than by love. The experiment has never been tried. The assumption that fear is the only influence to which human beings respond has been acted on from time immemorial and has begotten an absolute skepticism in regard to the efficacy of any other sentiment. That men should be influenced for good by fear seems to be someting like an absurdity. Fear can do no more for a moral nature than darkness can do for a plant or lightning for a tree. Sunshine alone quickens. Love alone warms. Violence may stimulate, but how can it nourish? Fear may create fear; can it create trust? Vitality is coincident with passionate desire, but fear produces apathy and repulsion. The substitution of rewards for penalities would probably be followed by a moral impulse towards goodness such as Christendom never experienced.

I heard, a short time since, the touching story of a drunkard. He had dragged himself and his wife down from a respectable position into the deepest pit of poverty and degradation. He was a beggar and a brute, and she was a wretched, sick, crushed creature, to whom existence was a burden. Reproaches had been rained upon his head for years; society had cast him into its outer darkness, shut its door upon him. The friend who told me the story found these people in a garret, and by the aid of some neighbors separated the husband from the wife. She, after a time, recovered herself sufficiently to do a little plain sewing; and when she had earned her first shilling, she placed half of it, sixpence, in her benefactor's hand saying, "When you see my husband, give him this, with my love." He did so. The wretched man took it, gazed at it, and broke into a sob of agony. "O God! I could bear threats, hunger, and curses, but I cannot bear this. That sixpence breaks my heart!" Is a woman's love so powerful, and can the Supreme love be impotent?

But let this pass. It is enough for the present to know that the doctrine of future punishment has not been, to any considerable degree, employed as an agent in moral reformation. It has been used as an engine for the suppression of heresy. The free preachers who preceded Luther did their best to galvanize sinners into good behavior by describing the terrors of hell. Very frightful their descriptions were; so grotesque and fantastical in their horror as to betray their weakness. None but the stupidest, the most credulous, the most animal, could have been affected by threatenings so ludicrously violent. The preachers, one would say, felt the impotence of their method, and not being wise enough to change it for a better, heaped up the agony till it was amusing. It would be safe to say that the certainty of a good whipping to be inflicted immediately on the perpetration of the offense, would exert a more salutary effect on conduct than the most lurid prospect of imaginary flames.

The truth is that the threat of hell even in its most mitigated form is so vastly in excess of any consciousness of guilt as to be practically inoperative. The flames might as well be painted, for any terror they carry. It is impossible to bring such fantasies home to the practical sense. They who have imagination to realize them are disgusted. They who have not are confounded and stunned. Instead of apprehending a decline of morality from the popular disbelief in the doctrine of hell torments, it will be more reasonable to apprehend such decline from its continued profession; and the more sincere the profession, the graver the cause for apprehension. Whatever effect Christianity may have had in softening the habits and sweetening the dispositions of men—and by all admission it has exerted a great deal—it has produced by its graciousness, in spite of this hideous doctrine. The benignant character of Jesus, the human teachings of the Sermon on the Mount, the lovely lessons of parables like the Good Samaritan and the Prodigal Son, the touching suggestions of the Supper, the Garden, and the Cross, the affecting mythology of the Atonement, with its background of the Eternal Love and its expression of self-sacrificing devotion on the part of the purest and gentlest of the sons of men, all these combined were perpetually dropping refreshing dew on the waste places of the human heart and warming into life the seeds of kindness and purity. For one nature, hard and brutal, that the terrors of the hereafter may have restrained, it has probably deadened, discouraged, or brutalized a hundred sensitive spirits that needed only a ray of hope to bloom in beauty and shed a delicious fragrance on the air. If all were known, as all never can be, it would probably appear that the doctrine of future punishment has demoralized and dehumanized the ages in which it prevailed, and has seriously retarded the progress of virtue by hindering the natural play of motive and preventing the standard of moral attainment. If all were known, it would probably appear that the doctrine reflected the inhumanity of inhuman generations, and deepened it.

In measuring the moral influence of this dogma, due weight must be allowed to a consideration which Mr. Lecky makes prominent in his "History of Rationalism in Europe." He dwells at length on the disastrous effect it exerted on the moral dispositions of churchmen, making them callous and cruel. He traces the connection between the horrible pictures of torment which they hung up and contemplated, which artists painted on walls and ceilings, which preachers colored with their ferocious rhetoric, which priests presented at the confessional, and mystics agonized over in their cell, and the frightful torments that were inflicted on heretics. The instruments of torture used in the middle ages, the wheels, racks, screws, pincers, were but material copies of the instruments which the fiends were believed to employ upon the damned in hell; and the cold-blooded ferocity with which the horrid enginery was plied, nay, the satanic glee of the auto da fe, was but such imitation as human creatures could make of the devils who executed on the cursed the mandates of the divine wrath. "If," says Lecky, "you make the detailed and exquisite torments of multitudes the habitual object of the thoughts and imaginations of men, you will necessarily produce in most of them a gradual indifference to human suffering, and in some of them a disposition to regard it with positive delight. If you further assure men that these sufferings form an integral part of a revelation which they are bound to regard as a message of good tidings, you will induce them to stifle every feeling of pity, and almost to encourage their insensibility as a virtue. If you end your teachings by telling them that the Being who is the ideal of their lives confines his affections to the members of a single church, that he will torture forever all who are not found within its pale, and that his children will forever contemplate those tortures in a state of unalloyed felicity, you will prepare the way for every form of persecution that can be directed against those who are without."

The bloody days are over. The instruments of torture are exhibited as curiosities in the castle dungeons of Europe. May we not hope, may we not reasonably expect that their diabolical counterparts will also be remanded to the mythological curiosity shop, to be marveled at as the insane contrivances of a diseased fancy? Is it not melancholy, nay ludicrous to think, that men who cry over an attack of rheumatism, who will not permit a woman to be injured, who remonstrate against the execution of a criminal, who raise an outcry against the practice of vivisection whereby surgeons make studies in anatomy by cutting up frogs and cats, are standing out vigorously for a doctrine that condemns millions of their fellow-creatures to agonies unspeakable and endless, and are defending the opinion in the name of the Supreme Goodness? Could there be a better illustration of the ease with which people allow themselves to use words without meaning? Could there be a better proof of hollowness and insincerity? Could there be a sharper admonition to the duty of making beliefs correspond with feelings, and of substituting for the gaudy card houses of rhetoric, the solid mansions of conviction? To talk about eternal torment is not difficult; to profess belief in it may be possible even for good natured people, but to think it, to bring it home to reason or heart, is what the stoutest cannot do. It may be questioned whether a single man, even a single priest, preacher, or churchman, ever fully "realized" the import of the doctrine. We know the names of single men whom the far off contemplation of it drove to the madhouse. Nothing but dense ignorance, credulity, mental and moral apathy, wrapping human sensibility about as with the hide of a rhinoceros, enabled them to bear the suggestion of it, and still go on their way believing, hoping, and rejoicing. In proportion as men become intelligent, conscientious, and sensitive, they throw the incubus off, though, with it, they cast over creed, church, scripture, and all the associations of religion. For Reason is worth more than all.

That the doctrine of endless punishment will be fully, frankly, in every form discarded, while the popular religion—Christianity—survives, cannot be expected. For, as has been declared, the article is an essential part of that religion, and will be maintained, literally and figuratively, by those who are interested in keeping the system alive. But that it is vanishing away before the brighter intelligence and the better heart of the modern world, is very certain; and equally certain is it that into the shadow of oblivion will go the kindred tenets with which it is associated.

It is not enough, however, that the intelligent minds of a new age should reject the doctrine of future punishment, as held by the Christian Church. They must abandon the habit of associating any idea of punishment with the divine administration of the universe. Not the physical conception merely, but the moral conception must be discarded. Neither in the life after death nor in the life before death is the thought of punishment, of retribution, of vengeance to be entertained. It is the custom of the "liberal" sects, so called, to spiritualize, as they term it, the consequences of the divine wrath. They transfer the pains from the body to the soul, and imagine conscience as the agent in executing the avenging decree. They too, paint pictures of the torments of the damned which, they boast, are more lurid and awful even than those set forth by the Calvinistic theology. They describe the agonies of the awakened conscience as Spurgeon might describe the agonies of the resurrected frame. It is only another form of the old iniquity. It is but a continuation of the evil habit they so bitterly condemn in their fellow believers. Their doctrine, though less disgusting and revolting, is hardly more rational than the ancient dogma which they repudiate.

The only rational alternative is the omission of the word "punishment," from the vocabulary of religion. Speak of actions and their consequences; of conduct and its issues; of character and its laws; speak of moral cause and effect, and trace the connection between deeds and destinies, a vital, organic connection that cannot be broken or interrupted; but let the thought of retaliation be dropped. Then will life be ordered on rational principles; then will hopes and fears be reasonable; and then will our conceptions of providence and deity be worthy of intelligent beings.

FOR ridding lawns of unsightly weeds, such as plantain and dandelions, the following plan is recommended by an experienced gardener: To the end of a light wooden rod attach a small sponge, or, better, wind a few thicknesses of cloth around it, dip the sponge in oil of vitriol, and with it touch the heart of the weed. The oil of vitriol may be carried in a wide-mouthed bottle at the end of another rod.

THERE was a noble youth who, on being urged to take wine at the table of a famous statesman at Washington, had the moral courage to refuse. He was a poor young man, just beginning the struggle of life. He brought letters to the great statesman, who kindly invited him home to dinner. "Not take a glass of wine?" said the great statesman, in wonderment and surprise. "Not one single glass of wine?" echoed the statesman's beautiful and fascinating wife, as she rose, glass in hand, and, with a glance that would have charmed an anchorite, endeavored to press it upon him. "No," replied the heroic youth, resolutely, gently, repelling the proffered glass. What a picture of moral grandeur was that! A poor friendless youth refusing wine at the table of a wealthy and famous statesman, even though proffered by the fair hands of a beautiful lady. "No," said the noble young man, his voice trembling a little and his cheeks flushing, "I never drink wine; but,"—here he straightened himself up and his words grew firmer—"if you have a little good old rye whisky, I don't mind trying a snifter!"

The Authority of the Bible.

A LECTURE BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. Underwood, after stating the position in his easy yet earnest way and with an appearance of uncommon familiarity with the subject, said:

The Bible is a work of human origin and authority, and, like all other books, must take its place among the products of man. It has all the marks of a human origin. First, it conflicts with the recognized facts of science, and gives us the childish, undeveloped conceptions of the unadvanced mind, whenever it refers to the prehistoric periods of this globe. It represents the first condition of the earth as one in which it was covered with water, while science says it was fiery. It represents that there was light and life on the globe before there was any sun. It gives the geocentric error that the earth is the point around which the sun moves and stars revolve. It represents that God devoted the whole of the second day to making a firmament (Hebrew rakia, which comes from the root meaning to beat out), which was intended to divide the waters above from the waters below the firmament, and into which sun, moon, and stars were set like lights in the dome of a cathedral or bull's eyes in the deck of a ship. It represents that grass, herbs, and fruit trees, such as bear seed, and such as man and beast could subsist on, were made the third day, when we know these were preceded immense ages, by a vegetation on which neither man nor beast could live. We know that mollusks and fish swarmed in the sea long before any of the higher vegetation appeared. According to the Bible, two great luminaries "and the stars also" were made on the fourth day. Days and nights before any sun or moon or stars! Theologians say the sun appeared the fourth day. But the same word (hasah) is used when it is said he made the sun and moon, and is used when it is said God made man and beast. Such disingenuousness in twisting a contract out of its true meaning would damn the reputation of any lawyer; yet theologians habitually resort to it to save the inspiration of the Mosaic cosmogony. The order in which the animals appeared, according to the geological record, differs from that of Genesis, which is both indefinite and erroneous. Reference was made to Hugh Miller, Tyndall, and Huxley's New York lectures. The Bible represents the six-days notion which is now exploded. It says God made the heavens and the earth in six days and rested on the seventh, and because he rested on that day made it sacred, and commanded man to rest on the same day. Was the seventh day a "long period?" Hebrew authorities were read to show that the word Yam, translated day, could not mean period, in the first chapter of Genesis. But the notion of six periods is without support in science, as there are no such geological divisions recognized by geologists. The Bible represents that it had not rained up to a time shortly before man was made, when "Devonian rain prints" are familiar to geologists, indeed when from the character of the rain pits made we can tell which way the wind blew when the rain fell on the old Silurian beach. The Bible represents that the serpent runs on its belly because of the scene in the Garden of Eden, while science says the serpent performed locomotion as it does to-day, millions of years before man appeared on the globe. Thorns and thistles, too, were as numerous before the earth was "cursed" as afterwards. The "punishment" inflicted on woman is experienced by the lower animals, and it is a necessary consequence of their physical constitution. The story of the flood and ark is another narrative that no scientific man can believe. There is not sufficient water on the globe—indeed there would not be if there were ten such oceans as the Atlantic—to cover the highest mountains. The ark described in the Bible would not hold a hundredth part of the animals of the earth, by pairs and septuples, with food for the same. There are craters of extinct volcanoes over which Hugh Miller says no water can have passed for a period three times as far back as the alleged date of the deluge. We have the history of Egypt, inscribed on tablets and monuments, made both before and after, and even during the time of the pretended deluge; and we know the Egyptians were busy with the arts of peace and war, and never heard of the deluge. They have no record of it on any of their monuments. It never occurred. Theologians, even, are ashamed of the account, and now claim it may have been confined to Asia Minor, or a portion of it, and that a few domestic animals may have been taken into the ark. But the Bible account in the seventh chapter of Genesis represents no local flood, but a universal deluge that destroyed all life on the face of the earth, save Noah and his company. Fault is not found with the Bible because it does not give information respecting science, but because it misstates facts. A wise teacher, if he does not choose to instruct the child in the higher branches, will not fill his mind with error on subjects which he attempts to teach. The account of Moses is the imaginings of the unscientific mind ages ago, and as such is of interest to us all: and I here expose its errors only to show that the Bible is an outgrowth and evolution of the human mind.

In the second place, the Bible contains commands and teachings which further establish its human origin. The command to destroy the Amalekites, in the time of Saul, because of what their ancestors did four hundred years previously, the destruction of 70,000 Israelites because David the king took a census of his people, the destruction of the Midianites and turning over 32,000 virgins to the Jewish soldiers as recorded in the 31st chapter of Numbers are simply fiendish. Moses says the statutes and judgments he gave to the Jewish people were given as the "Lord commanded." Look at the statutes. Any Jew who endeavored to persuade his neighbor or friend to leave the Jewish religion was to be put to death on the spot. Disbelief was high treason. Anything that died of itself "could be sold to an alien," but must not be eaten by a Jew. Any animal that "died of itself" is, as every physician knows, poison. Would God have authorized such a "know-nothing" law? The Jews were commanded to kill animals and sprinkle the blood on the people to placate God and avert calamities. God put lying spirits in the mouths of Ahab's prophets, and promised them that their lying should be crowned with success. He commanded Jewish soldiers to seize beautiful female captives, take them to their homes, and after humiliating them send them adrift; permitted men to separate from their wives, writing a bill of divorce themselves, putting it into the hands of the wife, and sending her out of the house; required a sin offering at each birth, to be twice as great in the case of a female as in the case of a male, because as the Jews believed "the badness of a man was better than the goodness of a woman." We are told Jephthah made of his daughter a burnt offering in accordance with a vow that he made when "the spirit of the Lord was upon him, and that Jael should be blessed above women" for assassinating a sleeping fugitive. So says the inspired prophetess Deborah. David the inspired Psalmist, in the 109th Psalm, prays that the children of his enemy may be vagabonds and beg, that even the sin of their mother may not be blotted out. The Old Testament is full of revenge and cruelty; its spirit is an "eye for an eye." Jehovah himself sets the example by commanding the destruction of whole nations—even the new born infant on its mother's breast, and the mother too—in one indiscriminate mass. Did those commands come from the same spirit that uttered the words, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do?" If the laws, the infamous laws, Moses gave are not of divine authority, what shall be said of his declaration that he gave the Jews laws "as the Lord commanded," reasoning from the theological standpoint? If the 109th Psalm and other vindictive portions of the Bible are human, what criterion have we for distinguishing the human from the divine? The Ten Commandments, we are told, are divine, but it needed no revelation from God to know that murder, theft, and adultery are wrong. Egypt had laws against all crimes and vices before Moses was born. That empire was famous for the wisdom and justice of its government, which was wonderfully complex, before the Jews had an existence as a nation; even Moses, we are told, "was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." No revelation then was needed to enable Moses to say, "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not steal;" while the bad commands and cruel, vindictive spirit of portions of the Old Testament demonstrate that it emanated from a half-civilized people, not from a wise all-knowing Being.

The third reason urged in proof of the human origin of the Bible is the fact that all its leading doctrines and precepts, rites and ceremonies, can be traced back to preëxisting systems of religion and philosophy. Much of Judaism can be traced directly to Egypt. The Egyptians had sacred books and a sacred priesthood in which the office was hereditary in one family or tribe. They had religious temples, and, as in Judea, they always faced to the east. They had inner and outer courts, sanctum and sactum sanctorum. They had an ark enclosed in a shrine which was carried about by a procession of priests as in Judea. This very ark indicated that the religion originated in a country subject to overflow, like the bottom lands of Egypt. In old pictures the gods of Egypt are seen sitting in an ark or boat. Henstenberg says: "The agreement of the cherubim with the Egyptian sphinxes cannot be doubted." The Egyptians offered animals as a sacrifice as did the Jews, and both slew the animal by cutting the throat; the Egyptians and Jews preferred a red heifer without spot. The practice of circumcision, Wilkinson says, is demonstrated by Egyptian monuments to have been fully established centuries before the alleged date of Abraham. Herodotus says: "The Phœnicians and Syrians say they learned it from Egypt."

The Egyptians had a scape-goat. A sacred fire was kept burning in the temples of Thebes as well as in Judea. The Egyptian priests took off their shoes in the temple, as Joshua took off his shoes in a holy place. The Egyptians anointed the kings and priests. The Egyptian priests were all monotheists—believers in one God, but the people believed in many gods. Moses, brought up at the court of the Pharaohs, needed no revelation to learn of one God. It took centuries to educate the Jewish people out of the belief in many gods. The Jews adopted some and omitted some of the Egyptian beliefs and ceremonies. The Egyptians had laws given by Diodorus Siculus and confirmed by hieroglyphical records, condemning and punishing murder, theft, adultery, perjury, false weights and measures, etc., etc. The Jews lived in Egypt hundreds of years. How absurd to suppose God revealed what was known to the Egyptians.

As for the Christian religion, all its doctrines were old when Jesus was born. The incarnation, the doctrine of atonement, the resurrection, baptism, etc., were parts of the old Pagan systems, as every scholar knows. The precepts requiring doing as you would be done by, forgiveness of enemies, loving your fellow-men, overcoming hate by love, indeed all the precepts of the New Testament, were taught and practised before the Christian era. [Quotations were made from the teachings of Buddha and other ancient teachers.] The Essenes, a sect that date back at least to the second century before Christ, taught and lived as did the early Christians. They had a community of goods, were simple in dress, took no oaths, allowed marriage, but discouraged it, forbade laying up treasures on earth, laid stress on being meek and lowly, aimed to be temples of the Holy Spirit, combined healing of the body with that of the soul, claimed to cast out evil spirits, performed miraculous cures, offered no animal sacrifices, had a three-fold rule, love of God, love of man, and love of virtue, never touched food before grace, and returned thanks after every meal, despised suffering, enjoined fasting and secret prayers, taught the body is corruptible but the soul is immortal, taught everlasting punishment of the wicked, and had writings among them which many scholars believe to have formed the basis of much of the New Testament. They composed hymns and sung them at their meetings.

Dr. Ginsburg, a contributor to Kitto's Bible Cyclopedia, an orthodox work, after showing the resemblance between the doctrines of the Essenes and the doctrines of Jesus, declares that Jesus probably was a member of their society. The Essenes had adopted some of the doctrines of Buddhism and of other systems. They claimed to be eclectic. They disappear from history when Christianity appeared. Gibbon says they probably changed their name. Pliny, Josephus, and Philo-Judæus gives descriptions of them. With all these doctrines taught, how can we fail to admit that Christianity is a revamp of them, taking a new name, and stamped by the individuality of the Nazarene reformer, the same as Mohammedanism was older teachings, stamped by the genius and enthusiasm of Mohammed; the same as Buddhism was the better parts of Brahminism, with its imperfections omitted and some features added and stamped by the wisdom and the asceticism of Buddha. Has Christianity many adherents? Mohammedanism has nearly two hundred millions. Buddhism has probably four hundred millions, including seven nations. Yet its founder left the allurements of a throne and became a wandering beggar. Both Mohammedanism and Buddhism have defects; so has Christianity; it teaches the barbarous doctrine of eternal torment, the superstition of diabolical possessions, the efficacy of prayer, the subordination of woman to man, a personal devil, and many other vagaries. It extols poverty, and denounces riches, restricts divorce to adultery on the part of woman, commands unresisting submission to tyranny, teaches that twelve disciples will sit on twelve thrones judging the world, etc., etc. The miracles of Christianity are sustained by no reliable history; it has no original doctrines; contains nothing man could not learn by his unassisted powers, and it is undergoing improvement in proportion as man becomes enlightened. All the evidence that the case admits of demonstrates that the Bible is an outgrowth of the human mind, an evolution of human thought, a work made up of books belonging to different ages, but all composed by man.

The Apostle Peter a Myth.

In the book of Acts there is no variance at all between Paul and Peter; only in the Epistle to the Galatians do they antagonize. If the writer of the Epistle tells the truth about them, the writer of Acts lies.

But aside from this, if there is any truth in the gospel story, there could not have been a disciple named Peter. An illiterate Galilean fisherman could not have been called by a Greek name Petros; nor was he in fact so named by Jesus. The vernacular of Galilee was Aramaic or Syriac. Now, we have an ancient Syriac version of the New Testament, and there is no Petros in the gospels or epistles; it is always Kipha.

But how came Petros in the Greek version? Simply by forgery in the guise of a translation. Kipha meant stone, so the Greek scribe, instead of writing it Kephas, translated it Petros. It is the only instance where a proper name has been translated instead of being transferred, and it was done with a fraudulent intent.

In Paul's epistles the forgery is more apparent. In the Syriac version, Paul mentions Kipha ten times; in King James's version only five times. Twice in the oldest Greek codices (Gal. ii. 7, 8), and three times in some of the later ones (Gal. i, 18; ii, 11, 14). Kipha has been changed to Petros. Elsewhere it is Kephas—Cephas.

These forgeries were made for the purpose of connecting Paul with the fabulous Galilean apostle. Paul was slightly acquainted with the three "pillars" of Jerusalem, James, Kipha and John, Essenean apostles of the ideal Joshua Ha Mashiach, Iesons Ho Christos, Jesus the anointed; but he knew no more about a Galilean fisherman named Kipha than he did about a Galilean Judas or Jesus, much less did he know any apostle Petros, because there never was such a person.

This and kindred questions have been elaborately discussed in a series of articles in the Investigator during the past three years. In a few months they will be embodied in a book in which the writer will prove Christianity to be a stupendous fraud, based upon a mythical Jesus and twelve mythical apostles.

ANTICHRIST.

WORDS CONTAINING THE FIVE REGULAR VOWELS.—There are a number of words in the English language which contain all the five regular vowels, but it would puzzle almost any one to think of more than one or two at short notice. The following may be given as examples: Education, reputation, regulation, emulation, perturbation, mensuration, repudiation. Besides these there are several words, each containing all the vowels, including the "y." Of course we may mention revolutionary, elocutionary and unquestionably. The word invisibility may be noted as a peculiar word, for it contains the letter "i" five times. Mississippi and Tennessee are each spelled with only four different letters of the alphabet, although one contains eleven letters and the other nine. Schnapps, a word of one syllable and eight letters, contains, but one vowel. There are no words in the English language of more than eight syllables, and of those containing that number may be mentioned incomprehensibility.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of Reading Matter than any other Journal of its class.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1878.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 41.

GREAT JEHOVAH: In connection with the fact that the books forming the New Testament are represented as being inspired by thee, may we not ask if there is such an amount of proof of the fact as to convince an earnest, investigating mind?

Are we to believe them to be of divine origin because the Church commands us to do so? Are we not entitled, as reasonable beings, to have some proof of so important a matter, and not be compelled to accept them because a privileged class of men who claim to hold commissions from thee demand that we should do so?

Is there any proof that any of the apostles, including Paul, or any of the early Fathers, including Justin Martyr, had any knowledge of the existence of the four gospels? If they had been written by those who are called the four evangelists during the generation in which thy Son is said to have lived, would not these parties have known something of their existence?

As the four gospels are merely narratives written in the style of those who write historical events, or who recite what they have heard, are there any grounds for us to conclude that the persons who wrote those books were necessarily inspired from heaven?

If Paul penned the epistles ascribed to him, and if he did so after the time when Matthew, Mark, Luke; and John wrote their narratives—if he was commissioned by thee to write what he did—would he not have known something of the existence of those four great books, and would he not have been familiar with their history and teachings?

During his whole career did Paul have any knowledge of the four gospels? Did he ever refer to them, or enjoin it upon his followers to read them or to believe in them?

In the instructions which he gave in his epistles, did he, even in one instance, cite or quote any of the moral precepts of Jesus, or did he allude to any of the events of his life while on earth?

Did Paul at any time call attention to any of the miracles that were claimed to have been performed by thy Son, or did he teach that salvation in any way depended upon believing them?

Is it not a reasonable conclusion that the four narratives now called the four gospels—but which were not called gospels till a long time after they were written—were entirely unknown to Paul, and that he knew nothing, historically or personally, of the begetting, birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of thine only Son?

Did Paul have any intimacy or close fellowship with any of the eleven apostles? and, so far as he is concerned, would it not be easy to come to the conclusion that they were myths?

In view of all the facts of the case, are not the grounds very slight for accepting the existence of the twelve apostles, and that the four gospels were written at the time thy Son was on the earth, or immediately after?

If "preaching the gospel," in the days of the apostles, meant to recite the story of his birth, life, and death, with a repetition of his moral precepts, is it not singular that what are now called the four gospels, and are deemed of so much importance, should have been wholly unknown by the apostles and saints and fathers for a century and a half after thy Son was born?

In the time when the apostles and fathers were living, and when they committed their narratives to writing on parchment, was it considered that these writings were anything more than human efforts, and was it regarded in any instance in their time that they were revelations from heaven? Was not that character attributed to them a long time after they were written, in succeeding generations, and by an entirely different class of persons?

Is it not an unfortunate circumstance connected with Christian theology that the plan of the salvation of the world should have for its foundation the baseless fabric of a dream, which some person is said to have dreamed, as given in the story of Matthew?

Were dreams in the first Christian century really any more of divine production than in the present century? Are not dreams a perfectly natural phenomena, that occur to men, women, and children alike, as well as to animals?

If some dreams are divine and sent from thee, would it not have been proper that some criterion or rule should be given whereby it could be decided which dreams were divine and which merely human?

Let us ask again, is not a dream of an obscure individual for which we only have the assertion of a second party—who was not present when the dream was dreamed, and did not even know the person who did the dreaming, and did not write his story till over a hundred years after the dream took place—an extremely slender foundation upon which to build up a plan and system for saving a world of almost countless millions of human beings?

Is it not most unfortunate for those who need salvation so badly, that there is so little proof of what they are commanded to believe, and that so much is left to faith?

Is it not a little unreasonable that men are required to believe without proof, and when their own eternal salvation depends upon it?

As in the present age of the world, when a historian or narrator gives marvelous statements as facts, and he tells how he knows what he states as truth to be so, whether he saw it himself or not, and whether he obtained the facts from responsible, reliable sources, would not such assurance have been as essential in olden times?

When a narrator states most remarkable occurrences, and wishes his readers to accept them as truths, should he not be clear in giving the sources of his information?

When Matthew states that the Devil carried thy Son from the wilderness to the top of a high mountain, and also to the pinnacle of the temple, and showed him the kingdoms on all sides of the globe, does he state that he was present and saw it, or does he give the least clue as to how he knew anything about it? Did the Devil tell Matthew about the little excursion, or did thy Son impart the information to him? Unless we have the authority of one or the other to rest upon, are we obliged to accept the statement as fact?

When he states that at the time of the crucifixion, when the sun was darkened, when earthquakes took place, when the graves were opened, and the dead carcasses were restored to life and walked forth and joined their former companions, does he give any proof that such things ever occured? Does he even say that he saw it, or does any other historian or story-teller confirm his statement? Did anybody else know anything about such events taking place?

Is there not, in fact, as much ground for the world to believe the writers of epic poems, romances, and fairy tales, who give us their remarkable stories, as there is to believe those who tell us about a carpenter's dream having so much meaning in it, about the Devil carrying the Son of God around where he pleased, and of the dead getting up and walking alive out of their graves?

What means had the writers of the gospels for knowing what Pilate's wife had dreamed? Is it of much consequence to the world what anybody has dreamed at any time?

Are not a full stomach and an undigested supper great incentives to strange and extravagant dreams? Is not, in fact, a dream the most unreliable and baseless of everything connected with the human race?

While the first three gospels have in many respects quite a sameness in style and the events narrated, seeming to have been derived from a common source, is not the fourth gospel of an entirely different character?

Does not John relate of Jesus a different set of miracles, a different and greater assortment of parables, and a different set of incidents? And is not the whole given in language unlike the others?

Does not John have it that Jesus visited Jerusalem four different times, which the others say nothing about?

How is it that John says nothing about the remarkable feats of Jesus, casting out devils from human beings—on one occasion as high as two thousand from a single individual?

How is it that the first great miracle which John narrates as being performed by Jesus, the changing of water into wine at a wedding, is not mentioned by either of the other three? Was it because they were temperance advocates and deemed it wrong to prepare more wine for people who were already drunk?

How is it that John says he cured the son of a courtier or captain of Capernaum of a dangerous illness, and the others said nothing about it?

How is it that John narrates the curing by Jesus of a cripple of thirty-eight years standing and the others have nothing to say upon the subject?

How is it that the great miracle of giving sight to a blind man forty years of age, who had been blind from his birth, should have been narrated by John, and by none of the others?

How is it that the most remarkable of all his miracles—the one said to have been performed in or near Jerusalem, and the one most calculated to attract attention of any of the great works he performed—should have been described by John, and not be noticed by any of the other evangelists?

If the act of raising Lazarus from the dead after he had been four days in the sepulchre, and after decomposition had set in, was really performed by him, must not Matthew, Mark, or Luke have known something of it? If they knew it, and kept silent upon the subject, were they not positively derelict in their duty, and can they be regarded as reliable historians?

Does not the very fact that they said nothing about this remarkable event go very far to show that it never took place?

Is it not true that John's gospel was written long after the others—after the apostles were all dead, after Jerusalem had been destroyed, after all the learned schools of Palestine had been broken up, after all the witnesses had disappeared, and after nearly all the population had been sold into slavery by the bitter cruelty of the Romans?

Was it not written in a foreign country and in a foreign language, and was it not simply a gross imposition to palm it off as a genuine account of thy Son's career on the earth and as written by his disciple John?

But if it was really written by John, the son of Zebedee, and he related marvelous events nearly one hundred years after they transpired, was it not his obvious duty to give not only his own name as the writer, but all the confirmatory proof that would bear upon the matter?

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Popess Joan.

The following brief chapter is from the forthcoming "Champions of the Church:"

"At the beginning of the ninth century, Charles the Great, after having subdued the Saxons, desired to convert them to Christianity, and sent to England for learned priests, who could second him in his plans. In the number of the professors who passed over into Germany was an English priest, accompanied by a young girl whom he had taken into his family to conceal her grossness. The lovers were obliged to interrupt their journey, and stopped at Mayence, where the young English woman gave birth to a daughter, whose adventures were one day to occupy the attention of future ages; this woman was Joan" (Marianus Scotus).

Authors do not agree as to the name she bore in her infancy, some calling her Agnes, others Gerberte, while the Jesuit Sevarius asserts that she was also called Isabella, Marguerite, Dorothea, and Justa; but she is called Joan by far the greater number. The old chroniclers represent her as having been a girl of extraordinary beauty and intelligence. Her father was a learned man, and her mind received the most careful cultivation from him. It is related that at the age of twelve years her instruction, even in scientific subjects, equaled that of the most learned professors of the palatinate, and that her replies excited the admiration and wonder of all the doctors who approached her.

But at length love took the place of learning and changed the destinies of Joan. Her lover was a young monk of the abbey of Fulda. Joan followed the leadings of her heart, and fled with him from the paternal roof. She disguised herself in male attire, and, under the name of English John, followed her lover into the abbey of Fulda. Here she was placed under the direction of the learned Raban-Maur. But such was the constraint under which they found themselves at the convent that they quit it to continue their studies in England. They soon acquired all that the schools of Great Britain could teach them. They then set out on a course of travel to learn the manners and languages of other countries. Joan, still disguised in the frock of a monk, disputed with all the learned doctors that fell in her way. They first visited France, where Joan excited the admiration of such celebrated characters as the duchess Septimania, St. Anscarius, Bertram, and Loup de Ferriere. Traversing Gaul, the lovers embarked at Marseilles for Greece.

At this period old Athens was the centre of science, the focus of learning and polite literature. Joan was then but twenty years old, and in the full flower of her wondrous beauty. Her monastic habit amply concealed her sex, and there, under the beautful skies of Greece, the two English monks pursued their studies unsuspected for three years. Under the most skillful masters, assisted with the best scientific apparatus the world afforded, Joan made prodigious advancement in universal knowledge. Her vast learning and unrivaled eloquence filled with astonishment her captivated audiences. At length her lover suddenly sickened and died, after an illness of but a few hours. This was a terrible blow to Joan. Left alone, and feeling herself abandoned on the earth, she determined to quit Greece. Perhaps one consideration with her was the difficulty in concealing her sex in a land where long beards were worn. At Rome the men were required to keep closely shaved. There was also a larger theatre for her ambition there than at Greece.

And so Joan set out for the holy city. Upon her arrival she secured a situation in the school of the Greeks as a teacher of the seven liberal arts. This academy had already become celebrated under St. Augustine. Joan still further added to its renown. Her audiences were immense. Her eloquence is spoken of as enchanting. She not only continued the studies already taught but introduced a course of abstract sciences which were continued three years, during which time the young professor became famous as the greatest genius of the age. Lords and priests and doctors were among her disciples, and in their admiration the people gave her the name of the Prince of the Wise.

Says Marianus: "Her conduct was as commendable as her abilities; the modesty of her discourse, her manners, the regularity of her morals, her piety, and her good works, shone forth as a light before men." But beneath this hypocritical mask Joan was concealing a gigantic project.

The health of Pope Leo IV. was failing, and Joan's ambition prompted her to intrigue for the throne of St. Peter. At last Leo went the way of all flesh, and the popular professor was unanimously placed at the head of the Roman Church. After an imposing and magnificent ceremony, Joan, attired in the pontifical ornaments, proceeded to the patriarchal palace, accompanied by an immense retinue of cardinals and clergy, deacons and dignitaries of the Church, and took possession of the apostolic chair. This was in the year 853. Joan now enjoyed the full realization of her ambitious dreams, and exercised the supreme authority of the vicar of Jesus Christ on earth. Abbots and archbishops, priests and princes and prelates, were now her faithful servants, and showed their religious reverence by kissing her feet.

For three years this woman discharged the duties of a Roman pontiff, and conducted the political affairs of the Court of Rome with a wisdom that filled Christendom with admiration. The skill of her administration, the purity of her life, and her extraordinary abilities secured for her the respect of the whole world. But a fearful fall awaited her. The pedestal of her power and glory was suddenly broken, and Rome stood appalled at the awful spectacle.

At the period of Rogations, in 855, which was celebrated by a pompous procession, the Popess Joan, as usual, appareled in the papal costume, mounted her horse and proceeded to St. Peter's church, preceded by the cross and sacred banners, and accompanied by cardinals, nobles, and large crowds of people. Arriving at the amphitheatre of Domitian, called the Colosseum, she was suddenly seized with the pains of childbirth, the reins dropped from her hands, and she fell from her horse upon the pavement. The wretched woman was disrobed of the sacred ornaments, and in the midst of the immense crowd, with frightful convulsions, the pope of Rome gave birth to a child in the public street. The priests crowded around her to conceal the shameful spectacle from the people, and during her paroxysms of pain threatened her with the most terrible punishment. She died in the arms of the cardinal priest who had supported her during her sufferings.

Thus died the Popess Joan, after having ruled Rome more than three years. The exasperated priests strangled her child upon the spot. But the citizens of Rome, in consideration of the respect they had so long entertained for her, consented to perform for her the last duties, and they placed her body and that of her child in a tomb on the very spot where the tragic transaction had taken place. A chapel was erected over her tomb, adorned with a marble statue, representing her clothed in papal attire, with a tiara upon her head, and holding a young child in her arms. Pope Benedict III. caused this image to be broken. The ruins of the chapel were to be seen in Rome as late as the fifteenth century.

This event confounded the clergy of Rome. The sacerdotal power had been scandalized and the papal chair disgraced forever by this strange occurrence. A decree was immediately made prohibiting the pontiffs from traversing the street in which the abominable affair happened. Afterwards, on the day of Rogations, the processions from St. Peter's to St. John's made a long circuit to shun the spot where the scandal happened, and to this day there is a certain street in Rome into which the papal procession never enters.

Precautions were at once adopted upon the death of Joan to prevent the repetition of a like imposture. A ceremony was devised for such a special purpose, and the successor of Joan was the first to be submitted to its singular provisions. It is unnecessary to give a detailed account of this ceremony, and perhaps it might be of questionable propriety to do so in this place; but suffice it to say, it consisted in a satisfactory examination of the person of the pontiff by two deacons and assistants appointed for that purpose. In the course of this ceremony use was made of two pierced chairs. Mention is made of these chairs in the consecration of Honorius II. in 1061; that of Paschal in 1099; in that of Urban VI. in 1378, and in that of the infamous Alexander VI., the father of five children and the seducer of his own daughter. The use of these chairs continued until the sixteenth century, and Crassus, master of ceremonies of Leo X., gave a minute report in the journals of Paris of all the particulars of the proof of the pierced chair to which that pontiff was submitted.

But owing to the improvement of manners and the ridicule that attended such an absurd and inconvenient custom, the practice was finally discontinued. The spectacle was judged to be injurious to public morals. The holy chairs were put away in the gallery of the palace of Lateran. Father Mabillon, during his journey into Italy in 1685, examined these chairs with the closest scrutiny and gave a minute description of them. He says they were of porphyry, and similar in form to a sick-couch.

Some ultra-Catholics, firm in the faith that God would not have permitted St. Peter's chair, founded by Jesus Christ himself, to be thus scandalized by a shameless woman, have stubbornly refused to admit the proof of a female pope; but the truth of the above facts are amply attested by the most authentic documents of history. The Ultramontanes of the Catholic Church, unable from the overwhelming evidence to deny the existence of the Popess Joan, having regarded her pontificate as a vacancy in the holy see, and make Benedict III. to succeed Leo IV., holding that a woman could not perform the sacerdotal functions of a successor of St. Peter. Over thirty ecclesiastical authors admit the above-given facts, while refusing to place Joan in the list of popes.

In the cathedral of Sienna, about the middle of the fifteenth century were placed the marble busts of all the popes down to Pius II., who then sat upon the papal stool; and among the number, between that of Leo IV., and Benedict III., was placed the portrait of Joan, with this inscription, "John the Eighth, the female pope." This proves incontestably that a woman gloriously worked her way into the sacred ranks of the rulers of the Church of Rome; and had not the custom of the Church been stronger than truth, Joan would be universally counted as the one hundred and eighth pope. Notwithstanding, fanatical Catholics, aware of the scorn and ridicule which the reign of a female would bring upon their religion, have treated the story of Joan as a fable; and even some Protestant authors have been so illy informed upon the matter as to regard Joan a myth. All the most equitable and trustworthy writers, Catholic as well as Protestant, have frankly admitted the truth respecting the pontificate of Joan. Some of the Catholic authors attempt to defend her reputation, and to prove that the popess honored the Roman see by the splendor of her talents and the display of Christian virtues. On the contrary, Baronius regarded her as a monster, whom heretics had evoked from hell by witchcraft and incantation as a curse to the holy Church. Florimond de Raymond compared her to a second Hercules, who had been sent by heaven as a reproach upon the Roman religion. The English historian Alexander Cook attempts to rescue her memory from the aspersions of her adversaries, and give her a place in the chronological order of the history of the popes. The Jesuit Labbe pronounced the story of the Popess Joan a fable, accusing Luther and Calvin of having originated it; but five hundred years before their time Marianus had written his history of her. He could not have copied from them.

The honest Launoy thus candidly confesses the truth of the story: "It is true that the contemporary ecclesiastics of the times of Leo IV. and Benedict III., through an excessive zeal for religion, have not spoken of this remarkable woman; but their successors, less scrupulous, have at last uncovered the mystery." Marianus Scotus was a devout Catholic. He is recognized by the world as a truthful, judicious, and unprejudiced historian. His probity and ability have never been questioned; and he is the principal authority for the facts herein related concerning Joan. More than a century before his time various authors had given several versions of her pontificate. He thoroughly examined them all, cleared up all doubts, and, as the most learned and conscientious chronicler of his time, his manuscripts, left in the abbey of Fulda, should be received as the highest authority, and as conclusive against anything that the Jesuits can adduce against the existence of the Popess Joan. His attachment to the Roman Church is amply attested by his defense of Gregory VII. against the emperor Henry IV.

There are manuscripts in all the principal libraries of Germany and France, of Oxford and the Vatican, which make mention of Joan. There are autograph manuscripts of monks preserved in the library of the Dome, in France, which contain the minutest details of her history. Now, is it reasonable to suppose that the proudest popes of the Church, laying claim to infallibility, such as Gregory IX., Victor III., Urban II., Paschal II., all contemporaries of Marianus, would have suffered him to fill his history with a story so disgraceful to the religion of Rome, had there not been the most indisputable testimony to support it? Would not all the ecclesiastical writers of the age have given the lie to such an impious and scandalous story?

And so, against the most authentic documents of history, against the amplest testimony of Catholic authors themselves, all that can be adduced in disproof of the story of Joan is the simple negative assertion of those whose reading upon the subject has been limited to Jesuitical writers. Even those Catholic authors who deny the elevation of a female pope admit that there was some mysterious occurrence which broke the succession of the papal sovereigns at the time Joan wore the sacerdotal miter.

The authorities consulted for this brief biographical sketch are those which no scholar, Catholic or Protestant, will gainsay. Among them may be mentioned Mosheim, Baronius, Raymond, Cook, Launoy. Marianus Scotus, De Cormenin, Loughborough, etc.

The supremacy and infallibility of Mother Church rests upon the regular succession of the Roman pontiffs. There was never a devout Catholic who did not sincerely believe that Christ placed Peter in the papal chair and committed to him the keys. But the stubborn facts of history mock the claim that the successor of St. Peter—the vicegerent of God and the visible head of the Church on earth—has always been chosen by inspiration in the holy conclave and determined from on high. The most notable instance on record is the elevation of Joan to the pontifical throne. And all the pompous pretensions of the splendid papal hierarchy resting upon an unbroken chain founded upon the rock, Peter, becomes a fitting subject of scorn as history points her unerring finger to the fact of a female pope giving birth to a child in the streets of Rome. Says the Roman Catholic historian De Cormenin: "The majesty of the priesthood, the pontifical infallibility, the pretensions of the holy see to universal rule, all that scaffolding of superstition and idolatry on which is placed the chair of St. Peter, fall before a female pope."

The forthcoming volume, "The Champions of the Church," is being pushed vigorously to completion. It will contain 1,000 pages, and is said to be one of the most damaging works against Christianity that has ever been published. More orders are solicited. Price in cloth, $3.00; leather, $4.00; morocco and gilt edges, $4.50.

STILL ONWARD.—We observe that Miss Kate Stanton the distinguished public lecturer, has lately graduated as an M. D., at the N. Y. Medical College for Women, in this city, and, the Express says, intends to practice here. Let us modestly suggest that with her brilliant talents as a writer and orator, and her scientific acquirements, Miss Stanton owes it as a duty to her sex to institute here a series of, perhaps private, lectures to women, upon phisiological subjects, the peculiar diseases of women and there cure; and she might profitably to her sex as well as herself visit other cities, with such a series of lectures—which would be still more "onward."

THE EIGHTH ANNUAL CONVENTION of the American Reform League will be held at Science Hall, 141 Eighth street, on the 5th and 6th days of May. E. H. Heywood, J. K. Ingalls, S. Myra Hall, and G. W. Madox are among the speakers who will address the convention.

To Those in Arrears.

Friends, let us say a word to you in the most careful manner. We would not wound your feelings, but we want to tell you how badly we are needing money, and how we wish you would renew for the present year. In its enlarged form, THE TRUTH SEEKER is an expensive paper to publish, and it takes no small amount of money to pay the bills. With the book work we are doing, our expenses amount to over $300 per week. To meet these expenses we have nothing to depend upon save the remittances which our friends send us from various parts of the country. If these sums do not come in sufficient number to meet our needs we are in trouble at once. We have no stockholders to look to unless every patron may be regarded as a stockholder. We know the times are hard and that money is scarce with nearly all our readers, but we hope they will remember our needs and not make us wait too long. There are a large number who have not renewed for the present year, and we hope those who know this to be the case will not make us wait any longer. We would not urge this matter were it not a real necessity. Unfortunately we are not nearly as well off as our enemies represented us. We have no $200,000, nor even $20,000, nor $2,000, and scarcely $200, on hand, while we have many bills to pay.

We are trying to give our readers a paper worth every cent we ask for it, and one of which every American Liberal can well feel proud, and we hope there may be a general disposition to sustain us in the effort we are making. Every person who hangs back and fails to remit us the amount due is really taking the most direct means to kill the paper. If the funds necessary for its support are withheld, it must certainly die. Men and brethren who owe us, do you mean to be the death of us? We hope not, and that every one who has not renewed for the present year will hasten to do so. If it is not convenient to send all, let a part be sent. We are willing to take it almost any way so we get it. The amounts due us are generally small, and a little effort on the part of our numerous friends will help us greatly. May we hope there will be a general feeling among our friends to do their duty in this direction?

We have been sending out notices to those who are in arrears since the first of the year, and it is quite possible our clerk has sent to some that should not be dunned. We hope where this has been done that offense will not be taken. We wish not to give offense. Our desire is to please our patrons by giving them a better paper than they can get any where else, and then that they will be willing and prompt to hold up our hands while we fight the battle of truth and reason.

Those who are not indebted to us, but still feel inclined to render us a little aid, can do so effectually by sending us the name of a new subscriber or ordering a bill of books. We make a moderate profit on the books we sell, and all that is received in that line will send the cheerful sunshine across our pathway, and will cheer us on in the labor we are performing. We trust our friends will not forget us.

"THE LIBERAL AGE."—Under the above title a new candidate for Liberal patronage will soon make its appearance, Oliver Hull Lowrey editor and publisher. It is to be a weekly at $2,00 per year, and will be published at 41 South Clark St., Chicago.

Mr. Lowrey has had considerable experience as a journalist in both this city and Baltimore, and engages in the work with determination and zeal. He proposes to pay considerable attention to his biographical department, and in the first number will give a sketch of Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll with a cut.

He also proposes to keep a full supply of Radical publications for sale, with which to supply the wants of the Liberals who may see fit to patronize him.

We cannot do less than to wish him much success in the enterprise, and to extend to him the right hand of fellowship. Though it seems to us there is a greater need that the Liberal journals we already have should be better sustained rather than there is to increase the number, we nevertheless think Chicago a good point for such an enterprise, and wish friend Lowrey abundant success.

BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY FACE TO FACE.—A pamphlet of 100 pages by our friend J. M. Peebles, and recently published in London, has been sent us by the author, who has nearly completed his second circuit of the globe. It is composed principally of a debate between a Buddhist priest and a Christian (Wesleyan) priest, held at Pantura on the island of Ceylon before an interested audience of over 5,000 persons, and in which the merits of the two systems of religion were pretty thoroughly canvassed and criticised, and in which the Buddhist priest acquitted himself at least with equal credit to the Christian. The whole is accompanied by an introduction and annotations. It possesses unusual interest.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will lecture at Springfield Ill., April 14th; Kirksville, Mo., 16th to 21st; Warsaw, Mo., 23d, 24d, 25th.

HONOR is like an island, rugged and without a landing place; we can never more re-enter when we are once outside of it.

THE prevailing manners of an age depend, more than we are aware of, or are willing to allow, on the conduct of the women; this is one of the principal things on which the great machine of human society turns. Those who allow the influence which female graces have in contributing to polish the manners of men would do well to reflect how great an influence female morals must have on their conduct.

The New Scripture.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus.

CHAPTER VII.

THE CITY AND THE GATES.

The City and its Thousand and Seven Gates.—Guides with Mystic Bottles.—Simon and Hydrocephalus.—Simon's entrance into the City of Conversion.—Receives the Glass of Faith.

1. Now, the city of Conversion was a great city, and round about it was a wall built of huge and rough stones, and they were exceedingly soft, and had no strength in them; and the names of the stones were Fancies, except the bigger of them, which were called by the learned, Fictions; and the foundation of the whole city was of Sackcloth and Ashes.

2. And in the wall of the city were a thousand and seven gates, besides many that were built up, and some that were about to be opened.

3. And over every gate was written in letters of blood these words, This is the way, and he that entereth by any other gate is a thief and a robber.

4. And by every gate was one of the guide-books open; and a guide stood by showing to the pilgrims that came that his gate, and his only, was the one through which the book directed them to enter; and over every gate were many figures and strange devices.

5. But the devices were diverse from each other, and did not accord one with another.

6. Over one gate was the figure of a man crowned with three crowns, and he had a key in his hand, and the name of that gate was Katholikos.

7. And over another gate was the figure of a goose, and beneath it the man with the three crowns was kindling a fire; and the name of that gate was Bo.

8. And over another gate was the figure of a marten; and below that a temple, having at its western end a large tower, and upon the tower a crown; and the name of that gate was Etats.

9. And over another gate was the figure of a certain plant called kale, and a vine; and a temple with a tower, albeit there was no crown to the tower, but, instead thereof, a lamb. And the people of this gate boasted that such of the pilgrims as entered by their gate could not afterwards by any means get out of the roadway, for that they had hedged it in, and the name of that gate was Electio.

10. And over another gate was the figure of a lighted lantern and a fox; and the name of that gate was Des-amis.

11. And over another gate was the figure of a man in a pool of water; and the name of that gate was Aquatilia.

12. And over another gate was the figure of a serpent giving suck to a young kid, and of a wolf sporting with a ram; and beneath was the figure of an old man, having wings upon his shoulders, and in his hand a reaping-hook; and the reaping-hook was well nigh worn away by much usage; and behind the old man with wings there was the figure of an angel, having no belly; and he held aloft, over the head of the old man having wings, a huge hollow cone, as if he would bring it down and smother him thereby; and the name of that gate was Millennium.*

13. But time would fail us to speak of all the gates, therefore these shall suffice.

14. And by the gates were many of the guides standing, some with trumpets, some with horns, others with baskets of brimstone and fire, others with censers of smoke, others with nets full of very fine dust.

15. And when any of the pilgrims of the roadway came up, there immediately arose a hubbub, and a tumult, and shoutings, and revilings, and much heavenly howling.

16. For the guides belonging to the various gates loved each other mightily, and lent each other many charitable cuffs, and fought stoutly for the pilgrims, and condemned each other to the flames with abundant heartiness and indisputable equity.

17. But by the gate Des-amis was a man of sober and sedate aspect, looking neither this way, nor that, nor any way; and his hands were clasped together, and the thumb of his right hand revolved as it were in a circle, and the thumb of the left hand pursued it for ever and ever, yea, from everlasting to everlasting did it pursue. Selah.

18. And I, Philo Aletheia, perceived that many of the men of the gates had on great and greasy cloaks, and under their cloaks had some of them certain bottles, and upon the bottles were exceedingly strange and marvelous devices engraven.

19. And the hieroglyphics upon the bottles were a hidden and ineffable mystery, the meaning whereof no man can tell. And the number of the mystic hieroglyphics were the sacred three.

20. And the first hieroglyphic was like unto a half-circle thickened and, as it were, bent upon itself at the lower end; and the second was a straight line erect; and the third was two straight-lines erect, having another line proceeding from the top of the first straight line erect to the bottom of the second.

21. And within the vessels, whereon were the triune hieroglyphics, was a certain curious and potent liquid, the smell whereof was like unto the smell of juniper berries; and the liquid was called by some the water of life, by others the spirit, and by others the comforter; and they who drank plentifully thereof were filled with the spirit, whose surname is the Ghost, and spake with tongues of fire and prophesied.

22. Now when Simon came out of the valley, and saw the city and its gates, he was filled with astonishment; and perceiving the inscriptions that were written over the gates, that they were all written with letters of blood, and all of them alike saying, This is the way; and he that entereth by any other gate is a thief and a robber, he began to be confounded, and marveled with himself how they should all be the right way, when there could be but one right way.

23. And while he debated with himself, the guides about the gates perceived him, and beset him on all sides, each bidding him to come in by their gate, and moving him thereto with many hard threats and emollient promises.

24. And they took hold of him and dragged him this way and that, and the other also. And Simon was utterly confounded, and bestirred himself to go every way, and went none.

25. But presently there came up from the gate called Aquatilia a man of pallid aspect, whose name was Hydrocephalus*, and his voice was like unto the croaking of a multitude of frogs; and he approached Simon and said unto him,

26. Oh, son of my yearning bowels, rejoice that I have found thee; for, verily, if thou goest with me, thou art as a brand plucked from the fire. But, said Simon, What meaneth these other gates, and how should they also be the right way, and each of them the only one? Then answered Hydrocephalus, saying, Heed them not, my son, they are but snares to entrap the unwary; turn away thine eyes from beholding them, and come with us. Look, then, into thy guide-book, first putting on thy glass, and thou wilt know for a surety that ours is the right way.

27. So Simon looked where the guide bid him, and was satisfied, and would have gone with Hydrocephalus, had there not come up a guide from the gate called Electio, and the name of this guide was Cannotbedamned.

28. And Cannotbedamned had an open guide-book in his hand, and he howled furiously at Simon, saying, Read it, and thou wilt perceive that there is no way but ours.

29. And Cannotbedamned would have taken hold of Simon, but that he was filled with the spirit; yea, verily, he was loaded therewith, and, by reason of his burden, he staggered to and fro, and went hither and thither, and elsewhere, and all manner of ways; and his voice was thick, and his words came out of his mouth as it were in great bundles: and when he would have gone forward the spirit drew him violently back, and when he would have gone to the right the spirit sent him vehemently to the left.

30. And when Cannotbedamned perceived that the spirit would not let him approach Simon, he suddenly lay down on the ground, and began to speak in an unknown tongue, and his speech issued from his nostrils; and Simon opened his ears and his mouth and hearkened.

31. And Simon marveled and drew near to Cannotbedamned, and looked into his guide-book and perceived that the gate called Electio was indeed the right way, and would have gone in thereat, except that Hydrocephalus was dragging him to the other, other, even that called Aquatilia.

32. And when Cannotbedamned had made an end of his discourse in unknown tongues, he looked up and saw Simon about to enter the city by the gate Aquatilia, and immediately he leapt up and ran and caught Simon by one of his legs and pulled it within the gateway of the gate Electio, and Hydrocephalus laid hold of Simon's other leg and drew into the other gateway, for the two gateways were next to each other.

33. And there came up some with the nets of fine dust, and beat Simon with them on the face, so that his eyes were filled with the dust; and others came with baskets of brimstone and fire, and others with censers of smoke, and they all let go together, and Hydrocephalus and Cannotbedamned tugged away mightily.

